This being the firſt opportunity of my writing to Italy, ſince our arrival before Cagliari, will plead my pardon that I did not ſooner tell your lordſhip, that we anchored before the town the 3d inſtant in the afternoon, and ſent a ſummons to the vice-king, to render the town and kingdom of Sardinia to the obedience of king Charles, with a letter to the burghers, to aſſure them of their effects and ancient privileges, in caſe they made their obedience. The officer ſent had leave to wait four hours for an anſwer, if required; at which time, being night, he returned, with an anſwer from the vice-king, that it was ſo late, that he could not that night get all the government together, but would do it the next morning, and ſend their anſwers. We judged it beſt to keep on the fright, and cauſe no delay, and that inſtant began bombarding, and hove that night an hundred and twenty ſhells into the town, and landed our men at the point of day; and, as ſoon it was light, the vice-king ſent off a flag of truce, to deſire to capitulate; after which the mob took poſſeſſion of the gates, and delivered them up to us. Thus we have got a city much ſtronger than Barcelona, and that has eighty-ſeven braſs cannon mounted, and the whole iſland, without the loſs of a man. In our capitulation we obliged them to furniſh Catalonia immediately with fourteen hundred tons of corn, and to-morrow it will ſail for Catalonia, it being embarked in our tranſports.

Laſt night we received letters from the king of Spain and Mr. Stanhope, and news, that the king had appointed fifteen hundred ſoldiers under Mr. Stanhope, to go to reduce the iſland of Majorca and the fortreſs of Port-Mahon. He deſires our aſſiſtance in the ſame; on which we this morning agreed to go to that ſervice, and to-morrow we ſail for that iſland; and though the French have a garriſon there, yet, if the weather proves good, I believe we may ſay we ſhall carry it. This will ſuit us in viſiting the pope, as we intended, for helping the pretender, till another ſeaſon. But after this ſervice our winter-ſhips will go to Naples, to convoy to Catalonia the troops the king expects from thence, and the reſt of our ſhips will be obliged to go home to refit for the next year, &c. I am, &c. JOHN NORRIS.

[k] Minorca (ſo called from being leſs than Majorca, another iſland about ſix leagues from it (lies in the Mediterranean. Its great length is forty-five, and greateſt breadth about twenty-four Engliſh miles. The chief places are, 1. Citadella, on the ſouth-weſt ſide about the middle of the iſland, in the bottom of a bay, thought to be the Jamma of Ptolemy. 2. Fort Formelli on the north-eaſt ſide over againſt Citadella. 3. Port Mahon at the bottom of a large bay, which runs about three Spaniſh miles to the ſouth-eaſt. The harbour is guarded by fort St. Philip, and is accounted the beſt and largeſt in the Mediterranean. Minorca lies in lat. 39. 45. It was taken by general Stanhope in 1708, and confirmed to the Engliſh by the treaty of Utrecht.

but as to forces he could ſpare none, for we were then within four miles of the enemy, who were much ſuperior to us, and we daily expected to be attacked. However, Staremberg conſented that Stanhope ſhould take Southwell's regiment, a battalion of Neapolitans, another of Portugueſe, and a ſmall detachment of Spaniards. All which marched immediately to Barcelona. General Stanhope follows them, on the 10th, and had the good fortune of meeting there with brigadier Wade, juſt returned from London, which was a great advantage to him. The 21ſt, he embarks with this handful of men and a few dragoons. What was wanting in troops was in ſome meaſure made up by a fine train of Britiſh artillery, with mules to draw it, commanded by colonel Boreguard, with that excellent engineer brigadier Petit, who in that capacity, might be ſaid to have taken and defended Barcelona, for which ſevices king Charles had raiſed him to the office of a general officer. Stanhope was here informed of the ſtrength of the garriſon of fort St. Philip, which would have damped the courage of any man that had not been ſo zealous in the undertaking. The fleet and tranſports ſailed from Barcelona the 23d, and the men landed the 26th to the ſouth-weſt of fort St. Philip, within two miles of it. As they ſailed by the fort, the garriſon was not a little intimidated, to ſee a fleet with two flags (Leake and Whitaker) and ſo many tranſports, expecting no leſs than an army of ten or twelve thouſand men; and, indeed, it had the appearance of it. With the four battalions were landed about ſeven hundred and ſixty marines, commanded by colonel Lee, which made up the whole number, officers included, three thouſand two hundred and ſixty four[l]. This little army marched to a riſing ground over-againſt the fort, having made as great a ſhow as poſſible in their march; for it was all in ſight of the enemy, whoſe alarms were much increaſed by it; and ſtill more when they ſaw our troops drawn up in a long line where they could be ſeen, but the beſt perſpective glaſs could not diſcover whether there was a ſecond or third line. From hence they went that evening to a camp marked out by the engineer, within leſs than two miles of the fort. The garriſon conſiſted of a thouſand Spaniards, and ſix hundred French marines, under the command of colonel la Jonquiere, an old officer, who was ſent there by way of puniſhment, for not behaving ſo well as was expected from him againſt the Cevonnois. The inhabitants of Minorca were very much for us, being weary of the yoke of their king, who had taken all their privileges from them as he had done from his ſubjects in the kingdom of Arragon, from whence they had been tranſplanted to this iſland.

Batteries were erected the next day, and the morning after they began to fire againſt two of the four towers, which are built at proper diſtances like baſtions, in a wall of ſtones without cement that covers the fort a quarter of a mile from it, and that from ſea to ſea. Theſe towers were ſoon battered down by our cannon. They had four pieces of cannon in each, with room enough for cannoneers, and ammunition. General Stanhope who ſhanted to induce the garriſon to a ſpeedy ſurrender, ordered a great many papers to be writ in Spaniſh and French, in which he offered very honourable terms to the beſieged, if they did not put him to the trouble of raiſing batteries; but, if they refuſed, he threatened that all the Spaniards ſhould be ſent to the mines, and the French be worſe uſed. Theſe papers were tied round arrows, which were ſhot in great numbers into the ſuburbs of the fort, and into the vacancy between the fort and the ſtone wall, where ſmall parties were placed to obſerve us. It was by a ſhot from one of theſe parties that Mr. Philip Stanhope, brother to the general, captain of the Milford galley, a young gentleman of great hopes, was killed, the ball fixing in his forehead, as he was held up by two of his ſailors to look over the wall, which was nine feet high.

The arrows had a good effect, eſpecially upon the Spaniards, who dreaded the mines. After the towers were beat down, the cannon continued to fire upon the wall, and, in a ſhort time, levelled it to the ground. Through the breach general Wade marched to a redoubt, at the head of all the grenadiers and ſome marines, with ſo much intrepidity, even within reach of the enemy's fire, that it ſtruck the garriſon (as one of the officers afterwards told our author) with admiration and terror, inſomuch that the ſoldiers could not be brought to fire at them, though commanded, and the cannon could not reach them, the ground being too low where they marched. Wade took the redoubt, left ſome men in it, and returned to the camp unattacked.

The next day their panic increaſed; a battery of large cannon was fixed againſt fort St. Philip, and the firſt ball was ordered to be ſo fired, as to fall in the ditch; which it did, and was immediately taken up and carried to the governor. A council of war was inſtantly held, wherein it was reſolved, by a ſmall majority, to beat a parley. Hoſtages were quickly exchanged, and Wade was ſent to agree on a capitulation. When he came to the governor's houſe, he found the large ball on the table, which moſt of the officers had been wondering at. They were not many hours in agreeing upon the following terms: The garriſon was to march out the next day with all the marks of honour, and to be ſhipped off immediately; the Spaniards to be tranſplanted to a harbour in Murcia, and the French to Marſeilles or Toulon: The magazines to be given up, their arms to be left in the court of the fort, and the outward gate to be delivered into our hands that evening, as ſoon as the capitulation was ſigned; which was done in a ſhort time, and a guard was ordered to the gate. Wade returned to the general in the camp, and both were extremely well pleaſed with this ſucceſs.

On the morrow Wade went with all the forces to ſee the garriſon evacuate the fort; and he had not men enough to form the two lines through which the garriſon was to march to the ſea-ſide, except they were placed at an unuſual diſtance. The enemy then ſaw their miſtake, as well as before, when they were coming up from the camp, but, was too late. All the boats of the fleet which were come into the harbour the night before, when the capitulation was ſigned, were ordered to attend the garriſon into the tranſports. When the French were got into three veſſels, a field officer was ſent to let them know, that general Stanhope made them priſoners of war by way of repriſals for the garriſon of Denia, which, after a brave defence, were, contrary to the capitulation, made priſoners of war by count d'Aſfeld.

Fort St. Philip being in our hands, the whole iſland gladly ſubmitted, except Port-Fornelli. On the 17th of Auguſt, Sir John Leake, with the Dutch, ſailing for England, Whitaker, rear-admiral of the red, was left with his ſquadron before Port-Mahon, who, with a few men of war ſailing to Port-Fornelli, and meeting little reſiſtance, brought away the garriſon, conſiſting of about two hundred men, priſoners of war. Thus the conqueſt of the whole iſland, with the loſs only of forty men killed or wounded, was finiſhed in leſs than three weeks, to the great admiration of all Europe. The beſiegers found in the forts about a hundred pieces of cannon, three thouſand barrels of powder, and all things neceſſary for a good defence. The Spaniards were all carried to Murcia, except the inhabitants of the ſuburbs, who had liberty to return to their houſes. As ſoon as they landed, the governor threw himſelf out of a window and died. The French marines were ſent to France, except a captain, who refuſed to ſign the capitulation, and two lieutenants, who were left to take care of the priſoners, that were detained on account of the affair of Denia. When they arrived at Toulon, Lajonquiere was confined for life, and all the captains received marks of their maſter's diſpleaſure. But the captain, who ſtood out againſt the capitulation, was promiſed a reward. General Stanhope appointed brigadier Petit, governor of fort St. Philip, and deputy-governor of the whole iſland. By this conqueſt our fleet had got a ſafe port to lie in and refit, and to retire to on all occaſions; for till then we had no place nearer than Liſbon [m].

Beſides the conqueſt of Minorca by the allies, and the

[l] Engliſh ——— ——— ——— 751
Neapolitans — — — 718
Spaniards — — — 298
Portugueſe ——— ——— ——— 757
Marines — — — 760
3284

[m] The earl of Sunderland wrote the following letter to general Stanhope upon the reduction of Minorca:

Whitehall, October 20, 1708.

Sir,

I received on Monday the favour of yours of the 30th of September, N. S. by captain Moyſer, with the welcome news of your having taken Port Mahon; which, though it came at the ſame time as the news of taking of Liſle, yet was not at all leſſened by it: Every body looking upon our being in poſſeſſion of Port Mahon as of the laſt conſequence to the carrying on the war in Spain; beſides the other advantages, which, if we are wiſe, we may reap from it, both in war and peace. I cannot expreſs to you the ſenſe the queen, and every body here, has of your zeal and conduct in this affair, to which this very important ſucceſs is ſo much owing. I heartily condole with you for the loſs of your brother, which indeed is a public loſs to us all, he was ſo deſerving a young man. As ſoon as we heard of your being gone upon this expedition, orders were ſent to ſir George Byng, as ſoon as he ſhould come to Liſbon, to carry with him into the Mediterranean a ſufficient quantity of ſtores for a ſquadron to winter there; and, upon the good news captain Moyſer has brought, thoſe orders are renewed, ſo that you may depend upon that being effectually provided for. I do not ſay any thing to you taking of Tortoſa by the duke of Orleans, nothing conſiderable was undertaken during the campaign, though the armies were incamped ſome months within a few miles of one another. But the enemies would not venture to attack us, notwithſtanding their ſuperiority; and marſhal Staremberg, who was reckoned the beſt general of the age for the defenſive, was contented to preſerve what we had left in Catalonia. Our army went into winter quarters the laſt of October; and, about the middle of November, the generals Starember and Stanhope formed the deſign of ſurpriſing Tortoſa, which was executed with the greateſt ſecrecy, but not with the expected ſucceſs. A detachment chiefly of grenadiers went, the 22d at night, to ſcalade the town, but, by the ignorance or treachery of the guides, the firſt ladders were ſet up over againſt the main guard, and cloſe to it: ſo that the whole garriſon was immediately alarmed, and marched to Barcelona gate, where the grenadiers were endeavouring to get the baſtion that covered it, who were ſo warmly attacked, that they were forced to retire, leaving many men killed, and moſt of the reſt wounded. This put an end to the deſign, and to all the operations of the campaign [n].

Beſides the having a ſafe port to retire to, the conqueſt of Minorca brought a further advantage to the allies, by defeating the French king's project of uniting the princes and ſtates of Italy in a league againſt the emperor, in order to rekindle war in that country: And a confederate fleet was ſeaſonably at hand to aſſiſt the Imperialiſts, who made a conſiderable progreſs in the eccleſiaſtical ſtate, and threatened to march to Rome, upon the following occaſion:

The emperor, and his brother, king Charles, had, for ſeveral years, impatiently borne the pope's partiality, which was of great prejudice to their affairs, and, in conſequence, to the common cauſe. But the pope having openly owned his engagements with the houſe of Bourbon, and his deſigns againſt that of Auſtria, and the whole confederacy, by his proceeding in relation to the pretender's expedition to Scotland, which, if attended with ſucceſs, would have ruined the grand alliance, and given a fatal wound to the liberties of Europe; the ſame did not only moſt ſenſibly affect thoſe two potentates and the duke of Savoy, againſt whoſe juſt pretenſions in eccleſiaſtical affairs the pope had fulminated his cenſures, but was reſented, with due indignation, by her Britannic Majeſty. Hereupon, the eccleſiaſtical revenues in the kingdom of Naples and duchy of Milan, belonging to perſons reſiding out of thoſe countries, who had neglected to take the oaths to king Charles, were put under ſequeſtration by the Imperial officers. And, not many days after, while the pope held a congregation about that affair, cardinal Grimani not only notified to him the diſyou of what you mention in relation to the troops from Naples, becauſe you will receive by Mr. Craggs the queen's approbation of what you have done in relation to it. I ſend you incloſed a letter of the queen's to the counteſs of Oropeſa, writ with her own hand. You will receive directions from my lord treaſurer, to give her, at the ſame, from the queen, the thouſand pounds you have ſo often mentioned. I muſt not omit telling you, that the queen does entirely approve of your leaving an Engliſh garriſon in Port Mahon, for the reaſons you mention, though ſome of them muſt be kept very ſecret. Her majeſty does approve alſo of the governor you have named, and is very well ſatisfied with your having the commiſſion you mention from the king of Spain, being ſatisfied you make no uſe of it but what is for the public ſervice. I have nothing more to trouble you with, but to aſſure you, that I am, with the greateſt truth and eſteem,

Sir,

Your moſt faithful humble ſervant,

SUNDERLAND.

P. S. Beſides the orders that are gone to ſir George Byng, captain Moyſer carries with him orders from the prince to ſir Edward Whitaker, in relation to the ſquadron's wintering at Port Mahon. You will receive with this packet a letter of the queen's to the king of Spain, in favour of the conde de Salazar, at the deſire and recommendation of ſeveral Spaniſh and Canary merchants.

[n] In our return from the camp to Barcelona (ſays the author of the manuſcript account of the campaigns in Spain) I went with major general Carpenter to view the convent of Mountſerrat, ſixteeen miles from it, which, for miracles and riches, is ſaid to be equal, and, by the Catalans, far to out-do that of the lady of Loretto. The treaſure of this chapel is immenſe in jewels and plate, and the income of the fryars, who are forty benedictines, beſides lay-brothers, is very conſiderable; and all owing to the pretended miracles of the bleſſed virgin, whoſe ſtatue in wood, of a very curious workmanſhip, and believed to be ſent by St. Peter from Rome to Barcelona, and carved by St. Luke, is ſet up behind the great altar. The mountain, on which the convent ſtands at the half way, is exceeding high and beautiful; the very top nature has adorned with twelve high rocks at equal diſtances, in the ſhape of ſugar loaves, which bear the names of the twelve apoſtles; in each a hermitage is built, little frequented, becauſe inacceſſible, but all inhabited by hermits, men of good families, and all reputed of great ſanctity. A German captain left his command and retired into one of them, having made great intereſt to obtain the firſt vacancy; there was a hermitage ſome hundreds of years, where this magnificent convent ſtands now. Great devotions were paid to a little ſtatue of the virgin which was worſhipped here, and abundance of miracles wrought, but none ſo wonderful as thoſe of the laſt found out ſtatue, which they tell you was found out in this manner: Some centuries ago, great numbers of people of the neighbouring towns, going in proceſſion to this hermitage on the feaſt of the aſſumption, in the month of Auguſt, were very much frightened, as they came to the bottom of this mountain, by a bull's coming out of a thicket, jumping and leaping in ſuch a manner, as drove moſt of the proceſſioners back, except the prieſts and ſome of the boldeſt Catalans, who were big with expectation of ſome miracle, which was ſoon wrought in their ſight; for this bull ſtopped of himſelf, after they had uſed their beſt endeavours to drive him away, about a hundred yards from the place where he came out; here he began to tear up the ground with his feet and horns, which confirmed the people in hopes of a miracle, and, ſpades and pick-axes being immediately ſent for, they began to dig up that ſpot where this famous ſtatue was found, and carried with extraordinary devotions and rejoicings into the chapel of the hermitage; here it was ſet up in the room of the little one, being well cleaned and varniſhed, and provided with fine cloaths, and ſuch crowds came to this place from all the parts of the kingdom, and from all the iſlands, as not only enriched the hermitage, but the whole neighbourhood: I aſked whether the bull was not canonized, the fryar anſwered me, no; but however the bull was very well taken care of, and had in great veneration, and religiouſly viſited as long as he lived, which was to an uncommon old age. As to the miracles wrought by the lady of Mountſerrat, they outdo many of thoſe that are recorded in their legend; but I ſhall relate only that, which was the occaſion of building that famous monaſtry: One Garinus, hermit in this place, debauched a beautiful young lady, daughter of the count of Barcelona, ſovereign of all Catalonia, who came to perform her devotions at the hermitage in her father's company, who uſed frequently to come to this mountain to hunt roebucks and wild-goats, with which it abounded. After this horrid fact, the young lady was deſtroyed, and her body caſt into a very deep ditch behind this hermitage, which the hermit carefully covered up; and then begun his journey to Rome, in the night, to ſue for a pardon and abſolution from the pope. When the count ſent for his daughter, neither ſhe nor the hermit were to be found, which cauſed a great affliction in the count's family, and many ſevere reflections againſt the young lady and the hermit, who were judged to have abſconded together. The penance impoſed by the pope on the hermit, was, that he ſhould return to the mountain in the night, ſtrip himſelf quite naked, walk upon all four, live upon graſs, and never ſtand upright before ſeven years were expired, and his lodging was to be in the hole of ſome rock; and that during the time of his penance, he ſhould not ceaſe to put up his prayers to the lady of the hermitage, that the count's daughter might be reſtored to life. The penance was ſtrictly performed, and in the middle of the ſeventh year, the count went for the firſt time, ſince this misfortune, to hunt on the mountain, when the dogs made up to the habitation of Garinus, and would have torn him to pieces, if the huntſmen had not made haſte to his reſcue: They were ſurprized to find a kind of monſter, who would not ſpeak, nor lift himſelf up, though he had the ſhape and features of a man. The count ordered him to be tied and led to Barcelona, where he continued chained in the corner of a ſtable, without eating any human food, but herbs, and many people had the ſight of this monſter. At laſt, on the very day that the ſeven years expired, the count made a very great feaſt for his family and others of his friends. Some of the company deſiring to ſee the monſter, he was brought to the door, when a child of five or ſix months old, ſon to one of the count's daughters, fixing his eyes upon him, ſpoke theſe words with a loud voice, Garinus riſe up, thy ſins are forgiven thee; upon which he run back with his keeper to the ſtable, the company being all ſtruck with fear and amazement at this great miracle: He began to ſpeak to his keeper, and deſired a ſheet to cover himſelf with, and that he would go to the count to obtain leave to come into his preſence, having a very great ſecret to reveal to him. He was immediately admitted, and upon his knees confeſſed his crime, but aſſured the count withal, that by his continued prayers to the lady of Mountſerrat, and her prevailing interceſſion, his daughter would be found living, and as well in all reſpects as ever ſhe was. The miracle of the child's ſpeaking made the count believe without heſitation all that Garinus told him, ſo that he gave immediate directions for a very grand proceſſion of all the orders of fryars and others to go to the holy mountain, for ſo it is called, to ſee the miracle that was wrought upon his daughter. When they came there, the young lady was found, and preſented to her father, in the ſame clothes ſhe had on when ſhe went from him, and looking as freſh, as young, and as well, as if ſhe had never gone from her father's houſe. The count was affected with ſo much gratitude for this ſurpriſing miracle in favour of his family, that he made a vow, before he left the place, to build and to endow that large monaſtry, that is now there. This whole hiſtory is beautifully painted in the cloyſters of the convent, and for the ſatisfaction of all ſtrangers, who reſort thither in great numbers yearly, it is printed upon large paper, and upon very thin ſilk, to make it more portable, and ſold for half a crown. The lay-brother, who ſhews the curioſities of this place, is a Fleming, and ſpeaks ſeveral languages: He was lieutenant in count Noyelles's regiment, and preferred this idle life to the fatigues of an army. After we had viewed every thing and eſpecially the treaſure, which, if all the jewels it contains be real, is beyond all valuation, we were carried to the abbot's apartment, where a nice collation was provided. After we had partaken of it, I walked with the interpreter into a balcony, into which the abbot's dining-room opens; from hence he ſhewed me the hole in the rock, where the famous Garinus lived during his penance: I aſked him in French whether he did believe it; the abbot who was talking with general Carpenter, who ſpoke very good Spaniſh, overheard me, and in a kind of emotion told me, yes, ſir, we believe it as much as we do the goſpel, which put a ſtop to all farther inquiries. Speaking of the richneſs and beauty of the crowns, that are put upon the ſtatue's head, eſpecially on great feſtivals, the abbot told us, that a Fleming jeweller was a good many years in making that of diamonds, that it is reputed worth ſixteen millions of pieces of eight, and that of emeralds, by reaſon of the bigneſs of the ſtones, is reckoned worth little leſs. That of diamonds is certainly, for the largeneſs of the ſtones, and the beautiful order in which they are fixed, the moſt excellent and richeſt piece of work of that kind now extant; and, to ſet it off the more, the top of it is a complete ſhip with maſts, and ſails, and cordage, &c. all of diamonds, a preſent of Iſabella, queen of Arragon. And it is no wonder if this place be ſo immenſely rich, conſidering the numberleſs vows, that are made by perſons in all ſickneſſes and diſtreſſes, eſpecially by women in labour, which are always very religiouſly performed. The two kings Charles and Philip made here their vows for the ſucceſs of their arms, and did offer each his preſent at the altar of the ſhrine; the firſt of a rich ſword ſet with diamonds, and the other of a gold chalice enriched with many jewels. They have in the outſide of the convent a good large houſe for the entertainment of ſtrangers, and of all the people that come to pay their vows, with very good accommodations, which brings a great yearly income.

appointment of the pretender's expedition, but, as a viceroy of Naples, and a grandee of Spain, ſignified to him, That king Charles expected he ſhould ſend a nuncio to Barcelona, to acknowledge him as king of Spain, deſiring his holineſs to conſider the fatal conſequences of his delaying that recognition, and continuing to own his competitor. Beſides which, at the ſolicitation of the court of Great Britain, the emperor was determined, in concert with duke of Savoy, to revive his old pretenſions to Comachio, and other places in the Ferrareſe, in order to check the pope, and oblige him to enter into ſuch meaſures, with reſpect to the rights and late acquiſitions of king Charles, as equity, and the peace and welfare of Naples and the Milaneſe, with the firm eſtabliſhment of their preſent ſovereign, neceſſarily required. The court of Rome ordered their miniſter at Vienna, to communicate to the emperor a letter from ſignior Piazza, ſecretrary of the memorials to the pope, wherein he endeavoured to extenuate what his holineſs was charged with, on occaſion of the late French expedition againſt Great Britain, though whatever arts they uſed to cover their remittances of money into France, they could not palliate the pope's appointing public prayers for the intended invaſion. On the other hand, the pope's refuſal to ſend, according to king Charles's demand, a legate a latere, to compliment his royal conſort in her paſſage through Italy, and to treat her as queen of Spain, having given a freſh diſguſt to the courts of Vienna and Barcelona, the Imperial troops, commanded by monſieur de Bonneval, in conjunction with thoſe of the duke of Modena, invaded the duchy of Ferrara, and took poſſeſſion of Comachio, a ſea-port town on the Adriatic ſea, Lugo, Argenta, Canale, Preſnero, Magnavacca, Condegoro, Pampoſa, Bagnecavallo, and ſome other ſmall places, on pretence of their being allodial ſtates, belonging to the duke of Modena, and fiefs of the emperor, to which the holy ſee had no lawful claim, and which were expreſsly excepted in the treaty between Clement the eighth, and Cæſar of Eſte. At the ſame time, the viceroy of Naples forbid, on pain of death or baniſhment, the remitting any money to Rome, or any other part of the territories of the church; and the council of the kingdom drew up a long memorial of the pretenſions of his catholic majeſty againſt the court of Rome, which ſtruck at the very foundations of the temporal power of the pope. Upon the firſt alarm of the Imperialiſts marching into the Ferrareſe, the pope wrote a letter to the emperor, wherein he remonſtrated, "That theſe things were attempted by the abuſe of his Imperial majeſty's name, againſt all juſtice, equity, and reverence due to the Roman pontiff, and the rights of the church: That they were contrary to the divine and human laws, and repugnant to the title of the defender of the church, which his famous anceſtors had taken as a great honour and glory." The pope declared withal, "That he would aſſert this cauſe, though he ſhould be ſure to loſe his life upon that account." But, before his letter reached Vienna, general Bonneval had put his orders in execution; and, when received, it rather exaſperated than allayed the reſentment of the emperor, who thereby plainly ſaw, that the pope was ſo far from offering any ſatisfaction, that, on the contrary, he threatened him both his ſpiritual and temporal arms. And, indeed, the pope reſolved to repel force by force; and, for that purpoſe, began to raiſe an army, the command of which he gave to count Marſigli, who was formerly diſmiſſed the emperor's ſervice, for not performing his duty at the ſiege of Briſac. At the ſame time, the pope's miniſters revived the project, which they had ſet on foot three years before, of a league of the princes and ſtates of Italy, for their mutual ſecurity, which was defeated by the terror of the confederate fleet. Nor had his holineſs's earneſt application to the French king for ſuccours better ſucceſs, that prince having, at this juncture, too much work upon his own hands, and his country lying, beſides, at too great a diſtance from the eccleſiaſtical ſtate. Notwithſtanding theſe diſappointments, the court of Rome went on with their new levies, which were encreaſed by the troops ſent from Avignon. But though the pope's ſubjects drew the firſt blood in the Ferrareſe, and forced the Germans to quit ſeveral poſts; yet the emperor, chuſing rather the way of negotiation than of the ſword, ſent orders to the marquis de Prie, a Piedmonteſe lord, to purſue his journey to Rome, to know from the pope himſelf, Whether he would have peace or war? In the mean time, his Imperial majeſty, and the duke of Savoy, by their interceſſion with the queen of Great Britain, ſuſpended the execution of the orders ſent to ſir John Leake for bombarding and deſtroying Civita Vecchia.

The pope's coffers being exhauſted, he held a conſiſtory on the 24th of September, N. S. at which aſſiſted forty-two cardinals, whom he acquainted, "That he was obliged to have recourſe to extraordinary means, and therefore thought, that part of the three millions of golden crowns, depoſited by Sixtus the fifth in the caſtle of St. Angelo, ought to be employed in theſe preſſing neceſſities of the church." His propoſal appeared extraordinary to ſome cardinals, who repreſented, that this treaſure was ſacred, and never to be made uſe of, but when all other means failed: That the preſent caſe of the church was indeed difficult enough, yet far from being deſperate, ſince they had to deal with the firſt chriſtian prince, who could not have in view the deſtruction of the church: That this diſpute might be made up in a pacific way, inſtead of being decided by the ſword. And therefore they exhorted the pope to conſider ſeriouſly the fatal conſequences of a raſh rupture with the emperor, and to ſtand on his guard againſt the ſuggeſtions of ſome fiery perſons, who were altogether for war, in hopes to better their fortunes during the confuſions of it. But this repreſentation had little effect upon the pope, who was too partial to hearken to any advice, that was not for the intereſt of France; and, moſt of the cardinals there preſent being of the French and Spaniſh factions, they reſolved to take out of the treaſury of the caſtle of St. Angelo five hundred thouſand golden crowns, upon a ſolemn promiſe made by the pope, that the like ſum ſhould be again depoſited in the ſame place as ſoon as the war was over. The pope was ſo highly elated with his ſucceſs in this important debate, that he declared he would not hearken to any propoſals made on the part of the emperor, nor receive any envoy or miniſter from him, till the Imperial forces were withdrawn from Comachio, and other parts of the eccleſiaſtical ſtate; which raſh reſolution was probably ſuggeſted to him by the marſhal de Treſſe, who was lately come to Rome with the character of the French king's ambaſſador extraordinary, in order to inflame the rupture, and encourage the pope with great aſſurances of ſupport. He was ordered likewiſe to try, whether the grand duke of Tuſcany, and the republics of Venice and Genoa, could be engaged in an alliance againſt the Imperialiſts. The emperor bore all the pope's threats with great patience, till the duke of Savoy ended the campaign, when the Imperial troops, that had been commanded by that duke, were ordered to march into the pope's territories, and were joined by ſome more forces drawn out of the Milaneſe and the Mantuan. The pope's troops began the war in a very barbarous manner; for, while they were in a ſort of a ceſſation, they ſurprized a body of the Imperialiſts, and without mercy put them to the ſword. But, as the Imperial army advanced, the Papalins, or, as the Italians in deriſion called them, the Papagallians fled every where before them, even when they were three to one. As they came on, the pope's territories and places were all caſt open to them. Bologna, the moſt important and the richeſt of them all, capitulated, and received them without the leaſt reſiſtance. The people at Rome were uneaſy at the pope's proceedings, and at the apprehenſions of a new ſack from a German army. They ſhewed this ſo openly, that tumults there were much dreaded, and many cardinals declared openly againſt the war. Upon this the pope declared, that he was ready to receive the marquis de Prie, who arrived at Rome on the 24th of October, N. S. however many days paſſed before the pope would admit him to his audience, upon a punctilio about the ceremonial, becauſe he had no other character than of plenipotentiary of the emperor, which, it was pretended, was not admitted at the papal court. This difficulty being at laſt removed by the pope's ſignifying to the marquis, that he would receive him with the ſame ceremonies, as were obſerved at the audience of count Martinitz, when he went through Rome to Naples, to take poſſeſſion of the dignity of viceroy of that kingdom, that miniſter went to his audience, on the 10th of November, N. S. and, in a few days after, delivered his propoſals for an accommodation, importing in ſubſtance, "1. That the pope ſhould diſband his new levies: 2. Give winter quarters to the Imperial troops in his territories: 3. And the inveſture of Naples to Charles III, and acknowledge him as king of Spain: And, 4. That he ſhould allow the Imperialiſts paſſage through his dominions, as often as there ſhould be occaſion." The pope was amazed at theſe high terms, but there was no remedy left. The ill ſtate of affairs in France was now ſo viſible, that no regard was had to the great promiſes, which Teſſe was making, nor was there any hopes of drawing the princes and ſtates of Italy into an alliance for his defence. In concluſion the pope, after he had delayed yielding to the emperor's demands long enough to give the Imperialiſts time to eat up his country, at laſt ſubmitted to every thing; yet he delayed acknowledging king Charles for ſome months, though he then promiſed to do it; upon which the emperor drew his troops out of his territories. The pope turned over the manner of acknowledging king Charles to a congregation of cardinals; but they had no mind to take the load of this upon themſelves, which would draw an excluſion upon them from France in every conclave, and therefore left it to the pope, who affected delays; ſo it was not done till the 15th of January, 1709, N. S.

With regard to the campaign in Germany, the elector of Bavaria had been ſent to command on the Upper Rhine. The true reaſon was believed, that he might not pretend to continue in the chief command in Flanders. He was put in hopes of being furniſhed with an army ſo ſtrong, as to be able to break through into Bavaria. The elector of Hanover again undertook the command of the army of the empire. Both armies were weak, but they were ſo equally weak, that they were not able to undertake any thing on either ſide; and therefore, after ſome months, in which there was no conſiderable action, the forces on both ſides went into winter quarters.

The affairs in Hungary continued in the ſame ill ſtate, in which they had been for ſome years. The emperor did not grant the demands of the diet, that he had called; nor did he redreſs their grievances; and he had not a force ſtrong enough to reduce the malecontents; ſo that his council could not fall on methods, either to ſatisfy or ſubdue them.

Poland continued ſtill to be a ſcene of war and miſery. To other calamities they had the addition of a plague, which laid ſome of their great towns waſte. The party formed againſt Staniſlaus continued ſtill to oppoſe him, though they had no king to head them. The king of Sweden's warlike humour poſſeſſed him to ſuch a degree, that he reſolved to march into Muſcovy. The Czar tried, how far ſubmiſſions and interceſſions could ſoften him; but he was inflexible.

He marched through the Ukrain, but made no great progreſs. The whole Muſcovite force fell on one of his generals, who had about him only a part of the army, and gave him a total defeat, moſt of his horſe being cut off.

The elector Palatine was this year reſtored to the poſſeſſion of the upper Palatinate, with the title and rank, which had been veſted in the houſe of Bavaria by the treaty of Munſter. And the elector of Brunſwick Lunenburg was at laſt acknowledged as ſuch by the electoral college. The duke of Savoy received the inveſtiture of the Mantuan, Montferrat, and other adjacent countries; and the ban of the empire was, on the 30th of June, N. S. publiſhed againſt the duke of Mantua, which probably haſtened his death, which happened five days after. The mediation of Great Britain did not a little contribute towards the pacifying of the inteſtine diviſions of the city of Hamburgh. But though, at the deſire of the king of Sweden, the queen had readily accepted the guaranty of the treaty of Alt Ranſtadt, yet the reformed in Sileſia, received no benefit from her Majeſty's earneſt interpoſition in their favour; the court of Vienna, now freed from the dread of the king of Sweden's reſentment, pretending, that the Lutherans only, and not the Calviniſts, were included, both in that treaty, and in that of Weſtphalia.

Our affairs at ſea wer leſs unfortunate this year, than they had been formerly. The merchants were better ſerved with convoys, and no conſiderable loſſes were ſuſtained. Commodore Wager gained a ſignal advantage againſt the Spaniſh galleons in the Weſt Indies. He had, on the 22d of December, 1707, returned to Jamaica, from the coaſt of Hiſpaniola, upon ſome advices of the arrival of Monſieur Du Caſſe, with a French ſquadron of great force, in order, as it was ſuppoſed, to make ſome attempt upon Jamaica. The next day the commodore, being then with his ſquadron in Port Royal harbour, held a council of war, to conſider of the ſeveral advices he had received. During the month of January, he ſent out ſeveral ſhips to cruize, and to get intelligence of the enemy; and, on the 5th of February, it was reſolved, in a council of war, to go over to the Spaniſh coaſt. Accordingly, the commodore ſailed in a few days after to the Keys, where he was joined by ſeveral other ſhips and ſloops. Upon advice, that the Spaniſh galleons were gone from Carthagena for Porto Bello, the commodore ſailed with ſuch ſhips as were ready, leaving directions, how and where the reſt ſhould join him. On the 25th they came to an anchor off the iſle of Pines. In March, the commodore received advice at two ſeveral times from captain Pudner, who was ſtationed near Porto Bello, that the galleons, with the king's money, could not ſail before the firſt of May; upon which it was reſolved to return to Jamaica, but it was given out, that they were only gone to cruize. On the 6th of April, the commodore ancored at Port-Royal keys, and having taken in proviſions, he ſailed again on the 14th, and about eight or ten days after, gave chace to ſeveral ſhips off Bocca Chica, ſome of which eſcaped into Carthagena, and others he loſt ſight of in hazy weather. On the 23d of May, the Anne ſloop joined the commodore from the Baſtimentes, and brought a letter from captain Pudner, with advice, that the galleons, being thirteen ſail, were at ſea, coming from Carthagena. The commodore had then with him the Expedition, Kingſton, Portland, and Vulture fire-ſhip, and cruized till the 27th, in expectation of the galleons; but, not meeting with them, he began to fear they had intelligence of his being on the coaſt, and were gone for the Havanna. On the 28th of May, about noon, the galleons, in all about ſeventeen ſail, were diſcovered from his top-maſt head; and, at the ſame time, they diſcovered him, but, deſpiſing ſo ſmall a force, reſolved to proceed. He chaſed them till evening, when they, finding they could not weather the Baru, a ſmall iſland, which lay in their paſſage to Carthagena, reſolved to diſpute the matter there, and ſtretching therefore to the northward with an eaſy ſail, they drew as well as they could into a line of battle. The admiral, who wore a white pennant at the main-top-maſt head, in the centre, the vice-admiral, with the ſame pennant at the fore-top-maſt head, in the rear, and the rear-admiral, who bore the pennant on the mizen-top-maſt head, in the van, about half a mile from each other, there being other ſhips between them. Of the ſeventeen two were ſloops, and one a brigantine, which ſtood in for the land; two others of them were French ſhips, which, running away, had no ſhare in the action; the reſt were Spaniards. The commodore inſtantly made his diſpoſition; he reſolved to attack the admiral himſelf; gave orders to captain Simon Bridges, who commanded the Kingſton, to engage the vice-admiral, and ſent his boat to the Portland, commanded by captain Edward Windſor, with orders to attack the rear-admiral; and, as there was no immediate occaſion for the fire-ſhip, ſhe plied to the windward.

The ſun was juſt ſetting, when commodore Wager came up with the admiral, and then beginning to engage, in about an hour and half's time (it being dark) ſhe blew up, not without great danger to the Expedition, from the ſplinters and planks, which fell on board her, on fire, and the great heat of the blaſt. Hereupon the commodore put abroad his ſignal lights for keeping company, and endeavoured to continue ſight of ſome of the enemies ſhips; but finding, after this accident, they began to ſeparate, and diſcovering but one, which was the rear admiral, he made ſail after her, and coming up about ten o'clock, when he could not judge which way her head lay, it being very dark, he happened to fire his broad-ſide into her ſtern, which did ſo much damage, that it ſeemed to diſable her from making ſail; and being then to leeward, he, tacking on the Spaniard, got to windward of him, and the Kingſton and Portland (which had by reaſon of the darkneſs of the night, or the blowing up of the admiral, loſt ſight of the other ſhips) following his lights ſoon after, came up with him, and aſſiſted in taking the rear admiral, who called for quarter about two in the morning. On board of this ſhip he ſent his boats to bring to him the chief officers; and, before the riſing of the ſun, he ſaw one large ſhip on his weather bow, and three ſail upon the weather quarter, three or four leagues off, lying then with their heads to the north, the wind being at north-eaſt, an eaſy gale. Then he put out the ſignal for the Kingſton and Portland to chace to windward, not being able himſelf to make ſail, being much diſabled; and, as he had a great part of his men in the prize, ſo were there no leſs than three hundred priſoners on board his own ſhip.

On Sunday the 30th, the wind being from the north-eaſt, to the north north-weſt, and but little of it, the Kingſton and Portland had left off chaſe; but the commodore made the ſignal for continuing it, which they did, and ran him out of ſight, the fire ſhip ſtill continuing with him; and he having lain by ſome time, not only to put the prize in a condition of ſailing, but to refit his own rigging, made ſail eaſtward on the 31ſt, when the Kingſton and Portland joined him, and gave him an account, that the ſhip they chaſed was the vice admiral, to which, as they ſaid, they came ſo near, as to fire their broadſides into her, but were ſo far advanced towards the Salmadinas, a ſhoal off Carthagena, that they were forced to tack, and leave her. This gave the commodore great uneaſineſs, and determined him to call the captains of theſe ſhips to account; but, in the mean time he ſent them orders to take or deſtroy a galleon of forty guns, which he underſtood by a Swediſh ſhip, that had been trading at Baru, had taken ſhelter in that iſland. She was juſt coming out of port, as the Kingſton and Portland appeared; upon which her crew ran her a-ſhore, ſet her on fire, and blew her up, ſo that nothing could be got out of her, as the captains affirmed, and, as it appeared to the commodore afterwards, was true. On the 2d of June, the commodore finding his provifions and water ſhort, the wind contrary, and nothing more to be done in thoſe parts, reſolved to ſet the Spaniſh priſoners a-ſhore, according to their requeſt, on the iſland of Baru, and then proceed for Jamaica; which he performed accordingly; and the Spaniſh rear admiral retained, as long as he lived, a grateful ſenſe of the commodore's civility.

On the 8th of July, the Expedition, Kingſton, and Vulture fireſhip, brought the prize ſafe into Port Royal harbour [o]: Here the commodore found the new act of parliament for the diſtribution of prizes; and though he had before permitted the ſailors to plunder as they thought fit, when the prize was taken, yet now he appointed agents, in obedience to that act of parliament, and ordered captain Long to deliver up near thirty thouſand pounds worth of ſilver and effects, that he had taken between decks, in order to ſatisfy the ſailors of the uprightneſs of his intentions. He likewiſe took care to diſpatch intelligence to England, that ſhips might be fitted out to cruize for the galleons, that had eſcaped; and, on the 23d of July, he held a court-martial on the two captains Bridges and Windſor, who were both diſmiſſed for not having done their duty in the late engagement [p].

Another ſquadron of the Britiſh fleet, under the command of ſir George Byng, carried over the arch-ducheſs Mary Anne, married to the king of Portugal, which was performed with great magnificence: She had a quick and eaſy paſſage, arriving at Liſbon on the 27th of October. This did in ſome meaſure make amends to that crown for our failing them in not ſending over the ſupplies, that had been ſtipulated. And it was a particular happineſs, that the Spaniards were ſo weak, as not to be able to take advantage of the naked and unguarded ſtate, in which the Portugueſe were at that time.

After this large account of foreign affairs, it is time to return to the tranſactions at home.

In the month of July, an ambaſſador from the emperor of Fez and Morocco arrived in Great Britain with a preſent of ſix lions for the queen; but upon his coming to Hammerſmith near London, he was put under an eaſy confinement by way of reprizal for the reſtraint put upon captain Delaval, the queen's envoy in that country, before he reached that court; which happened upon a falſe report, that ſome ill uſage had been offered to Hamet Ben Hamet Cardenas, the late Morocco ambaſſador here. But, upon better information, the captain was releaſed, as was alſo the Morocco ambaſſador. However the Britiſh envoy did not think fit to go in perſon to the court of Morocco, and only ſent thither, with her majeſty's letter and preſent, Mr. Corbiere, his ſecretary, who was received with great demonſtrations of reſpect.

About this time an indignity offered in London to count de Matueof, the Muſcovite ambaſſador, was highly reſented, not only by himſelf, but likewiſe by all concerned in the preſervation of the rights and privileges of public miniſters. Thomas Morton, a laceman in King-ſtreet, Covent-garden, and ſome other tradeſman, to whom the ambaſſador owed ſeveral ſums of money, amounting in the whole to about three hundred pounds, finding he had taken his audience of leave, and being apprehenſive that he would leave the kingdom without paying his debts, though a merchant in the city, trading to Muſcovy, had ſet a day for ſatisfying moſt of them, held ſeveral conſultations together, and at laſt reſolved to arreſt him; which was done accordingly, on the 21ſt of July, in the open ſtreet, with ſeveral aggravating circumſtances. For the ambaſſador, not knowing at firſt the reaſon of his being ſeized, and imagining he was ſet upon by villains, ſtruggled in his own defence, and was ill uſed and overpowered by the bailiffs who carried him to a ſpunging-houſe at the ſign of the Black Raven, where he was detained till the earl of Feverſham and a merchant of the city had bailed him. The ambaſſador, incenſed at this inſult, in violation of the law of nations, applied himſelf for redreſs to the government; and the next day wrote a letter to Mr. ſecretary Boyle, when he urged, "That the queen who was ſo jealous of the reſpect due to the ambaſſadors of crowned heads, and had ſo glorioufly vindicated the honour of the earl of Mancheſter, her ambaſſador at Venice, and cauſed a rigorous puniſhment to be inflicted on the officers of the cuſtom-houſe, ſome of whom were ſet in the pillory, and others condemned to the gallies, only for inſulting the gentlemen of his retinue, could not but moſt juſtly revenge the affront put upon him by a corporal puniſhment. The count Zobor, who was delivered up to the diſcretion of the king of Sweden for picking a quarrel with his envoy, likewiſe afforded an inſtance of the ſatisfaction he required, as being deſirous of nothing with greater earneſtneſs than to avoid all the ill conſequences of this affair. For in caſe the criminals were connived at, under any colour whatſoever, he ſhould be obliged to take other meaſures, and retire without recredentials, leaving the whole matter to the management of his Czariſh majeſty, his maſter, as the protector of his injured honour, and of his abuſed miniſter."

At the ſame time count Gallas, the emperors envoy, the baron Spanheim, ambaſſador from the king of Pruſſia, and ſeveral other foreign miniſters, thinking themſelves concerned in the affront put upon their character, demanded a due reparation for the ſame: All which having been laid before the queen, who ſtill continued at Windſor, ſhe expreſſed a very great reſentment for the indignity offered to the Muſcovite ambaſſador, and commanded an extraordinary council to be ſummoned on the 25th of July on that occaſion. Mr. Morton, and ſome other creditors, with the attorney, bailiffs, and other perſons concerned in the arreſt of the ambaſſador, having been examined, were committed to the cuſtody of ſeveral meſſengers, and ordered to be proſecuted with the utmoſt ſeverity, according to law. The next day, before Mr. Boyle was returned from Windſor, the Muſcovite ambaſſador wrote to him another letter, importing, "That as he had not received any teſtimony of concern, or regret, either from the queen, or any of her miniſters, ſince he had ſent him his complaints in writing, he found himſelf obliged to preſs for his departure; and therefore entreated Mr. ſecretary to get a paſſport for him as ſoon as poſſible." Mr. Boyle acquainted the ambaſſador, "That ſeven of the accomplices, in the deſperate attempt upon his perſon, were committed to priſon, and under proſecution, by order of the privy-council, who were to meet again about that affair as ſoon as poſſible." But the ambaſſador being impatient to leave the kingdom, wrote a third letter on the 27th of July to Mr. ſecretary, for a paſſport for himſelf and family. Mr. Boyle wrote, two days after, a letter to the ambaſſador, acquainting him, "That he had that morning ſent him the paſſport he deſired: That orders had been iſſued out to the officers of the cuſtom-houſe to wait on him, to cauſe his equipages to be tranſported without any moleſtation; and he hoped they had alreſdy done that to his ſatisfaction: That an extraordinary meeting of the queen's privy-council was to be held that day, to inquire further into the circumſtances of that diſmal affair: That they had made a ſtrict ſearch after thoſe were any ways concerned therein; and had cauſed ten others to be apprehended: That expreſs orders had been given to the attorney-general, to proſecute the ſeventeen perſons now confined, with the utmoſt rigour; and to omit nothing that might contribute towards making him the moſt ſignal reparation, that could be, according to our law." Notwithſtanding theſe aſſurances, the ambaſſador refuſed the ordinary preſents made to miniſters of his character, which were made to him by the queen, dated the 17th September, wherein that prince demanded no leſs, than "That a capital puniſhment according to the rigour of the law, be inflicted on all the accomplices of the indignity put upon the perſon of his ambaſſador; or at leaſt, ſuch a one as was adequate to the nature of the affront, which every particular perſon put upon the ambaſſador." Such a puniſhment being altogether inconſiſtent with the laws of England, this unlucky affair gave no ſmall uneaſineſs to the queen and miniſters [q].

[o] The priſoners gave an account, that the admiral was a ſhip of ſixty-four braſs guns, with ſix hundred men, called the St. Joſeph, and had on board as ſome ſaid, five millions of pieces of eight; but according to others, ſeven millions in gold and ſilver: That the vice-admiral mounted ſixty-four braſs guns, and had between four and five hundred men, with four, or, as ſome ſaid, ſix millions of pieces of eight: And that the rear-admiral was mounted with four and twenty guns, having eleven more in the hold, and between three and four hundred men: But that upon ſome difference between the admiral and him at Porto-Bello, orders were given that no money ſhould be ſhipped on board her; ſo that thirteen cheſts of pieces of eight, and fourteen pigs or ſows of ſilver, which were privately brought on board that night, and belonged to ſome of the paſſengers, was all the treaſure, which was on board, except what others might have about them, or were in trunks, of which they could give no account. This is the account, which the priſoners gave. Several relations publiſhed ſoon after that time make the riches of the admiral and vice admiral to have been far greater, the former at leaſt thirty, and the latter twenty millions of pieces of eight. They all however agree, that the rear-admiral had no regiſtred-money on board. The other Spaniſh ſhips had little or no money on board, but were chiefly laden with cocoa, as the rear-admiral was, and but one of them was of any conſiderable force, being of ſeven hundred tuns burden, and having forty braſs guns, and an hundred and forty men. But the two French ſhips had about an hundred thouſand pieces of eight on board.

[p] Captain Bridges of the Kingſton was diſmiſſed, becauſe he left off chaſe within ſhot of the Spaniſh vice-admiral, doubting the pilot's knowledge, and being near the ſhoal of Salmadinas, though the pilot offered to carry the ſhip within ſhoal. Captain Windſor of the Portland was alſo diſmiſſed, for not bearing ſo near the enemy, as to keep ſight of ſome of them, when they were engaged on the 28th in the night; for leaving off chaſe the next day, and for ſhortening ſail on the 30th, before he came up ſo far with the Spaniſh vice-admiral near Salmadinas, as he might have done.

[q] Mr. Addiſon gave the following account of this affair, in a letter to the earl of Mancheſter, dated at the Cock-pit, July 23d, 1608, O. S. and publiſhed in Cole's Memoirs of affairs of State, p. 546. "We had an unlucky buſineſs

On the 28th of October, about ten in the forenoon, died prince George of Denmark, in the 56th year of his age, after he had been twenty-five years and ſome months married to the queen. He had, for many years, been troubled with an aſthma, and ſometimes a ſpitting of blood, which often endangered his life; and about three months before, a dropſical humour, with which he had been formerly afflicted, ſeized his legs and moſt parts of his body. This was attended with a ſleepineſs, cough, and an increaſe of the aſthma; and on Saturday the 23d of October, the violence of the cough produced a ſpitting of blood and an increaſe of the ſleepineſs, with an addition of the convulſive motions of the tendons; which ſymptoms not yielding to the remedies adminiſtered by his own and ſeveral other phyſicians, he fell into a ſuffocation, and which neither bleeding, nor a vomit, could relieve him, ſo that he ſoon after expired. The queen, who, during the whole courſe of her marriage, had been a moſt tender and affectionate wife to him, in his laſt illneſs, which laſted ſome years, would never leave his bed, but ſate up, ſometimes half the night in the bed by him, with ſuch care and concern, that ſhe was looked on very deſervedly as a pattern in this reſpect. The prince was duke of Cumberland, lord-high-admiral of Great Britain and Ireland, generaliſſimo of all her majeſty's forces both by ſea and land, and warden of the cinque-ports. He had ſhewed himſelf brave in the wars both in Denmark and in Ireland. His temper was mild and gentle. He had made a good progreſs in mathematics. He had travelled through France, Italy, and Germany, and knew much more than he could well expreſs; for he ſpoke acquired languages ill and ungracefully. He was free from all vice. He meddled little in buſineſs, even after the queen's acceſſion to the crown. He was ſo gained by the tories, by the act which they carried in his favour, that he was much in their intereſt. He was unhappily prevailed with to take on him the poſt of lord-high-admiral, of which he underſtood little, but was fatally led by thoſe, that had credit with him, who had not all of them his good qualities, but had both an ill temper and bad principles. His being bred to the ſea gained him ſome credit in thoſe matters. In the conduct of our affairs, as great errors were committed, ſo great misfortunes had followed on them. As ſoon as the prince had reſigned his laſt breath, the queen came from Kenſington to her palace at St. James's, where ſhe reſided the whole winter. On the 11th of November, the body his royal of highneſs was carried from Kenſington to the painted chamber, within the palace of Weſtminſter, where having lain in ſtate till the 13th, it was that night interred in the Abbey-church, with all the pomp conſiſtent with a private funeral.

The death of prince George occaſioned ſome alterations at court; for the earl of Pembroke was, on the 25th of November, advanced to the poſt of lord-high-admiral, which he entered on with great uneaſineſs, and a juſt apprehenſion of the difficulty of maintaining it well in a time of war. He was at that time both lord-preſident of the council, and lord-lieutenant of Ireland. The earl of Wharton had the government of Ireland (who made Mr. Addiſon his ſecretary) and the lord Sommers was made lord preſident of the council. The great capacity and inflexible integrity of the lord Sommers would have made his promotion to this poſt very acceptable to the whigs at any juncture, but it was moſt particularly ſo at this time; for it was expected, that propoſitions for a general peace would be quickly made; and ſo they reckoned, that the management of that, upon which not only the ſafety of the nation, but of all Europe depending, was in ſure hands, when he was ſet at the head of the counſels, upon whom neither ill practices nor falſe colours were like to make any impreſſion. Thus the minds of all thoſe, who were truly zealous for the preſent conſtitution, were much quieted by this promotion, though their jealouſies had a deep root, and were not eaſily removed.

It may here be obſerved, that, notwithſtanding the duke of Marlboroughs's ſucceſſes this year, and the queen's kind letter to him on occaſion of his victory at Oudenard [p], his intereſt with her began greatly to decline, through the intrigues of Mrs. Maſham and Mr. Harley, all the ſummer [r].

buſineſs about two days ago, that befel the Muſcovite ambaſſador, who was arreſted going out of his houſe and rudely treated by the bailiffs. He was then upon his departure for his own country, and the ſum under an hundred pounds that ſtopped him; and, what makes the buſineſs worſe, he has been punctual in his payments, and had given order, that this very ſum ſhould be paid the day after. However, as he is very well convinced, that the government entirely diſapproves ſuch a proceeding, there are no ill conſequences apprehended from it. Your lordſhip knows, that the privileges of ambaſſadors are under very little regulations in England; and I believe, that a bill will be promoted in the next parliament for ſetting them upon a certain foot; at leaſt it is what we talk of in both offices on this occaſion.'

[q] This letter is printed in the Account of the Ducheſs of Marlborough's Conduct, and was as follows:

Windſor, July 6, 1708.

I want words to expreſs the joy I have, that you are well, after your glorious ſucceſs; for which, next, to God Almighty, my thanks are due to you. And indeed I can never ſay enough for all the great and faithful ſervices you have ever done me. But be ſo juſt as to believe, I am as truly ſenſible of them as a grateful heart can be, and ſhall be ready to ſhew it upon all occaſions. I hope you cannot doubt of my eſteem and friendſhip for you, nor think, that, becauſe I differ with you in ſome things, it is for want of either. No, I do aſſure you, if you were here, I am ſure you would not think me ſo much in the wrong in ſome things, as I fear you do now. I am afraid my letter ſhould come too late to London, and therefore dare ſay no more, but that I pray God Almighty to continue his protection over you, and ſend you ſafe home again. And be aſſured I ſhall ever be ſincerely

Your humble ſervant.

To this the duke anſwered:

July 23, 1708.

Madam,

I have the honour of your majeſty's letter of the 6th, and am very thankful for all your goodneſs to me. And I am ſure, it will be always my intention, as well as my duty, to be ready to venture my life for your ſervice.

As I have formerly told your majeſty, that I am deſirous to ſerve you in the army, but not as a miniſter, I am every day more and more confirmed in that opinion, and I think myſelf obliged upon all accounts on this occaſion to ſpeak my mind freely to you. The circumſtances in this laſt battle, I think, ſhew the hand of God; for we were obliged, not only to march five leagues that morning, but to paſs a river before the enemy, and to engage them before the whole army was paſſed, which was a viſible mark of the favour of heaven to you and your arms.

Your majeſty ſhall be convinced from this time, that I have no ambition, or any thing to aſk for myſelf or family. But I will end the few years, which I have to live, in endeavouring to ſerve you, and to give God Almighty thanks for his infinite goodneſs to me. But, as I have taken this reſolution to myſelf, give me leave to ſay, that I think you are obliged in conſcience, and as a good chriſtian, to forgive, and to have no more reſentments to any particular perſon or party, but to make uſe of ſuch as will carry on this juſt war with vigour; which is the only way to preſerve our religion and liberties, and the crown on your head. Which that you may long enjoy, and be a bleſſing to your people, ſhall be the conſtant wiſh and prayer of him, that is with the greateſt truth and duty, Madam, &c.

[r] The ducheſs of Marlborough, in the Account of her Conduct, p. 206, obſerves, that the duke was perfectly ſenſible of the change in her majeſty towards him; and having complained of it in a letter to the ducheſs, ſhe ſent that letter to the queen, incloſed in the following one to herſelf:

'I cannot help ſending your majeſty this letter, to ſhew how exactly lord Marlborough agrees with me in my opinion, that he has now no intereſt with you: Though when I ſaid ſo in the church on Thurſday [Auguſt 19, 1708,] you were pleaſed to ſay it was untrue. And yet I think he will be ſurprized to hear, that when I had taken ſo much pains to put your jewels in a way, that I thought you would like, Mrs. Maſham could make you refuſe to wear them in ſo unkind a manner; becauſe that was a power ſhe had not thought fit to exerciſe before. I will make no reflections upon it; only that I muſt needs obſerve, that your majeſty choſe a very wrong day to mortify me, when you were juſt going to return thanks for a victory obtained by lord Marlborough.'

In anſwer to this, the queen wrote the ducheſs theſe few words:

Sunday.

'After the commands you gave me on the Thankſgiving-day of not anſwering you, I ſhould not have troubled you with theſe lines, but to return the duke of Marlborough's letter ſafe into your hands, and for the ſame reaſon do not ſay any thing to that, nor to yours, which incloſed it."

Upon receiving this letter, the ducheſs wrote again as follows:

'I ſhould not trouble your majeſty with any anſwer to your laſt ſhort letter, but to explain what you ſeem to miſtake in what I ſaid at church. I deſired you not to anſwer me there, for fear of being overheard. And this you interpret, as if I had deſired you not to anſwer me at all, which was far from my intention. For the whole end of my writing to you ſo often, was to get your anſwer to ſeveral things, in which we differed, that, if I was in the wrong, you might convince me of it, and I ſhould very readily have owned my miſtakes. But, ſince you have not been pleaſed to ſhew them to me, I flatter myſelf, that I have ſaid ſeveral things to you, that are unanſwerable. And, I hope, ſome time or other you will find leiſure to reflect upon them, and will convince lord Marlborough, that he is miſtaken in thinking, that he has no credit with you, by hearkening ſometimes to his advice; and then, I hope, you will never more be troubled with diſagreeable letters from me; for I ſhould be much better pleaſed to ſay and do every thing you like. But I ſhould think myſelf wanting in my duty to you, if I ſaw you ſo much in the wrong, as without prejudice or paſſion I really think you are in ſeveral particulars I have mentioned, and did not tell you of it; and the rather, becauſe no body elſe cares to ſpeak out upon ſo ungrateful a ſubject. The word command, which you uſe at the beginning of your letter, is very unfitly ſuppoſed to come from me. For though I have always writ to you as a friend, and lived with you as ſuch for ſo many years with all the truth and honeſty and zeal for your ſervice, that was poſſible; yet I ſhall never forget, that I am your ſubject, nor ceaſe to be a faithful one.'

Through the whole ſummer after Mr. Harley's diſmiſſion, the queen continued to have ſecret correſpondence with him. And, that this might be the better managed, ſhe ſtaid all the ſultry ſeaſon, even when the prince was panting for breath in that ſmall houſe ſhe had formerly purchaſed at Windſor, which, though as hot as an oven, was then ſaid to be cool, becauſe from the park ſuch perſons, as Mrs. Maſham had a mind to bring to her majeſty, could be let in privately by the garden. 'And when, (continues the ducheſs of Marlborough) upon the death of the prince, one would have thought, that her majeſty's real grief would have made her avoid every place and every object, that might ſenſibly revive the remembrance of her loſs, ſhe choſe for her place of retirement his cloſet, and for ſome weeks ſpent many hours in it every day. I was amazed at this; and, when I ſpoke to her of it, ſhe ſeemed ſurprized, juſt like a perſon, who on a ſudden becomes ſenſible of her having done ſomething ſhe would not have done, had ſhe duly conſidered. But the true reaſon of her majeſty's chuſing this cloſet to ſit in, was, that the back ſtairs belonging to it came from Mrs. Maſham's lodgings, who by that means

At the ſame the lord Sommers was made preſident of the council, the archbiſhop of York, the dukes of Mountague and Montroſe, the earls of Louden, Rivers, and Eſſex, the lord Ferrers, and M. Peregrine Bertie were ſworn of the privy-council; as, a little before, were chief-juſtice Holt, the duke of Queenſberry, the earls of Seafield, Scarborough, and Ranelagh, and lord Conigſby. The earl of Cholmondeley was made treaſurer of the houſhold in the room of the earl of Bradford deceaſed, ſir Thomas Felton comptroller, and Mr. Edmund Dunch maſter of the houſhold. Sir James Mountague attorney-general, and Mr. Robert Eyre ſolicitor-general, the duke of Dorſet was appointed the 3d of December, conſtable of Dover, and warden of the cinque-ports.

The new parliament of Great Britain met, the 16th of November, with great advantage; for the preſent miniſtry was now wholly ſuch, as gave an entire content to all, who wiſhed well to the public affairs; and the great ſucceſſes abroad ſilenced thoſe, who were otherwiſe diſpoſed to find fault and complain. The queen did not think it decent to come to parliament during this whole ſeſſion; and therefore, having granted a commiſſion under the great ſeal, appointing the archbiſhop of Canterbury, the lord chancellor, the lord treaſurer, the lord ſteward, and the maſter of the horſe, to repreſent her royal perſon, the commons were deſired to come up to the houſe of peers, and hear the commiſſion read. Which done, the lord chancellor ſignified to the commons, that they ſhould immediately proceed to the choice of a ſpeaker, and preſent him the Thurſday following. The commons being returned to their houſe, the lord William Powlet moved to chuſe for their ſpeaker ſir Richard Onſlow, a worthy man entirely zealous for the government, and very acceptable to the whigs. He was ſeconded by ſir William Strickland. But major general Mordaunt, by way of irony, propoſed, "That they ſhould chuſe Mr. Joddrel, the clerk of the houſe, who, having been aſſiſtant to good ſpeakers, to indifferent ones, and to the worſt, ſeemed to be as well qualified for that ſtation as any body." But at laſt, general Mordaunt ſupported the lord Powlet's motion, commended ſir Richard Onſlow's experience and integrity; and added, "That, being poſſeſſed of a good eſtate, he did not lie open to the temptations that might biaſs perſons, who had their fortunes to make againſt the intereſt of their country." Upon this he was led to the chair by the lord Powlet and ſir William Strickland, after he made a ſhort ſpeech, in which he modeſtly endeavoured to decline that important truſt in ſo critical a juncture of affairs, "wherein the good or bad ſucceſs of this war did in a great meaſure depend on the reſolutions of that great aſſembly." The tories, upon a ſurmiſe, that the court or whig-party would have been divided between ſir Richard Onſlow and ſir Peter King, recorder of London, had deſigned to have put up ſir Thomas Hanmer; but, being diſappointed in that expectation, they thought it prudent, not being able to make a majority, unanimouſly to concur with the reſt. Indeed, the tories perceived, they had ſo little ſtrength in this parliament, that they reſolved to lie ſilent, and to wait for ſuch advantages, as the circumſtances of the affairs might afford them. The ſame day, the duke of Queenſberry was introduced into the houſe of peers by the dukes of Somerſet and Ormond, as a peer of Great Britain, and duke of Dover. After this, both houſes adjourned to the 18th, when the commons being come to the houſe of peers to preſent their ſpeaker, the lord chancellor, in the name of the commiſſioners, ſignified to them the queen's entire ſatisfaction in their choice of a perſon ſo well qualified for that office, both by his great abilities, and his zeal and affection for the government, and the proteſtant ſucceſſion: And then he delivered to both houſes the following ſpeech.

My lords and gentlemen,

"In purſuance of the authority given us by her majeſty's commiſſion under the great ſeal, among other things, to declare the cauſes of her majeſty's calling this parliament;

"We are, by her majeſty's command, in the firſt place, to obſerve to you, that the extraordinary length of this year's campaign hath obliged your majeſty to defer your meeting longer than otherwiſe ſhe would have done, and that you might be informed with the greater certainty of the ſtate and poſture of the war, in order to your reſolutions for the enſuing year.

"This neceſſary delay hath now ſo far ſhewn us the ſucceſs of affairs abroad, as that, whether you would conſider the places acquired by the allies, or the farther and continued proofs given this laſt year, of their ſuperior courage and conduct (which, as to the future part of the war, is equal to all other advantages) we may, with thanks to God and juſtice to thoſe he hath been pleaſed to uſe as inſtruments in this great work, conclude, that, upon the whole, we are brought much nearer than we were laſt ſeſſion, to the end of our undertaking this war, the reducing the dangerous power of France, and ſettling ſuch a peace as may ſecure itſelf from being violated.

"Her majeſty therefore commands us to aſſure you, ſhe hath not the leaſt doubt, but that this parliament will be of the ſame opinion with her laſt, as to the vigorous proſecution of this war, and the ends of it; believing it impoſſible, the repreſentatives of the Britiſh nation can endure to think of loſing the fruits of all our paſt endeavours, and the great advantages we have gained (particularly this preſent year) by ſubmitting at laſt to an inſecure peace.

"And therefore, ſince nothing probably can hinder our ſucceſs abroad for the time to come, but miſunderſtandings among ourſelves at home; we have it in command, to conjure you, by your duty to God, and to her majeſty, your zeal for the proteſtant religion, your love for your country, and the regard you cannot but have for the liberty of Europe in general, to avoid all occaſions of diviſion, which are ever hurtful to the public, but will more eſpecially be ſo at this juncture, when the eyes of all our neighbours are upon you with a very particular concern; and your unanimity and good agreement will be the greateſt ſatisfaction and encouragement to all our allies.

Gentlemen of the houſe of commons,

"You cannot but be convinced, that the ſeveral parts of the war, which were provided for by the laſt parliament, will require your ſupport, at leaſt in the ſame degree. But, in Flanders, the nature of the war is much altered, by the great advances made there towards entering into France, which hath ſo far alarmed our enemies, that they are drawing more troops daily to that ſide, for the defence of their own country. And therefore her majeſty hopes you will

could ſecretly bring to her whom ſhe pleaſed. And that a correſpondence was thus carried on with Mr. Harley, became every day more and more manifeſt by the difficulties and objections, which her majeſty had learnt to raiſe againſt almoſt every thing propoſed by her miniſters. Nay, it is well known, that Mr. Harley and his aſſociates, when at length they had compaſſed their deſigns, and got into the management of affairs, did often (both in their cups and out of them) boaſt, that they, while the queen's miniſters were aſleep, were frequently at court, giving advice in ſecret, how to perplex them in all their meaſures.

But they were much miſtaken, if they imagined, that their proceedings at the time I am ſpeaking of were ſo entirely covered. The miniſters were fully convinced of the truth, and frequently repreſented to her majeſty, what a diſcouragement it was to them in their endeavours for her ſervice, to find, that ſhe had no confidence in them, but was influenced by the counſel of others, who counter-worked them in every inſtance. Upon this ſubject I myſelf wrote and ſpoke a great deal to her with my uſual plainneſs and zeal. But finding, not only that I could make no impreſſion on her in this reſpect, but that her change towards me in particular was every day more and more apparent, I at length went to her, and begged to know what my crime was, that had wrought in her ſo great an alteration. This drew from the queen a letter, dated October 26, 1709, wherein ſhe charges me with inveteracy (as her word is) againſt poor Maſham; and with having nothing ſo much at heart as the ruin of my coufin. In ſpeaking of the miſunderſtanding betwixt her majeſty and me, ſhe ſays, they are for nothing, that ſhe knows of, but becauſe ſhe cannot ſee with my eyes, and hear with my ears. And adds, That it is impoſſible for me to recover her former kindneſs, but that ſhe ſhall behave herſelf to me as the duke of Marlborough's wife, and her groom of the ſtole. This declaration ſo plain and expreſs of her majeſty's thorough change towards me was the more extraordinary, as in the ſame letter are theſe words: You have aſked me once or twice, if you had committed any fault, that I was ſo changed; and I told you, no, becauſe I did not think it a crime in any one not to be of my mind. Upon the receipt of this letter, I immediately ſet myſelf to draw up a long narrative of a ſeries of faithful ſervices for about twenty-ſix years paſt; of the great ſenſe the queen had of my ſervices; of the great favour I had been honoured with on account of them; of the uſe I had made of that favour; and of my loſing it now by the artifice of my enemies, and particularly of one, whom I had raiſed out of the duſt. And, knowing how great a reſpect her majeſty had for the writings of certain eminent divines, I added to my narrative the directions given by the author of the Whole Duty of Man with relation to friendſhip; the directions in the Common Prayer Book before the communion with regard to reconciliation, together with the rules laid down by biſhop Taylor upon the ſame head: And I concluded with giving my word to her majeſty, that if, after reading theſe, ſhe would pleaſe only to anſwer in two words, that ſhe was ſtill of the ſame opinion, as when ſhe wrote that harſh letter, which occaſioned her this trouble, I would never more give her the leaſt trouble upon any ſubject, but the buſineſs of my office, as long as I ſhould have the honour to continue her ſervant; aſſuring her, that, however ſhe might be changed towards me, and how much ſoever we might ſtill differ in opinion, I ſhould ever remember, that ſhe was my miſtreſs and my queen, and ſhould always pay her the reſpect due from a faithful ſervant and dutiful ſubject. I ſent from St. Albans this narrative, which ſhe promiſed to read and anſwer. And, ten days after, writing to me upon another occaſion, ſhe ſaid ſhe had not leiſure yet to read all my papers, but when ſhe had, ſhe would ſend me ſome anſwer. But none ever came, nor had my papers any apparent effect on her majeſty, except that, after my coming to town, as ſhe was paſſing by me, in order to receive the communion, ſhe looked with much good nature, and very graciouſly ſmiled upon me. But the ſmile and pleaſant look, I had reaſon afterwards to think, were given to biſhop Taylor and the Common Prayer Book, and not to me.'

have ſo right a ſenſe of our preſent advantages, as to enable her majeſty to make a conſiderable augmentation for preſerving and improving them, which, by the continuance of God's bleſſing on our arms muſt ſoon put a glorious period to this long and expenſive war.

" As to the condition of the fleet, we have it in command from her majeſty to acquaint you, that the conſtant and remote ſervices, in which the ſhips have been employed, have made a greater ſum than uſual requiſite, as well for the extraordinary repairs, as the building of new ſhips. And the taking of Port Mahon, as it hath afforded the means of having a part of the fleet operate with more readineſs and effect on the enemy, or wherever it may be uſeful to the common cauſe in thoſe parts, ſo the making ſuch proviſions, at ſo great a diſtance, as will be proper for that ſervice, muſt of neceſſity cauſe ſome extraordinary expences. All which her majeſty recommends to your ſerious conſideration, deſiring you to provide timely and effectual ſupplies for thoſe ends; and likewiſe, for the carrying on ſuch fortifications for the ſecurity of our ports, and extinguiſhing the enemy's hopes of profiting by diſturbances in Scotland, as you ſhall think fit.

My lords and gentlemen,

" The union is eſteemed by her majeſty to be ſo happy and great a part of the ſucceſſes of her reign; and her majeſty hath ſo much at heart the confirming and improving it, that ſhe is pleaſed to command us, to remind you of preparing ſuch bills, as ſhall be thought conducing to that end; and particularly to make the laws of both parts of Great Britain agree, as near as may be, for the common intereſt of both people, eſpecially as to thoſe laws, which relate to criminal caſes and proceedings, and ſettling the militia on the ſame foot throughout the united kingdom.

" Her majeſty is graciouſly pleaſed we ſhould alſo aſſure you, that if you can propoſe any means for the improvement of our trade or manufactures, or better employment of the poor, her majeſty will take the greateſt ſatisfaction in enacting ſuch proviſions; there being nothing ſhe ſo earneſtly deſires, as that God would bleſs her with more and more opportunities of doing all poſſible good to ſo well deſerving a people, ſo firm and affectionate to her intereſts.

" And as her majeſty doth not doubt, by God's bleſſing and your good affections, to continue to defeat the deſigns of the pretender, and his open or ſecret abettors; ſo her majeſty will always endeavour, on her part, to make her people happy to ſuch a degree, as that none (except of deſperate fortunes) ſhall enter into meaſures for the diſturbance of her government, the union, or the proteſtant ſucceſſion, as by law eſtabliſhed, without acting at the ſame time manifeſtly againſt their own true and laſting intereſt, as well as their duty."

Both houſes immediately reſolved upon addreſſes of condolance upon the death of prince George, and of congratulation for the glorious ſucceſſes of the laſt campaign. Which addreſſes were preſented in a private way to the queen, that of the lords by the marquis of Dorcheſter, and that of the commons by ſuch members as were of the privy-council.

The proceedings in both houſes this ſeſſion were agreeable to the directions given at court; for, the court being now joined with the whigs, they had a clear majority in every thing: All elections were judged in favour of whigs, and courtiers, but with ſo much partiality, that thoſe, who had formerly made loud complaints of the injuſtice of the tories, in determining elections, when they were a majority, were not ſo much as out of countenance, when they were reproached for the ſame thing: They pretended they were in a ſtate of war with the tories, ſo that it was reaſonable to retaliate this to them, on the account of their former proceedings: But this did not ſatisfy juſt and upright men, who would not do to others, that which they had complained of, when it was done to them, or to their friends[s].

The chief buſineſs of this ſeſſion was concerning the ſupply, the Scotch elections and invaſion, the naturalization of foreign proteſtants, and the trials of treaſons in Scotland.

The ſupplies, that were demanded, were granted very unanimouſly in the houſe of commons, not only for maintaining the force then on foot, but for an augmentation of ten thouſand men more. This was thought neceſſary to preſs the war with more ſtrength, as the ſureſt way to bring on a ſpeedy peace. The ſtates agreed to the like augmentation on their ſide. The French, according to their uſual vanity, gave out, that they had great deſigns in view the next campaign: And it was confidently reported by the Jacobites, that a new invaſion was deſigned both in Scotland and on Ireland. The whole ſupply voted by the commons for the ſervice of the year 1709, amounted to above ſeven millions. The land-tax of four ſhillings in the pound, and the duty on malt, were readily agreed to; but it took ſome time to find funds for the reſt, and it would have proved a very difficult matter, if the bank of England had not offered to circulate two millions five hundred thouſand pounds in exchequer bills for the government, on condition the time for their continuance was enlarged twenty-one years from Auguſt 1, 1711, and their ſtock of two millions, two hundred and one thouſand, one hundred and ſeventy-one pounds was doubled by a new ſubſcription. The commons, agreeing to the propoſal, addreſſed the queen to iſſue out a commiſſion under the great ſeal for taking the ſubſcriptions; which being done, the books were opened at Mercers-hall, on the 22d of February, about nine in the morning, and by one o'clock in the afternoon the whole ſum of two millions, two hundred and one thouſand, one hundred and ſeventy-one pounds (at the rate of an hundred and fifteen pounds for every hundred pounds) was ſubſcribed. Such was the crowd of people, that brought their money to this new fund, that it was believed a million more would have been ſubſcribed before night, if there had been room. This ſhewed both the wealth of the nation and their entire confidence in the government. It was obſervable, at this very juncture, the French court had a project for erecting a royal bank for circulating their mint-bills, but the deſign was ſoon found to be impracticable, becauſe of the great ſcarcity of money in that kingdom, and the almoſt entire ruin of their public credit. By this ſubſcription, and by a further prolongation of the general mortgage of the revenue, the commons created good funds for anſwering all the money they had voted in the beginning of the ſeſſion. The two third ſubſidy was appropriated for the intereſt of the money raiſed by the bank-ſcheme.

The Scotch elections occaſioned great debates in both houſes. The commons, on the 3d of December, took into conſideration that part of the act of union, which relates to the election of members to ſerve in that houſe for Scotland. The petitions and repreſentations, concerning the incapacity of the eldeſt ſons of Scots peers to ſit in the parliament of Great-Britain, were read, and council heard upon it. The ſubſtance both of theſe repreſentations and the counſels arguments, was, 'That by an act of the Scots parliament, entitled, An act for ſettling the manner of electing ſixteen peers and forty-five commoners, to repreſent Scotland in the parliament of Great-Britain, which act was ratified by the act for uniting the two kingdoms, it is declared, That none ſhall be capable to elect, or be elected, to repreſent a ſhire or burgh in the parliament of Great Britain for this part of the united kingdom, except ſuch as are now capable to elect, or be elected, as commiſſioners for ſhires or burghs to the parliament of Scotland:' That from hence it evidently followed, that the Scots peers eldeſt ſons could not ſit in the houſe of commons of Great-Britain, unleſs it did appear, that they were capable to be elected, and ſit as members of the parliament of Scotland. But as a proof of the contrary, ſeveral inſtances were alledged of their being always rejected by the parliament of Scotland, and, in particular, the viſcount Turbat's eldeſt ſon, in the year 1685, and the lord Levingſton in the year 1689. That the fundamental law of the union had moſt expreſsly reſerved to the commons of Scotland that valuable privilege of electing their repreſentatives in parliament, from among the beſt qualified gentlemen of their own number and ſtate, in the ſame manner as they had formerly uſed to do. That, in electing members of parliament, the choice of the electors ought to be made as free as is poſſible, from the influence either of bribes, or threats, and in juſtice ſhould only be determined by the honeſty and candour of the perſon to be choſen; and his character be ſuch, as promiſes a faithful diſcharge of ſo great a truſt; and that his inclination be accompanied with a ſufficient capacity to maintain this character; the commons there being ſurrounded with a numerous and powerful peerage, who, like ſo many ſovereigns, judge and determine within their reſpective bounds in criminal as well as civil matters, being veſted with vaſt ſuperiorities and hereditary juriſdictions, ſo that no commoner holding any part of his lands of a peer, or indeed being in his neighbourhood, could be reckoned at liberty to make a free election of his repreſentative: And therefore the commons of Scotland, whereof the majority of their parliament conſiſted, had invincible arguments for preſerving entire to themſelves that neceſſary privilege of excluding their peers eldeſt ſons from being from members of that houſe. That if the parliament of Scotland, which conſiſted of peers and commoners ſitting together in the ſame houſe, enjoying the ſame liberty of ſpeech, and the ſame common privileges and judicative capacity, being alſo reſtricted to the ſame rules and forms, had ſo many weighty reaſons for excluding their peers eldeſt ſons; how many more arguments of greater moment might be urged in the houſe of commons of Great Britain, who were a ſeparate and diſtinct houſe of peers, enjoying by themſelves ſo many valuble privileges which could not be incroached upon, or ſubjected to a houſe of peers, without endangering the whole conſtitution of the houſe of commons? And in the laſt place, That, England and Scotland being now united, and their intereſts inſeparably joined, it ought to be a maxim with all true Britons, that the liberty of the commons of Scotland will always be an advantage to thoſe of England; and that the ſlavery of the firſt cannot fail ending in the deſtruction of the latter.

[s] It was propoſed, that all queſtions at the trial of elections ſhould, (if any member inſiſted on it) be determined by ballot, but it was carried in the negative. The houſe, having heard the merits of the conteſted election for the city of Weſtminſter, ſent Huggins, then high-bailiff, to Newgate, for refuſing to tender the oaths of abjuration; and voted Thomas Medlicot, eſq. who was ſet up by the tories, in oppoſition to ſir Henry Dutton Colt, to be duly elected for that city, yeas 154, noes 142. Several accidents happened to ſir Henry's diſadvantage in that conteſt, in which the whigs, for the moſt part, favoured him, though they did not much eſteem or love him, otherwiſe than as he was a man of revolution-principles. Huggins is the perſon, that lay ſo long in Newgate for a criminal caſe, in the exerciſe of the office of warden of the Fleet. On the other hand, ſir Simon Harcourt having been returned for Abington, and Mr. John Hucks having lodged a petition againſt him, the cauſe was argued, and the debates continued till two in the morning, on the 28th of January, when Mr. Hucks carried it by a great majority. Sir Simon took his leave of the houſe with a ſpeech, which he began with aſſerting: 'Whatever the determination of this houſe may be, this I am ſure of, and it muſt be admitted, that I am as duly elected for the borough of Abington as ever any man was.'

Little being offered on the other ſide againſt theſe arguments, the eldeſt ſons of the peers of Scotland were declared incapable to ſit in parliament, and, three days after, the commons ordered their ſpeaker to iſſue out his warrants to the clerk of the crown, to make out new writs for the electing commiſſioners for the ſhire of Aberdeen, in the room of William lord Haddo; and for the ſhire of Linlithgow, in the room of James lord Johnſtown, who, being eldeſt ſons of peers of Scotland, were declared to be incapable to ſit in that houſe.

A petition of a new nature was likewiſe brought before the lords, with relation to the election of the peers from Scotland. There was a return made in due form; but a petition was laid before the houſe in the name of four lords, who pretended, that they ought to have been returned. The duke of Queenſberry had been created a duke of Great Britain by the title of duke of Dover; yet he thought he had ſtill right to vote as a peer of Scotland. He had likewiſe a proxy; ſo that two votes depended on this point, whether the Scots peerage did ſink into the peerage of Great Britain. Some lords, who were priſoners in the caſtle of Edinburgh on ſuſpicion, as favouring the pretender, had ſent for the ſheriff of Lotian to the caſtle, and had taken the oaths before him; and upon that were reckoned to be qualified to vote or make a proxy. Now it was pretended, that the caſtle of Edinburgh was a conſtabulatory, and was out of the ſheriff's juriſdiction; and that therefore he could not legally tender them the oaths. Some proxies were ſigned without ſubſcribing witneſſes, a form neceſſary by their law. Other exceptions were alſo taken from ſome rules of the law of Scotland, which had not been obſerved. The clerks being alſo complained of, they were ſent for, and were ordered to bring up with them all inſtruments or documents relating to the election. When they came up, and every thing was laid before the houſe of lords, the whole matter was long and well debated.

As to the duke of Queenſberry's voting among the Scots lords, it was ſaid, that if a peer of Scotland, being made a peer of Great Britain, did ſtill retain the intereſt in electing the ſixteen from Scotland, this would create a great inequality among peers, ſome having a vote by repreſentation, as well as in perſon: The precedent was miſchievous, ſince, by creating ſome of the chief families in Scotland peers of Great Britain, they would be able to carry the whole election of the ſixteen as they pleaſed. It was objected, that, by a clauſe in the act paſſed ſince the union, the peers of England, who were likewiſe peers of Scotland, had a right to vote in the election of Scotland ſtill reſerved to them; ſo there ſeemed to be a parity in this caſe with that. But it was anſwered, That a peer of England, and a peer of Scotland, held their dignity under two different crowns, and by two different great ſeals: But, Great Britain including Scotland as well as England, the Scots peerage muſt now ſink into that of Great Britain. Beſides, that there were but five, who were peers of both kingdoms before the union; and therefore, as it might be reaſonable to make proviſion for them, ſo it was of no great conſequence; but, if this precedent were allowed, it might go much farther, and have very ill conſequences. Upon a diviſion of the houſe, the matter was determined againſt the duke of Queenſberry.

A great deal was ſaid both at the bar by the lawyers, and in the debate in the houſe, upon the point of juriſdiction, and of the exemption of a conſtabulatory. It was ſaid, that the ſheriffs court ought to be, as all courts were, open and free, and ſo could not be held in caſtle or priſon. But no expreſs deciſion had ever been made in this matter. The priſoners had taken the oaths, which was the chief intent of the law, in the beſt manner they could; ſo that it ſeemed not reaſonable to cut them off from the main privilege of peerage, which was reſerved to them, becauſe they could not go abroad to the ſheriffs court. After a long debate it was carried, that the oaths were duly tendered to them. Some other exceptions were proved and admitted; the returns of ſome, certifying that they had taken the oaths, were not ſealed; and ſome had ſigned theſe without ſubſcribing witneſſes. Other exceptions were offered from proviſions, which the law of Scotland had made, with relation to bonds and other deeds, which had not been obſerved in making of proxies. But the houſe of lords did not think theſe were of that importance, as to vacate the proxies on that account. After a full hearing, and a debate, which laſted many days, there was but one of the peers, who were returned, that was found not duly elected, and only one of the petitioning lords was brought into the houſe; the marquis of Annandale was received, and the marquis of Lothian was ſet aſide.

The Scots members in both houſes were divided into factions. The duke of Queenſberry had his party ſtill depending upon him. He was in ſuch credit with the lord-treaſurer and the queen, that all the poſts in Scotland were given to perſons recommended by him. The chief miniſters at court ſeemed to have laid it down for a maxim not to be departed from, to look carefully to elections in Scotland; that the members returned from thence might be in an entire dependance on them, and be either whigs or tories, as they ſhould ſhift ſides. The duke of Queenſberry was made third ſecretary of ſtate: He had no foreign province aſſigned him, but Scotland was left to his management. The dukes of Hamilton, Montroſs, and Roxburgh, had ſet themſelves in an oppoſition to his power, and had carried many elections againſt him. The lord Sommers and the earl of Sunderland ſupported them, but could not prevail with the lord treaſurer to bring them into an equal ſhare of the adminiſtration. This had almoſt occaſioned a breach; for the whigs, though they went on in a conjunction with the lord treaſurer, yet continued ſtill to be jealous of him.

The bill for naturalizing all proteſtant foreigners was alſo the ſubject of great debates this ſeſſion. Since the revocation of the edict of Nantz, ſo fatal to France by the decreaſe of her trade, and the loſs of numberleſs ſubjects, England abounded with French proteſtants. They had indeed been well received, but with much more reſerve than in the United Provinces, Brandenburgh, and Pruſſia. They had however done all the ſervice they could, and the Engliſh themſelves had not behaved with more bravery and reſentment againſt France than theſe refugees. For ever excluded from their native country, they had long been ſeeking to be incorporated by an act of naturalization with a people, to whom they had fled for refuge. But their endeavours had hitherto proved ineffectual. The preſent parliament, wherein the whigs had the majority, whoſe maxim it was to countenance foreign proteſtants, at length granted their deſire. For, on the 5th of February, Mr. Wortley Montague made a motion for a bill for naturalizing foreign proteſtants, and, in a ſet ſpeech, ſhewed the advantages, that would accrue to the nation by ſuch an act; alledging, amongſt other particulars, "the example of the king of Pruſſia, who had not only invited, but furniſhed abundance of French refugees with means to ſettle in his dominions; whereby he had fertilized an almoſt barren country, improved trade, and vaſtly encreaſed his revenue." Adding, "That if foreigners were induced to ſettle under a deſpotic government, where they found protection and encouragement, they would undoubtedly be the more inclined to bring their effects, and at leaſt their induſtry, into Great Britain, where they would ſhare the privileges of a free nation." Mr. Compton, and ſeveral other members, ſupporting the motion, the houſe ordered the bill to be prepared and brought in.

Whilſt this bill was depending, a paper was printed, and induſtriouſly diſperſed, importing, 1ſt, That the conflux of aliens, as would probably be the effect of ſuch a law, might prove dangerous to our conſtitution; for theſe would owe allegiance to their reſpective princes, and retain a fondneſs for their native countries; and therefore, whenſoever a war should break out, might prove so many spies and enemies. And, besides this pretence, the professed enemies of our established church and religion might flock over, with design to effect its overthrow. 2dly, That a general naturalization might undoubtedly spread an universal disgust and jealousy throughout the nation; there having been many complaints and commotions in London, and elsewhere, on occasion of foreigners. 3dly, That the design of inviting multitudes of aliens to settle here, might prove in time a further mischief; for they would not only be incapable of voting at elections, but also of being chosen members of parliament; have admission into places of trust and authority, which, in process of time, might endanger our ancient policy and government, and, by frequent intermarriages, go a great way to blot out and extinguish the English race [t].

The majority of the house easily discerned the fallacy of these popular arguments, being thoroughly convinced, both by their own observation, and the reasons alledged both within and without the walls, that (as the preamble of the bill set forth) the increase of people is a means of advancing the wealth and strength of a nation: This maxim was abundantly verified, not only in Prussia, Holland, and other protestant countries, which had greatly increased in riches by the French refugees settling there, but principally in Great Britain, where, by the industry of the refugees, several new manufactures had been set up, and others improved, to the great advancement of trade, and the total turning the balance thereof, to the prejudice of France, and the benefit of this nation. That, besides the improvement of commerce, the French refugees had greatly contributed towards the support of the revolution settlement, by putting the best part of their own substance, and of their friends and relations abroad, into the public funds; of which they had a fresh instance, in subscribing near five hundred thousand pounds into the bank of England; so that, by a modest computation, the refugees were reckoned to have above two millions sterling in the government. That, as they could not be supposed to have brought one half of that money into England, so it was prudence to divert the thoughts they might have, upon the conclusion of the war, of carrying their vast gains abroad (which would very much lessen the current cash and credit of Great Britain) by granting them the advantages and privileges enjoyed by her majesty's natural born subjects; which would not only engage them to settle here, but likewise bring over such of their friends and relations, as might hope to inherit their estates. That the French refugees had at all times, in their several stations and capacities, given signal proofs of their love for our happy constitution, and of their zeal and affection for the government: And, in particular, such of them, as had military employments, which they had discharged, both in the late and present war, with distinguishing bravery and conduct. That this war had already consumed such vast numbers of men, that it was highly necessary to supply that loss, by inviting foreigners to come over, whether the war continued, which would still increase the scarcity of men; or whether it was drawing to a period; in which case a great number of hands would be requisite to carry on the manufactures. In short, that all the objections against a naturalization were grounded upon this false supposition, that 'foreigners would ever continue, and be looked upon as such;' which was sufficiently confuted by past and daily experience.

When those who were against the bill perceived they should have no strength, if they set themselves directly to oppose it, they studied to limit strangers, in the receiving the sacrament, to the way of the church of England. This probably would not have hindered many, who were otherwise disposed to come among us: For the much greater part of the French came into the way of our church. But it was thought best to cast the door as wide open as possible, for encouraging of strangers: And therefore since, upon their first coming over, some might chuse the way, to which they had been accustomed beyond sea, it seemed the more inviting method to admit of all who were in any protestant communion. Accordingly, the bill was carried in the house of commons by a great majority, for naturalizing all foreign protestants, upon their taking the oaths to the government, and receiving the sacrament in any protestant church. All those, that appeared for this comprehensive way, were reproached for their coldness and indifference in the concerns of the church. Of this the bishop of Sarum had a large share; for, when the bill was brought up to the lords, he spoke copiously for it; whilst the bishop of Chester spoke as zealously against it, who seemed resolved to distinguish himself as a zealot for that which was called high-church. The bill passed with very little opposition, though it was protested against by several lords, as prejudicial to trade and manufactures, and of ill consequence to our liberties and religion [u].

The other subjects of debate in this session were, the enquiry into the Scotch invasion, and the trials of treason in Scotland. What gave rise to the great and long debates on these affairs was this: Upon the attempt made by the pretender, many of the nobility and gentry of Scotland, who had all along adhered to that interest, were secured; and after the fleet was got back to Dunkirk, and the danger was over, they were ordered to be brought up prisoners to London; when they came, there was no evidence at all against them, so they were dismissed, and sent back to Scotland. No exceptions could be taken to the securing them, while there was danger: But, since nothing besides presumptions lay against them, the bringing them up to London, at such a charge, and under such a disgrace, was much censured, as an unreasonable and an unjust severity; and was made use of, to give that nation a further aversion to the union. That whole matter was managed by the Scotch lords then in the ministry, by which they both revenged themselves on some of their enemies, and made a shew of zeal for the government; though such as did not believe them sincere in these professions, thought it was done on design to exasperate the Scots the more, and so to dispose them to wish for another invasion. The whig ministry in England disowned all these proceedings, and used the Scots prisoners so well, [t] Several other reasons were urged, as 4. That antiently naturalizations by act of parliament were seldom or never made, but upon special reasons, and for particular occasions. And though some acts have given encouragement to foreign merchants and weavers to settle here; it was when our weaving trade, and other manufactures, were inconsiderable, to the advancement they have since attained: And that from the settlement of the great customs in Edward the first's time, in all acts of parliament for subsidies since passed, aliens had always been charged with an increase of customs above natives, and a discrimination kept up between them; as was particularly remarked by the learned lord chief justice Hale, in a tract against a general Naturalization. 5. That it was more than probable, that the greatest number, that would come over, would be of poor people, which would be of fatal consequence with respect to the many poor industrious families, who would thereby be reduced to the uttermost straits; it being evident, that no hands were wanted to carry on our manufactures, from the great quantities, that lay on hand, their cheapness, and the lowness of wages now given. What then would be the effect of such an addition? For these aliens would altogether settle in places of manufacture; there being no instances of any of the late refugees betaking themselves to the spade, plough, or flail. And it would be a very great charge to those parishes, wherein they should settle; there being now great numbers of French, who for want of work were relieved, and, in a great measure, maintained by the queen's bounty and charity of their churches, and other well-disposed persons, who, when naturalized, would have recourse to their own respective parishes for an allowance. 6. That a general naturalization would, in effect, defeat the patent of the act of navigation, which had always been esteemed to conduce to the interest of the nation, by the encouragement and increase of English mariners, and advance of trade. 7. That hereby, in process of time, aliens would be advanced in riches, and her majesty's subjects impoverished; for those beneficial trades, buying and selling by commissions, remittances, and exchanges of money, would, in a great measure, be ingrossed by foreigners, by reason of their many friends and relations abroad. Besides, such aliens generally living in lodgings, and at little charge, frequently escaping public taxes and parish duties, would be able to undersell and undermine the native merchants. 8. That hereby the treasure of the nation would be exhausted and remitted into foreign parts; for it might well be supposed, that those aliens, that have valuable estates, could not or would not transport the greatest part thereof hither; and leaving children, and their nearest relations behind them, they would come hither only upon a design of getting riches, and to return home again therewith, particularly upon a prospect of war; an instance of which we have in the practice of our merchants, who, when they have got estates abroad, constantly return home to enjoy the same. 9. That the queen's customs would hereby be considerably diminished; for many statutes, which lay a greater duty on aliens than on natives, would, as to this, be repealed. 10. That opportunity would hereby be given to merchants, to colour the goods and merchandizes of other strangers beyond sea, their correspondents, friends, or relations, to the great detriment of her majesty's customs, and trade of the native subjects; a practice which was offered to be proved before their late majesties and the lords of the treasury: Which reasons did influence the judgments of our ancestors, as appears by the statutes of 1 Hen. VII. c. 11. 11 Hen. VII. c. 14. 22 Hen. VIII. c. 8. 11. That the duties of package and scavage of the goods of all merchants, as well denizens as aliens, were the indispensable right and inheritance of the commonalty and citizens of London, let to farm by lease (wherein were about eighteen years to come) for a fine of one thousand pounds, and the yearly rent of nine hundred and fifty pounds; and, among other things, were, by act of parliament, charged towards the raising of eight thousand pounds per annum for ever to the orphans, and other creditors of the said city, and would render them incapable to support the government of the same. 12. And in the last place, That, the nation being now engaged in an expensive, though necessary war, taxes high, trade obstructed, great quantities of woollen, and other manufactures, lay unsold; and, as an effect hereof, the several prices of making them very small, many families destitute of work throughout the kingdom: What then, at such a time as this, must be the consequence of inviting hither, by a general naturalization, multitudes of poor foreigners, who would only employ themselves in trade and manufactures?

About the same time the city of London having, on the 18th of February, petitioned the commons, that they might be heard by their counsel against the bill, and their request being granted, their lawyers chiefly insisted on the 11th of the above-mentioned reasons; but upon examination it was found, that the duties of package and scavage did not, of late, yield above twenty pounds per annum, most of the foreign merchants having been already naturalized.

[u] Buckingham, Guernsey, Scarsdale, North and Grey, Anglesea, Guilford, and Nottingham. Pr. H. L. Vol. II. 261.

that they went down much inclined to concur with them: But the lord Godolphin fatally adhered to the Scotch miniſters, and ſupported them, by which the advantage that might have been made from theſe ſevere proceedings was loſt. Hence it was, that the lords having ordered their members to attend on the 10th of January, they took into conſideration the ſtate of the nation, with reſpect to the late invaſion of Scotland. The lord Haverſham opened the debate with a long ſpeech, wherein he ſet forth, that the nation expected an enquiry into this matter, in which not only their welfare, but their very being itſelf, the ſecurity of the nation, and the ſafety of the queen, were highly concerned. For the ſucceſſes of their arms had not diſabled the French king from making farther attempts. Beſides, it was plain, his chief dependance in the late invaſion was from the encouragement he had from hence; and yet, notwithſtanding all enquiries, it was ſtill a great myſtery who the perſons were that were concerned in that unnatural treaſon. It is true, ſeveral perſons of great quality had been taken up on ſuſpicion, but had any thing been proved againſt them? The French king had more encouragement than before to renew his attempt upon us, ſince the methods hitherto taken to diſcover the many friends he has among us had ſignified ſo little. Another encouragement was the defenceleſs condition of Scotland, the deficiency of forces, and the ill ſtate of the garriſons at the time of the invaſion, notwithſtanding the certain account we had of it. He concluded with ſaying, 'My lords, if your lordſhips have any intention of looking into this matter, I ſhall make your lordſhips a motion, which perhaps may give us ſome light. It is, That her majeſty will pleaſe to order, that there may be laid before this houſe, at what time her majeſty received the firſt account of the intended invaſion? What orders were thereupon iſſued into Scotland, with relation either to forces or garriſons? What was the number of regular troops and forces there at the time of this intelligence? What was the ſtate of the garriſons there at that time? What augmentation was made, or forces ſent thither, from the time of the intelligence, to the time of the invaſion? What orders had been given with relation to the garriſons, and when, both before and ſince the invaſion, from the time of the firſt intelligence?'

The lord Haverſham having ended this ſpeech, ſeveral other peers ſpoke to the ſame purpoſe. Whereupon the houſe appointed a committee, to enquire into the ſtate of the nation in relation to the intended invaſion, and ordered an addreſs to be preſented to the queen, to deſire, that the papers concerning that affair might be laid before them; which was readily complied with.

Not long after this addreſs the lord Haverſham opened in the houſe of lords, the account of the Scotch invaſion in a much longer ſpeech, wherein he obſerves, that the lords who ſeconded his motion for the papers to be laid before them, never ſo much as looked into them, or have mentioned the matter ſince; perhaps, they will ſay they never intended it, and that they called for the papers only to cover ſome deſign, or to try how an act of grace will reliſh, to which, as he was innocent, he ſhould not give his conſent. As to the papers, he had looked into them, and with their lordſhip's leave would take notice of ſome particulars: Mr. Boyle received certain intelligence, the 23d of February, that the armament of Dunkirk was intended for Scotland; and the queen on the 25th, empowers her privy-council there to put her forces, forts, and garriſons in the beſt order. There were not at that time above fifteen hundred men of regular forces in Scotland. Though this was an inſufficient ſtrength, and though the parliament raiſed the eſtabliſhment, December 20, 1707, from two thouſand eight hundred and thirty-four, to five thouſand nine hundred and thirty-two, yet there was little or no augmentation made, nor had the council one ſhilling for neceſſary expences the 11th of March, nor ſo much as one penny ordered till the 13th, neither was the eſtabliſhment ſettled till after the invaſion. He then proceeds to ſhew, that when Scotland was in this defenceleſs condition, what aſſiſtance they had from Oſtend, England, and Ireland. The tranſports from Oſtend did not arrive at Tinmouth Bay, till ten days after the enemy were ſeen on the Scotch coaſt, ſo that the diſpute, had there been any, would have been over before they could come up. As to the troops from England, they had not orders to march till the 14th of March, which, conſidering the length of the march from hence to Edinburgh, was certainly too long a delay. As for the troops from Ireland, the very orders to provide tranſports were not given by the lord Sunderland till the 12th of March here, nor by the lord-lieutenant of Ireland, for the troops to be in readineſs till the 13th. Now, conſidering what time would be taken up in providing neceſſaries for tranſporting the troops, it ſeems very evident, that the queen was not truly acquainted with the danger ſhe was in, and that theſe forces muſt arrive in Scotland very late. He then took notice of the wretched ſtate of the garriſons, particularly of the caſtles of Stirling, Blackneſs, and Dumbarton, and concluded with ſaying, 'I will not trouble you farther: I think this matter is now very plain before your lordſhips. I could wiſh I had not ſaid one word of truth in what I have ſaid to you; but the vouchers ſhew it to be ſo; and, if all this be true, it is a very ſtrange, a very ſurprizing, and a very aſtoniſhing truth.

I ſhall not move any thing to your lordſhips farther, in this matter: I believe there has been enough now ſaid, to juſtify thoſe lords for moving this inquiry, and ſhall add but this word, That if there be no greater care taken for the future than there was at this time of ſuch imminent danger, it will be the greateſt miracle in the world, if, without a miracle, the pretender be not placed upon that throne.'

This is the ſubſtance of what was obſerved by lord Haverſham, though there happened ſome interlocutions between him and another lord; and ſome obſervations were made upon the papers as they were read. The duke of Buckingham and ſeveral peers ſpoke to the ſame purpoſe. Upon which it was ordered, that the affair ſhould be conſidered the Tueſday following in a full houſe. But all ended in a joint addreſs, as will preſently be ſeen.

During theſe debates in the houſe of lords, the commons had alſo taken the affair of the invaſion into conſideration. Purſuant to an addreſs they had preſented to the queen, Mr. Boyle laid before the houſe a ſtate of the whole matter of the deſigned invaſion of North Britain; the proceedings againſt the late lord Griffin and others taken in open rebellion, and alſo an account of the names of all thoſe that were taken up, and the proceedings againſt them; and in what poſture of defence the caſtles and garriſons of North Britain were taken at that time, and now are. Not long after the commons reſolved to preſent another addreſs to the queen, 'That there might be laid before them a liſt of the ſhips of war employed on account of the late invaſion, under vice-admiral Byng and rear-admiral Baker, and of the names of the captains, who were employed in that expedition, and what journals had been delivered in relating to the ſame.' But after all theſe addreſſes, when the papers, relating to this affair, came to be conſidered, the houſe at length reſolved, 'Firſt, that orders were not iſſued for the marching of the troops in England until the fourteenth day of March, it being neceſſary for the ſecurity of her majeſty's perſon and government, that the troops in this part of the kingdom ſhould not march into Scotland, till there was certain intelligence that the enemy intended to land in that part of the united kingdom. Secondly, That timely and effectual care was taken by thoſe employed under her majeſty, at the time of the intended invaſion of Scotland, to diſappoint the deſigns of her majeſty's enemies both at home and abroad, by fitting out a ſufficient number of men of war, ordering a competent number of troops from Flanders, giving directions for the forces in Ireland to be ready for the aſſiſtance of the nation, and by making the neceſſary and proper diſpoſitions of the forces in England.' Purſuant to theſe reſolutions an addreſs was drawn up, and preſented to the queen with the concurrence of the lords[w].

The conſideration of the ſtate of the nation, with reſpect

[w] However, the author of a piece, ſuppoſed to be written by the lord Haverſham himſelf, and publiſhed in 1709, in 4to, under the title of An Account of the late invaſion as it was opened by lord Haverſham in the houſe of lords, on Friday the 25th of February 1708-9: With ſome obſervations, that were made in the houſe of commons, and true copies of authentic papers in a letter from a gentleman in South Britain, to his friend in North Britain, obſerves, p. 20, &c. 'That the ſame papers being laid before the houſe of commons, purſuant to their addreſs, produced the like obſervations there, and that the Scots gentlemen concurred with the Engliſh, in blaming the conduct of the miniſtry; affirming it was ſuch, as gave great encouragement to the enemies of the government; while its friends looked on their country to be perfectly given up. This, they ſaid, was their general ſenſe. In the houſe of commons ſome obſervations were alſo made upon the impriſoning many perſons in Scotland at that time; ſeveral lords and gentlemen of the beſt quality and eſtates were apprehended and ſeized, by virtue of warrants ſent from hence for ſuſpicion of treaſon and treaſonable practices; though it does not appear from the papers, that there was any cauſe to ſuſpect; nor that any of their countrymen (who were the propereſt perſons to be adviſed with on this occaſion) were conſulted in it. For the earl of Mar in his letter to the earl of Leven, March 9, writes, That he, with the dukes of Queenſberry and Montroſs, the earls of Loudon and Seafield, were ſummoned to the cabinet, and were told there, that ſince both houſes had for ſecuring ſuſpected perſons, ſuſpended the habeas corpus act, it was fit, perſons in Scotland ſhould be apprehended; and a liſt was read to them, which they took down in writing, and warrants were ready drawn. This was certainly a very extraordinary way of proceeding, and the more extraordinary to the late invaſion, gave occaſion to a bill concerning trials of treaſons in Scotland, under the title of 'an act for improving the union of the two kingdoms.' This bill cauſed very great and long debates, and ſprung from the proceedings againſt the ſuſpected perſons in Scotland, and particularly for a trial of ſome gentlemen of that kingdom, who had left their houſes, when the pretender was on the ſea, and had gone about armed, and in ſo ſecret and ſuſpicious a manner, that it gave great cauſe of jealouſy. There was no clear evidence to convict them; but there were very ſtrong, if not violent preſumptions againſt them. Some forms in the trial had not been obſerved, which the criminal court judged were neceſſary, and not to be diſpenſed with. But the queen's advocate, ſir James Stewart, was of another mind. The court thought it was neceſſary by their laws, That the names of the witneſſes ſhould have been ſignified to the priſoners fifteen days before the trial. But the queen's advocate had not complied with this, as to the chief witneſſes, ſo that the court could not hear their evidence. He did not, upon that, move for a delay; and therefore the trial went on, and the gentlemen were acquitted. Severe expoſtulations paſſed between the queen's advocate and the court. They complained of one another to the queen, and both ſides juſtified their complaints in print. Upon this it appeared, that the laws in Scotland concerning trials in caſes of treaſon were not fixed nor certain. For which reaſon a bill was brought into the houſe of commons to ſettle that matter; but it was ſo much oppoſed by the Scots members, that it was dropped in the committee. It was taken up and managed with more zeal by the lords.

It conſiſted of three heads: All crimes, which were high-treaſon by the law of England, and theſe only, were to be high-treaſon in Scotland. The manner of proceeding ſettled in England was to be obſerved in Scotland; and the pains and forfeitures were to be the ſame in both nations. The Scots lords oppoſed every branch of this act. They moved, that all things, that were high-treaſon by the law of England, might be enumerated in the act, for the information of the Scots nation; otherwiſe they muſt ſtudy the book of ſtatutes, to know when they were ſafe, and when they were guilty. To this it was anſwered, that directions would be given to the judges, to publiſh an abſtract of the laws of high-treaſon, which would be a ſufficient information to the people of Scotland in this matter. That nation would by this means be in a much ſafer condition than they were now; for the laws, they had, were conceived in ſuch general words, that the judges might put ſuch conſtructions on them, as ſhould ſerve the ends of a bad court; but they would by this act be reſtrained in this matter for the future.

The ſecond head in this bill occaſioned a much longer debate: It changed the whole method of proceedings in Scotland. The former way there was, the queen's advocate ſigned a citation of the perſons, ſetting forth the ſpecial matter of high-treaſon, of which they were accuſed. This was to be delivered to them, together with the names of the witneſſes, fifteen days before the trial. When the jury was impannelled, no peremptory challenges were allowed: Reaſons were to be offered with every challenge; and, if the court allowed them, they were to be proved immediately. Then the matter of the charge, which is there called the relevancy of the libel, was to be argued by lawyers, whether the matter, ſuppoſe it ſhould be proved, did amount to high treaſon, or not. This was determined by a ſentence of the court, called the interloquitur; and the proof of the fact was not till then to be made. Of that the jury had the cognizance. Anciently the verdict went with the majority, the number being fifteen; but by a late act the verdict was to be given upon the agreement of two third parts of the jury. In the ſentence, the law did not limit the judges to a certain form, but they could aggravate the puniſhment, or modetate it, according to the circumſtances of the caſe. All this method was to be ſet aſide; a grand jury, was to find the bill; the judges were only to regulate proceedings, and to declare what the law was; and the whole matter of the indictment was to be left entire to the jury, who were to be twelve, and all to agree in their verdict.

In one particular, the forms of Scotland were much preferable to thoſe in England; the depoſition of the witneſſes were taken indeed by word of mouth, but were writ out, and after that were ſigned by the witneſſes; they were ſent in to the jury; and theſe were made a part of the record. This was very ſlow and tedious; but the jury, by this means, was more certainly poſſeſſed of the evidence, and the matter was more clearly delivered down to poſterity; whereas the records in England are very defective, and give no light to an hiſtorian who peruſes them.

The Scots oppoſed this alteration of their way of proceeding: They ſaid, that neither the judges, the advocates, nor the clerks would know how to manage a trial of treaſon. They inſiſted moſt on the names of the witneſſes to be given to the perſons ſome days before their trial. It ſeemed reaſonable, that a man ſhould know who was to be brought to witneſs againſt him, that ſo he might examine his life, and ſee what credit ought to be given to him. On the other hand it was ſaid, this would open a door to practice, either upon the witneſſes to corrupt them, or in ſuborning other witneſſes to defame them. To this it was anſwered, that a guilty man knew what could be brought againſt him; and, without ſuch notice, would take all the methods poſſible to defend himſelf. But proviſion ought to be made for innocent men, whoſe chief guilt might be a good eſtate, upon which a favourite might have an eye: And therefore ſuch perſons ought to be taken care of. This was afterwards ſo much ſoftened, that it was only deſired, that the names of the witneſſes, who had given evidence to the grand jury, ſhould, upon their finding the bill, be ſignified to the priſoner five hours before his trial. Upon a diviſion of the houſe on this queſtion, the votes were equal; and therefore by the rule of the houſe, that in ſuch a cauſe the negative prevails, it was loſt.

Upon the third head of the bill the debates grew ſtill warmer. In Scotland many families were ſettled by long entails and perpetuities; and therefore it was ſaid, that ſince, by one of the articles of the union, all private rights were ſtill preſerved, no breach could be made on theſe ſettlements. Biſhop Burnet carried this further; he thought, that it was neither juſt nor reaſonable to ſet the children on begging for their fathers faults: That the Romans, during their liberty, never thought of carrying puniſhments ſo far: That it was an invention, under the tyranny of the emperors, who had a particular revenue called the Fife[x]; and all forfeitures were claimed by them, from whence they were called confiſcations: That it was never the practice of free governments: That Boulogne flouriſhed beyond any town in the pope's dominions, becauſe they made it an article of their capitulation with the pope, that no confiſcation ſhould follow on any crime whatſoever: That in Holland the confiſcation was redeemable by ſo very ſmall a ſum as an hundred guilders[y]. That many inſtances might be brought of proſecu-extraordinary, becauſe the greateſt part of the lords and gentlemen, taken up by theſe warrants, had given undoubted teſtimonies ever ſince the revolution (in which ſome of them had been very active and inſtrumental) of their fidelity and good affection to the government; they had taken all oaths, that have been injoined for their ſecurity; they had ſate in parliament; and ſome of them had been in offices and employments of great truſt in the reign of king William and of her majeſty. Others, under the like circumſtances were taken up by warrants, bearing date the 29th of March, when the danger was over; which made the Scots gentlemen very free in declaring, that the taking them up could be for no other reaſon, than to influence the approaching elections to parliament; and for their diſaffection to the intereſts ſome courtiers then promoted, rather than for their diſaffection to her majeſty's perſon and government, in which they were the more confirmed, becauſe they ſaw there was no evidence in the papers againſt any of them. There was indeed ſome evidence of high-treaſon pretended againſt five gentlemen, taken up by warrants from the privy-council of Scotland; but that was ſuch, as the lord advocate writes, neither he nor the other advocates employed for her majeſty, did think would convict them; and therefore humbly offered it as their opinion, that it would be more for the honour and ſervice of her majeſty, and of her government, that they ſhould not be proſecuted. The earl of Sunderland, in his anſwer, acquainted him, he had laid his memorial before her majeſty, who was well ſatisfied with what he had done, in procuring evidence againſt the priſoners; and though poſſibly, upon their trial, the evidence might not be ſufficient to convict them by the law of Scotland, yet conſidering all the circumſtances of that affair, and the noiſe it has made in the world, her majeſty thought it abſolutely neceſſary for her ſervice, that it be carried as far as it will bear. Accordingly, they were brought upon their trials, and acquitted. After all the obſervations made upon the papers, the conſideration of them ended in the houſe of commons, in the reſolution abovementioned. The gentlemen, that were againſt this reſolution, deſired, that all the papers laid before the houſe, relating to the intended invaſion of Scotland, might be printed, that the world might ſee and judge how well grounded it was. But thoſe, who had juſtified the miniſtry in their debates, and voted for the reſolution, would not ſuffer the papers to be printed, ſo that the queſtion was carried in the negative.'

[x] This remark of biſhop Burnet is clearly overthrown by the author of an excellent piece, publiſhed this preſent year 1745, and entitled, 'Some conſiderations on the law of forfeitures for high-treaſon, occaſioned by a clauſe in a late act, for making it treaſon to correſpond with the pretender's ſons, or any of their agents', &c. in which the law of forfeitures is juſtified from the principles of natural juſtice, the practice and genius of the freeſt ſtates, the conſtitution of the Engliſh government, with a perſpicuity, force, and comprehenſion of reaſoning, not to be found in any other diſcourſe on that ſubject. This writer oppoſes to the biſhop's obſervation, concerning the Roman Fife, the words of Cujacius ad L. Jul. Maj. Fiſcus erat populi imperatoris; which, intimates, "That forfeitures was a known puniſhment during the republic. It was then called 'bonorum publicatio.' But the biſhop ſeems to have been miſled by the late origin of the word, to imagine the thing itſelf was introduced no earlier."

[y] The author of 'Some conſiderations on the law of forfeitures, p. 39', takes notice

tions, only to obtain the confiſcation. But in this none of the lords ſeconded the biſhop. It was acknowledged, that this was juſt and reaſonable, and fit to be paſſed in good times; but, ſince the nation was then expoſed to ſo much danger from abroad, it did not ſeem adviſeable to abate the ſecurity of the law. But clauſes were agreed to, by which, upon marriages, ſettlements might be made in Scotland, as was practiſed in England, for no eſtate is forfeited for the crime of him who is only tenant for life. By this act alſo tortures were condemned, and the queen was impowered to grant commiſſions of oyer and terminer, as in England, for trying treaſons. The Scots inſiſted on this, that the juſticiary of the criminal court being preſerved by an article of the union, this broke in upon that. It was anſwered, that the criminal court was ſtill to ſit in the time regulated; but theſe commiſſions were granted upon ſpecial occaſions. In the intervals between the terms, it might be neceſſary, upon ſome emergency, not to delay trials too long. But, to give ſome content, it was provided by a clauſe, that a judge of the criminal court ſhould be always one of the quorum in theſe commiſſions. Thus the bill paſſed in the houſe of lords, notwithſtanding the oppoſition of all the Scots lords, with whom many of the tories concurred, they being diſpoſed to oppoſe the court in every thing, and to make treaſon as little to be dreaded as poſſible.

The bill met with the ſame oppoſition in the houſe of commons; yet it paſſed with two amendments. By one, the names of the witneſſes, who had appeared before the grand jury, were ordered to be ſent to the priſoner ten days before his trial. The other was, that no eſtate in land was to be forfeited upon a judgment of high-treaſon; which came up fully to the motion, which Biſhop Burnet had made. Both theſe amendments were looked on as ſuch popular things, that it was not probable, that the houſe of commons would recede from them. Upon that the whigs in the houſe of lords did not think fit to oppoſe them, nor to loſe the bill; and therefore it was moved to agree to theſe amendments, with this proviſo, moved by the lord Sommers, that they ſhould not take place till after the death of the pretender. It was ſaid, that, ſince he aſſumed the title of king of Great Britain, and had ſo lately attempted to invade the nation, it was not reaſonable to leſſen the puniſhment and the dread of treaſon, as long as he lived. Others objected to this, that there would be ſtill a pretender after him, ſince ſo many perſons ſtood in the lineal deſcent before the houſe of Hanover, ſo that this proviſo ſeemed to be, upon the matter, the rejecting the amendment. But it was obſerved, that to pretend to the right of ſucceeding was a different thing from aſſuming the title and attempting an invaſion. The amendment was received with this proviſo; but thoſe, who were againſt the whole bill, did not agree to it. The houſe of commons conſented to the proviſo, which the lords had added to their amendment, with a further addition, that it ſhould not take place till three years after the houſe of Hanover ſhould ſucceed to the crown.

This met with great oppoſition; it was conſidered as a diſtinguiſhing character of thoſe, who were for or againſt the preſent conſtitution and the ſucceſſion; the Scots ſtill oppoſing it on account of the former laws. Both parties collected their ſtrength, and many, who had gone into the country, were brought up on this occaſion; ſo that the bill, with all the amendments and proviſo's, was carried by a ſmall majority; the lords agreeing to this new amendment. The Scots members in both houſes ſeemed to apprehend, that the bill would be very odious in their country; and therefore, to maintain their intereſt at home, they who were divided in every thing elſe, did agree in oppoſing this bill.

The court apprehended from the heat, with which the debates were managed, and the difficulty in carrying the bill through both houſes, that ill-diſpoſed men would endeavour to poſſeſs people with apprehenſions of bad deſigns and ſeverities, that would be ſet on foot; and therefore reſolved to have an act of grace immediately upon it. It was the firſt the queen had ſent, though ſhe had now reigned above ſeven years. The miniſters, for their own ſakes, took care, that it ſhould be very full. It was indeed fuller than any former act of grace. All treaſons committed before the ſigning the act, which was the 19th of April, were pardoned, thoſe only excepted that were done upon the ſea. By this they, who had embarked with the pretender, were ſtill at mercy. This act, according to form, was read once in both houſes, and with the uſual compliments of thanks.

Beſides theſe, there were other things of leſs importance paſſed this ſeſſion.

The injury done to major general Webb, after the battle of Wynendale, having made a great noiſe, the leaders of the tory party readily ſeized this opportunity, both to do him juſtice, and at the ſame time, to expoſe the partiality of thoſe in power. Sir Thomas Hanmer therefore made a motion, on the 13th of December, "That the thanks of the houſe be given to major general Webb, for the great and eminent ſervices performed by him at the battle of Wynendale;" which was unanimouſly carried in the affirmative. The major general being then in the houſe, the ſpeaker gave him, in his place, the thanks of the houſe; which he acknowledged in a very handſome and modeſt ſpeech, ſaying, among other things, "That he valued the honour done him by the commons above the greateſt rewards." This gave Mr. Bromley occaſion to ſay, "That he did not diſapprove the cuſtom, which, of late years, had been introduced, of returning thanks to ſuch generals as had performed eminent ſervices; eſpecially when they received thoſe compliments as modeſtly, as the worthy member, to whom they were now given, had done. But it was with grief, he obſerved, a certain commander, on whom not only the thanks of the houſe, but alſo great rewards had been beſtowed, appeared yet to be unſatisfied." This reflection was viſibly levelled at the duke of Marlborough, who, about that very time, was attacked in two pieces, which were printed, and induſtriouſly ſpread about, the one intituled, 'A ſpeech of Caius Memmius, tribune to the people of Rome, tranſlated from Salluſt;' the other intituled, 'An account of a dream at Harwich.'

On the other hand, the ſame day that an addreſs was voted by the commons for ſuch treaties and agreements, as had been made for contributions, it was unanimouſly reſolved, "That the commons of Great Britain being truly ſenſible, not only of the great and eminent ſervices performed by his grace the duke of Marlborough the laſt ſucceſsful campaign, ſo much the honour of Great Britain, and advantage of all Europe, but alſo of the indefatigable zeal he perſevered in for the ſervice of the common cauſe abroad, while he might, with reaſon, expect to be received with all the marks of honour and ſatisfaction at home, did, with a juſt regard to his glorious actions, return him the thanks of the houſe, and ordered their ſpeaker to tranſmit the ſame to his grace." This being done, the duke of Marlborough returned an anſwer, dated from Bruſſels, February the 13th 1709, importing, "That he was extremely ſenſible of the great honour, which the houſe of commons had done him, in the vote the ſpeaker had been pleaſed to tranſmit to him by their order: That nothing could give him more ſatisfaction, than to find the ſervices, he endeavoured to do the queen and his country, ſo acceptable to the houſe of commons: And he begged the favour of the ſpeaker to aſſure them, he ſhould never think any pains or perſeverance too great, if he might, by God's bleſſing, be inſtrumental in procuring a ſafe and honourable peace for her majeſty and his fellow-ſubjects."

Moreover, when the news of the reduction of Ghent was brought over, both houſes preſented an addreſs to the queen, wherein the duke of Marlborough was mentioned with honour. In this addreſs, "they congratulated her upon the laſt great effort of this glorious year; a year, that would be ever famous in hiſtory, as well for the entire diſappointment of all the attempts and hopes of her enemies, as for the wonderful ſucceſſes, with which God had bleſſed the arms of her majeſty and her allies:" Adding, "That the unuſual length of the campaign, the variety of events, and the difficulty and importance of the actions, had given opportunities to her majeſty's general, the duke of Marlborough, to ſhew his conſummate ability, and all the great qualities neceſſary for ſo high a truſt; whereby, in conjunction with the renowned prince Eugene of Savoy, ſuch conſiderable progreſs had been made, and the conqueſts ſo far advanced, that there is reaſon to hope, the enemy, in ſpite of all their preſumption, would ſoon find themſelves under an abſolute neceſſity of ſubmitting to a ſafe and honourable peace."

The duke of Marlborough being arrived, after a dangerous paſſage from Oſtend, came to London the 1ſt of March, notice of this aſſertion as a miſtake in biſhop Burnet, and obſerves, 'That the contrary is well known; and that it would be to turn legal puniſhments of high crimes into a jeſt, were a redemption of that kind allowed. This is not only the caſe in the ſeparate adminiſtration of many of the provinces, but we are told by one of the beſt writers, on the conſtitution of the Low Countries [Janiçon, Vol. I. p. 183.] that the council of ſtate condemns any officer, who abuſes a public truſt in the finances, the armies, the negociations, or juſtice of the republic, to the heavieſt penalties by fine, ſuited to the crime, the exigency, and example. And it is much the ſame thing to the children of a criminal, whether the fortune of the family be taken from them by judgment of entire forfeiture, or by a diſcretionary ſentence condemning to a ſevere fine, which may equal or exceed the value of it.'

whilſt the lords were ſitting; the lord chancellor, by order of the houſe, returned him thanks for the eminent ſervices performed by him the laſt campaign. As he was ſuppoſed to bring over propoſals of peace, the lord Sommers moved for an addreſs to be preſented to the queen, that ſhe would be pleaſed to take care, at the concluſion of the war, that the French king might be obliged to own her title and the proteſtant ſucceſſion, and that the pretender might be removed out of the French dominions; which being unanimouſly approved, the addreſs was ſent down to the commons, where Mr. Boyle repreſented, "That the Britiſh nation having been at a vaſt expence of blood and treaſure, for the proſecution of this neceſſary war, it was but juſt they ſhould reap ſome benefit by the peace: And the town of Dunkirk being a neſt of pirates, that infeſted the ocean, and did infinite miſchief to trade, he therefore moved, That the demoliſhing of its fortifications and harbour be inſiſted upon in the addreſs:" Which, with that amendment, was unanimouſly approved, and carried back to their lordſhips by Mr. ſecretary Boyle. The lord chancellor, on the part of the peers, and the ſpeaker of the commons, on the part of the commons, having attended the queen with the ſaid addreſs, her majeſty told them, "That ſhe was of the ſame opinion with her two houſes of parliament, in the ſeveral particulars of that addreſs; as ſhe had alſo been in all the other which they had made on the ſame ſubject;" aſſuring them, "no care ſhould be wanting on her part, to attain the ends they had deſired." This addreſs of both houſes was highly acceptable to the whole nation, and to all our allies.

An order having been made, on the 13th of January, by the privy council, in purſuance of her majeſty's pleaſure to them, ſignified, "That in the Form of Prayer, with Thankſgiving to Almighty God, to be uſed in all churches and chapels every year upon the eighth day of March (being the day, on which her majeſty began her happy reign) in the prayer at the communion ſervice, immediately before the reading of the epiſtle, for the queen, as ſupreme governor of this church, theſe words following be left out: 'And, that theſe bleſſings may be continued to after ages, make the queen, we pray thee, an happy mother of children; who, being educated in thy true faith and fear, may happily ſucceed in the government of theſe kingdoms.' This order ſeeming to intimate, that the queen deſigned to paſs the remainder of her life in widowhood; Mr. Watſon, ſon to the lord Rockingham, moved, on the 25th of January, in the houſe of commons, "That an humble addreſs be preſented to her majeſty, that ſhe would not ſuffer her juſt grief ſo far to prevail; but would have ſuch indulgence to the hearty deſires of her ſubjects, as to entertain thoughts of a ſecond marriage." This motion, being ſeconded and ſupported by ſeveral young members, was unanimouſly carried, and a committee was appointed to draw up the addreſs; which being agreed to, and the lords having given their concurrence to the ſame, was the next day preſented to the queen by the ſpeakers of the two houſes. The queen was not a little ſurprized at this unexpected addreſs; to which ſhe returned an anſwer, importing, "That the frequent marks of duty and affection, ſhe had received from both houſes of parliament, muſt needs be very acceptable to her: That the proviſion ſhe had made for the proteſtant ſucceſſion, would always be a proof, how much ſhe had at heart the future happineſs of the kingdom: But that the ſubject of this addreſs was of ſuch a nature, that ſhe was perſuaded they did not expect a particular anſwer." However the commons, on the 29th, voted their thanks for this anſwer.

A bill was brought into the houſe of commons, 'for the exportation of tobacco, and other commodities and manufactures of the growth and product of Great-Britain;' the deſign of which was, to exchange tobacco for French wines. But the Portugueſe embaſſador having, by a memorial, repreſented to her majeſty, and by word of mouth to ſeveral members without doors, that ſuch a bill was contrary to the alliance between her majeſty and the king his maſter; and it being conſidered, beſides, that ſuch an exchange would redound to the advantage of France, and to the benefit of five or ſix perſons in Great-Britain only, the bill was diſmiſſed, by putting off the conſideration of it for a month. And, on the other hand, a bill was ordered to be brought in, 'for the more effectual prohibiting the importation of French wines, and all other commodities of the growth and product of France.'

It may here be obſerved, that our trade was now very high, and was carried on every where with advantage, but no where more than at Liſbon: For the Portugueſe were ſo happy, in their dominions in America, that they diſcovered vaſt quantities of gold in their mines, and we were aſſured that they had brought home to Portugal, the former year, about four millions ſterling, of which they, at that time, ſtood in great need, for they had a very bad harveſt: But gold anſwers all things: They were ſupplied from England with corn, and we had in return a large ſhare of their gold.

The deficiency of the laws to puniſh inſults, in caſe of foreign miniſters, being apparent in the caſe of the Muſcovite embaſſador, a bill was brought into the houſe of commons, for preſerving the privileges of embaſſadors and other foreign miniſters. Count Gallas, the Imperial and Spaniſh envoy, having got a copy of it, communicated it to Baron Spanheim, the Pruſſian embaſſador, at whoſe houſe there was a meeting of foreign miniſters, who reſolved to lay before the ſecretaries of ſtate their obſervations on the bill, in a memorial, importing, 'That the preamble of the bill mentioned only the particular indignity offered to the Muſcovite embaſſador, and his being arreſted and taken out of his coach by violence, &c. in contempt of the protection granted by her majeſty, without taking notice of the law of nations, on which the privileges of embaſſadors are founded, and which is ſuperior and antecedent to all municipal laws: And therefore they inſiſted, that in the preamble theſe words ſhould be added, contrary to the law of nations, and in prejudice of the rights and privileges, which embaſſadors, and other public miniſters, authorized and received as ſuch, have at all times been thereby poſſeſſed of, and which ought to be kept ſacred and inviolable. II. That, in the clauſe for preventing for the future the ſeizing, arreſting, or impriſoning of public miniſters, it ſhould be made criminal to offer them any inſult or ill treatment. III. That their equipages, goods, and other effects, of what nature ſoever, ought likewiſe to enjoy the ſame protection with their perſons and ſervants, and not be ſeized or ſtopped on any pretence. IV. That their houſes ought to be accounted and declared ſanctuaries, and no bailiffs, or other officers of juſtice, allowed to enter the ſame. V. And that foreign embaſſadors, and other miniſters, ought to enjoy theſe privileges from their firſt coming into Great-Britain, till they are out of her majeſty's dominions, even after they have had their audience of leave, as long as they retain their characters.' The ſubſtance of this memorial being communicated to the committee, to whom that bill was referred, they inſerted the firſt amendment in the preamble, but did not think proper to mention the other particulars: And, Mr. Compton having reported the ſeveral amendments made to the bill, the houſe added a clauſe, "That no perſon ſhould be proceeded againſt for having arreſted the ſervant of an embaſſador, or public miniſter, by virtue of this act, unleſs the name of ſuch ſervant be firſt regiſtered in the office of one of the principal ſecretaries of ſtate, and by ſuch ſecretary tranſmitted to the ſheriffs of London and Middleſex, who ſhall hang up the ſame in ſome public place in their offices, &c." and ordered the bill to be engroſſed. The foreign miniſters, having alſo procured a copy of this laſt clauſe, held another aſſembly at Baron Spanheim's houſe, at which the earl of Sunderland aſſiſting, they repreſented to him, "That the exacting liſts of foreign miniſters ſervants was a thing unpractiſed in other courts, and liable to ſeveral inconveniences; and deſired beſides, that the lord chamberlain of her majeſty's houſhold might be added to the number of the perſons appointed by this bill, to take cognizance of the offences committed againſt the privileges of foreign miniſters, and to inflict ſuch puniſhments, as they ſhall judge fit." But the parliament did not think fit to make any more alterations in the bill.

On the 14th of March, the commons, in a grand committee, came to ſeveral reſolutions in favour of the inhabitants of Nevis and St. Chriſtophers, who had ſuffered by the late invaſion of the French; and voted the ſum of one hundred and three thouſand two hundred and three pounds for the uſe of ſuch ſufferers, as ſhould re-ſettle in their plantations in thoſe iſlands.

The commons being informed, that the humour of laying wagers about the events of war was grown to ſuch an height, that many unwary perſons were ruined by it, and that the moſt crafty in thoſe bargains maintained clandeſtine correſpondences abroad, which might be of dangerous conſequence to the government, a bill was brought in, which paſſed both houſes, and received the royal aſſent, to prevent the laying of wagers relating to the public.

1709.] Theſe were the tranſactions of this ſeſſion of parliament, which was concluded the 21ſt of April, when the following ſpeech of the lords commiſſioners was delivered to both houſes by the chancellor:

My lords and gentlemen,

Being now, by the queen's directions, to put an end to this ſeſſion, we have it in command from her majeſty to aſſure you, her majeſty is extremely ſenſible of the zeal and affection you have ſhewn for her ſervice, and the good of her people, and of the prudence and diſpatch, with which you have completed the important buſineſs of this ſeſſion.

"The vigour and firmneſs of your proceedings have already had a very good effect on affairs abroad; and there is ground to hope, that, by God's bleſſing on her majeſty's endeavours, this will every day appear more and more evident.

Gentlemen of the houſe of commons,

"We are to return you in particular her majeſty's thanks, for your having provided ſo timely and effectually the ſupplies found neceſſary to the proſecution of this war, with an augmentation of thoſe forces, which, in conjunction with our allies, have, by God's aſſiſtance, procured us the preſent advantages over the common enemy.

"Your chearfulneſs in giving ſuch large ſupplies at this juncture, and the ready advances, which have been made for their being effectual with ſo little burden to the people, ſhew, you perfectly underſtand how to make a right uſe of our paſt ſucceſſes, and that nothing is too difficult for ſo dutiful and affectionate ſubjects, acting in defence of ſo good a cauſe.

My lords and gentlemen,

"Her majeſty, through the whole courſe of her reign having been deſirous to ſhew all poſſible inſtances of goodneſs and clemency to her ſubjects, hath now, for the ſtrengthening the union, and quieting the minds of all her ſubjects throughout the united kingdom, thought fit to grant them an act of grace and free pardon, in a more full and beneficial manner, than hath been formerly uſed; not doubting, but all her people will make a right uſe of, and ſuitable returns on their part, for ſo extraordinary an indulgence.

"Her majeſty, having alſo been graciouſly pleaſed to give the royal aſſent to the ſeveral bills you have preſented during this ſeſſion, commands us to obſerve to you on that occaſion, that the life and benefit of all laws, how wiſely ſoever they are framed, do chiefly conſiſt in a due and regular execution of them, and therefore to exhort you, that, when you return to your countries, you would think it indiſpenſably your duty, to ſet a good example towards an impartial and ſteady obſervation of the many good laws, which have been enacted (eſpecially ſince the late revolution) and which fall within your province to execute; it being but too evident, that the defect at preſent attending us is not ſo much the want of new laws, as the neglect and diſregarding thoſe already made."

After this the parliament was prorogued to the 19th of May.

The ſeverity of the winter ſeaſon (as hath been ſaid) was very remarkable this year; for it began to freeze, the night before Chriſtmas day, with great violence, and not long after fell great ſnows. Thoſe, who compared the great froſt in 1683-4 with this, obſerved, that the firſt was generally a bright one, and continued above two months without interruption; but the latter moſtly dark, and with ſome intervals laſted a month longer; during which, many cattle, eſpecially ſheep, and likewiſe birds, periſhed. The Thames was frozen over, and, on the 3d of January, people began to erect booths, and ſet up tents on the ice. It was alſo obſerved, that the ſummer, which ſucceeded the froſt in 1683-4, was exceſſively hot and dry, affording in general great plenty of things neceſſary for human life; but this proved very near as comfortleſs as the winter, by reaſon of the coldneſs and moiſture of the air, pouring almoſt continual rains on the earth, which, as it retarded the maturity of the fruits, ſo, in many places, occaſioned a thin harveſt, and this a ſcarcity of corn. This great froſt was general in Europe, but moſt ſeverely felt in France, where, in moſt places, the fruit trees were killed, and the corn frozen in the ground, which occaſioned there a dreadful calamity and deſolation.

Two young princes, near relations to the czar of Muſcovy, arriving in London in January, the queen gave orders for their being entertained at her charge, and attended by her officers; the princes, to ſhew the grateful ſenſe of theſe favours, deſired an audience, to which, being introduced by Mr. Boyle, they made their compliments to her majeſty in Latin, acknowledging, with great reſpects, the ſingular marks of kindneſs, which ſhe was pleaſed to heap upon them; and, at the ſame time, congratulated her upon the ſignal ſucceſs of her victorious arms, and wiſhed her a long continuation of the ſame. To which the queen anſwered, 'That ſhe had ſo much eſteem and friendſhip for his czariſh majeſty, that ſhe could not but be very well pleaſed to ſee any ſo nearly related to him in her kingdoms, and have an opportunity of ſhewing her kindneſs and diſtinction to them. She likewiſe thanked them for their congratulations and good wiſhes, adding, That ſhe would endeavour to make their ſtay here as agreeable to them, as ſhe could.' Beſides this compliment paid to the czar, in order to ſoften his reſentment of the late affront offered to his embaſſador, an information was tried at the court of queen's bench, before the the lord chief juſtice Holt, for the queen, againſt Thomas Morton the laceman, and thirteen others, for meeting, conſulting, and conſpiring to arreſt and impriſon the Muſcovite embaſſador, of which they were found guilty, the ſpecial matter of the privilege of embaſſadors, to be argued before the judges the next term. There were preſent in court the earl of Sunderland, Mr. ſecretary Boyle, the lord Halifax, and ſeveral other perſons of quality[z].

On the 3d of February, the queen, in council, was pleaſed to declare, 'That, the public buſineſs increaſing, her majeſty had thought fit to appoint a third ſecretary of ſtate of Great Britain; but that ſhe intended, nevertheleſs, to continue the foreign affairs, for the preſent, in the courſe of diſpatch they were now in.' Upon this the duke of Queenſberry was made third ſecretary of ſtate, and took for one of his under ſecretaries Nicholas Rowe, famous for his dramatic performances.

The convocation was ſummoned, choſen and returned as the new parliament was. It was too evident, that the ſame ill temper, that had appeared in former convocations, did ſtill prevail, though not with ſuch a majority: When the day came, in which it was to be opened, a writ was ſent from the queen to the archbiſhop, ordering him to prorogue the convocation for ſome months: And, at the end of theſe, there came another writ, ordering a further prorogation: ſo the convocation was not opened during this ſeſſion of parliament; by this, a preſent ſtop was put to the factious temper of thoſe, who ſtudied to recommend themſelves by embroiling the church. This did not cure them; for they continued ſtill by libels and falſe ſtories to animate their party. The moſt effectual encouragement to that end was, the ſecret inſinuation that the queen's heart was with them: That though the war, and the other circumſtances of her affairs, obliged her at preſent to favour the moderate party, yet, as ſoon as a peace brought on a better ſettlement, they promiſed themſelves all favour at her hands. It was not certain, that they had then any ground for this, or that ſhe herſelf, or any by her order, gave them theſe hopes; but this is certain, that many things might have been done to extinguiſh thoſe hopes, which were not done: So that they ſeemed to be left to pleaſe themſelves with thoſe expectations, which kept ſtill life in their party; and indeed it was but too viſible, that the much greater part of the clergy were in a very ill temper, and under very bad influences; enemies to the toleration, and ſoured againſt the diſſenters.

About this time was publiſhed a letter from a gentleman in [z] The Muſcovite embaſſador, ſeeing the ſlowneſs of the judicial proceedings in England, wrote expoſtulatory letters to Mr. Boyle, who at laſt aſſured him, That the laws of the kingdom could not admit of a final deciſion till the next term: That nothing had been omitted to procure all reparation, which the utmoſt rigour of law could afford: That a bill had, by the queen's order, been brought into the parliament for ſecuring the privileges of embaſſadors and foreign miniſters, to ſhew how far ſhe deteſted the violence offered to his excellency's perſon and character: That the queen had no ſooner notice, that the two young Muſcovite princes, relations of the czar, were arrived in her kingdom, but ſhe gave orders for their reception. In anſwer to this letter, the embaſſador replied, That if it was in the queen's power to conſult the parliament about a law to ſecure the immunities of foreign miniſters, could not due meaſures have been taken at the ſame time for reparation of the paſt affront? That it was a very eaſy matter to do it, and was what ſhe herſelf had cauſed to be done in the caſe of her embaſſador the earl of Mancheſter at Venice: That as to the honours lately done to two young noblemen, who were taken for Muſcovite princes, the czar reckoned none but the Imperial hereditary prince within the verge of his auguſt houſe: That theſe were two young lords, who were a-kin to him, and were travelling incognito, but he did not deſire they ſhould be defrayed by any power, having wherewithal to bear their own charges. Several other letters paſſed between Mr. ſecretary Boyle and Mr. D'Ayrolle, the Britiſh ſecretary at the Hague; but it having been found impracticable in England to inflict any legal puniſhment on thoſe, who had affronted the embaſſador, it was at laſt agreed between the two courts, that the queen, by way of ſatisfaction, ſhould make ſolemn excuſes for the inſufficiency of our former laws in that behalf. This was accordingly done by Mr. Whitworth, the queen's envoy extraordinary to the czar, in a ſpeech at his public audience, on the 8th of February, 1709-10. Upon which the czar ordered his miniſters to ſettle the affair with him in a conference, and the following articles were agreed on: 1. That his czariſh majeſty accepted of the excuſes, and was willing to forget the criminal proceedings of the authors of the affront, and deſired they might be diſcharged. 2. That ſatisfaction ſhould be given to the embaſſador by a letter from the queen to repair his honour; and by a reimburſement of all the coſts and damages he had been at on account of the affront. 3. That the embaſſador ſhould demand his letter of recredence, which he had refuſed to accept, as well as the uſual preſent and the yatch, which the queen cauſed to be offered him. 4. That his czariſh majeſty would acquaint the queen, that he was content with this ſatisfaction, by a letter, which ſhould be delivered to Mr. Whitworth.

Scotland to his friend in England, againſt the ſacramental teſt; as inconſiſtent with the union, dangerous to the eccleſiaſtical conſtitution of North Britain, and to ſuch parts of their civil conſtitution as are reſerved to them: Inconſiſtent with the civil intereſt of Great Britain in general; contrary to the deſign of our Saviour's inſtitution of the Lord's ſupper, and to the doctrine of the church of England: And an apology for this letter.

The teſt act is here repreſented as contrary to the rules of religion, becauſe it requires an end in receiving the ſacrament, that muſt prophane it, and ſuch as bears no proportion to the original deſign of it; and uſurps an authority, which no power on earth can lay any juſt claim to, to apply divine inſtitutions to ſuch ends, as only ſerve the intereſt of politic ſocieties; and obliges ſuch as have any civil poſt to take the ſacrament, without any regard to the fitneſs, which the law of Chriſt requires, for that ſolemnity. It looks as if it was no matter, how ill a character a perſon bore, if it can be covered with the name of churchmen; which ſhews, that it is not the honour of religion, but the ſecular intereſt of a party that is principally regarded.

Whilſt the houſe of commons, in January, were conſidering a bill for the ſpeedy and effectual recruiting the land forces and marines, by encouraging the pariſhes to provide them, this letter againſt the teſt was diſperſed by perſons unknown, at the door of the houſe. It was a ſnare laid for the whig members. By approving the letter and aboliſhing the teſt, which bore ſo hard upon the diſſenters, and excluded the moſt rigid from places of truſt, they alarmed the church, and furniſhed a ſpecious pretence of aſſerting, the church was in danger. If the teſt was preſerved, notwithſtanding the reaſons alledged againſt it in the letter, the diſputes about occaſional conformity, which had been ſo troubleſome in the former parliaments, would have revived and produced the ſame animoſities in this. The commons, being aware of theſe things, avoided the ſnare, by condemning the letter, upon a complaint made to them of it, to be burnt for a ſcandalous, ſeditious libel, and the author and printer to be enquired after.

By this time, the negociations for a peace were begun at the Hague [a]. It has been already obſerved, that, ſoon after the battle of Ramillies, the elector of Bavaria gave out hopes

[a] Dr. Hare in his piece entituled, 'The Negotiations for a Treaty of Peace in 1709 conſidered: In a third Letter to a tory Member,' having ſtated this whole affair in a clear and full light, it will be proper to tranſcribe his account of it. He begins his letter with ſome reflections on the general conduct of the French in all the treaties they had made for fifty years before, to ſhew the neceſſity there was for the allies to refuſe entering into any conferences for a general peace, till ſome preliminaries were firſt ſettled, as a foundation, on which it ſhould be built. But before we come, ſays the doctor, p. 7. to conſider the preliminaries themſelves, that you may the better judge of the ſincerity of France, I muſt obſerve to you, that they had previouſly, by their emiſſaries, been feeling the pulſe of the Dutch; and, by the mighty profeſſions they made of the ſincere deſires of the king to put an end to the war, they obtained ſome private conferences the beginning of the year 1709, in which the reſtitution of Spain and the Indies to king Charles, was always ſuppoſed as the firſt ſtep towards a treaty; and, for the reſt, they hoped the Dutch, for their part, would not be very difficult, ſince they were aſſured, that in other points they might have their own terms, and not only be ſecured by a good barrier, in which the French were pleaſed to be very liberal, but likewiſe be made very eaſy in relation to trade. The Dutch, who, on this occaſion, ſhewed they underſtood the French, as well as the French thought they did them, appeared to be very well pleaſed to hear of overtures of peace, and expreſſed great readineſs to enter on a treaty; but that they could do nothing without the concurrence of their allies, to whom they communicated what had paſſed; and, in order to a treaty, gave leave to the miniſters of France to come to Holland; firſt to Monſieur Rouille, and afterwards to the marquis de Torcy, who both timed their coming thither too remarkably, not to be taken notice of. The duke of Marlborough made two voyages that ſpring to England; one in the beginning of March, N. S. which was the ſooneſt the affairs of the war would admit of his return after the campaign of Liſle; the other about the end of April, when he went to communicate to the queen what had paſſed, and to receive her inſtructions. Now Monſieur Rouille came to Holland, almoſt as ſoon as the duke was gone from thence the firſt time; and the marquis de Torcy followed ſoon after the duke's leaving it the ſecond: By which it ſhould ſeem, they thought they might make ſome advantage of his abſence; and that it was for their maſter's ſervice, to have the Dutch as much as they could to themſelves, as the likelieſt way to procure ſuch a peace as they had a mind to.

Monſieur Rouille and the marquis de Torcy came neither of them into Holland, till the duke of Marlborough had left it; which was a plain proof, that they had ſome deſigns, which they feared he would not come into; and, that in his and prince Eugene's abſence, they hoped the ſtates, by the great inclination they expreſſed for peace, might be drawn in to conſent to ſome points, which might either produce a treaty to their minds, or divide the allies among themſelves. This they hoped to do theſe two ways; firſt, by gaining their conſent to a partition, which they had never abſolutely declared againſt; and next by offering to them, in conſideration for that, a greater barrier than they thought conſiſtent with the intereſt and honour of the houſe of Auſtria. The firſt of theſe they knew the emperor would not agree to; and neither the emperor nor England to the latter. And from this occaſion and ground for diviſion they promiſed themſelves great ſucceſs. But, to their ſurprize, the firmneſs of the ſtates was ſo great, that, as they would abſolutely reject nothing, ſo neither would they agree to any thing ſeparately from the reſt of the allies, nor enter into any treaty, but jointly with the queen and the emperor, who, to ſhew their readineſs to hearken to any reaſonable terms of peace, that would anſwer the end for which they went into the war, immediately upon notice of the propoſals the French had made, ſent to the Hague the duke of Marlborough and prince Eugene; the firſt was attended by my lord Townſhend, and the other was ſoon followed by count Zinzendorf. And both theſe miniſters diſtinguiſhed themſelves in theſe negotiations very much to the ſatisfaction of all the reſt. My lord Townſhend particularly has, by his good ſenſe, integrity, openneſs, and affability, acquired the univerſal eſteem of the ſtates, and all the reſt of the allies, beyond what could be hoped from ſo young a miniſter, and to ſuch a degree, as will always be remembered to his honour in that country, however it may be denied or forgot in this. If therefore you do not meet with his and count Zinzendorf's names in what follows, I muſt deſire you would ſuppoſe of them what I ſay of the two generals, ſo far at leaſt, as to think they did not in any thing of moment ever differ from them.

But to proceed; upon the arrival of theſe miniſters at the Hague, conferences were daly held with thoſe of France, to ſettle preliminary articles. In treating of which their inſincerity ſoon diſcovered itſelf, and great reaſon was given to ſuſpect their chief aim was to amuſe and divide thoſe they ſeemed ſo much in haſte to agree with; that, if they could not get ſuch a peace for themſelves as they deſired, the campaign at leaſt might be loſt to the allies. For it was very obſervable, that they eaſily agreed, and, in a very little time after theſe conferences were begun, to all the demands of England and Holland for themſelves, though ſome articles wrre contained in both, which the French never dreamt of being aſked, when the firſt overtures of peace were made; ſuch as the demoliſhing of Dunkirk, and the giving up many towns, which were no part of the Spaniſh Netherlands, at the time of king Charles's death, nor had in the courſe of the war been taken from them. When the firſt ſteps of a treaty were made, the French ſo little thought of theſe demands, that the quitting even Liſle and Menin was refuſed. But now theſe extraordinary points on the part of England and Holland were by the miniſters of France readily agreed to; and yet, at the ſame time, great difficulty was made with reſpect to what was aſked for the emperor and the duke of Savoy, though there was nothing in thoſe articles, but what was extremely reaſonable and neceſſary to ſecure the dominions of thoſe princes from the invaſions they would otherwiſe be expoſed to. There was an interval of ſeveral days, before the French miniſters would treat about theſe articles; nor did they at laſt conſent to them but with a reſerve and a declaration, that this was beyond their inſtructions; and that therefore they muſt ſuſpend a full aſſent, till the farther pleaſure of the king was known. Now what could the meaning of this management, but to inſnare the maritime powers, if they could and draw them into a baſe deſign of ſacrificing the intereſts of their allies to their own? And what uſe can any body imagine they would have made of this, but to engage the allies in a quarrel among themſelves, and to take advantage of their differences; to break the confederacy, and to entice ſome of the members of it by large offers to come into ſeparate meaſures with them? But, this ſcheme failing by the firm adherence of the maritime powers to the reſt of the allies, there was one article ſtill remained to be adjuſted, which in effect included all the reſt, and which would afford the French a ſpecious pretence for breaking off the treaty, whenever they had a mind to it; and that was to ſettle terms, on which a perpetual ſuſpenſion of arms ſhould be agreed. No body had ever doubted, but that there was ſuch an underſtanding between the French king and his grandſon, that the former could oblige the latter to reſign the Spaniſh monarchy whenever he pleaſed, ſince he not only gave it king Philip at firſt, but had hitherto ſupported him in it. Accordingly every thing about him was entirely French; and the reſtitution of Spain at leaſt, and the Indies, had, as I obſerved before, been always ſuppoſed. And as this was the point that occaſioned the war, the firſt thing ſettled in the preliminaries was a perfect and entire ceſſion of the whole Spaniſh monarch to king Charles III, to be made within two months from the firſt of June following. And in caſe the duke of Anjou ſhould make any difficulty to comply with this, it is expreſsly covenanted in the fourth article, That his moſt chriſtian majeſty and the allies ſhall take in concert the proper meaſures to oblige him to it. What was to be underſtood by taking proper meaſures, both ſides were content ſhould not be then explained. Thus far looked well; and one would have thought the French meant in earneſt, that the duke of Anjou ſhould immediately quit Spain to his competitor. But all hitherto was words only, and would ſignify nothing unleſs the execution of this eſſential point was effectually provided for; and there was but one way of doing this, which was to make this ceſſion one of the conditions of continuing the ſuſpenſion of arms, agreed to in the thirty-fourth article, to the concluſion of a general peace; which was accordingly done in the thirty-ſeventh article, which declares, That this ſuſpenſion ſhall continue till a general peace; provided the king of France executes all that is promiſed on his part in the foregoing articles, and the whole Spaniſh monarchy be reſtored, rendue & cedée, to king Charles as is ſettled in theſe articles. This article touched home and diſcovered plainly, that all the French pretended to conſent to in this fundamental point was mere grimace; and that they meant nothing elſe, but to draw the allies into a ſeparate peace, and leave them to get Spain as they could. This was the moſt they meant; and I am apt to think, for reaſons I will give you by and by, they did not mean ſo much; but, whether they did or not, they did not want a ſpecious cover for their oppoſition to this article; they made greater profeſſions of the ſincerity of their king's intentions; that he would punctually execute all that depended upon him; and that he would endeavour to perſuade his grandſon to a compliance; but that to force him to it, and that within ſo ſhort a term was not in his power: That it would therefore be impoſſible for the king to conſent to this article and to conſent to the reſt of the preliminaries, unleſs an abſolute ſuſpenſion of arms were agreed to, would be to leave himſelf at the mercy of the allies, and put himſelf into a much worſe ſtate than before. And theſe pretences, you may be ſure, wanted no art to ſet them off. But to all this it was eaſy to anſwer, That they were fully perſuaded, that, if the king was really in earneſt in this matter, he might certainly recal his grandſon without any difficulty; and provided he acted the fair part, and did all he could towards it, according to the fourth article, he might depend upon it, the allies would take no advantage of any words in the thirty-ſeventh, to begin the war again upon him, when he had faithfully performed the other parts of it, and ſurrendered the places agreed to be delivered up to them in the thirty-fifth. That ſuppoſing what they objected to this article, were not a pretended but a real difficulty, which could hardly be believed, the conſequence then would be, that the allies muſt either truſt to the ſincerity of France, or France to that of the allies. As the king, ſuppoſing it not in his power to oblige the duke of Anjou to reſign, would, by executing the reſt of the treaty, be at the mercy of the allies; ſo, on the other hand, if the allies made a peace with the king without this article, they would be at his mercy for the recovery of the Spaniſh monarchy; which was the great point, for which they entered into the war; but which they could of a peace, and that the French king would come to a treaty of partition, by allowing Spain and the Weſt Indies to go to king Charles, provided the dominions of Italy were given to king Philip. They hoped, that England and the ſtates-general would agree to this, as leſs concerned in Italy; but they knew that the court of Vienna would never hearken to it; for they valued the dominions in Italy, with the iſlands near them, much more than all the reſt of the Spaniſh monarchy. But, at the ſame time that Lewis XIV. was tempting us with the hopes of Spain and the Weſt-Indies, that king, by a letter to the pope, offered the dominions in Italy to king Charles. But as the parliament had always declared the ground of the war to be the reſtoring the whole Spaniſh monarchy to the houſe of Auſtria (which indeed the ſtates-general had never done) ſo the duke of Marlborough could not hearken to this. He convinced the ſtates of the treacherous deſigns of the court of France in this offer, and it was not entertained. The court of Vienna (as hath been ſaid) was ſo alarmed at the inclinations which ſome had expreſſed towards the entertaining this project, that this was believed to be the ſecret motive of the treaty for evacuating the Milaneſe, and of their perſiſting ſo obſtinately in their deſign upon Naples; for by this means they became maſters of both. The French being now reduced to great extremities, by their conſtant ill ſucceſs, and by the miſeries of their people, and more eſpecially by the general decline of the public credit, the eminent bankers of Paris and Lyons having been obliged to ſtop payment, began to entertain ſerious thoughts of a peace, and reſolved to try the ſtates again. When the duke of Marlborough came over to England, Monſieur Rouille was therefore ſent to Holland with general offers of peace, deſiring them to propoſe what they inſiſted on; and he offered them as good a barrier for themſelves as they could aſk. The ſtates, contrary to the expectation of France, reſolved to adhere firmly to their confederates, and to enter into no ſeparate treaty but in conjunction with their allies. However, upon the arrival of Monſieur Rouille at Antwerp, they appointed Monſieur Buys, penſionary of Amſterdam, and Monſieur Vanderduſſen, penſionary of Gouda, to have a conference with him at Moerdyke. Upon the report of what paſſed in this interview, the ſtates permitted Rouille to come to Woerden, a place between Leyden and Utrecht, that he might be nearer at hand for the intended negociation; and then the deputies of the ſtates had another conference with him, in which he made ſome looſe propoſals towards a general peace, which, however, he refuſed to give could never hope to gain, if he did not abſolutely abandon his grandſon, which they could by no means depend on, while they had nothing but his bare word for it. Now in this caſe, Which is more reaſonable for France to truſt the allies, or the allies France? This cannot be a very hard queſtion, ſince France had been guilty of the breach of public faith on ſo many occaſions, that it is hard to find an inſtance to the contrary. This very war will make two notorious inſtances of this remembred to all ages; the ſcandalous violation of the partition treaty, almoſt as ſoon as made; and the uſurpation of the Spaniſh monarchy, notwithſtanding the moſt ſolemn and repeated renunciations that had been made of it. It would be endleſs to enter into a detail of all the complaints of that kind againſt France, ſince the Pyrenean treaty. And therefore it cannot be reaſonable for the allies to truſt to thoſe, by whom they have ſo often been deceived. But it is not ſo with them; they never have been guilty of the breach of public faith in any flagrant caſe; at leaſt, I know of none. But I will venture to add further, that they neither would, nor, if they would, can they act a falſe part in ſuch a caſe as this. They would not, they do not think it for their intereſt to continue or renew a war unneceſſarily; they are ſufficiently weary; the burthen of the war has laid ſo heavy upon them, that they would be glad to have a little reſpite, and to be at leiſure to cultivate the arts of peace, and enjoy, as faſt as they can, ſome fruits of it. Thus they have always done; they have hardly had patience to keep up their armies till a peace was ſigned. And it is this humour of the allies has made the French have ſo little regard to execute their treaties with them. Beſides, it muſt be owned, there is a great probity, plainneſs, and honeſty, both in the Dutch and Germans, which appear in all the affairs of common life, and have been very obſervable in their dealings with the French all this war, in which the allies notwithſtanding the many provocations they have received, have, in no inſtance, retaliated, when they could not do it without breach of faith. The war in Flanders affords many inſtances of this, that they have always punctually performed whatever articles they have ſigned, and not made reprifals, where even honeſt men have thought they might have done it without any violation of juſtice. But the greateſt inſtance, and the only one I ſhall name, is their exact performance of the treaty of the evacuation of the Milaneſe, when the French had juſt reaſon to fear their troops would have been detained againſt the letter of the articles, in revenge of the injuſtice and inſolence, with which they had diſarmed and ſeized a conſiderable body of the duke of Savoy's troops, at the very time he was in alliance with them. I need ſay nothing of our own country, that France could have no reaſon to fear any perfidiouſneſs from home. The character of her majeſty is too well known to give the French grounds for any ſuch ſuſpicion; and, had we a prince of leſs renown on the throne, France would have little to fear from him, unleſs he were ſupported by his people; which no ſovereign of England has ever been, when they have thought the war he made unjuſt. But it is not enough to ſay the allies would not be falſe, nor act againſt the intentions of a public treaty; I think I may affirm, they cannot be ſo. A ſingle potentate is maſter of his own will, and can act without controul; but a confederacy can do nothing without a concurrence of all parts; which, in ſo unjuſt a cauſe as this, there would be no reaſon to apprehend. When all the moſt juſt and neceſſary cauſes of a war concur, it is very hard to keep a confederacy long together; much leſs can it be imagined it ſhould be kept up to oppreſs a prince, who has done all he can to ſatisfy the demands of all parties. Either honeſty or intereſt will certainly diſarm ſome of them. No ally, when he has gained all he can hope for by the war, will be willing to continue the expence of it in compliment to any of the reſt, eſpecially when the cauſe is manifeſtly unjuſt. No, were it ever ſo juſt, this is hardly to be hoped for. When a confederacy is ſucceſsful, jealouſies naturally ariſe among themſelves; and they are more concerned, that one part ſhould not be too great gainers, and have too much to their ſhare, than that any other ſhould not have enough. Of which we ſee an inſtance, though a very fooliſh one among ourſelves; our preſent maſters of politics, to render the very ſucceſſes of the war odious, alarm us with new fears, which no body before ever thought of; and tell us, the Dutch will have by this treaty a better country than our own. And, if a certain correſpondence by way of Calais has been continued, France might be aſſured, that no advantage would be taken of the thirty-ſeventh article, though Spain was not relinquiſhed in the time ſtipulated; and that therefore they might ſafely ſign the preliminaries, for that the war could not be renewed, ſince they might depend on it, that England would never conſent to uſe in ſo barbarous a manner a prince whom ſo great a party among them have always had ſo much reſpect for: And, without England, they know the reſt of the allies could do nothing.

But whether it was more reaſonable for the allies to truſt France, or France the allies, was not left at this time to general reflections. What was doing at this very juncture in Spain, gave the allies abundant cauſe to ſuſpect the ſincerity of France, that they meant nothing leſs than the reſtitution of that Monarchy. No body that looks into the accounts of that time, and ſees how thick expreſſes went one upon another between France and Spain, can doubt whether the king and his grandſon did not perfectly well agree: And not only the news of that time, but the facts themſelves ſhew, that the king gave him all poſſible aſſurances, that he would not abandon him, though it was neceſſary for his affairs to promiſe it. This, I ſay, is very plain, from what was at that time doing in Spain; for, though the marquis de Torcy told the allies, he did not know but king Philip might be at Paris before him, there was not the leaſt ſign of any intention to relinquiſh Spain; but on the contrary, there were on the part of the duke of Anjou all the appearances that could be of a prince that thought of nothing leſs. For the war was preſſed with the utmoſt vigour in all parts; Alicant was beſieged at a vaſt expence, and other places in Valencia were reduced with all diligence; preparations were made for the ſiege of Gironne, and the army was put into the beſt condition it could be, to invade Catalonia; and at the ſame time, the marquis de Bay advanced cloſe to the Portugueſe in Eſtremadura, with a deſign to give them battle; in which, againſt the opinion of my lord Galway, they unhappily prevented him. This did not look like a deſign to quit Spain to king Charles, but, on the contrary, ſhewed a reſolution to drive him out of it, if poſſible. But what gave the allies a greater jealouſy than all this, was the cauſing the prince of Aſturias to be acknowledged preſumptive heir of Spain by all the ſtates of the kingdom; which ceremony was performed with the greateſt magnificence the 7th of April; that is, about a month after M. Rouille had been in Holland; which proceeding, you may remember, every body was then alarmed at; ſuch a ſtep being plainly taken for no other end, but to lay in matter for a new war, or rather it was a declaration, that an end could not be put to this, as long as the reſtitution of Spain was made one condition of a peace. The French miniſters had but one reply to this, that their maſter was not anſwerable for what the duke of Anjou had done; but that, for his own part, he was ſincere, and would do whatever depended upon him, and that therefore, if a peace was not concluded, it could not lie at his door. The allies, though they could not think what was urged had any truth in it, yet to ſhew how far they were from deſigning to impoſe upon the king impoſſible conditions, thought of an expedient, which could not be refuſed, without diſcovering, that France meant nothing by this treaty, but to make peace for themſelves, and to leave the allies involved in a war with Spain. If it was not in the king's power to oblige his grandſon to retire out of Spain, they declared they would be content with his doing what evidently was in his power; which was to deliver up to them ſuch places in the Spaniſh dominions, as were garriſoned by his own troops. But this expedient was rejected; and the marquis de Torcy thinking, I ſuppoſe, that the allies inſiſting upon the duke of Anjou's being recalled, was a more ſpecious handle to break off the treaty upon, than the refuſal of the expedient they propoſed inſtead of it, he agreed at laſt to let the thirty-ſeventh article ſtand as it is now worded; which is perfectly agreeable to the main deſign of the treaty, and to the tenor of the other articles; but with a reſerve, as before, to know the king's pleaſure, without whoſe further inſtructions he could not ſign. And thus the conferences held to ſettle theſe preliminaries ended the 28th of May, and were the ſame day ſigned by the allies. The marquis de Torcy immediately ſet out for Verſailles, leaving Monſieur Rouille behind, to whom he promiſed to return the king's anſwer by the 4th of June at fartheſt; which, from the neceſſity of the king's affairs, the point the treaty was carried to, the marquis's rank and character, and perſonal merit, and the great proteſtations he made of his maſter's ſincerity, was hoped would be favourable; but moſt of all from his deſire to the allies at parting, that they would haſten the ratifications of theſe articles with all the diſpatch they could.

Theſe hopes the marquis left with the allies; and the near proſpect of a good peace filled all people with a joy, that is not to be expreſſed. They waited with great impatience for the 4th of June: It was the next day before the anſwer came, upon the receipt of which Monſieur Rouille acquainted the allies, that the king could not agree to theſe preliminaries. The articles excepted againſt were the ſame, that the marquis had before diſputed, thoſe relating to the emperor and the duke of Savoy, and the thirty-ſeventh. The allies were not a little ſurprized at this anſwer, and more at the haughty air with which monſieur Rouille in a long conference on this ſubject preſſed his objections; a behaviour very different from what either he or the marquis had ſhewn before; which there being no viſible cauſe for, they thought it was in great meaſure gaſconade; that it meant nothing elſe but to make what advantage he could of the inclinations the allies had without diſguiſe ſhewn to peace; and that he would at laſt recede from his pretenſions, when he ſaw they would not; and that in all events they could not, on their part, give up articles ſo reaſonable in themſelves, and which they had ſo unanimouſly agreed to, as abſolutely neceſſary to make a good and laſting peace. And what they ſuſpected did in good meaſure prove to be the caſe, at leaſt it ſeemed ſo; but after having inſiſted with ſo much ſtiffneſs upon the objections he had in the king's name made, when he perceived it had no effect on the allies, his departure being fixed for the ninth: The ſeventh in the evening, or early the next morning, he waited on the penſioner; and, as an inſtance of his great ſincerity and in writing. The ſtates-general, being ſtill cautious of making any advances in ſo important an affair without the participation of their allies, gave immediate notice of what had paſſed to the court of Vienna and Great Britain. Prince Eugene, who, during this interval, was gone to Vienna, returned from thence to Bruſſels, on the 27th of March, N. S. with full powers from his Imperial majeſty; and, on the 8th of April, came to the Hague, where the duke of Marlborough likewiſe arrived the next day from England. Theſe two great men had a long conference with the grand penſionary Heinſius, Meſſieurs Buys and Vanderduſſen, and other deputies of the ſtates, where they debated the overtures made on the part of France; which being thought inſufficient to be the ground of peace, orders were given for carrying on the warlike preparations with all poſſible application and diligence, in order to open the campaign, as ſoon as the backwardneſs of the ſeaſon would permit, and purſue the late advantages with the utmoſt vigour. The deputies of the ſtates, having informed Rouille, that his overtures were not ſatisfactory, that miniſter ſent an concern, that the treaty might not be broke off, communicated to him his inſtructions, by which it appeared, that he was empowered to recede from all the other points he had before inſiſted on, excepting that of the thirty-ſeventh article, which ſeems to have been a maſter-piece of French artifice. For, if the treaty muſt be broke, it is as effectually done by inſiſting upon one article, as upon twenty; and which ever part the allies took, the French would find their account; for, if they could be perſuaded to give up that, which in appearance was but one article, but in effect was the ſubſtance of all, or at leaſt of the moſt important ones, then it was in the power of the French to make peace, without obliging the duke of Anjou to quit Spain: And if the allies could not be brought to this, the point they ſhould break upon was ſo ſpecious, that the French miniſters hoped for a double good effect of it; that it would incenſe the populace in theſe provinces againſt the miniſters, and ſet the king right in the affections of his people, which through the continued misfortunes of the war, he began to loſe. And, in this laſt point they ſucceeded perfectly well: There were no efforts the French were not willing to make, to ſupport a prince, who ſeemed to prefer their ſafety to his own glory, and to think no ſacrifice too great to procure his people a good peace: But their other point they were much miſtaken in; and the breaking of the treaty had no other effect upon the ſubjects of the ſtates, though it be a popular government, than to fill them with the utmoſt indignation againſt the French, and loud reſentments of their conſtant injuſtice and perfidiouſneſs.

concern

But to return to Monſieur Rouille, when he had ſhewn his inſtructions to the penſioner, which diſcovered ſo much more than he would own before, he took his leave of him, without propoſing any accommodation or expedient in lieu of this important article; and whether the truth were all out, and there was not ſome ſecret inſtructions ſtill behind, was more than any body could tell. And though this was his language the 8th in the morning, they did not know but he might alter it before night, when he found the allies were not to be moved, or that he might make a longer ſtay; he and the marquis de Torcy both having often fixed days for their departure; but, when the time came, thought fit to change their minds. And what made this the more probable was, that Monſieur Petkum, who had all along, without authority or character, gone between the miniſters of the allies and France, did that morning propoſe to ſome of the allies, that France ſhould give to them two or three towns as an equivalent for the thirty-ſeventh article, to be kept by them till Spain ſhould be quitted to king Charles. But ſince Monſieur Petkum made this motion, as of his own head, without any commiſſion from Monſieur Rouille, who lodged with him, and the propoſal was indeterminate, without either the names, or fixed numbers of the towns, that ſhould be given, the allies could not take any notice of it. Beſides, had the offer been never ſo diſtinct, and made with full authority, to give two or three cautionary towns, was to evade and not to ſatisfy the intention of the article, and was in effect nothing elſe, but to offer a little better barrier to the Dutch, in exchange for Spain and the Indies. In the mean time, Monſieur Rouille ſpent the day in making viſits of leave, as deſigning to ſet out in earneſt for Verſailles next morning. When night was come, and there was no room to hope for any further ſtep being made on his part, here the man, who is accuſed of prolonging the war, interpoſed, and ſhewed how little he deſerves ſuch a cenſure. The duke of Marlborough ſent to the penſionary and the other miniſters, to deſire a meeting, to try once more, if any thing could be done to ſave the treaty. But, this meeting being diſappointed, there was an extraordinary congreſs of all the miniſters the next morning, in which the deputies of the ſtates having acquainted them of what had paſſed, and aſſured them of their reſolution to preſs the war with the utmoſt vigour, till France was forced to conſent to a good peace, count Zinzendorf thanked the ſtates in the name of the emperor and king Charles, for the firmneſs they had ſhewn on this occaſion. The duke of Marlborough did the ſame on the part of the queen; which was followed with like expreſſions of ſatisfaction by all the other miniſters, that were preſent, with very particular marks of eſteem to the penſionary, whom I have often thought the Godolphin of the ſtates, for his wiſe and prudent conduct through the whole negotiation. I need not ſay more, to let you know, that he is a plain, grave, wiſe man, of great judgment and abilities, quiet, unpopular, and uncorrupt.

All thoughts of peace being now in appearance over, and Monſieur Rouille gone, the duke of Marlborough, who was extremely mortified at this change of things, reſolved to follow in the afternoon, and would not give over all hopes of having ſtill one interview more with him; to which end he got to Bruſſels, as ſoon almoſt as Monſieur Rouille, and ſent word before to prince Eugene (who had been there ſome days, to give the neceſſary orders for aſſembling the army) but Monſieur Rouille was gone, before either the duke or prince could ſee him: And nothing was now left to the generals, but to try to do by the ſword what they could not do by treaty, and to make their way to peace by a good campaign.

This, I can aſſure you, from what I have obſerved myſelf in the progreſs of this affair, and the moſt exact information I could get from others, is a plain and true account of theſe negociations thus far; in which one ſees, on the part of France, violent ſuſpicions of inſincerity through the whole treaty, working its way by all the methods of addreſs and artifice, which they are ſo great maſters of: But in the allies, plainneſs, unanimity, and an unſhaken confidence; every thing is open and above-board, without any diviſions in their conferences with the French, or any violent heats among themſelves; even in the great point of the barrier, which the French had hopes might make a breach between the Dutch and Imperial miniſters: But by the prudence of the contending parties themſelves, and the firmneſs and temper, with which the duke of Marlborough calmly interpoſed, this difficult point was amicably adjuſted, and the diſputes upon it produced no effects, that the French could take any advantage of. I believe you have not forgot, I am ſure I have not, how people here in England reaſoned upon theſe conferences. While theſe preliminaries were like to take effect, ſome men were by no means ſatisfied; they thought care enough was not taken of England; which ſhould make us hope, that they will ſome time or other obtain better terms for us; and that, in the next treaty, more regard will be had to the trading intereſt of Great Britain, than the miniſters have ſhewn. And yet no ſooner were the preliminaries rejected, but the men, who thought but juſt before there was too little in them, would have perſuaded us, that there was a great deal too much; and that it was unreaſonable to inſiſt on ſuch demands, eſpecially to oblige a great king, whom they have always admired, to dethrone his grandſon, though all ſuch invidious expreſſions were purpoſely avoided in the articles; and no body, as I have obſerved before, doubted, but the king, if he were in earneſt diſpoſed to ſatisfy the allies, could do it without difficulty.

Dr. Hare then proceeds to ſhew, in oppoſition to the clamours, which had been raiſed againſt the duke of Marlborough in particular, or the conduct of the allies in general, with relation to the preliminary articles, firſt, That, if to inſiſt on the thirty-ſeventh article was a fault, the duke of Marlborough was not to be blamed for it: And, ſecondly, That to inſiſt on that article was in itſelf right and neceſſary, in order to a good peace.

Firſt (ſays Dr. Hare, p. 30.) I ſay, That, if to inſiſt on the thirty-ſeventh article was a fault, the duke of Marlborough is not to be blamed for it. Secondly, becauſe, if he did inſiſt, it was what he was obliged to: He had no authority to do otherwiſe. All the world knows, that both houſes of parliament did, the beginning of that year 1709, addreſs the queen, that no peace ſhould be made with France, without an entire reſtitution of the Spaniſh monarchy: And her majeſty was pleaſed to expreſs herſelf very well pleaſed with their addreſs, and that ſhe was perfectly of the ſame opinion. This addreſs being thus approved, no miniſter had any power or authority to conclude a treaty upon other terms, without her majeſty's command; nor could ſuch a command be expected from her, without advice of her council: And I belive a council will not eaſily be found, that will adviſe againſt the joint opinion of both houſes of parliament. If therefore the thirty-ſeventh article was inſiſted on, the duke is not to be blamed; he did but his duty, and could not juſtify his doing otherwiſe; which, if he had, would as certainly have been made a high crime and miſdemeanor, as his not doing it is now made a matter of complaint againſt him. There is no room for any objection here, unleſs it could be pretended, that this addreſs was of his procuring; the contrary to which is as well known, as the addreſs itſelf. But though it is plain, that the duke of Marlborough had no hand in making this addreſs, it is as plain, that, when it was made, he was bound by it; and, ſince that required the reſtitution of the whole Spaniſh monarch, he was obliged to inſiſt upon it. So the thirty-ſeventh article was unanimouſly adhered to as it is, by all the miniſters; and their doing ſo, I ſhall now ſhew you, was very right in itſelf, and neceſſary in order to a good peace. Firſt, it is right in itſelf, that is, juſt and reaſonable, not hard, or inſolent, or inhuman, as theſe advocates of France would have it thought. For what is the point in diſpute, but to reſtore to an injured perſon what has been unjuſtly taken? Has not the injured party, by the fundamental laws of juſtice, a right to this? Or is not the party, that does the injury, obliged to reſtitution, where it is poſſible? And is not this the caſe of the Spaniſh monarchy? I deſpair of ever proving any uſurpation unjuſt, if this is not. But if it be unjuſt, does it alter the caſe, becauſe the king of France has not uſurped it for himſelf, but for his grandſon? Am I the leſs obliged to reſtore what I have unjuſtly ſeized, becauſe I have given it to a third perſon, provided it be in my power? Does not the duke of Anjou know, as well as his grandfather, that it is a violent uſurpation? Can he of right keep, what the other had no right to give? Is it not kept plainly for the uſe and benefit of the giver? Has not the giver power to take it from him? Is it not plain, that his grandſon has not kept it thus long, but by the ſupport he receives from him? And if it be thus manifeſtly unjuſt, and the uſurper has it in his power to make reſtitution, is it ill manners to demand it? Is the Spaniſh monarchy ſuch a trifle, as not to be worth inſiſting on? Shall we compliment the king of France, or his grandſon, with giving up what ſo many princes and ſtates have ſpent ſo much blood and treaſure to regain? Can that now be thought conſiſtent with the ſafety and commerce of Great-Britain, with the intereſt and welfare of our allies, or with the liberty of Europe, which we ventured to begin a war for, under the moſt unpromiſing appearances of ever ſeeing a good end of it? But it was nonſence not to riſk all, when all was at ſtake: There was no room left but to appeal to heaven, and take arms; which gave us a chance for eſcaping the ruin, which was otherwiſe inevitable. This is the truth of the matter, this the point in diſpute. What then do people mean by all their ſenſeleſs clamour of the hardſhip and barbarity of the allies, in obliging the king of France to recal his grandſon? They, who think the cauſes of this war ſuch indifferent things, as not to be worth inſiſting on any longer, though we have ſo long ſtruggled for them, that we have at laſt got faſt hold; theſe men, I fear, will in a little time think the ſame of the cauſes of the revolution too; nay, they already tell us ſo; they are grown ſo inſenſible to the fears they were once in, that they begin to think popery and arbitrary power innocent harmleſs things; they now plainly inſinuate, that there was no danger of the government in church and ſtate being overturned, and that therefore the revolution was not neceſſary; and, in virtue of theſe fooliſh ſentiments, when the revolution is upon the point of being unalterably fixed, they truly are grown weary, and, after twenty years labour do not think it worth a little more pains to finiſh the work, and put an effectual ſtop to the return of thoſe evils, which they were once, as well as their neighbours, ſo heartily frightened with. And it is no wonder if men, who have contracted ſuch a ſtupid indolence, and are ſo indifferent for the civil and religious rights of their own country, cannot ſee what ſenſe there is in inſiſting upon the reſtitution of the Spaniſh monarchy, and are ſupinely willing to think (if nonſenſe can be called thinking) that the demand of the allies is either unjuſt, or at beſt very rude and unmannerly.

But further; this demand of theirs is not only right in itſelf, but neceſſary, in order to a good peace; and the beſt way to ſet this in a clear light, is to conſider what would have been the conſequence, ſuppoſing the allies had not inſiſted on it. Now to ſhew what this would have been, I will ſuppoſe, for the preſent, that the French were in earneſt; and that, if this article had been receded from, they would have ſigned the reſt. Which way now, I would aſk, ſhould we have propoſed to get Spain? Can we do it, unleſs the king of France entirely abandons his grandſon? No, certainly. But he has promiſed he will. But is his bare word a ſecurity that may be depended upon? By no means. What then? Why, he gives you up ſo many great towns, which he would expreſs to Paris for new inſtructions. This threw the French court into great uneaſineſs; for as, on the one hand, they were reſolved not to comply with the demand of the confederates, in giving up the whole monarchy of Spain; ſo on the other hand, the great difficulty they laboured under, which was much increaſed by the general ſcarcity of corn and other proviſions, occaſioned by the great ſeverity of the preceding winter, laid them under a neceſſity of keeping up the ſinking ſpirits of the people with hopes, at leaſt, of putting a ſpeedy end to the war, by peace. Rouille's expreſs was therefore immediately ſent back with directions (as appeared in the ſequel) to that miniſter, to amuſe the allies with a would not do, if he did not intend to leave his grandſon to himſelf. Why ſo? How can the giving up theſe towns to the allies be thought any ſecurity? Is it any more than giving the allies a barrier, which barrier they would have inſiſted upon, whatever became of Spain? How now comes that to be a ſecurity, that the king of France would abandon his grandſon, which he muſt nevertheleſs have complied with, though he had not abandoned him? Is it the ſame thing to part with theſe towns, and keep Spain, as to part with them and Spain too? If not, then his agreeing to give up one is no proof he intends to part with the other. Ay, but when the allies have theſe towns, they will force him to it. That I deny. Why ſo, ſay they? The towns are to be delivered in two months: That is, by the middle of Auguſt; and then the allies will have time enough to enter France, if he ſends any ſuccour to his grandſon. But, firſt, the ſurrender, that is to be made in two months, is only of thoſe towns, that are to make the barrier for the Netherlands: Thoſe that are to be reſtored to the emperor and empire, are not to be evacuated till the exchange of their ramifications, which is a tedious work. Beſides, though it be ſtipulated, that the towns in the Netherlands, &c. ſhall be given up in two months, I believe no body wants to be told, that things are ſeldom ſo punctually executed, as to be performed nicely within the time agreed. But I will ſuppoſe for once, theſe articles had been effectually complied with within the time, and that the allies conſequently would have been at liberty to invade France, if they had openly ſent any conſiderable ſuccours to Spain; but what then? Could not they have ſent money and jewels to the duke of Anjou, without any danger of diſcovery? Or would they not have pretence enough for denying it? And would the allies invade France, upon a bare ſuſpicion of ſending ſuch an aſſiſtance to Spain? And for men, though a body of troops could not have been ſent thither without being known, might not what number they pleaſed of the French troops, that were in Spain, have ſtaid there, under a notion of deſertion, or have been detained by the duke of Anjou's order upon ſome blind pretence or other; a trick the grandfather has practiſed often enough for the grandſon to learn it from him? Well, but ſuppoſe France had neither openly, nor under-hand, given the duke of Anjou any aſſiſtance for that ſummer (not that I can by any means grant it) how long would that have held? Or what uſe would the allies have made of it? Could the troops we had then in Spain have over-run the kingdom without further help, or have driven out the duke of Anjou in one campaign? That, I preſume, will not by any body be pretended. Or could a ſufficient reinforcement have been ſent time enough to them, either from Italy or England, to do any great matters that year? That, I ſuppoſe, will be pretended as little by thoſe, that conſider, it was June, when theſe preliminaries were finiſhed. It is plain then, Spain could not have gained that year, unleſs the duke of Anjou had conſented to relinquiſh it. Let us then, in the next place, ſuppoſe the ſummer ſpent, and the armies gone out of the field, and ſee what we are to expect then. A peace is made with France; the allies have got each of them their reſpective ſhares, and have nothing more to hope for. They renew, perhaps, the grand alliance, with great expreſſions of mutual zeal; the emperor at leaſt, and the maritime powers; but ſome of the leſſer princes might poſſibly ſhew themſelves diſguſted, and think they have been neglected: For, as the preliminaries are now ſettled, it is certain more than one of them are not ſatisfied. Suppoſe the king of Pruſſia or the duke of Savoy, for example, had thought due care had not been taken of them, it is plain, in that caſe, their alliance is no longer to be depended on; and either of theſe, falling off, would very much weaken the confederacy; eſpecially the laſt, whom the French would be very glad to draw into their intereſts. But ſuppoſe none of the allies have any of theſe reſentments, or at leaſt ſtifle them, and all conſent to renew the grand alliance; what becomes of the armies upon leaving the field? Is it not certain, that they will on all ſides diſmiſs great part of their forces? Will not the maritime powers ſend home the foreign troops in their pay, except ſuch as Holland keeps for the defence of their new frontier? Shall we hear of any more armies upon the Rhine, or in Savoy, when they have made peace, when the articles of the treaty have been all executed, and there is no more enemy to moleſt them, no cauſe of complaint, or pretence for a new campaign left? I think nothing can be ſurer, than that this would have been the caſe: The allies would have thought no more of war in the places that have been hitherto the ſeats of it, nor have made any preparations for taking the field another year. All ſides would have made what haſte they could to have leſſened the burthen, which, during the war, they had been oppreſſed with. Holland particularly would have had full work to take care of their new frontier, to provide ſo many towns with ſufficient garriſons and magazines, and ſettle what foot the ſeveral parts of their new acquiſitions ſhould be put upon, with reſpect to war, trade, and ſubſidies; and, beſides the great expence this would for the preſent put them to, they would be at a very great charge to pay the arrears due to the foreign troops, without which they could not be diſmiſſed. Add to this the extraordinary allowance, which, upon their diſmiſſing, is to be made to carry them home. This would put the ſtates under the neceſſity of retrenching, as much as poſſible, the expences of the next year. And this laſt article England would be proportionably affected with. Now I would be glad to know, what ſhould hinder the king of France, from the minute the allies diſmiſs their troops, to give what aſſiſtance he will to Spain, provided it be not done too groſsly, but gradually, by inſenſible ſteps, and by thoſe many ways of artifice, which the French are maſters of? If they make a peace, they may diſband ſixty or eighty thouſand men, or more. And what ſhould hinder theſe men from going into Spain to ſeek their bread? What ſhall hinder the king of France from giving ſecret orders for this? And, when it is complained of, from poſitively denying, and perhaps ſeemingly forbidding it? And may not the duke of Anjou, by this means, againſt the next ſpring, have a greater army, than the allies can bring againſt him? And how then are we to get Spain? Will the allies raiſe new armies, and make new war upon France in Flanders, upon the Rhine, and in Savoy, becauſe ſome men have inſenſibly ſtole out of France into Spain, againſt the expreſs order of the king, which you are ſure will be pretended? You do not know the ſweets of peace, or how unwilling people are, who have once laid down their arms to take them up again. If you think the allies could be brought to this, or that any armies would take the field againſt France, after a peace was once made; what then is to be hoped for? Why, I think nothing more than this, that the Dutch and the emperor would contribute for a little while, perhaps for one campaign, ſome money and troops, to act in conjunction with England againſt Spain; in which no great ſucceſs can be expected, conſidering the numerous army, I have ſhewn you, the duke of Anjou might and would have. Now if this, upon the trial of one campaign, were found to be the caſe, I am afraid Holland would not be very willing to continue the proſecution of ſo expenſive a war, and the whole weight of it another year would lie upon England, except a very little, that might be expected from the emperor. And what could this end in, but in the ruin of England and the loſs of Spain? For the moſt that could be expected from this war, would be, that the duke of Anjou would offer a partition, ſuch as I have mentioned in my firſt letter, but with no option in the caſe. He would certainly keep Spain and the Indies, and give the other part to his competitor. And if that be accepted, what becomes of England, which is ſo much intereſted in the recovery of Spain? And if it be not accepted, what ſhall hinder the French king from aſſiſting his grandſon after one year, more openly, and taking upon him to mediate a peace; that is to force ſuch a one as he pleaſes upon us? For how can we help ourſelves? Shall we be in a condition to quarrel with him, when we have been exhauſted two years more with ſuch an expenſive war, while he has been enjoying all the advantages of peace, to repair the breaches the war had made in his affairs; to reſtore commerce, retrieve the public credit, remedy the ill ſtate of his finances, look into the condition of his fleet, and put himſelf into the beſt poſture he can for a new war, if the ſupport of the duke of Anjou makes it neceſſary? No, ſure; we ſhall never think ourſelves in a condition to break with him; nor ſhall we be able to perſuade our allies to it. No part therefore will be left us, but to ſubmit to ſuch a peace with his grandſon, as he ſhall in his pleaſure think fit to preſcribe. I need not enlarge upon the difficulties of making war with Spain, after what I have ſaid in my firſt letter. It is eaſy to ſee how the duke of Anjou may find us work enough for two or three years, if he do but avoid coming to an action. Sieges will coſt time, as well as men and money; and many muſt be made before ſuch a kingdom can be reduced; and that will give the king of France opportunity enough to do what he will, to ſupport his grandſon ſecretly or openly, or to preſcribe a peace, or begin a new war which it is always eaſy to find a pretence for; and we are ſure he cannot want inclination to do whatever is in his power, which ſuch a cauſe calls for. Nor is he ſo little known, as to leave us the leaſt room to think, that any treaties or engagements can bind him, when inclination and power tempt him to break through them. His whole reign is one continued proof of this. I have ſaid ſomewhat of it already, and therefore ſhall add but one inſtance which is a little parallel to the caſe before us; and that is, the manner in which he kept the promiſe he made the Spaniards, at the Pyrenean treaty, not to aſſiſt the Portugueſe, who were then at war with them. Never was treaty made with more ſolemnity; and yet what did thoſe engagements ſignify? All the time the treaty was making, France was concerting meaſures to ſupport the Portugueſe; and the king, the preſent king, who was then but young in perfidy, had ſo little regard to cover or palliate what he did, that he ſent, in the face of all the world, an army to the aſſiſtance of thoſe, whoſe defence he had renounced, commanded by a marſhal of France. And can we, after ſuch an inſtance, depend upon his word? Has he not much greater temptation to aſſiſt Spain againſt us, than he had then to ſupport the Portugueſe againſt Spain? Is not the honour of his grandſon, the intereſt of his family, and the acquiſition of ſo great a monarchy of infinitely more concern to him, than the defence of Portugal could be? A man muſt be blind, not to ſee there is no compariſon between the two caſes; and it is inexcuſable, when we are ſenſible of this, to think, that a prince, who has been ſo falſe in one inſtance, can be ever true in the other.

The ſum of this argument is, that if a ſeparate peace be made with France upon the foot of the preliminaries, without the 37th article, nothing can hinder France from aſſiſting the duke of Anjou: And, if he be aſſiſted by France, we can never be able to drive him out of Spain: And conſequently, if Spain be ever had, it muſt be by treaty. If therefore no peace can be a good one without Spain, then the 37th article is neceſſary in order to a good peace: Which is the point I was to prove.

I know but one thing can be ſaid againſt what I have advanced upon this head; and that is, That the allies, though they make peace with France, ſhould ſtill keep up their armies, and then France will not dare to give the duke of Anjou any great aſſiſtance. But, firſt, I have already ſhewn, that this is a very unreaſonable ſuppoſition; the allies moſt certainly would not continue to keep their armies, were a peace with France once made. But let us now ſuppoſe they would, how would this mend the matter? If we keep on foot as great armies, as we have now, we ſhould be no more at liberty to ſend men into Spain, than we are now. And, if we ſent any conſiderable number to Spain, they would be wanted elſewhere; and the king of France would have nothing to fear from us, for want of a ſufficient ſtrength to act offenſively, in caſe we ſhould think ourſelves ſufficiently provoked to it by any thing he does in violation of the treaty; nay, conſidering the number of towns given up to the allies, which all muſt have garriſons in them, and thoſe not very ſmall ones, to keep their new ſubjects in awe, we ſhould want a greater army in Flanders than before, to be in a condition to act offenſively. And, if ſuch armies muſt be kept up, I cannot ſee why they ſhould not be employed; that is, why we may not as well continue the war, or to what purpoſe we ſhould make peace. To me continuing the war ſeems much more eligible than ſuch a peace, for this plain reaſon, that France would certainly make a great advantage of peace, while we muſt, under the name of peace, continue in a ſtate of war, without the fruits of it. For example, all we have done, this campaign, would upon that ſuppoſition have been undone; and we ſhould have been ſo much farther off than we are, from putting France under a neceſſity to give us Spain. For though the ſucceſſes of this year [1710] have been ſo ſlighted, as to be thought not worth mentioning, where one would have moſt expected it; I can tell you, Doway alone is in the opinion of France of that mighty conſequence, that in all the negotiations, that have been carried on, ſince the refuſal of the preliminaries, to find an expedient for the thirty-ſeventh article. Doway has been always excepted out of the number of the towns, that they have pretended to give as an equivalent. Now this and the other conqueſts of this campaign have brought us much nearer to our end, than if our armies had gone out of the field, as they came in, and had done nothing. I muſt therefore ſtill maintain, that upon all ſuppoſitions the thirty-ſeventh article is neceſſary to a good peace, unleſs ſome real expedient could be found out, which has hitherto been in vain looked for.

ſeeming compliance with all their demands, but not to ſign any thing, that ſhould be drawn up in writing.

The penſionary, having by order of the ſtates, made a report to the duke of Marlborough of what paſſed at the conference, which had been held by Buys and Vanderduſſen, with the French miniſter, after the return of the courier from France, the duke reſolved to return to Great Britain, to acquaint the queen with the progreſs of this important negociation.

The duke therefore embarked the 13th of April, N. S. and arrived three days after at London. During this ſecond abſence of the duke, the French court, to cover their artifices with an air of ſincerity, ſent the marquis de Torcy, ſecretary of ſtate for foreign affairs, to Holland, thinking the preſence of ſo great a miniſter might have ſome influence on the ſtates. Upon his arrival at the Hague, the paſſport, by which he came, having been ſent blank by Rouille, he was there two days before his quality was known. After this he paid a viſit to the penſionary, and offered to communicate the propoſals which he had to make; but that miniſter told him, he could not confer with him nor ſee his propoſals, without leave from the ſtates. However the ſtates having conſented, that he together with the deputies who had been appointed to receive the propoſals of Rouille, ſhould meet the marquis, and hear what he had to offer, they had an interview with him the next day. The reſult of this conference being communicated to the ſtates-general, the penſionary had orders to inform the French miniſter, that he could not give him any reſolution till they were informed of the ſentiments of the queen of Great Britain, by the return of the duke of Marlborough.

The duke, who made but a ſhort ſtay in England, returned to the Hague the 18th of May, N. S. The firſt thing he did was to confer with prince Eugene, who arrived there ſix days before from Bruſſels, and had the ſatisfaction, in his conferences with the penſionary, to receive freſh aſſurances, "That the ſtates would never ſeparate from the general intereſt and ſcope of the grand alliance, upon any private conſiderations whatſoever." With the duke of Marlborough went over the lord viſcount Townſhend, as embaſſador extraordinary, and joint plenipotentiary with him, the duke reckoning the load too great to bear it wholly himſelf. The choice was well made; for as lord Townſhend had great parts, had improved theſe by travelling, and was by much the moſt ſhining perſon of all our young nobility, and had on many occaſions, diſtinguiſhed himſelf very eminently; ſo he was a man of great integrity, and of good principles in all reſpects, free from all vice, and of an engaging converſation. Upon their arrival, the preſident of the week and the penſionary went together to the duke to compliment him on the part of the ſtates, and at the ſame time to confer with him, which they did for about an hour and an half, and then they returned to the aſſembly of the ſtates-general. The ſame evening the marquis de Torcy went alone to the duke of Marlborough's lodgings, and had a conference of above two hours with him and the lord Townſhend. The 19th in the morning, the marquis paid another viſit to the duke, and they both went together to prince Eugene's apartment, where they likewiſe conferred for ſome time. In the evening, thoſe two princes went to the penſionary, who acquainted them with the reſolution of the ſtates-general, not to accept the offers made by the French miniſters, nor to take one ſtep farther, but in concert with all the allies. This determination was very ſatisfactory to the duke and prince Eugene, and begat ſuch an unanimity and good harmony among all the confederate miniſters, as entirely baffled all the ſecret deſigns of France, notwithſtanding the marquis de Torcy managed his purpoſe very artfully, and did all he could to amuſe them with half promiſes and faint denials.

On the 20th, in the morning, the duke and prince Eugene, together with the lord Townſhend, returned the viſit they had received from Monſieur de Torcy, where Rouille, who till then had been with no other miniſters but Buys and Vanderduſſen, was preſented to theſe great generals and miniſters. This ſame day, the French miniſters carried the amuſement ſo far, as to declare, that their maſter conſented to the demolition of Dunkirk; that he would abandon the pretender, and ſend him out of his dominions; that he would acknowledge the queen's title, and the ſucceſſion eſtabliſhed on the houſe of Hanover; that he would renounce all pretenſions to the Spaniſh monarchy, and yield up ſuch places as the Dutch demanded for their barrier. With reſpect to the empire, the French offered to reſtore all things, as they were ſettled by the treaty of Ryſwick, and to demoliſh the fortifications of Straſburgh. But the allies inſiſting on ſome other articles, namely, the reſtitution of Upper and Lower Alſace to the empire, Torcy declared he had no power to make any further conceſſions, broke up the conference, and ſent to the penſionary to deſire paſſes to return home. However, upon ſecond thoughts, and as they pretended, at the deſire of Monſieur Perkum, reſident of Holſtein, the French miniſters conſented to ſuſpend their departure: And, on the 21ſt, Torcy went alone to the penſionary, to agree about another conference, which was held at ſix o'clock in the evening; and, notwithſtanding the French miniſters had declared the day before, that they could not enlarge their offers, they now propoſed to ſurrender Straſburgh in its preſent condition. The allies not being ſatisfied with the propoſals made in this conference, another was appointed for the 22d, in the morning, which proved likewiſe unſucceſsful. Whereupon the French declared, that they were reſolved to go away; and, the better to demonſtrate their ſeriouſneſs in this reſolution, they ſent again to the penſionary for paſſes, and took their leave of prince Eugene and the duke of Marlborough, and the miniſters of the neutral princes; but the ſtates having, the ſame evening, ſent them paſſes, and the penſionary intimated to them, that they were not hereafter to expect any paſſport for their return to the Hague; and, conſidering, on the other hand, how unconcerned the miniſters of the allies were at the threats of their departure, they were eaſily perſuaded to ſtay, at the deſire (as they ſtill pretended) of ſome neutral miniſters; and, the better to colour the matter, they ſent, on the 23d of May, N. S. an expreſs to the court of France for new inſtructions. The ſame day, in the morning, another conference was held from nine o'clock, till about two in the afternoon; wherein they begun to ſet down ſome articles in writing, and agreed to meet again about ſix in the evening. That afternoon count Zinzendorf, the emperor's plenipotentiary, arrived at the Hague, and went immediately with Monſieur Heems, the Imperial miniſter, to pay a viſit to prince Eugene and the duke of Marlborough; with whom, together with the penſionary, count Gallas, and the lord Townſhend, the French miniſters had another conference in relation to the ſecurity of the execution, of the points agreed on. But, though this conference laſted from ſix till eleven o'clock in the evening, yet nothing was concluded in it. The 24th, in the morning, the French miniſters had another interview with the deputies of the ſtates, who gave an account of what had paſſed in it to the duke of Marlborough and prince Eugene; and, the ſame evening, there was another meeting, wherein they reſumed the debate, relating to the ſecurity of the performance of the articles agreed on, particularly the evacuation of the Spaniſh dominions. For this the allies demanded ſeveral cautionary towns; but the French refuſed to give any, inſiſting, 'That the engagement which the moſt chriſtian king offered to enter into, to recal his troops from Spain, and his promiſe to give no manner of aſſiſtance to king Philip, was a ſufficient ſecurity, ſince that prince being forſaken by his grandfather, would be obliged to quit Spain; and the rather, becauſe the Spaniards, in ſuch a caſe, would certainly declare for king Charles.' This occaſioned warm debates; but at laſt it was agreed, that France ſhould deliver up ſome places in the Netherlands, that were to be part of the barrier, before they entered upon the general negociations of peace. On the 25th and 26th, there was no interview with the French miniſters; but the duke of Marlborough, prince Eugene, the lord Townſhend, and count Zinzendorf had ſeveral conferences with the penſionary and the deputies of the ſtates, wherein they acquainted the new Imperial plenipotentiary with what had been tranſacted ſince the beginning of this negociation, and agreed on the further demands to be made to the French miniſters. A conference being held on the 27th, in the morning, at which count Zinzendorf aſſiſted for the firſt time, thoſe demands were communicated to Torcy and Rouille, who deſired ſome time to conſider of them. But the duke of Marlborough having ſent them word, that he and prince Eugene had determined to ſet out for Flanders within two days, they promiſed to return an anſwer at ſix in the evening in another conference, which laſted till two o'clock in the morning. After many diſputes, the French ſeemed to comply with all the preliminary articles inſiſted on by the confederates.

The foundation of the whole treaty was, the reſtoring of the whole Spaniſh monarchy to king Charles, within two months: Torcy ſaid, the time was too ſhort, and that, perhaps, it was not in the king of France's power to bring that about; for the Spaniards ſeemed reſolved to ſtick to king Philip. It was, upon this, inſiſted on, that the king of France ſhould be obliged to concur with the allies, to force it by all proper methods: But this was not farther explained, for the allies were well aſſured, that if it was ſincerely intended by France, there would be no great difficulty in bringing it about. This, therefore, being laid down as the baſis of the treaty, the other preliminaries related to the reſtoring all the places in the Netherlands, except Cambray and St. Omer; the demoliſhing or reſtoring of Dunkirk; the reſtoring of Straſburg, Briſack, and Hunningen to the empire; Newfoundland to England; and Savoy to that duke, beſides his continuing poſſeſſed of all, he then had in his hands; the acknowledging the king of Pruſſia's royal dignity, and the electorate in the houſe of Brunſwick; the ſending the pretender out of France, and owning the ſucceſſion to the crown of England as it was ſettled by law. As all the great intereſts were provided for, by theſe preliminaries; ſo all other matters were reſerved to be conſidered, when the treaty of peace ſhould be opened: a ceſſation of all hoſtilities was to begin, within two months, and to continue till all was concluded by a complete treaty, and ratified: Provided the Spaniſh monarchy was then entirely reſtored. The French miniſters ſeemed to be confounded at theſe demands: But, in concluſion, pretended to ſubmit to them[b]. Torcy told the miniſters, he would ſet out for Paris immediately, to lay the whole before his moſt chriſtian majeſty, and at parting deſired the ratifications might be returned with all poſſible haſte. He promiſed prince Eugene, that the king of France's final anſwer ſhould be ſent, by the 4th of June; but ſpoke of their affairs as a man in deſpair: He ſaid, he did not know but he might find king Philip at Paris, before he got thither, and ſaid all that was poſſible, to aſſure them of the ſincerity of the king of France, and to divert them from the thoughts of opening the campaign; but at the ſame time king Philip was getting his ſon, the prince of Aſturias, to be acknowledged, by all the towns and bodies of Spain, as the heir of that monarchy. Rouille, who had opened the firſt ſcene of this negociation, was to continue at the Hague ſome time longer, in order to ſuſpend the unravelling of the plot as long as poſſible. The whole artifice of France was at length diſcovered, and it appeared very viſibly, that the French had no other deſign in all this negociation, but to try if they could beget an ill underſtanding among the allies, or, by their ſeeming great conceſſions for the ſecurity of the ſtates, to provoke the people of Holland againſt their magiſtrates, if they ſhould carry on the war, when they had ſuch ſafe and honourable offers made them; and they reckoned, that if a ſuſpenſion of arms could be once obtained upon any other terms than the reſtoring of Spain, they ſhould then get out of the war, and the allies would be left to try, how they could conquer Spain. Torcy was, however, punctual to his promiſe given to prince Eugene; for, on the 4th of June, the prince being at Bruſſels, received a letter from the marquis, importing, "That his moſt chriſtian majeſty, having examined the project of peace concluded at the Hague, found it impoſſible for him to accept it; and therefore had ſent orders to the preſident de Rouille to notify the ſame to the potentates engaged in the war; and that it was to be hoped, that more favourable terms would preſent for the eſtabliſhing of a peace ſo neceſſary for all Europe, and conſequently ſo much deſired by every body." The meſſenger, who brought this letter to prince Eugene, arrived the next morning at the the Hague, where people were in the height of expectation of the French king's ratification of the preliminaries; but, to their great diſappointment, Rouille having the ſame day had a conference at the penſionary's, with the Imperial and Britiſh plenipotentiaries, and the deputies of the ſtates, he acquainted them, That the moſt chriſtian king could not ratify ſome articles agreed to in the conference held with Monſieur de Torcy, and concluded the 28th paſt. He excepted to the articles relating to the emperor and the duke of Savoy; but chiefly on that of not beginning the ſuſpenſion of arms, till the Spaniſh monarchy ſhould be reſtored, which, he ſaid, was not in his power to execute[c].

Theſe difficulties ſtarted by the French king having been communicated by Rouille, count Zinzendorf, the duke of Marlborough, the lord Townſhend, and the penſionary Heinſius, immediately held a conference among themſelves, in which it was reſolved, "That no alteration ought to be admitted in the preliminary articles, eſpecially in thoſe excepted againſt by France, which were the moſt eſſential." And it was agreed at the ſame time to ſignify to Rouille, to depart in four and twenty hours.

The 6th of June, N. S. in the morning, Rouille made a viſit to the duke of Marlborough, and propoſed another conference, which was held that night; but nothing material was tranſacted in it, except that the allies declared to Rouille, "That they would not recede from any of the articles agreed to; and that, if his maſter did not think fit to comply therewith, the allies would not think themſelves bound by the articles, or reſtrain their pretenſions to the contents thereof, after the 15th of that month, the time allowed by the articles."

[b] The preliminary articles were as follows:

1. That a firm and laſting peace be forthwith treated of, &c.
2. That to that end preliminary articles be agreed on, &c.
3. That the moſt chriſtian king ſhall acknowledge king Charles III. king of Spain, &c.
4. The treaty ſhall be finiſhed in two months, during which time Sicily ſhall be put into the hands of king Charles; and the duke of Anjou ſhall evacuate Spain, which, if he refuſes to conſent to, the French king and the allies ſhall enter into proper meaſures, that this article may have entire effect.
5. That the French king ſhall, within that time, withdraw his troops out of Spain, &c. and not aſſiſt the duke of Anjou for the future with troops, artillery, ammunition, or money.
6. The monarchy of Spain ſhall remain entire in the houſe of Auſtria, and no prince of the houſe of France ever become ſovereign of any part thereof.
7. France ſhall never poſſeſs the Spaniſh Weſt Indies, or trade thither.
8, 9. The French king ſhall deliver up Straſburg, Fort Kehl, and Briſac, to the emperor.
10. The French king ſhall poſſeſs Alſace in the literal ſenſe of the treaty of Munſter, except Landau, which ſhall belong to the emperor.
11. He ſhall demoliſh New Briſac, Fort Lewis, and Hunningen.
12. Rheintels ſhall be poſſeſſed by the landgrave of Heſſe, till otherwiſe agreed.
13. The clauſe concerning religion in the treaty of Ryſwick ſhall be referred to the negociation.
14, 15. The French ſhall acknowledge the queen of Great Britain, and the proteſtant ſucceſſion.
16. The French king ſhall reſtore to Great Britain what he is poſſeſſed of in Newfoundland; and whatever either party has taken in the Indies ſhall be reſtored.
17. Dunkirk ſhall be demoliſhed.
18. The pretender ſhall retire out of France.
19. A treaty of commerce ſhall be ſettled with Great Britain.
20. The king of Portugal ſhall enjoy all that is ſtipulated for him by the allies.
21. The French king ſhall acknowledge the king of Pruſſia, and not diſturb him in the enjoyment of Neufchatel.
22. The French king ſhall deliver up Furnes, Menin, Ypres, Warneton, Commines, Werwick, Poperingen, Liſle, Conde, and Maubeuge, for the barrier of the ſtates.
23. He ſhall reſtore all the towns and forts he has taken in the Netherlands, with the artillery and ſtores, provided the catholic religion ſhall ſtill be profeſſed there.
24. None of the cannon or ſtores to be removed from this time.
25. The ſtates, as to their commerce, ſhall have what was ſtipulated at the treaty of Ryſwick, and the tariff of 1664 only ſhall be in force.
26. The French king ſhall acknowledge the ninth electorate.
27. The duke of Savoy ſhall enjoy all that has been yielded to him by the emperor, and whatever has been taken from him ſhall be reſtored.
28. The French king ſhall make over to that duke Exilles, Feneſtrilles, and Chemont, with the valley of Pragelas, and all on this ſide the mountains, for a barrier.
29. The pretenſions of the elector of Bavaria and Cologne ſhall be referred to the general negociation; but the elector Palatine to remain in poſſeſſion of the Upper Palatinate, &c. the garriſons of the ſtates to remain in Huy, Liege, and Bonne, till otherwiſe agreed with the emperor and empire.
30, 31, 32. The farther demands on either ſide ſhall not interrupt the ceſſation of arms; the other allies being allowed to make farther demands at the general congreſs.
33, 34. The negociation ſhall be finiſhed in two months, and in the mean time a ceſſation of arms be made.
35. Upon the ratification of theſe articles the French king ſhall evacuate Namur, Mons, Charleroy, Luxemburg, Conde, Tournay, Maubeuge, Newport, Tournes, and Ypres, and raze the fortifications of Dunkirk.
36. The French to execute what has been ſtipulated, with reſpect to the other allies, within two months after the concluſion of the treaty.
37. And if he executes all that is above mentioned, and the whole monarchy of Spain ſhall be delivered up to Charles III. as is ſtipulated within the limited time, then the ceſſation of arms ſhall continue till the ratification of the peace.
38. All this ſhall ſerve as the foundation and baſis of the enſuing treaties of peace.
39. The ratification of the preliminary articles to be performed by the French king, the queen of Great Britain, and the ſtates, before the 15th of June, and by the emperor by the 1ſt of July, and what is ſtipulated in favour of each of the allies reſpectively, to be ſet down as ſoon as they have ſettled the preliminaries.
40. The congreſs to begin the 20th of June at the Hague, and, to prevent diſputes about the ceremonial, no embaſſador ſhall take upon him his character till the day of the ſigning of the peace. Lamberti, vol. V.

[c] Rouille ſaid, That the French king in particular excepted againſt the tenth, eleventh, twenty-eighth, twenty-ninth, and thirty-ſeventh. That as to the tenth his moſt chriſtian majeſty agreed to the ſame, as far as it concerned the poſſeſſion of Alſatia, according to the literal ſenſe of the treaty of Munſter; but inſiſted, that Landau ſhould be reſtored to him; and, as an equivalent, offered Old Briſac; both which places were yielded up to France by that treaty. That the moſt chriſtian king could not conſent to the demoliſhing Hunningen, New Briſac, and Fort Lewis, but agreed to all the other parts of the eleventh article. That the eight and twentieth, relating to the places yielded to the duke of Savoy, was entirely excepted againſt, and referred to a further diſcuſſion. That his majeſty alſo diſliked the whole nine and twentieth article, whereby the emperor's proceedings againſt the electors of Cologne and Bavaria were approved, but would have the ſame referred to the negociations of a general peace, with this proviſo, that the Upper Palatinate, and the dignity annexed thereto, ſhould not be confirmed to the elector Palatine; and that the intereſts of the electors of Cologne and Bavaria ſhould be ſettled in the preliminaries; and, in the laſt place, that his moſt chriſtian majeſty excepted alſo againſt the ſeven and thirtieth article, whereby two months only were allowed for the delivering up of the Spaniſh monarchy, which term he would have enlarged, but conſented to recal his own troops from Spain within that time.

The French miniſter ſaid, He had no orders to make any further declaration; whereupon he received a ſecond intimation to depart the Hague immediately. The ſame evening, Mr. Walpole, ſecretary to the Britiſh plenipotentiaries, returned to the Hague with the queen of Great Britain's ratification of the preliminaries. On the 8th, the penſionary reported Rouille's declaration to the aſſembly of the ſtates; upon which they conſidered, "That the articles were concerted with the marquis de Torcy and Monſieur de Rouille, put into writing with their aſſent, and by the marquis de Torcy himſelf carried to the king of France, in order to be ſigned and ratified; that they were actually ſigned on the part of the emperor, Great Britain, and Holland, and had been ratified by her Britannic majeſty; and that nothing ſhort of theſe preliminaries could obtain and ſecure the general peace, and prevent a dangerous, expenſive, and lingering war in Spain:" Whereupon the neceſſary reſolutions for the continuance of the war were taken with equal firmneſs and wiſdom.

The ſame night, Rouille being preſſed to declare if he had any ſecret orders tending to peace, made anſwer, "That if the allies would content themſelves with the fifth article of the preliminaries in relation to Spain, without inſiſting on the others relating to the delivering up of the Spaniſh monarchy, he thought the king, his maſter, would be induced to depart from the other exceptions about Alſatia, the duke of Savoy, &c." But the recovery of the Spaniſh monarchy from the houſe of Bourbon being the chief end of the war, and the only means to reſtore and preſerve the balance of Europe, the miniſters of the allies did not think fit to depart from any one of the articles to ſecure the evacuation of Spain; and ſo, the ſame evening, a paſſport was ſent Rouille, for his ſafe return home. On the 9th of June he ſet out from the Hague, to embark at Rotterdam for Antwerp, from whence he continued his journey to Paris. The ſame morning, all the miniſters of the allies being deſired to meet in a congreſs, Monſieur Van Eſſen, preſident of the ſecret affairs, and the penſionary, communicated to them the reſolution of the ſtates-general, gave them a full account of all the ſteps that had been made in the negociations, particularly ſince the French king had refuſed to agree to the preliminaries; and deſired them to acquaint their principals with theſe unfair proceedings of France, and exhort them to join their beſt efforts againſt an enemy, who could never be brought to reaſon but by force. Count Zinzendorf took this opportunity to tell the deputies of the ſtates, "That the empire, the emperor, and king Charles III. would doubtleſs expreſs their ſatisfaction for the great firmneſs and conſtancy, which their high mightineſſes had manifeſted in the courſe of theſe negociations." The duke of Marlborough gave the ſame aſſurances on the part of the queen of Great Britain; as did alſo the reſt of the miniſters, on the part of their reſpective maſters; and all ſignified to the penſionary, how much the allies were obliged to him, and ſatisfied with the prudence and wiſdom he had expreſſed in the negociations, which, contrary to the expectations of the enemy, would prove a new cement to the grand alliance, and an argument to convince the allies, that the war was to be proſecuted till France ſhould be reduced to the neceſſity of ſubmitting to any terms that the allies ſhould preſcribe.

Thus theſe negociations came ſoon to an end, without producing any ill effect among the allies; and it now plainly appeared, that the eaſineſs with which the French miniſters yielded to the preliminaries, was only an artifice to ſlacken the zeal of the confederates in advancing the campaign, as the leaſt effect it would have: But in that their hopes failed them, for there was no time loſt in preparing to take the field[d]. The ſtates of Holland and Weſt Frieſland having met on the 13th of June, N. S. ratified the preliminary articles, without regard to that king's refuſal to ſign them; after which, the aſſembly unanimouſly reſolved to carry on the war with the utmoſt vigour. But, while the generality of people in Great Britain, Holland, and Germany, expreſſed their reſentment againſt the inſincerity of France, that court made a politic uſe of the very preliminary articles, which were made public in ſeveral languages by the allies. For, in order to raiſe among his people an indignation againſt thoſe exorbitant demands, and encourage them to bear, with leſs impatience, the burden and calamities of war, the French king cauſed circular letters to be ſent to all the governors of his provinces, the archbiſhop of Paris, and other prelates of France, wherein he inſiſted upon the unreaſonableneſs of the allies, in requiring his aſſiſtance to dethrone his grandſon[e].

The people in France were much wrought on, by this pretended indignity offered to their monarch, to oblige him to force his grandſon to abandon Spain; and even here in England, there wanted not many, who ſaid it was a cruel hardſhip put on the French king, to force him into ſuch an unnatural war: But if he was guilty of the injuſtice, of putting him in poſſeſſion of that kingdom, it was but a reaſonable piece of juſtice, to undo what he himſelf had done: And it was ſo viſible, that king Philip was maintained on that throne by the councils and aſſiſtance of France, that no doubt was made, but that, if the king of France had really deſigned it, he could eaſily have obliged him to relinquiſh all pretenſions to that crown.

The breaking off the negociation of peace was ſoon attended with the diſgrace of Monſieur de Chamillard, the French king's prime miniſter, and even with ſome coldneſs towards Madam de Maintenon, who were both ſaid to have given larger inſtructions to Rouille and Torcy, than either the king

[d] Burnet obſerves on this occaſion, France had ſo perfidiouſly broke all their treaties, during this king's reign, that it was a piece of inexcuſable folly to expect any other from them. In the peace of the Pyrenees, where the intereſt of France was not ſo deeply engaged, to preſerve Portugal from falling under the yoke of Caſtile, as it was now to preſerve Spain in the hands of a grandſon; after the king had ſworn to give no aſſiſtance to Portugal, yet, under the pretence of breaking ſome bodies, he ſuffered them to be entertained by the Portugueſe embaſſador, and ſent Schomberg to command that army; pretending he could not hinder one, that was a German by birth, to go and ſerve where he pleaſed: Under theſe pretences, he had broke his faith, where the conſideration was not ſo ſtrong, as in the preſent caſe. Thus it was viſible no faith that king could give was to be relied on, and that unleſs Spain was reſtored, all would prove a fatal deluſion: Beſides, it came afterwards to be known, that the places in Brabant and Hainault, commanded by the elector of Bavaria, would not have been evacuated by him, unleſs he had orders for it from the king of Spain, under whom he governed in them; and that was not to be expected. Burnet, Vol. II. 529.

[e] Theſe letters were as follows:

Couſin,

The hopes of an approaching peace were ſo generally ſpread in my kingdom, that, out of regard to the loyalty my people have expreſſed during the whole courſe of my reign, I think myſelf obliged to give them the comfort of acquainting them with the reaſons, which ſtill hinder their enjoying the repoſe I deſigned to procure them.

In order to reſtore the ſame, I would have accepted conditions very oppoſite to the ſecurity of my frontier provinces; but the more facility and deſire I have ſhewn to diſſipate the umbrages, which my enemies affect to entertain of my power and deſigns, the more they have multiplied their pretenſions; inſomuch that by degrees, adding new demands to the firſt, and making uſe, either of the duke of Savoy's name, or of the intereſt of the princes of the empire, they have at once let me ſee, that they had no other intention, than to increaſe, at the expence of my crown, the ſtates bordering upon France, and to open to themſelves eaſy ways to penetrate into the heart of my kingdom, as often as it would ſuit with their intereſt to begin a new war. Nor would the war I now maintain, and was willing to have ended, have ceaſed, had I conſented to the propoſals they have made to me. For they fixed within two months the term, wherein I was, on my part, to execute the treaty; and, during that interval, they pretended to oblige me to deliver up to them the places they demanded of me in the Low-Countries and Alſace, and to raze thoſe, on the demoliſhing whereof they inſiſted; refuſing, on their part, to enter into any other engagements, than the ſuſpenſion of all acts of hoſtility, till the firſt day of Auguſt, and reſerving to themſelves the liberty of acting then by force of arms, in caſe the king of Spain, my grandſon, perſiſted in the reſolution of defending the crown God has given him, and rather to periſh, than abandon faithful people, who, for nine years, have acknowledged him as their lawful king. Such a ſuſpenſion (more dangerous than war itſelf) would rather put off than forward peace. For it would not only have been neceſſary to continue the ſame expence for the maintaining of my armies, but, as ſoon as the term of the ſuſpenſion of arms would have expired, my enemies would have attacked me with the new advantages they would have taken from the towns, into which I ſhould have introduced them myſelf, at the ſame time that I ſhould have demoliſhed thoſe that are a bulwark to ſome of my frontier provinces. I paſs over in ſilence the propoſals they have inſinuated to me, of joining my forces with thoſe of the confederates, and to compel my grandſon to deſcend the throne, if he did not voluntarily conſent to live, for the future, without dominions, and to reduce himſelf to the condition of a private man. It is againſt humanity to believe, that they had even the thought of engaging me in ſuch an alliance with them; but although the tenderneſs I have for my people be as hearty as for my own children; although I bear a part in all the ills, which the war makes ſuch faithful ſubjects undergo; and I have ſhewn to all Europe, that I ſincerely deſired to make them enjoy peace; I am perſuaded they would themſelves oppoſe the acceptance of it on conditions equally oppoſite to juſtice, and to the honour of the French name.

It is therefore my intention, that all thoſe, who, for ſo many years paſt have given me demonſtrations of their zeal, by contributing with their labours, fortunes, and blood, towards the maintaining ſo heavy a war, may know, that the only value my enemies pretended to ſet on the offers, I was willing to make to them, was a ſuſpenſion of arms; which, being ſtinted to the ſpace of two months, would have procured to them more conſiderable advantages, than they may expect from the confidence they put in their troops. As I repoſe mine in the protection of God, hoping that the purity of my intentions will draw the divine bleſſings upon my arms, I write to the archbiſhops and biſhops of my kingdom, to excite more and more the fervency of prayer in their reſpective dioceſes: And at the ſame time I order you to acquaint my people, within the extent of your government, that they ſhould enjoy peace, if it had been in my power, as it was in my will, to procure them a good they wiſh for with reaſon, but which muſt be obtained by new efforts, ſince the immenſe conditions I would have granted, are uſeleſs towards the reſtoring of the public tranquillity. I therefore leave it to your prudence to make my intentions known in ſuch a manner, as you ſhall judge convenient. And ſo I pray God to have you in his holy keeping. Lamberti, vol. IV.

intended, or were thought proper by the young princes of the blood [f]. On the other hand, it is obſervable, that while the terms of peace were debating, both the French court and the pope were uſing all imaginable endeavours to draw off the duke of Savoy from the grand alliance; the diſcovery of which was owing to the duke's miniſter at the Hague, and came very opportunely to expoſe the double-dealing of the court of France, who had the modeſty to reject the very article of the preliminaries, by which the allies ſtipulated a barrier for the duke of Savoy, and, at the ſame time, were offering him much greater advantages to induce him to leave the peace of Europe to their mercy. But theſe artifices were defeated by the penetration and firmneſs of prince Eugene and the duke of Marlborough, who treated the peace, as they managed the war, and, by their cool temper and open conduct, baffled the ſtratagems both of the French miniſters and generals. And it is certain, that the French, who propoſed to divide the allies, by ſetting on foot a negociation of peace, were themſelves caught in the preliminaries, which were ſo wiſely contrived for the particular ſatisfaction of each of the confederates, for their common ſecurity, that they became the more firmly united by this very tranſaction; and, being juſtly incenſed at the unfair proceedings of France, reſolved to improve their late advantages, by a vigorous proſecution of the war.

The duke of Marlborough ſet out from the Hague ſoon after Rouille, to put himſelf at the head of his army. Prince Eugene had abſolutely refuſed to go into Spain. There was nothing to fear in Italy. The army, on the Rhine, was formed with great difficulty, and very late. So the prince choſe to remain in Flanders, and ſecond the duke of Marlborough's deſigns. On the other hand, Villars was ſent to command the French army in Flanders, of whom the king of France ſaid, He was never beaten; Harcourt commanded on the Rhine, and the duke of Berwick in Dauphine. As the duke of Marlborough had truſted little to the ſhews of peace, he had taken care to have every thing in readineſs to open the campaign, as ſoon as he ſaw what might be expected from the court of France. By the 21ſt of June, the confederate troops formed an army of a hundred and ten thouſand men near Menin; and, two days after, the right wing under prince Eugene, and the left under the duke of Marlborough, marched and encamped in the plain of Liſle, on both ſides the Upper Deule. About the ſame time, the enemy's forces were marching from all quarters to form their army, under marſhal Villars, in the plain of Lens, where he began to caſt up intrenchments to cover his troops. Upon advice from Arras that Villars had poſitive orders to venture a battle, the lieutenant generals Dopf and Cadogan were ſent out with detachments, to take a near view of the enemy; and, upon their report of the almoſt inſuperable difficulties that muſt attend the attacking the French troops in their advantageous and fortified camp, the confederate generals reſolved to lay ſiege to Tournay [g]. The conqueſt of this place, notwithſtanding the ſtrong fortifications, appeared the more eaſy, becauſe Villars, at the approach of the confederate army, had unadviſedly weakened the garriſon. It ſeems, the train of artillery was by a feint brought up the Lys to Courtray; and therefore it was believed, the duke of Marlborough's deſign was upon Ypres, and, there being no apprehenſion of any attempt upon Tournay, no particular care was taken of it; ſo that, on the 27th of June, it was ſuddenly inveſted, and the train was ſent back to Ghent, and brought up the Scheld to Tournay. This enterprize was managed with ſo much ſecrecy, that the enemy could not have notice of the deſigns of the allies, nor time to reinforce the garriſon, which conſiſted only of twelve weak battalions, and four ſquadrons of dragoons, under the command of lieutenant general de Surville. Upon the confederate army's coming up to the town, the duke of Marlborough made a detachment, under the prince of Naſſau, to ſurprize St. Amand, a poſt very neceſſary to cover the ſiege, and another to take poſſeſſion of Mortagne, a poſt, where the Scarp falls into the Scheld; both which were ſoon effected, the French troops retiring upon the approach of our men. The governor of Tournay, not a little ſurprized to ſee the town inveſted, which was unprovided with neceſſaries for a long ſiege, rifled great part of the corn of the inhabitants, and ſent out a party of French dragoons to bring in the cattle of the neighbourhood, who were moſt of them cut off, or taken priſoners, and the cattle, to the number of above ſeven hundred, were generouſly reſtored to the peaſants. At the ſame time, Villars, being ſenſible of his miſtake, in weakening the garriſon of Tournay, ordered ſeven or eight thouſand horſe from Mons and Conde to advance, and endeavour to throw themſelves into the town; but ſuch meaſures were taken to prevent them, that they were forced to retire, without attempting any thing.

On the 3d of July, all the troops appointed for the ſiege had taken their poſts round the town, from Cerque above the town, to the caſtle of Conſtantine below it; and, the next day, the line of circumvallation was begun on this ſide the Scheld. In the mean while, upon advice, that a detachment of ten thouſand men from the enemy's army was marched towards Warneton, lieutenant general Wilks was detached thither, with two thouſand five hundred grenadiers, and thirty ſquadrons. But, before he could arrive, a lieutenant colonel, a major, and about ſeven hundred men, had yielded themſelves priſoners of war. All the neceſſary diſpoſitions being made for odening the trenches, and the bridges of communication being laid over the Scheld, the generals made the following diſpoſitions for the attacks of the city and citadel: That there ſhould be three attacks; one againſt the citadel, and one on each ſide of the river againſt the town, of which the principal was to be commanded by general Lottum, againſt the citadel, on the ſide of the gate of Valenciennes: The ſecond by general Fagel, againſt the gate of Marville; and the third by general Schuylemburgh, againſt the horn-work of the gate of the ſeven fountains. Sixty battalions were appointed for the trenches; three Imperialiſts, ſeven Engliſh, three Danes, ſeven Pruſſians, three Saxons, twenty-three Dutch, five Hanoverians, three Palatines, four Heſſians, two Wirtemburghers; and ſix ſquadrons of the troops of the ſeveral nations were to attend the uſual ſervices of horſe in a ſiege.

On the 4th of July, the enemy endeavoured to poſſeſs themſelves of Commines and Fort Rouge, in the former of which places was a major with a hundred and fifty men, and in the latter a captain with fifty, who were twice attacked with great vigour; but they defended themſelves ſo bravely, that, the confederate troops coming up in time to their relief, the enemy not only retired with precipitation, but abandoned the poſt of Warneton. On the 7th, at night, the trenches were opened before Tournay at the three attacks, with the loſs of about thirty men killed, and as many wounded. The next day the trenches were relieved about four in the afternoon; but the violent rains, which fell in the night, very much incommoded the beſiegers, and retarded their works. On the 9th the beſiegers began to erect a battery. The ſame day two French officers, who attempted to get into the town, were taken priſoners; and, in the night, the trenches were carried on (notwithſtanding the wet weather, and the continual fire of the beſieged) with the loſs of thirty men killed or wounded. The 10th thirty veſſels, laden with artillery and ammunition, arrived near the bridges of communication. The ſame day the beſieged made a ſally with five hundred men, but immediately retired at the approach of the confederates. The 12th they made another ſally by the Valenciennes gate; but general Lottum had diſpoſed all things at his attack with ſuch regularity, that the enemy were immediately repulſed with the loſs of near twenty men. On the 13th the beſiegers began at the attack of count Lottum, and fired from two batteries of twelve pieces of cannon each with ſo much ſucceſs, that they ſoon diſmounted the guns of the enemy on that ſide, and beat down a wind-mill, from which they had very much diſturbed the allies in their trenches. The 14th they began at the ſame attack to fire from another battery to break open ſluices, and the ſame day the batteries, at the attack of general Fagel, began to fire; as did, on the 15th, thoſe at the attack of general Schuylemburgh. The reſt of the cannon and mortars were mounting [f] It was reported, that the duke of Burgundy preſſed the making a peace, as neceſſary to prevent the ruin of France, while the Dauphin preſſed more vehemently the continuance of the war, and the ſupporting of the king of Spain: It was ſaid, that Madam Maintenon appeared leſs at court; Chamillard, who had moſt of her favour, was diſmiſſed: But it is not certain, what influence that had on the public councils; and the conduct of this whole negociation ſhewed plainly, that there was nothing deſigned in it, but to divide, or to deceive the confederates; and, if poſſible, to gain a ſeparate peace for France, and then to let the allies conquer Spain as they could. But the allies kept firm to one another, and the treachery of the French appeared ſo viſible, even to the people in Holland, that all the hopes they had, of inflaming them againſt their magiſtrates, likewiſe failed. Burnet, vol. II. 530.

[g] Tournay is one of the moſt ancient cities of Flanders. It had belonged time out of mind to France, till in 1513 it was taken by king Henry VIII. of England. It was ſoon after reſtored by the intrigues of cardinal Wolſey. The Spaniards took it in 1618, and kept it till 1667, when it was retaken by Lewis XIV. This prince had ſpared no coſt to fortify it, and had made it one of the ſtrongeſt places in the Netherlands: It is very advantageouſly ſituated, of a great compaſs, and divided by the Scheld, as the army, that beſieges it, muſt alſo be, which is always very incommodious and dangerous. Tournay is a biſhoprick under the archbiſhop of Cambray, about fifteen miles eaſt of Liſle, twenty north-eaſt of Doway, thirty-two almoſt weſt of Mons, and thirty ſouth of Ghent.

on ſeveral batteries, and were in a condition to fire the 16th. The ſame day the beſiegers at count Lottum's attack began to batter the wall, which made the communication between the town and citadel. On the 19th they fired from a battery of eleven pieces of cannon at General Fagel's attack, in order to enlarge the breach at the attack of count Lottum, and into the covered way, on the ſame ſide from the Scheld to the citadel, which would very much facilitate the ſucceſs of that attack: And, on 21ſt, they made themſelves maſters of the whole counterſcarp, at general Fagel's attack, and fired into the covered way on the other ſide of the Scheld before the attack of count Lottum, with ſo much ſucceſs, that the beſieged were forced to quit that poſt. The attack of general Schuylemburgh was likewiſe by this time very forward; for they made ſuch an inceſſant fire from their batteries, that, on 22d, the breaches in the horn work, the ravelin, and the wall of the town, were almoſt in a condition to be mounted, and, at the ſame time, the ſaps were carried to the wall of the ditch. However they continued to fire from all the batteries to enlarge the breaches, inſomuch, that general Schuylemburg, on the 27th, cauſed the ravelin and half-moon at his attack to be ſtormed; and, notwithſtanding the vigorous reſiſtance of the enemy, and their great fire, the allies lodged themſelves thereon, and perfected their lodgment, by favour of the continual fire they made from the cannon and mortars. On the 28th in the morning, the beſieged made a vigorous ſally, in order to retake the works they had loſt the night before, but met with ſo warm a reception, that they were forced to retire with conſiderable loſs: And, in the evening, the beſiegers having made the neceſſary diſpoſitions for a general ſtorm; and, the enemy fearing to be taken ſword in hand, they beat a parley, and deſired to capitulate for the town. Whereupon hoſtages were exchanged, and after ſome debates, the capitulation was agreed to.

Thus, after twenty-one days of open trenches, the allies reduced a place, which the French thought impregnable, and that in the ſight of a numerous army of the enemy, who made no attempt to relieve it. And the conqueſt was ſo much the more advantageous, that the loſs of the allies was leſs than could have been expected, conſidering the ſtrength and importance of the place.

The French, according to the capitulation, ſurrendered one gate the 30th of July. The next day Surville, the French governor, was entertained at dinner by prince Eugene; and, in the afternoon, retired into the citadel, which his garriſon of about four thouſand men had already entered, and the earl of Albemarle, who was appointed governor of Tournay, took poſſeſſion of the town. The time agreed on for evacuating the place expiring that night, the allies began to work on the approaches to the citadel. On the 1ſt of Auguſt, in the evening, the French began the firſt act of hoſtility, and fired from the citadel with cannon and ſmall ſhot upon count Lottum's trenches and batteries; from whence they were immediately anſwered, and the fire continued very hot on both ſides the whole night. The ſame day the diſpoſitions were made for an attack, the new lines of circumvallation about the citadel almoſt finiſhed, and orders given for levelling thoſe about the town.

In the mean time, Surville having propoſed to the confederate generals the appointing two perſons to treat about the ſurrender of the citadel, prince Eugene and the duke of Marlborough nominated de Lalo (a brigadier in the Britiſh troops) on their parts; and Surville named the marquis de Ravignan a brigadier in the French ſervice) who, having conferred, drew up and ſubſcribed articles for ſettling the time of ſurrendering the citadel.

Theſe articles were ſent to the French court for their approbation, and an anſwer was to be returned in ſeven days. But upon this occaſion the French gave a freſh inſtance of their inſincerity, and manifeſted to the world, that their propoſals for delivering up the citadel of Tournay was but an artifice to gain time, and amuſe the allies. For the French king would not ratify theſe articles, but upon condition, that there ſhould be a ceſſation of arms in general in the Netherlands till the 5th of September, which the allies would not conſent to; and therefore the ſiege was carried on with all poſſible vigour, notwithſtanding the great diſadvantages, which the confederate troops lay under, by reaſon of the great number of the enemies mines. From the 8th of Auguſt, the day on which the marquis de Ravignan returned from the French court, to the 20th of the ſame month, the enemy ſprung ſixteen mines, which coſt the beſiegers a great number of men, and very much retarded their approaches. On the 20th the beſieged ſprung a mine with ſo great execution, that part of the wall from the town to the citadel, two branches of the trenches, a parallel, two ſaps, and two of the beſiegers mines were ruined; and a captain, two enſigns, and nineteen ſoldiers killed. The 22d the miners of the allies diſcovered the branch of another mine; and as they were buſy in finding out the mine itſelf, they heard the enemy working on a great gallery. Whereupon a lieutenant and ſixteen grenadiers was ordered to diſlodge them; but the lieutenant being killed at the firſt onſet, his men were diſheartened and retired. Immediately after another officer, with a freſh detachment, was ordered to go upon that ſervice; but, the enemy throwing a great number of grenadoes, and making a terrible ſmoke, the beſiegers were forced to retire, to prevent being ſuffocated. The 23d the miners, ſupported by a lieutenant and twelve grenadiers, were at work to pierce through a traverſe croſs the gallery they had diſcovered; but the enemy threw in a great quantity of ſtraw, hemp, and powder, which being ſet on fire, occaſioned ſuch a ſmoke, that the officer and eight grenadiers were ſtifled. All this while the miners of the beſiegers frequently met with thoſe of the enemy, and engaged them with piſtol and bayonet. On the 26th the enemy ſprung a mine, which killed above four hundred of the confederate troops, who, notwithſtanding that loſs, and the great fire of the beſieged, lodged themſelves that night near the palliſadoes at general Schuylemburgh's attack. On the 29th Monſieur Du Mey, the chief director of the attacks, was mortally wounded. That day and the next the beſiegers made a fierce fire upon the citadel, and threw abundance of bombs, which did great execution.

On the 30th, at ſix in the morning, the enemy beat a parley, deſiring to capitulate; and, hoſtages being exchanged, Monſieur Dolet and the marquis de Ravignan, both major generals, and four other officers came out of the citadel; and major general Hondorff, with five officers more on the beſiegers ſide, were ſent in. Dolet, and his company were brought to the earl of Albemarle's houſe, where the duke of Marlborough and prince Eugene were met to receive their propoſals. They offered to ſurrender the place, and delivered a project of a capitulation, conſiſting of eleven articles, the chief whereof were: "That the chapel ſhould not be made uſe of for the exerciſe of any other religion but the Roman catholic, upon any pretext whatſoever: That they ſhould have twelve pieces of cannon and ſix mortars, with ammunition for twenty charges, and horſes and waggons, and other neceſſaries for that purpoſe, to be furniſhed by the beſiegers: That the garriſon ſhould march out, drums beating, and colours flying, with the other uſual marks of honour: That they ſhould have four covered waggons; and that the priſoners ſhould be returned on either ſide, and no deſerters ſtopped."

Dolet and the other French hoſtages having made theſe offers, they were told by the duke of Marlborough and prince Eugene, that they could not allow of any other conditions, but that the garriſon ſhould ſurrender themſelves priſoners of war. Upon this they returned into the citadel; and, about three o'clock in the afternoon, the hoſtilities were renewed. The confederate generals inſiſted upon having the garriſon made priſoners of war, as well for the honour of the arms of the allies, as in return for the king's having refuſed to agree to the former capitulation, which was declared to the French officers. Beſides, during the ceſſation, the allies had confirmed accounts, that the enemy owned they were obliged to ſurrender for want of proviſions; which they did in leſs than three days, upon the following conditions: "That all the officers and ſoldiers ſhould retain only their ſwords and baggage, and, leaving their colours and arms behind, were permitted to return to France, upon condition that they ſhould not ſerve, until they were actually exchanged againſt the like number of officers and ſoldiers of the allies; and thoſe taken at Warneton were immediately to be ſent back as part of that exchange." After this conqueſt, the duke of Marlborough and prince Eugene reſolved to leave nothing unattempted, that might tend to the improvement of their late ſucceſſes; and therefore concerted the neceſſary meaſures for beſieging of Mons. The army, on the 3d of September, paſſed the Scheld, and encamped the next day at Breffeul, the hereditary prince of Heſſe-Caſſel (who was detached the day before with four thouſand foot and ſixty ſquadrons) encamping at ſome diſtance. The 5th, the troops continued their march, notwithſtanding a violent rain. The prince of Heſſe paſſed the Haiſne in the afternoon, and the grand army encamped at Siraui, within a league of that river. The 6th in the morning, the army was again in motion; and, in the march, the duke of Marlborough received advice, that, the prince of Heſſe having made the diſpoſitions for attacking the French lines from the Haiſne to the Sambre, three regiments of dragoons had abandoned the ſame. The French deſigned to defend thoſe lines; for the chevalier de Luxemburg, with a great detachment arrived ſoon after to ſuſtain the regiments of dragoons, and was followed by marſhal Villars in perſon. But, ſeeing that their troops had quitted their poſt, they marched back to Quievrain, whither the whole French army marched from their lines behind the Scarpe. On the other hand, the prince of Heſſe having taken poſſeſſion of the other lines already mentioned, encamped with his right at Jenappe, and his left to Tremiers, whereby Mons was in a manner blocked up, and the army under the duke of Marlborough encamped at Havre, and that under prince Eugene, at St. Denis.

On the 7th of September Boufflers arrived in the French camp, and joined Villars. The ſame day the duke of Marlborough received advice, about noon, that the French were marching to attack the body under the command of the prince of Heſſe. Whereupon, orders were given to the army to decamp from Havre, and leave their baggage behind, and their tents ſtanding. The army having made a halt on the hills of Belian (where the prince of Heſſe had his quarters) the generals received farther intelligence, that the French had not paſſed the defiles of Waſſne, but were encamped near Quievrain; whereupon the confederate army continued in the camp the following night, but in order of battle. The duke of Marlborough being informed, that the garriſon of Mons conſiſted only of nine weak Spaniſh, and two Bavarian battalions, beſides the dragoons of Paſteur, conjectured, that Villars's chief deſign was to oblige the confederates to draw all their forces into the plain between Belian and Tremiers, that he might have an opportunity to throw reinforcements into Mons: To prevent which, the duke ſent ſome troops towards St. Guiſlain. The 8th, prince Eugene and the duke ſpent the whole day in viewing the ground between the two armies; and, the 9th in the morning, the French made a motion, as if they would march towards Boſſu, but, the duke of Marlborough being advanced with ſome other generals to take a narrow view of their army, they ſoon perceived, that the motion of their left was only a feint to cover the march of their right, which filed off at the ſame time. The duke, being unwilling to loſe a moment, ordered his army to march by his left; by which motion the two armies came ſo near, a little after two, that they cannonaded each other till the evening. They continued all the night in the ſame ſituation; the French being poſted behind the woods of la Merte and Taiſniere, near Malplacquet, where they intrenched themſelves the 10th. And the confederate troops lay with their right near Sart and Bleron, and the left on the edge of the wood of Lagniere, the head quarters being near the centre of Blaregnies.

The duke of Marlborough, prince Eugene, and the prince royal of Pruſſia paſſed the night with Monſieur Goſlinga, that they might be ready if the enemy ſhould make any attempt. But though they were much ſuperior in number, and more eſpecially in infantry, yet they were ſo far from deſigning to attack the allies, that on the contrary, they begun to fortify their camp (though it was by nature very ſtrong and advantageous) with all the induſtry and application imaginable. Beſides the thick hedges, which, like a chain, ran along their whole camp, they made deep lines to cover their foot; and, on the right, caſt up three intrenchments one behind the other, though the acceſs was otherwiſe very difficult, becauſe of a marſhy ground, which lay before them. Their centre, which was in a little plain, was likewiſe ſecured by ſeveral intrenchments, defended in convenient places with good artillery; and beſides all this, they cut down a great number of trees, which they laid acroſs the ways, to obſtruct the paſſage of the confederate horſe. They alſo cut down the hedges behind their lines, for the more eaſy march of their cavalry to ſupport their infantry as occaſion might require; ſo that their camp might not be very improperly called a regular fortified citadel.

Prince Eugene and the duke of Marlborough, who had in concert with Monſieur Goſlinga, taken the reſolution to attack the French, finding on the 10th, that they had made uſe of the preceding night to improve the advantage of their ſituation, reſolved only, without altering their deſign, to put off the execution of it, till they were reinforced by eighteen battalions, which had been employed in the ſiege of Tournay. To theſe orders were immediately diſpatched that they ſhould march with all poſſible expedition to join the grand army; which they did that very night under the command of count Lottum and baron Schuylemburgh. The ſame evening alſo a detachment from the blockade from Mons, under the command of lieutenant general Dedem, took St. Guiſlain ſword in hand, and made the garriſon, which conſiſted of two hundred men, priſoners of war.

The troops, that came from Tournay, having, on the 11th of September, on the morning, joined the right wing, over againſt the wood by Start, where the enemy's left was poſted, prince Eugene, the duke of Marlborough, and the field-deputies, rode together along the lines between the two armies, and ſeveral men were in their preſence killed by the enemy's cannon.

The confederates had begun to work on their batteries at break of day. They raiſed one of the twenty-eight pieces of cannon on the left, another of forty in the centre, and the reſt of the artilley was diſtributed on the right. A very thick fog, which laſted till half an hour paſt ſeven, had very much facilitated their work; but then it cleared up, and gave the two armies a perfect view of each other.

This being the poſture of the French and confederate forces, a little after eight o'clock, the ſignal for the attack being given by a diſcharge of fifty pieces of cannon, and the cannonading continuing very briſk on both ſides, prince Eugene advanced with his right into the wood of Sart, and eighty-ſix battalions of that wing, commanded by general Schuylemburgh, the duke of Argyle, and other generals, and twenty-two other battalions, under the command of count Lottum, attacked the enemy with ſuch bravery, that, notwithſtanding the barricadoes of felled trees, and other impediments they met in their way, after an hour's reſiſtance, they drove the French out of their intrenchments in the woods of Sart and Traiſniere. The deſign of the attack was to drive the enemy out of the wood, and then to attack them in the flank of their intrenchments on the plain; which ſucceeded, and all the enemy's infantry of the left wing were ruined. General Withers, with ninteen battalions, attacked the enemy in another intrenchment beyond the woods of Taiſniere and Great Lagniere with the like vigour and good ſucceſs. Thirty-ſix Dutch battalions, commanded by the prince of Naſſau Friſeland (or Orange) and baron Fagel, who attacked the enemy's right, poſted in the wood of La Merte, and in that opening covered with three intrenchments, met with greater reſiſtance, and loſt abundance of men before they could penetrate into the intrenchments. The fight was here deſperate; but the Dutch ſoon drove the enemy from off their advantageous ground into their intrenchments, taking their colours. They likewiſe drove them out of their firſt intrenchment; but, as they were marching on to the ſecond, they were charged, with great vivacity by the enemy, and obliged to retire to their former poſts. The duke of Marlborough then ordered Withers to march with the body under his immediate direction to ſuſtain them; but upon notice, that Withers was actually engaged with the enemy, and that all things went well on the right, the duke thought fit rather to preſs the advantages there, than to hazard a new motion towards the left in the heat of the action. As ſoon as the enemy's left went to retire and draw off their cannon, the duke of Marlborough commanded the earl of Orkney, with fifteen battalions to attack them, and force them from their intrenchments in the plain between the woods of Sart and Janſart, with directions, if he ſucceeded, to poſt himſelf there, and cover the horſe, as they ſhould file off through the woods into the plain, in order to charge the enemy's cavalry, which were there drawn up. This was executed with ſuch reſolution and ſucceſs, that, after a ſhort diſpute, the enemy quitted thoſe intrenchments, which gave the horſe an opportunity to enter them. And though the firſt ſquadrons, led by the prince of Heſſe, had great difficulty to form themſelves, and were put into ſome diſorder by the French king's houſhold troops; yet being immediately rallied by the duke of Marlborough, and ſeconded by the ſquadrons of prince Eugene's army, they advanced together into the plain. Being there covered by their own foot, and having formed themſelves into very good order, they charged the enemy's cavalry, who being ſoon broke and defeated, their whole army fell into diſorder, and retired towards the plains of Bavay, leaving ſome of the cannon behind them. The allies made a good uſe of the beginning of the victory, and all the troops moved on with freſh reſolution. General Vink having, with the horſe, ſurrounded ſeveral battalions of the enemy's right, ſummoned them to ſurrender themſelves priſoners of war; but the French, being covered by a moraſs, made their retreat along the edge of a wood: Three regiments of Daniſh cavalry, falling at the ſame time on the enemy, made a terrible ſlaughter among them, till, having gained a ſecond wood, they found means to eſcape. Eighteen ſquadrons, being detached to endeavour to diſperſe them in their retreat towards Quievrain, met their whole left wing on this ſide the little river, Quaiſnau, conſiſting of about an hundred ſquadrons, commanded by Boufflers in perſon; and perceiving only at firſt the enemy's rear, poſted at the corner of a wood, the dragoons made up to them, and drove them without reſiſtance; but colonel Lippe and a cornet, advaneing too far, were taken, without being perceived by their own men. The wood being forced, the eighteen ſquadrons advanced into the plain; but perceiving before them the enemy's whole left wing in three columns, one of which retreated in good order, the other two in ſome confuſion, they made a ſhort halt, and were ſomewhat ſurprized to ſee the enemy face about, and draw up in order of battle. However, this ſmall body of the confederate horſe kept their ground, and poſted themſelves upon an eminence, with the wood of Elonge on their right, expecting to be attacked; but they immediately perceived, that the enemy made a ſtand, with no other deſign than to paſs a rivulet, that was in their way to a defile, leading them to Bavay, which they gained, before the allies, who purſued them full gallop, could come up with them. However, the allies followed the chace as far as the village of Quievrain, where the French had a brigade of foot, who obliged them to ſlacken their pace. Upon which they thought fit to give over the purſuit, and the enemy marched unmoleſted to Bavay. The reſt of their broken army retired in great confuſion, ſome to Maubeuge and Valenciennes, and others to Conde, leaving the allies in poſſeſſion of the field of battle, ſixteen of their cannon, twenty colours, twenty-ſix ſtandards, and other indiſputable marks of a victory; not to mention a great number of priſoners. Some of theſe were taken in the action, others in the purſuit, and the far greater number the next morning in Bavay, and other neighbouring places, either wearineſs or wounds not permitting them to follow the groſs of their army; which, having that night paſſed the rivulet of Renelle, incamped with their right at Queſnoy, extending their left towards Valenciennes.

The confederate generals, upon viewing, after the battle, the advantageous poſts, from whence they had driven the enemy, were themſelves aſtoniſhed to ſee what difficulties they had ſurmounted. And indeed all the troops, as well officers as ſoldiers, ſhewed as great reſolution, bravery, and firmneſs in this obſtinate action, as ever was known. The enemy, whether encouraged by their intrenchments, or animated by the ſhame of their former defeats, fought with a bravery beyond what was expected from them, from half an hour paſt eight in the morning, till half an hour paſt two in the afternoon. They were, however, at length, forced to yield to the ſuperior courage of the allies, whoſe generals, the duke of Marlborough, prince Eugene, count Tilly, and the prince of Naſſau, were, during the whole fight continually at the head of their troops in the hotteſt of the fire. And Monſieur Goſlinga, one of the field-deputies of the ſtates, was not wanting to animate the ſoldiers by his example. Great numbers fell in this bloody action; and the allies owned, that they had above eighteen thouſand killed or wounded[h]. Amongſt the ſlain were ſeveral officers of diſtinction, particularly general count Lottum, general Tettau, of the Pruſſians; count Oxenſtiern, lieutenant general; the lord Tullibardine, eldeſt ſon of the duke of Athol, and colonel of a regiment of foot in the ſervice of the ſtates. Among the wounded were prince Eugene of Savoy ſlightly on the head, as was alſo brigadier May on the ſame place; lieutenant generals Spar, Wakerbaert, and Hamilton, and the firſt mortally; brigadier Cronſtrom, count Oxenſtiern's adjutant, dangerouſly; and Monſieur Duyts, adjutant to the prince of Orange. His highneſs himſelf had two horſes killed under him, but eſcaped unhurt; as did alſo the duke of Argyle, though he received ſeveral muſket-ſhots through his clothes and perriwig. Brigadier Lalo, a French refugee, in great favour and eſteem with the generals; ſir Thomas Pendergaſt, colonel of a regiment of foot; colonel Rivett, of the guards; colonel Cranſtone, lieutenant colonel Arundel, and lieutenant colonel Bethel, were alſo reckoned among the ſlain; lieutenant general Webb, in the beginning of the action, received a very dangerous wound by a muſket-ball, that lodged itſelf near the groin; lieutenant colonel Ramſey, major Laſhley, and major Row died of their wounds; but lieutenant colonel Farmer, major Chivers, and ſeveral others of inferior rank, ſurvived theirs.

The French were very induſtrious in leſſening and concealing their loſs from the public. But ſome private accounts from their army owned, that they had about five hundred and forty officers killed on the ſpot, and one thouſand and ſixty-eight wounded, beſides three hundred and one taken priſoners; and the number of their private men killed, wounded, or taken, was modeſtly computed at fifteen thouſand [i].

This was the moſt deſperate and bloody attack, that had been fought in the memory of man; and both our generals were very much blamed for throwing away ſo many brave mens lives, when there was no occaſion. It was the only raſh thing the duke of Marlborough was ever guilty of, who, it was generally believed, was preſſed to it by prince Eugene [k].

The action being over, the confederate army was ordered

[h] In the army of prince EUGENE.

	Killed.	Wounded.
Imperialiſts,	190	328
Danes,	534	750
Saxons,	196	510
Palatines,	86	273
Dutch,	711	888
Heſſians,	135	392
Wirtemberghers,	132	290
Total	1984	3431

In the duke of MARLBOROUGH's army.

	Killed.	Wounded.
Britiſh,	575	1281
Pruſſians,	309	894
Hanoverians,	298	1119
Dutch,	2381	6081
Total	3563	9375
Total of both armies	5547	12806

[i] Among their ſlain were Meſſieurs de Courſillon, de Chemerault, Palavicini, de Lautree, de Greberges, de Moret, and Sheldon, lieutenant generals; count de Beuil, Meſſieurs de Rouleau, de Rochebonne, and de Tournefort, major generals; count d'Ageunes, Meſſieurs de Coaſquin and de Stekenburg, brigadiers; the duke de St. Agnan, and Meſſieurs de Schawefiein, de Salis, de Seignelay, the chevalier de Croy, de Teleconde, de Molezum, Fitzgerald, de Barentin, St. Laurent, and the duke of Charoſt. Amongſt the wounded was the marſhal de Villars himſelf, who, in the heat of the battle receiving a ſhot in the knee, was obliged to leave the command of the French army to Marſhal de Boufflers; the duke of Guiche, the chevalier de St. Toris; Meſſieurs de Conſlan, de Beaufremont, de Savigne, de Craufat, de Mornefiers, de Opeide, de Refuge, d'Albergotti, the princes de Lambeſſe and de Montbaſon, Meſſieurs de Brillac, de Tournemine, de Renty, de Berville, d'Autel, and de St. Hilaire.

[k] Biſhop Burnet obſerves, That military men have always talked of this, as the ſharpeſt action in the whole war, not without reflecting on the generals for beginning ſo deſperate an attempt. The French thought it a ſort of victory, that they had animated their men to fight ſo well behind the intrenchments, and to repulſe our men ſo often, and with ſo great loſs. They retired to Valenciennes, and ſecured themſelves by caſting up ſtrong lines, while they left our army to carry on the ſiege of Mons, without giving them the leaſt diſturbance. Monſieur Rouſſet's remarks are as follow: 'In the opinion of the whole world (ſays he) our generals were guilty of an irreparable fault in not attacking on the 9th, but delaying it, in expectation of ſix and twenty battalions, and ſome ſquadrons; while, by giving the enemy time to intrench themſelves (which was what we had infallibly to expect from a general ſo accuſtomed to it as the marſhal de Villars) we weakened ourſelves, in proportion as the enemy grew more formidable. Beſides, we thereby gave him all the time he could wiſh to penetrate into our diſpoſition, to recal ſeveral detachments, which did not join him till the 10th, and in ſhort to render all thoſe places impenetrable, through which only our troops could break into the plains. In the council of war which was held the 9th, the deputies of the ſtates-general were of opinion, that the ſiege of Mons ſhould be immediately undertaken, without giving the enemy battle; but that, if they ſhould attack us, in that caſe, we ſhould retreat from them; and of this opinion were moſt of the generals. Prince Eugene and the duke of Marlborough were of opinion to attack the enemy, before they began the ſiege, and they brought over the deputies to be of the ſame mind; but then, as well they, as the duke of Marlborough, inſiſted, that the attack ought to be made immediately, not to give the marſhal de Villars time to fortify his camp. Prince Eugene was not, however, to be diſſuaded from the reſolution he had taken, to wait for the detachment from Tournay. A fatal delay, which occaſioned the ruin of the whole body of the Dutch infantry, which alone loſt near ten thouſand men, more than ſeven hundred of whom were officers, at the attack of the intrenchments.'

Monſieur Du Mont likewiſe ſays, 'That it was a misfortune to the allies, that they did not fight on the 9th, for then probably the victory would have been obtained with leſs loſs of blood. The enemy was then on the other ſide of the wood in the plain; there was room to come at them through the intervals. They had not time to intrench themſelves; and the advantage of the ground would have been pretty near equal.'

Father Daniel aſſerts, that the field of battle coſt the allies thirty thouſand men killed or wounded, while the loſs, which the French army ſuffered, was not two thirds of that number.

Dr. Hare, in his 'Second letter to a tory member upon the management of the war, p. 24, obſerves, That in this battle the enemy were ſo defeated, that they, who had hazarded a battle to prevent the ſiege of Mons, did not dare to venture any thing for the relief of it, towards which they did not make the leaſt ſtep, though the allies had neither river nor intrenchment to cover them.' He afterwards, p. 32, takes notice of a queſtion aſked by the author of a piece, intituled, Arlus and Odolphus, viz. If the bloody battle of Taniers or Malplacquet was ſo well concerted, as it might have been; and if there was an abſolute neceſſity to wait two days within ſight of the enemy for a few troops, that never engaged when they came, and give them ſo much time to throw up ſuch unequal fortreſſes before we attacked them? In anſwer to which Dr. Hare writes thus: 'I little thought to have ſeen the battle of Taniers inſtanced for a counter-ſtop deſigned to hinder the effect of our former ſucceſſes, when it was itſelf ſo great a one: But it ſhews the abſurdity of their cauſe, when victory itſelf is made a crime; and they attempt to prove a general's deſign to prolong the war, becauſe he has endeavoured to force the enemy to put an end to it by a new defeat. This is a ſtrange way of arguing indeed, peculiar to the cauſe, and its worthy defenders. It is a known ſaying, Victoriæ ratio non redditur: But, it ſeems, it now muſt be allowed. A general has been often called to give an account, how he came to loſe a battle; but to be accountable for winning one is ſomething new; and, if victories had not been ſo common, we ſhould hardly have been ſo difficult; we ſhould have underſtood the value of a to encamp a little beyond the field of battle; and, on the 12th of September, they returned to their camp at Belian. The ſame the day, the allies were employed in burying their dead; and, there having been a great number of French officers and ſoldiers left wounded in the field of battle, and in the adjacent villages, the duke of Marlborough ſignified to the marſhal Boufflers and, Villars that thoſe perſons might have leave to retire upon their parole, to return when they were cured; that he would ſend lieutenant Cadogan with two hundred horſe to Bavay, to make an agreement about that matter, with any general they would ſend with the like number of men. The enemy accepted this propoſal, and they ordered the chevalier de Luxemburg to meet general Cadogan at Bavay, in order to concert every thing for the relief of the wounded, and burying of the dead.

The French, being retired to Valenciennes, left the confederate generals at liberty to beſiege Mons[1], the capital of Hainault, and the place, for the preſervation of which the enemy had hazarded the late battle. In this city the elector of Bavaria had lately kept his fugitive court, and from thence the count Berghieck and the duke of Alva by order of king Philip their maſter, wrote a joint letter to the duke of Marlborough, to which the count added a note, importing, "That, if the queen of Great Britain, by means of his highneſs's good offices, ſhould think it for the intereſt of the nation to have regard to it, he was provided with powers from the king his maſter, to explain himſelf more particularly, to ſuch a perſon and in ſuch a place, as his highneſs would pleaſe to appoint." The duke of Marlborough did not think fit to have, at that time, any private conference with that miniſter; but, as the latter happened to be in Mons, when the allies inveſted the town, he was on the 21ſt of September, allowed to have an interview with his grace, who granted him paſſports for himſelf, and ſeveral ladies and perſons of diſtinction, who went out of the place. As ſoon as the train of artillery was brought from Bruſſels, the ſiege, under the command of the prince of Orange, was carried on with great vigour, though the ſeaſon was both cold and rainy. The out-works were carried with little reſiſtance, and Mons capitulated about the end of October. With the taking of Mons ended the campaign, both armies retiring into winter-quarters.

The confederate arms were not this year attended with the ſame ſucceſs every where as in Flanders. Little was expected on the Rhine. The Germans were ſo weak, ſo ill furniſhed, and ſo ill paid, that it was not eaſy for the court of Vienna to prevail on the elector of Brunſwick to undertake the command of the army there, yet he came at laſt; and, upon his coming, the French, who had paſſed the Rhine, thought it the ſafeſt for them to repaſs that river, and keep within their lines. The elector ſent count Merci with a conſiderable body of troops to paſs the Rhine, and break into Franche Comte; but, a detached body of the French, under the command of count de Borgh, lying in their way, there followed a very ſharp engagement on the 26th of Auguſt N S. Two thouſand men were reckoned to be killed on each ſide; but, though the loſs of men was thought equal, yet the deſign miſcarried, and the Germans were obliged to paſs the Rhine, and retire to Friburg. The Germans having paſſed through the territories of Baſil, in order to make their intended irruption into the territories of France, the French embaſſador in Swiſſerland expoſtulated with the diet of the cantons aſſembled at Baden, about the violation of their neutrality, and even threatened thoſe of Baſil with the effects of his maſter's reſentments. But the Helvetic body took ſuch effectual meaſures for the ſecurity of that canton and of their frontiers, that the French did not think this a proper juncture to increaſe the number of their enemies, and ſo contented themſelves with ſeizing upon the corn and revenues belonging to thoſe of Baſil and Alſatia.

The campaign in Piedmont and Dauphine fell alſo this year much ſhort of expectation. The duke of Savoy refuſing to go into the field, by reaſon the Imperial court ſtarted ſome difficulties about Vigevano and other dependencies on the Miſaneſe, which, by agreement, were made over to him. The court of Vienna inſiſted to have the controverſy adjuſted by commiſſaries: but this was oppoſed by the duke of Savoy, who pretended there was no need of ſuch a dilatory negociation to find out the literal ſenſe of the treaty concluded with him by the emperor; and made preſſing inſtances with the queen of Great Britain and the ſtates-general, who ſtood guarantees of that treaty for the punctual performance of it. The maritime powers conſidering with what firmneſs the duke had adhered to the grand alliance, eſpouſed his intereſt with warmth. But the emperor inſiſting on a reference to commiſſaries, the duke perſiſted in his reſolution not to go into the field, and left the command of the army to field-marſhal Thaun, who on the 7th of Auguſt, went from Turin to Suza, and made the neceſſary diſpoſitions to march over ſingle victory, and been thankful for it. But the number, it ſeems, has made us ſo nice, that we had rather not have them, if they are not juſt to our minds; if they are not of as much conſequence as Blenheim, or as cheap as Ramillies or Oudenard.' I would be glad to know, if ever any one French writer treated the battle of Landen with that contempt, that theſe gentlemen do that of Taniers; or thought the fighting it a crime in a general, becauſe it was dear bought, and had little other conſequence than the gaining what Arlus calls unprofitable honour. On the contrary, never victory was ſo much magnified, the tongues and pens of that nation were for many years full of nothing elſe; and yet thoſe, who were at that battle, will tell you, that the French did not only loſe as many as the confederates, but double or treble their number; and the allies recovered that defeat ſo ſoon, that in ſix weeks time they had a better army than before the battle; and all the uſe the French made of their victory was to take Charleroy, though the battle was fought in June; a conqueſt one may eaſily ſuppoſe they might have made without the purchaſe of ſo dear a victory, as they made thoſe of Mons and Namur, places of much more importance. Now let us ſee whether the victory of Taniers be on any account inferior to that of Landen. That it exceeded it in honour, Arlus himſelf allows; for he grants, 'That in all the wars of immemorial time, there never was a battle fought where mortal men gained ſuch immortal honour.' And, whether he will allow it or not, it is as certain, that it was more valuable alſo in its conſequence, and the advantage the common cauſe reaped from it; for Mons was evidently a greater conqueſt in itſelf, and of more uſe to us, when Brabant had no other cover, than Charleroy could be to them. Beſides Charleroy might have been had without Landen; but Mons could not have been had without Taniers; and, though that battle was not fought till the laſt of Auguſt, Mons had not been the only fruits of it, if the weather would have permitted the allies to keep the field longer; and the ſucceſs of the ſiege, was a plain diſcovery, that the loſs of the enemy was not only as great as that of the allies, but much greater. Why elſe ſhould they venture a battle to prevent the ſiege; and yet did not move a ſtep to diſturb it, when it was formed? Is not this a confeſſion, that they, who thought themſelves a match for our army before the battle, did not think ſo after it, though ſo many troops were employed and weakened in the ſiege? Did they not ſpend the time the allies were making the ſiege in throwing up lines, and drawing all the troops together, that poſſibly they could? And was not the duke of Berwick ſent for poſt from Dauphine, to join with marſhal Boufflers in the command of them? What, I would fain know, was all this for? Why ſuch ſtrong lines, ſo vaſt an army, ſo many generals, ſo much concern in the middle of October, when the ways were impaſſable, and the confederate army was entirely ruined by their victory? If their loſs was ſo unequal, as Arlus thinks it was, the French might have done what they would; they might not only have lain ſtill in great tranquillity, without any apprehenſion of being diſturbed by the allies, but might have advanced to them, given them battle, and not only ſaved Mons, but ruined their army, if they were ſo much ſuperior to them, as their writers would make the world believe. But, if we will allow the French to be better judges of theſe matters than our paper-politicians, the difference, that was made by the battle between the two armies, was to their diſadvantage entirely; and the impreſſion, which the loſs of that battle gave them, made them think themſelves never ſafe; as if neither weather, nor intrenchments, nor numbers, could effectually ſtop the progreſs of this victorious army; though weakened by three ſieges and a battle equal to three more. They ſhewed plainly by all their motions, they thought nothing impoſſible to ſuch an army, that could beat an hundred thouſand men, the beſt troops of France, through ſuch entrenchments, or, in the language of the learned Arlus, through ſuch unequal fortreſſes.' Dr. Hare, afterwards, p. 36, obſerves, 'That without this battle, the reſt of that campaign muſt have been ſpent without action, and perhaps this laſt [of 1710] alſo. For we could not have carried our arms into the Artois, while Brabant was ſo much expoſed, as it was before the taking of Mons, which would conſequently have thruſt the work of this year one campaign at leaſt backwarder. But, if the neceſſity, the glory, and advantage of this victory cannot keep off theſe examiners, you may be well aſſured it will bear examination. I have heard a good deal of it, and, by all I can find, there never was a battle, for which there was a more unanimous concurrence of all parties, than there was here. And the delay that happened, was not only to wait for a few troops, but for bread, which men, who had been continually marching for ſeven days together, were not very fit to fight without. Beſides, the troops they ſtayed for were not a few; and there was a great number of officers with them. And it is moſt ridiculous to fancy troops were not worth ſtaying for, becauſe they did not engage. At that rate all corps de reſerve are very fooliſh and unneceſſary things. Might there not have been occaſion for troops, becauſe there was not? Or is it no encouragement to men, that do engage, to know there are others ready to ſuſtain them upon occaſion? But it is endleſs to argue with the zeal or affected ignorance of theſe men. It is no great compliment to our generals to ſuppoſe they underſtand their buſineſs; and we ought always to preſume they concert their matters well, unleſs we are ſure of the contrary; which we may eaſily believe, neither theſe writers, nor their maſters, are in the caſe before us, ſince they were neither at the conſultations of the generals themſelves, nor pretend to any correſpondence with thoſe that were. And therefore to inſinuate, that they did not conſider things ſo maturely as they ſhould have done, is extreme impudence. Thoſe unequal fortreſſes indeed, which the enemy had thrown up, were, I have heard, more and greater than they were thought to be. Our generals knew they were entrenching, but neither believed ſo much work could have been done in ſo little time, nor that the fears of the enemy could make them think ſo much was neceſſary. But this ſerved only to make the victory more glorious. And, notwithſtanding all their fortreſſes, had the orders, which to prevent all miſtakes, were given in writing, been rightly executed, the price of it had been much cheaper than it was. But there is no need of entering farther into the particulars of this battle, to ſhew the folly and malice of this moſt profligate libeller, and the reſt of his companions.'

[1] Mons, a very large, fine, ſtrong, and rich city, of the Low-Countries, the marquiſate of the earldom of Hainault, in the county of Mons, or proper Hainault. It was taken in 1691, but ſurrendered to the Spaniards by the peace of Ryſwick, 1697. It ſtands on the river Troville, near Haiſne, twenty-ſeven miles ſouth-weſt from Bruſſels, thirty-three north-eaſt of Cambray, thirty ſeven weſt of Namur, thirty-nine ſouth of Ghent, forty-eight almoſt ſouth of Antwerp, forty-eight almoſt eaſt of Arras, ſixty-five almoſt weſt of Liege, one hundred and twenty north of Paris, and one hundred and twenty-eight almoſt ſouth of Amſterdam.

Mount Cenis. On the other hand, the duke of Berwick, who commanded the French army in Dauphine, had, by this time, cauſed ſtrong intrenchments to be caſt up to cover Briançon, the place moſt threatened by the confederates, and to defend ſome other important poſts. So all that count Thaun was able to do, was only to oblige the French to abandon their lines at St. Maurice, drive them from thoſe at Feſſons, defeat a ſmall body at Conflans, and make himſelf maſter of the inconſiderable town and caſtle of Anneci; after which, for want of proviſions, he was forced to repaſs the Alps, and march into Piedmont towards the end of September. The glory which the duke of Berwick gained in thus diappointing the deſigns of the allies, was the greater, as part of his troops were at that very time employed in ſuppreſſing, in the Vivarez, an inſurrection of the Camiſars, and other malcontents, who on the 19th of Auguſt, N. S. maintained a ſharp encounter with the French king's troops. But on the 23d of the ſame month, they were entirely defeated within ſome leagues of Vernoux, and about fifty of them taken priſoners, with their chief leader Abraham, who was broke alive upon the wheel; and twenty-three others hanged at ſeveral places, ſix or ſeven ſent to the gallies, and the reſt committed to priſon.

The moſt important thing relating to Italy this year, was, that the pope delayed acknowledging king Charles, by ſeveral pretended difficulties; his deſign being to ſtay and ſee the iſſue of the campaign; but when he was threatened towards the end of it, that, if it was not done, the Imperial army ſhould come and take up their winter-quarters in the eccleſiaſtical ſtate, he ſubmitted, and acknowledged him. He ſent alſo his nephew Albano, firſt to Vienna, and then to Poland; he furniſhed him with a magnificent retineu, and ſeemed to hope, that, by the ſervices he ſhould do to the papal intereſts there, he ſhould be preſſed to make him a cardinal, notwithſtanding the bull againſt Nepotiſm.

The Spaniſh and Portugueſe armies having taken the field towards the end of April, they ſoon came to an engagement; for, on the 7th of May, N. S. being both incamped on the Caya, and the Spaniards making a motion, with a deſign either to forage the adjacent country, or to inſult the confederates; the Portugueſe general, contrary to the earl of Galway's opinion, paſſed the river with all their horſe, moſt of the foot, and ſome field-pieces, which they fired with good execution on the enemy. The marſhal de Bay, who commanded the Spaniards, charged the Portugueſe horſe of the right wing, who immediately wheeled about, and fled, without firing a ſhot, which gave the Spaniards an opportunity of ſeizing the Portugueſe cannon. In order to recover theſe, and to favour the retreat of the body of foot, which had repulſed the enemy three times with great firmneſs and reſolution, the earl of Galway brought up himſelf Pearce's brigade, conſiſting of two Britiſh battalions of Barrymore and Stanwix, and one of the Spaniards lately raiſed. But theſe troops not being ſuſtained by the Portugueſe horſe of the left, who fled like thoſe of the right, they were intercepted, and obliged to ſurrender priſoners of war, and with them major general Sankey, the earl of Barrymore, brigadier Pearce, and the conde de ſan Juan, a Portugueſe general. The reſt of the Britiſh foot, under the command of the marquis de Montandre, performed wonders, and, with the Portugueſe infantry, made an orderly retreat, with the loſs of about an hundred and fifty men; ſo that, except the priſoners, and other marks of honour, the Spaniards had no reaſon to boaſt of their victory. The earl of Galway, who had a horſe ſhot under him, very narrowly eſcaped being taken; but having found means to get away from the enemy with major Bladen his ſecretary, and a few other officers, he rid about four or five miles, and at laſt reached the confederate army, which that night came to Aronches, and the next day encamped at Elvas. The marquis de Bay, having refreſhed his troops, advanced towards the confederates; but the earl of Galway took ſuch advantageous poſts along the Guadiana, that the Spaniards durſt not attempt, either to paſs that river, or beſiege Olivenza, into which place the Britiſh general found means to introduce ſupplies of proviſions; and, the heats coming on, both armies went into quarters of refreſhment; nor did any thing worth notice happen on that ſide in the autumn campaign. For the Spaniards apprehending, that our fleet might have a deſign upon ſome part of their ſouthern coaſt, were forced to draw their troops from the frontiers of Portugal to defend their own coaſt, though they had no diſturbance given them on that ſide.

The caſtle of Alicant had now been blocked up ever ſince the month of December 1708. The garriſon, conſiſting only of Hotham's and Syburg's regiments (which were not above half complete, when left there two years before) held out with great reſolution all the winter, notwithſtanding the ſeverity of the weather, the ſcarcity of proviſions, and the diſturbance they met with from the enemy's bombs. The Spaniards, finding all other means ineffectual to reduce that important fortreſs, reſolved at laſt to blow up the rock, on which the caſtle ſtands, by a great mine; the ſeveral chambers whereof being prepared, with incredible labour and induſtry, the chevalier d' Asfeldt cauſed fifteen hundred barrels of powder to be lodged in them, ſummoned colonel Syburg the governor to ſurrender; and, the better to determine him to it, gave him leave to ſend out two of his officers to ſee the condition of the mine. This was readily accepted. Asfeldt went himſelf with the officers to the mine, and told them he could not bear to let ſo many brave men periſh under the ruins of a place they had ſo gallantly defended, and gave them twenty-four hours to conſider it. But the governor being immoveable in his reſolution, the mine was ordered the next day to be fired, which the centinels, poſted on the ſide of the hill to give notice of it, perceiving, they made the appointed ſignal. Upon which the governor, with ſeveral officers, walked to the parade, and ordered the guard to retire; which was no ſooner done, but the mine was blown up, and with little or no noiſe made an opening in the rock on the very parade, of ſome yards in length, and about three feet wide, into which the governor, lieutenant colonel Thornicroft, major Vignoles, and other officers fell, and the opening inſtantly cloſing upon them, they all periſhed, though their bodies were not entirely ſunk in. Notwithſtanding this accident, lieutenant colonel d' Albon of Syburg's regiment, being the ſurviving commander, reſolved to hold out as long as he had any proviſions; and, to make theſe laſt the longer, he reduced his men to half allowance. By this time king Charles being informed, that the garriſon was reduced to great extremities, a council of war was held at Barcelona, to conſider of the moſt proper means to relieve that place, the reſult whereof was, that lieutenant general Stanhope ſhould embark for Port Mahon, to confer with ſir George Byng on that ſubject. The general, being returned the 12th of March, N. S. to Barcelona, embarked again, on the 18th, on board ſir Edward Whitaker, who was arrived there with three thouſand five hundred men from Naples. Theſe troops were ordered upon this expedition; and then, ſailing for Port Mahon, they took there on board four hundred men more; and, on the 11th of April, ſailed for Alicant. But, a ſtrong eaſterly wind forcing them to anchor in the bay of Denia, the enemy ſuſpected their deſign, and made the neceſſary preparations to prevent its execution. On the 15th the fleet arrived in ſight of Alicant; but the weather continuing ſo tempeſtuous, that the ſhips could not come near the ſhore; and beſides, don Pedro de Ronquillo had by that time aſſembled ſeven thouſand men, caſt up intrenchments, and erected batteries, to oppoſe the landing of the confederate troops. However, ſome men of war were ordered to get as near the ſhore as poſſible, and fire upon the enemy's intrenchments, which they did with ſome execution, but were much annoyed by the enemy's batteries. The general and admirals, ſeeing the impoſſibility of relieving the caſtle, reſolved, in a council of war, to endeavour to ſave ſo brave a garriſon from being made priſoners of war; and accordingly general Stanhope ſent a boat on ſhore with a flag of truce, and an officer, with a letter for don Pedro de Ronquillo, offering to ſurrender the caſtle of Alicant upon honourable terms. This propoſal being accepted, ſeveral articles were demanded, and moſt of them granted. Purſuant to the capitulation, the garriſon marched out, on the 18th of April, with two pieces of cannon, and all other marks of honour, embarked on board the fleet, and were landed in Minorca to refreſh themſelves.

General Stanhope having laid a deſign to ſurprize Cadiz, either by means of a ſecret correſpondence he had in the place, or merely upon the encouragement of the weakneſs of the garriſon, concerted meaſures for that purpoſe with ſir George Byng, on board whoſe ſquadron he embarked at Port Mahon with two regiments of foot; and, about the middle of Auguſt, ſailed for Gibraltar. Here he expected to be joined by the forces, which, about the ſame time, embarked at Portſmouth on board a ſquadron, commanded by rear-admiral Baker, conſiſting of one battalion of Scots guards, the regiments of foot of the lord Tyrawley, brigadier Whetham, colonel Gore, colonel Boles, colonel Capel, colonel Munden, colonel Dormer, and the earl of Rochford's dragoons. But this ſquadron being long detained on the coaſt of England by contrary winds, ſo that they did not make the coaſt of Portugal till the beginning of October, the Spaniards, in the mean time, being apprehenſive of general Stanhope's deſign, made detachments from Eſtremadura for the ſecurity of the coaſt of Andaluſia; and the ſeaſon being too far advanced to undertake any thing on that ſide, that general returned to Port Mahon, thence to Barcelona, and not long after ſailed for Italy, from whence he came over to England by the way of Germany and Holland. On the other hand, rear-admiral Baker having, on the 10th of October, ſent a man of war to Liſbon for orders, lord Galway gave him directions to ſail directly for Barcelona with the forces he had on board. The court of Portugal (who expected that theſe troops would have ſtaid in that kingdom) having expoſtulated with lord Galway about their being ſent to Catalonia, he took that opportunity to complain of the ill proviſion that was made for the ſubſiſtence and accommodation of the Britiſh regiments in Portugal; and ſaid, that nevertheleſs, her Britannic majeſty would take care to recruit theſe forces, and, if the court of Portugal would be as diligent in raiſing the men for ſix regiments of dragoons in the pay of Great Britain (which levies were at laſt reſolved upon) the Portugueſe army would then be in a condition to act offenſively. He added, that the forces on board rear-admiral Baker would be of far greater ſervice in Catalonia, even with reſpect to Portugal itſelf, by giving a ſtrong diverſion to the enemy; which argument had certainly great weight in it; for the Portugueſe were ſenſible, that general Stanhope's bare coming to Gibraltar with two regiments, had occaſioned the weakening of the Spaniſh forces in Eſtremadura, and diſabled them from undertaking any thing on that ſide, in the autumn campaign.

The rejoicings made at the court of Madrid, upon the eaſy and inconſiderable victory gained by the marquis de Bay in Eſtremadura, and on the birth of a ſecond ſon to king Philip, were ſoon damped, both by the death of that young prince, and their misfortunes on the frontiers of Catalonia. For general Starember, after he received the reinforcements from Italy having paſſed the Segra without oppoſition, made himſelf maſter of Balaguer, and took nine hundred men priſoners; the marſhal de Bezons having refuſed to ſecond the conde d'Aguilar, who was for attacking the allies. Upon notice of theſe tranſactions, king Philip thought it neceſſary to leave Madrid, and go to the army. When he came there, Bezons juſtified himſelf, by producing the French king's orders for avoiding all engagements. King Philip ſeemed much mortified at this, and not thinking it adviſeable to attempt the attacking of Staremberg, in his advantageous poſt near Balaguer, returned to Madrid, where cardinal Portocarrero died ſome days before, to the great regret of that prince, and his partizans. Not long after, Staremberg, having put a ſtrong garriſon into Balaguer, and ſo both armies went into winter quarters.

This ſummer brought a cataſtrophe on the affairs of the king of Sweden. He reſolved to invade Muſcovy, and engaged himſelf ſo far in the Ukrain, that there was no poſſibility of his retreating, or of having reinforcements brought to him. He engaged a great body of Coſſacks to join him, who were eaſily drawn to revolt from the czar. He met with great misfortunes in the end of the former year; but nothing could divert him from his deſigns againſt Muſcovy. He paſſed the Nieper, and beſieged Pultoway. The czar marched to raiſe the ſiege, with an army much ſuperior to the Swedes; but the king of Sweden reſolved to venture on a battle, in which he received ſuch a total defeat, that he loſt his camp, his artillery, and baggage. A great part of his army got off, but being cloſely purſued by the Muſcovites, and having neither bread nor ammunition, they were all made priſoners of war. The king himſelf, with a ſmall number about him, paſſed the Neiper, and got into the Turkiſh dominions, and ſettled at Bender, a town in Moldavia. Upon this great reverſe of his affairs, king Auguſtus pretended, that the reſignation of the crown of Poland was extorted from him by force, and that it was not in his power to reſign the crown, by which he was tied to the republic of Poland without their conſent. He marched therefore into Poland, and Staniſlaus was not able to make any reſiſtance, but continued under the protection of the Swedes, waiting for another reverſe of fortune. A project was formed to engage the kings of Denmark and Pruſſia, with king Auguſtus and the czar, to attack the Swedes in ſo many different places, that the extravagant humour of their king was like now to draw a heavy ſtorm upon them, if England and the ſtates-general, with the court of Vienna, had not cruſhed all this, and entered into a guarranty, for preſerving the peace of the empire, and by conſequence of the Swediſh dominions in Germany.

Dantzick was at this time ſeverely viſited with a plague, which ſwept away almoſt one half of its inhabitants, though few of the better ſort died of the infection. This put their neighbours under great apprehenſions, who feared the ſpreading of the contagion; but it went no further[m].

The king of Denmark ſpent a great part of this ſummer in a very expenſive courſe of travelling through the courts of Germany and Italy; and it was believed, that he intended to go to Rome, where great preparations were making for giving him a ſplendid reception; for it was given out, that he intended to change his religion. But whether theſe reports were altogether groundleſs, or whether, being ſo commonly believed, was like to produce ſome diſorders in his own kingdom, is not certainly known; but thus much is certain, that he ſtopped at Florence, and went no farther, but returned home, and, upon the king of Sweden's misfortunes, entered into meaſures to attack Sweden with king Auguſtus, who had called a diet in Poland, in which he was acknowledged their king, and all things were ſettled there according to his wiſhes. The king of Denmark, upon his return home, ſent an army over the Sound to Schonen, about the middle of November, having firſt publiſhed a manifeſto, wherein he ſet forth his reaſons for declaring war againſt Sweden. Finding no reſiſtance at his landing at Helſingburg, he fixed there his head quarters; but, the cold ſeaſon not permitting him to undertake the ſiege of Landſcroon, he diſpoſed his troops into winter quarters, and on the 4th of December, N. S. returned to Copenhagen. Some time after, the Danes having taken the field, made ſome progreſs in Schonen; but the regency of Stockholm having, by this time, ſent a good body of troops into that province, the Swedes obliged the enemy to retire under the cannon of Helſingburg; where, on the 10th of March, N. S. 1709-10, they attacked them with ſo much bravery and fierceneſs, that the Danes were almoſt totally defeated; and, not being able to maintain themſelves at Helſingburg, abandoned that city on the night, between the 15th and 16th of that month, went on board their ſhips, and ſailed for Elſinore, leaving behind them their horſes, and ſome proviſion and baggage, which they had not either time or conveniencies to carry off.

The Swediſh army, that was in Poland, having got into Pomerania, the French ſtudied to engage them to fall into Saxony, to embroil the affairs of Germany, and, by that means oblige the neighbouring princes to recal the troops that were in her Britannic majeſty's ſervice, and that of the other allies in Flanders. But the queen and the ſtates-general interpoſed effectually in this matter; and the Swedes were ſo ſenſible, how much they might need their protection, that they acquieſced in the propoſitions that were made to them; by which means the peace of the northern parts of the empire was ſecured. A peace was likewiſe made up between the grand ſignior and the czar. The war in Hungary ſtill went on. The court of Vienna publiſhed ample relations of the great ſucceſſes they had there; but theſe were ſaid to be given out, to make the malcontents ſeem an inconſiderable and ruined party. There were ſecret negociations ſtill on foot, but without effect.

[m] Burnet ſays, this ſudden, and, as it ſeemed, total reverſe of all the deſigns of the king of Sweden, who had been for many years the terror of all his neighbours, made me write to Dr. Robinſon, who had lived above thirty years in that court, and is now biſhop of Briſtol, for a particular character of that king.

I ſhall ſet it down in his own words:

He is now in the twenty-eighth year of his age, tall and ſlender, ſtoops a little, and in his walking diſcovers, though in no great degree, the effect of breaking his thigh-bone about eight years ago: He is of a very vigorous and healthy conſtitution, takes a pleaſure in enduring the greateſt fatigues, and is little curious about his repoſe: His chief and almoſt only exerciſe has been riding, in which he has been extremely exceſſive. He uſually eats with a good appetite, eſpecially in the morning, which is the beſt of his three meals: He never drinks any thing but ſmall beer, and is not much concerned whether it be good or bad: He ſpeaks little, is very thoughtful, and is obſerved to mind nothing ſo much as his own affairs, laying his deſigns, and contriving the ways of acting, without communicating them to any, till they are to be put in execution: He holds few or no councils of war; and though in civil affairs his miniſters have leave to explain their thoughts, and are heard very patiently; yet he relies more on his own judgment than on theirs, and frequently falls on ſuch methods, as are fartheſt from their thoughts: ſo that both his miniſters and generals have had hitherto the glory of obedience, without either the praiſe or blame of having adviſed prudently or otherwiſe. The reaſon of his reſervedneſs in conſulting others may be thus accounted for; he came, at the age of fifteen, to ſucceed in an abſolute monarchy, and, by the forward zeal of the ſtates of the kingdom, was in a few months declared to be of age: There were thoſe about him, that magnified his underſtanding as much as his authority, and inſinuated, that he neither needed advice, nor could ſubmit his affairs to the deliberation of others, without ſome diminution of his own ſupreme power. Theſe impreſſions had not all their effect, till after the war was begun, in courſe of which he ſurmounted ſo many impoſſibilities (as thoſe about him thought them) that he came to have leſs value for their judgments, and more for his own, and at laſt to think nothing impoſſible. So it may be truly ſaid, that, under God, as well all his glorious ſucceſſes, as the late fatal reverſe of them, have been owing ſolely to his own conduct. As to his piety, it cannot be ſaid, but that the outward appearances have highly recommended it, only it is not very eaſy to account for the exceſs of his revenge againſt king Auguſtus, and ſome other inſtances; but he is not ſuſpected of any bodily indulgences. It is moſt certain, he has long wiſhed well to the allies, and not at all to France, which he never intended to ſerve by any ſteps he has made. We hear the Turks uſe him well; but time muſt ſhew what uſe they will make of him, and how he will get back into his own kingdom. If this misfortune does not quite ruin him, it may temper his fire, and then he may become one of the greateſt princes of the age.

Nothing of importance paſſed at ſea. The French ſent out no fleet; and our convoys were ſo well ordered, and ſo ſucceſsful, that the merchants made no complaints. Towards the end of the year, the earl of Pembroke, finding the care of the fleet a load too heavy for him to bear, deſired to lay it down. It was offered to the earl of Oxford; but though he was willing to ſerve at the head of a commiſſion, he refuſed to accept of it ſingly; ſo it was put in commiſſion, in which he was the firſt, the other commiſſioners being ſir John Leake, ſir George Byng, Mr. George Dodington, and Mr. Paul Methuen. The queen gave the earl of Pembroke a penſion of three thouſand pounds a year, payable out of the revenue of the poſt-office, in conſideration of his eminent ſervices[n].

As ſoon as the campaign in the Netherlands was ended, the French court thought fit to make new advances towards a negociation of peace. In order to which, ſignior Foſcarini, the Venetian embaſſador, who, about this time, came to Holland, took a turn incognito to Amſterdam, to ſound the Burgomaſters of that city. On the other hand, Monſieur Petkum, reſident of the duke of Holſtein, at the Hague, who had been ſecretly employed the laſt winter in the negociations there, kept up a correſpondence by letters with Monſieur de Torcy, to try, if an expedient could be found out for the 37th article in the preliminaries, the difficulty in that article being the only point, for which the conferences, in appearance at leaſt, were broke off. The point they offered to ſatisfy the allies in, was, that the French king ſhould not directly nor indirectly aſſiſt his grandſon king Philip; and, with regard to the expedient propoſed to ſecure this point, all went upon the ſame foot with that which Petkum had propoſed, as from himſelf, the day before Rouillé left the Hague. That three towns ſhould be put into the hands of the allies, to be reſtored to France, when the affairs of Spain, &c. ſhould be decided. The meaning of which ſeemed to be no other, than that France was willing to loſe three more towns, in caſe king Philip ſhould keep Spain and the Weſt-Indies. The places therefore ought to have borne ſome equality to that, for which they were to be given in pawn; but the anſwers, which the French made to every propoſition, ſhewed they meant nothing but to amuſe and diſtract the allies. The firſt demand made by the allies was of the places in Spain, then in hands of the French king; for the delivering up of theſe might have been a good ſtep to the reduction of the whole. But this was flatly refuſed; and that the king of France might put it out of his power to treat about it, he ordered his troops to be drawn out of all the ſtrong places in Spain, and ſoon after out of the kingdom, pretending that he was thereby evacuating it, though the French forces were kept ſtill in the neighbourhood. Thus a ſhew was made of leaving Spain to defend itſelf; and upon that king Philip prevailed on the Spaniards to make great efforts, beyond what was ever expected of them. This was done by the French king to deceive both the allies and his own ſubjects, who were calling loudly for a peace; and it likewiſe eaſed him of a great part of the charge, that Spain had put him to. But, while his troops were called out of that kingdom, as many deſerted, by a viſible connivance, as made up ſeveral battalions; and all the Walloon regiments, as being ſubjects of Spain, were ſent thither; ſo that king Philip was not weakened by the recalling the French troops; and by this means the places in Spain could not be any more demanded. The next demand, as moſt important towards the reduction of Spain, was that Bayonne and Perpignan might be put into the hands of the allies, with Thionville on the ſide of the empire. By the two former all communication betwixt France and Spain would be cut off, and the allies would be enabled to ſend forces thither with leſs expence and trouble. But it was ſaid, theſe were the keys of France which the king could not part with; and therefore it remained to treat of towns on the frontier of the Netherlands, and even there they excepted Arras, Doway, and Cambray; ſo that all the offers appeared illuſory, and the intercourſe by letters was for ſome time let fall[o]. After ſome time Torcy wrote to Petkum to deſire, ſince the point in diſpute could not be adjuſted by letters, that paſſes might be granted for ſome miniſters from France to come to Holland, and renew the conferences; or that Petkum might be permitted to go to France, to try if his preſence could help to find out an expedient, that had hitherto been in vain endeavoured by letters. The firſt the ſtates refuſed, till they knew preciſely what they were to come for, ſince, under the appearance of ſome good, the preſence of French miniſters in Holland gave them an opportunity to do a great deal of harm, by ſowing ſeeds of jealouſy among the allies, poiſoning the minds of the people againſt their governors, and retarding the great preparations for another campaign, which can never be puſhed with the vigour they ſhould, while the people are amuſed with the ſpecious appearances of an approaching peace: For ſo the French endeavoured to make it every where thought, when they meant nothing leſs. For theſe reaſons the ſtates refuſed to give paſſes for any miniſters to [n] Matthew Aylmer, eſq. was appointed admiral, and commander in chief of her majeſty's navy; the lord Durſley, vice admiral; and Charles Wager, eſq. rear admiral of the red; ſir John Jennings, admiral, and ſir Edward Whitaker, vice admiral of the white; ſir John Norris, admiral; and John Baker, eſq. vice admiral of the blue.

[o] Dr. Hare, in his fourth letter to a tory member, ſets forth this affair more at large: 'This, ſays he, was the nature of the expedient in agitation; and nothing can ſhew better the readineſs of the allies to put an end to the war, and the inſincerity of France, than what paſſed between them on this ſubject. The towns to be given up for this purpoſe muſt have been either in Spain, or on the borders of it, or on the ſide of Alſace, or in Flanders. Whatever could have been done of this kind, was but a poor expedient for an article of ſo much conſequence; and, had the king of France been in earneſt, one cannot think he would have made any difficulty to give the allies what they were willing to accept. But, as he meant nothing leſs than what he was ſo forward to promiſe, there was no ſecurity of this ſort the allies could aſk, which he did not think too much to grant.

As for towns in Spain, which was the beſt ſecurity, and moſt to the purpoſe, that expedient had been propoſed during the conferences at the Hague, and was by the French miniſters refuſed: And to prevent the allies from inſiſting in this demand, the kind ſoon after put it out of his power to comply with it; otherwiſe his people, as blind as they are, could not have had any great opinion of his ſincerity in the deſires he expreſſed for peace, while he rejected a condition, that was ſo natural for the allies to aſk; and not only poſſible, but eaſy for him to grant; and which the ſafety and intereſt of France, as diſtinct from Spain, were no way concerned in. That the negociations therefore might not continue to reſt upon this point, he took care immediately, that there ſhould be no room left for the allies to inſiſt on this demand; and to that end withdrew his troops out of all the Spaniſh fortreſſes, as he did afterwards out of the kingdom, upon pretence indeed of evacuating Spain, according to the preliminary articles. But that was only a pretence; for he kept them there all the ſummer, to be at hand to aſſiſt the duke of Anjou, in caſe his army ſhould be attacked, or an invaſion ſhould be made into Arragon; though otherwiſe the general, that commanded them, had orders not to venture a battle, but to be on the defenſive; as appeared upon the duke of Anjou's coming to his army upon the ſurprize of Balaguer by the allies, and expoſtulating with marſhal Bezons for not joining upon that occaſion the Spaniſh army; for which he juſtified himſelf by producing the king's orders. By this middle way, the king thought he could deceive the allies, without abandoning the Spaniards; and, in the mean time, the duke of Anjou, according to the direction of French councils, made his utmoſt efforts to put Spain into a condition to defend itſelf, as if they were in earneſt to expect no farther aſſiſtance from France; which had ſo good an effect on the Spaniards, that they exerted themſelves, beyond what could be expected of them. They compleated in a little time their old regiments, and raiſed beſides a great many new ones; and the moſt vigorous meaſures were taken to find money, and erect magazines, as if they were to ſtand for the future, on their own bottom, though the king of France was far from intending they ſhould want his aſſiſtance, when their affairs called for it. And that his grandſon might not want a general for his army, it was publicly talked at Paris, before Monſieur Rouille's return, that, in caſe of a peace, the duke of Berwick had deſired leave to reſign his baton of marſhal of France, that he might go and command in Spain: Which ſhews us, how the duke of Anjou might have officers as well as men from France, if he had any want of them. If therefore the king of France withdrew his troops, it was not with a deſign to leave his grandſon to himſelf, but upon very different views: It was to make the allies, and his own people believe he was ſincere, and that he was willing to remove, as far as he could, all the difficulties in the way of peace; and yet, at the ſame time, and by the ſame action, increaſe the difficulties he would ſeem to remove, by rendering by this means the moſt reaſonable demand of the allies impracticable: Beſides that he really wanted theſe troops himſelf againſt another year, the danger he was threatened with in Flanders obliging him to have a more numerous army on that ſide. This was all he meant by withdrawing his troops from Spain, and therefore he did not do it, till he had put the duke of Anjou's affairs upon a pretty good foot, and he was ſure there could be no immediate want of them, the campaign there being at an end. And, that this removal of his troops might be of the leaſt prejudice poſſible to his grandſon, he contrived, that as many of his own troops ſhould deſert as would make ſeven or eight battalions; and, to ſupply the place of the reſt as far as he could, he ſent his grandſon all the Walloon regiments from Flanders; from whence they began their march for Spain the beginning of February following, which was as ſoon as money, arms, and clothes could be provided for them. And not content with giving the duke of Anjou this aſſiſtance, and ſupplying him with great ſtores of ammunition, becauſe new raiſed troops could not be much depended on, he kept many of the troops he withdrew in Rouſſillon upon the borders of Spain, to be ready to return, when his grandſon's affairs ſhould make it neceſſary. And is not this very like the conduct of one, who means in earneſt to abandon Spain, and would reſtore it to the houſe of Auſtria, if he could? But poor man! he cannot do impoſſibilities. It is a pretty way to facilitate the reduction of a kingdom, to make it as difficult as poſſible; a great ſign of ſincerity to put things out of our power, which we cannot, without diſcovering our inſincerity, keep in it; and mighty reaſonable to create impoſſibilities, and then complain of them. Who can help believing ſuch a man, when he tells you, he would with all his heart, to procure a peace, give up the Spaniſh monarchy, if he could, but that he really cannot; and that this is the only hindrance? Or what pledge of his good will is there, one may not expect from him, as a caution, that he will not, directly or indirectly, hinder your doing what he cannot poſſibly himſelf do for you? To expect a valuable pledge from a man, to be returned to him when that is done, which he intends never ſhall be done, is a great jeſt. And therefore, ſince the French king has ſo plainly diſcovered his intention, you muſt not wonder he makes ſuch difficulties in ſettling an expedient, as you could not expect in a man, who means one word of what he ſays.

come frome from France, till they knew more of their intentions. But, to ſhew their readineſs to hearken to any reaſonable propoſal, they conſented, that Petkum ſhould go to France, which he did about the latter end of November.

While theſe negociations were carrying on by letters with France, king Philip did not only take all the proper meaſures he could to maintain himſelf in the monarchy, which his grandfather was, in appearance, treating to give up, but publiſhed a notable manifeſto, wherein he proteſted againſt all that ſhould be tranſacted at the Hague in his prejudice, as void and null, and declared his reſolution to adhere to his faithful Spaniards, as long as there was a man of them that would ſtand by him; and was ſo far from quitting Spain and the Indies to his competitor, that he would not conſent he ſhould have thoſe parts of the monarchy which he was then poſſeſſed of; and, in purſuance of this manifeſto, he named the duke of Alba and count Bergheyck for his plenipotentiaries, with orders to notify it to the maritime powers; which count Bergheyck did in a letter to the duke of Marlborough, dated from Mons, Aug. 21, with a copy of their inſtructions; and they ſent another, at the ſame time, to the deputy of the ſtates; which were accordingly tranſmitted to their principals. But no anſwer was thought fit, either by England or Holland, to be returned to them. And to admit plenipotentiaries from him now, would undo all that had been hitherto agreed on; and, inſtead of ſeeking for an expedient for the 37th article of the preliminaries, the whole of them would have been deſtroyed, and the treaty muſt have been begun entirely anew.

In count Bergheyck's letter there was alſo broad intimations, how grateful king Philip would be, if, by means of the duke of Marlborough's good offices, his juſt and reaſonable deſires might be complied with; and there was nothing he would not do to content England in general, or that might be to his ſatisfaction in particular. Torcy was likewiſe ſaid to write very unneceſſarily, and with great officiouſneſs, two or three very civil letters to the duke, till he found his civilities were loſt upon him. Petkum, after a ſtay at Paris, of about ten days, and ſeveral fruitleſs interviews with the marquis de Torcy, returned to the Hague, on the 7th of December, without having been able to make the leaſt progreſs in the buſineſs he went upon, or bringing ſo much as the pretence of an expedient along with him; but, inſtead of that, he brought the ſenſe of the French court, in a paper drawn up by Torcy, and importing in ſubſtance, "That it would be impoſſible for the king of France to execute the 37th article of the preliminaries, even though his majeſty could reſolve to ſign it. That the other articles were propoſed by the allies ſix months ſince, in order to prevent, by a ſuſpenſion of arms, the events of the campaign, which might change the diſpoſitions towards peace: And that reaſon now ceaſing, becauſe the winter ſeaſon naturally produced a ceſſation of arms, without any agreement in writing, that therefore, without farther mention of the preliminaries, the three winter months might be ſpent in treating and concluding a peace. That, though the form of the preliminaries were ſuppreſſed, yet the king of France would preſerve the ſubſtance, and treat on the foundation of the conditions, to which he had conſented, for the ſatisfaction of the emperor, England, and Holland, and their allies, though he had declared, that thoſe conditions ſhould be void, if they were not accepted during the negociation at the Hague. That his majeſty was ready to reſume the negociations on the ſame foot, and ſend his plenipotentiaries to ſuch a place as ſhould be agreed on, to begin the conferences with thoſe of the allies, on the firſt day of January. And, if this propoſal were accepted, the ſieur Petkum might forthwith return, for ſettling the paſſes, and other formalities, for the place and manner of meeting." The ſtates-general, having conſidered both the anſwer and the report of their deputies, came to the unanimous reſolution, "That the ſieur Petkum, who, at the deſire, and, upon the repeated inſtances of France, was permitted, with the conſent and knowledge of the high allies, to go for France, to ſee if any expedient could be found out, for removing the difficulties about the 37th article of the preliminaries, was, contrary to all expectation, returned, not only without bringing any ſuch expedient with him, but with an anſwer, in which France entirely receded from the foundations agreed to with common conſent, and with a propoſal to enter into a formal negociation of peace, without ſettling and adjuſting any thing beforehand; a propoſal in all times judged dangerous, and contrary to the declaration made on the part of France, 'That all the preliminary articles ſhould remain firm, as they were ſettled, only with ſuch alterations in the terms of the execution, which the courſe of time had rendered neceſſary, except only the 37th article.' That from this way of proceed-

The firſt and only good expedient, you ſee, is made impracticable, on purpoſe, that it may not be inſiſted on. The next beſt was to put into the hands of the allies ſome French towns on the frontier of Spain, ſuch as Bayonne and Perpignan, which would have enabled the allies to ſend forces to Spain with infinitely leſs expence and trouble, in a quarter of the time they can now; and, at the ſame time, have obliged the French pretty effectually to keep their promiſe not to aſſiſt the duke of Anjou, by cutting off in a great meaſure the communication between France and Spain. This was an expedient, which the king could not ſay it was not in his power to comply with. But, when one has not a mind to do a thing, nothing is ſo eaſy as to find out a reaſon for not doing it. If this could not be ſaid to be an impoſſible expedient, it was eaſy to pretend, that it did not ſuit either with the ſafety or dignity of France to put the keys of his kingdom into the hands of the allies, ſince he could not be ſure what uſe they might make of them, or when he ſhould get them again. And this was very right arguing for a man, who never intended that ſhould be done, which is made the condition on which the cautionary depoſits ſhall be reſtored. If the King does not deſign Spain ſhould be quitted by his grandſon, it muſt be owned it would not be very prudent in him to give the allies ſuch important places under the notion of cautionary towns, which muſt either defeat his deſign of ſupporting his grandſon; or, if that deſign ſucceed, could never of right be demanded back of them; not but that a prince of his known abilities would, we may be ſure, ſoon find a pretence to aſk for them, and that pretence he would juſtify, if not readily ſubmitted to, the ſame way he has ſo many others no leſs groundleſs, by force and arms, which with him have always been the meaſures of right and wrong. But if he were ſincere, if he really meant that Spain ſhould be reſtored, what inconvenience could there be in complying with this expedient? What ill uſe could the allies make of it? Could they, by the help of theſe towns, hurt France, before they had reduced Spain? Can it be imagined, that would not find them work enough? Or is there any room to fear an invaſion from Spain afterward? No, ſure; however ſignificant Spain may be in French hands, it will not in haſte be very formidable out of them. They would have themſelves too much buſineſs in looking to themſelves, to think of diſturbing ſo powerful a neighbour. And there would be a thouſand times more reaſon for them to be afraid of France, than for France to apprehend any thing from them. Nor can there be the leaſt pretence for a ſuſpicion, that the allies, if theſe towns were once in their hands, would never part with them, ſuppoſing the end anſwered for which they were intruſted with them; for, beſides that ſuch a breach of faith is without example on the ſide of the allies, they cannot, for the reaſons I gave you in my laſt, act a falſe part in this matter, if they would, eſpecially not on this ſide of France; where, if the allies had ever ſo much juſtice on their ſide, they could not long ſupport themſelves under the mighty diſadvantages with which they muſt make war on this frontier. But there is no need of ſaying more, to ſhew you how ridiculous it is to pretend any fear of the allies, if theſe towns ſhould be put into their hands. The ſupporting of Spain has coſt France too dear, not to know the low condition it is in; and that nothing could be greater madneſs in king Charles, or his allies, than not to ſit down quietly in peace the minute that kingdom is reduced to his obedience, without ſeeking for new pretences to continue the war needleſsly.

Nothing therefore can be thought to be the true reaſon, why the king of France rejected this expedient, but that he never intended the allies ſhould obtain the end, for which it was aſked, as you will ſee more plainly in what follows. On the ſide of Alſace nothing was propoſed, that I know of, but Thionville, a place of great conſequence to France, were they in any danger from the empire. But, conſidering the feeble low condition of that emaciated exhauſted body, one cannot but think the ſtrong places on that ſide are of no other uſe but to enable the French to invade the empire, and not to ſecure them againſt invaſions from it. And what ſhould be depoſited as a pledge, would be to be reſtored long before the empire could be in a condition to make any uſe of it, that would be either unjuſt in itſelf or troubleſome to France. But France never intending to fulfil the condition on which the town ſhould be reſtored, this propoſal was rejected upon the ſame pretence as the former.

Nothing now was left, but to ſeek for an expedient in Flanders, which was what the French offered from the firſt, and all along preſſed, as if they were very much in earneſt. But, had they been ſo, it is very hard to give a good reaſon, why an expedient ſhould be looked for here, rather than in any other part. The allies, though they were ſenſible whatever could be given on this ſide, was but a poor expedient at beſt; yet they were ſo ſincerely diſpoſed to put an end to the war, that they would not abſolutely reject it. Whatever towns France could put into the hands of the allies on this ſide, if they were not ſuch, as lie neareſt to thoſe, that are to be given up by the preliminaries, their tenure would be very precarious; and it would be very difficult to keep them, when France had a mind to have them again. This you may eaſily judge of by the impoſſibility the allies were under laſt campaign to make the ſiege of Arras, while they left Doway behind them; and the difficulty Ypres gave them in the ſiege of Aire. But if theſe cautionary towns were to be of thoſe that lie neareſt, they could not be of ſo much importance to France, as that they ſhould not be willing to part with them to keep Spain, ſince this would only be making a little farther addition to the barrier of the Netherlands; which would ſecure them from France. But, as bad an equivalent as this was at the beſt, the French refuſed to make it as good as they could, by excepting ſuch towns as were of moſt conſequence, ſuch as Douay, Arras and Cambray, which would lay them open to an invaſion from the allies; which, if the allies were able to make, they knew their own deſigns would give but too juſt a handle for; beſides, they were unwilling to part with, under the name of a caution, what they could not be willing to part with for good and all, ſince they intended to forfeit the condition, and not do themſelves, or rather not ſuffer that to be done, which would give them a right to aſk for it again.

This being the deſign of France, all theſe negociations by letters came to nothing; and one ſide would never offer what the other could accept, while the allies would be content with the name of an expedient inſtead of the thing, which they were before-hand ſure could by no means anſwer the end it was given for; which the allies were too wiſe to do.'

P Dr. Hare, in his 'fourth Letter to a Tory Member,' p. 19, obſerves, that 'this anſwer was ſhort even of their expectations, who hoped leaſt from it; for this overthrew all the preliminaries at once, while the king pretended to agree to all but one; and by promiſing to keep the ſubſtance of them, while they deſtroy the form, they effectually defeat all that had been done, and recover to themſelves an entire liberty to diſpute all points afreſh, and to lay hold of all the occaſions, which that would give them, to create diviſions and jealouſies between the ſtates and their allies; which is plainly the great ing, nothing could be expected, but that the enemy was not ſincerely diſpoſed to agree to a ſafe peace; and that little regard was to be had to the aſſurances of their good intentions, ſeeing the effects agreed ſo little with their profeſſions; but rather, that all was concerted and deſigned to ſow, if poſſible, diſtruſts and jealouſies between the allies and that ſtate, while the French were reſolved to continue the war. That therefore it was abſolutely neceſſary, that the allies in general, and every one of them in particular, ſhould, in an extraordinary manner, exert themſelves, and make early preparations for proſecuting with vigour, in the next campaign, the advantages obtained in the laſt. That a letter to that purpoſe ſhould be written to the emperor and diet of the empire at Ratiſbon; the confederated circles, the electors and princes of the empire, the queen of Great Britain, and the duke of Savoy. And that their Imperial and Britannic majeſties ſhould be deſired, that prince Eugene of Savoy, and the prince and duke of Marlborough, might come to the Hague very early in the ſpring, before the end of February, to concert the neceſſary meaſures for campaign." The queen of Great Britain not only returned a favourable anſwer to the letter of the ſtates-general, reſolved alſo to exhort all the allies to a vigorous proſecution of the war; and, in particular, wrote a very preſſing letter to the general diet of the empire.

About the time Petkum returned to the Hague, the French king wrote to king Philip, to acquaint him with what had paſſed, and to aſſure him, that though he was obliged to recal his troops, he need not be alarmed at it, for that he would never abandon him; and that he had ordered twelve regiments, that were then in Spain, to join the Spaniards, in caſe king Charles ſhould make an irruption into Arragon. And a little after Monſieur Ibbeville was ſent to Madrid; but both his journey and buſineſs were made ſo great a ſecret, that it was not for ſome time known whither he was gone; and when he came to Madrid, where he arrived on the 26th of December, his inſtructions were to communicate his buſineſs to nobody but the king himſelf. He did not make a long ſtay, nor was he in appearance well received; but no judgment could be made from thence what his errand was; there was no way to diſtinguiſh between what was real and what diſguiſe. But to judge from other ſteps, it is moſt reaſonable to think his buſineſs was to learn the ſtate in which king Philip's affairs were, and to give him his leſſon, how he ſhould manage in ſo nice a juncture; with aſſurances, that in ſpite of all appearances to the contrary, which the neceſſity of his affairs might oblige the French king to make, he would never deſert him, much leſs agree with the allies, upon any terms, to turn his arms againſt him. But this journey was made a great myſtery of, to make the allies believe, that the buſineſs of it was to perſuade king Philip to retire out of Spain, ſince it would be impoſſible for the French king to ſupport him any longer.

About the beginning of May happened an extraordinary event, which raiſed much diſcourſe and argument in England, namely, the coming over of the Palatines, Swabians, and other Germans, moſt of them Lutherans, being driven from their habitations, either by the oppreſſive exactions of the French, or the deſolation of their native country, occaſioned by the calamities of the war; ſo that, by the middle of June, they were increaſed to ſix thouſand five hundred and twenty men, women, and children; among whom were ſchoolmaſters, huſbandmen, vine-dreſſers, herdſmen, wheel-wrights, ſmiths, weavers, carpenters, maſons, bakers, coopers, brewers, and other handicrafts-men. It was never certainly known upon what motives, and with what views, theſe people were brought over; but it is certain, that, being come into Holland, with deſign to go for the Engliſh plantations in America, upon an invitation of ſome of their countrymen, who were reported to be there in a thriving condition, they were furniſhed with ſhipping to come over to England by Mr. d'Ayrelles, the Britiſh ſecretary at the Hague, by direction from thoſe in the adminiſtration. Being deſtitute of all neceſſaries, they muſt inevitably have periſhed, had not the queen firſt ordered a daily allowance to be diſtributed to them, and, at the ſame time, a ſufficient number of tents to be delivered out of the tower, for encamping on Black-Heath near Greenwich, and in a large field near Camberwell; and afterwards, upon the petition of the juſtices of peace for the county of Middleſex, granted a brief for the collection of charity money within that county; which brief was ſhortly after made to extend through the whole kingdom of Great Britain; and, at the ſame time, were appointed ſeveral perſons, in the moſt eminent ſtations, to be truſtees and commiſſioners, for receiving and diſpoſing of the monies ſo collected. The kind reception and entertainment which theſe diſtreſſed fugitives found here, having been reported abroad, encouraged many other Germans to leave their deſolate habitations, and to follow their countrymen, inſomuch that their numbers increaſed ſo faſt, that the ſecretary at the Hague was directed to put a ſtop to their coming over. As a conſiderable number of German Roman catholics had come along with the proteſtants, ſuch of them as did not voluntarily change their religion, were, at the queen's expence, ſent back to Holland, where ſhe ordered a ſum of money to be diſtributed to them, towards the charges of their journey home. As for the Palatines, who ſtaid behind in Great Britain, ſome were entertained in private families, ſome ſent to Ireland, others to Carolina, and the greateſt part to New-York, under the direction of commiſſary Du Pré, who ſailed with them for that country about the beginning of April 1710, together with colonel Hunter, governor of that country.

The earl of Wharton having been made lord lieutenant of Ireland, arrived there the 2d of April 1709. A fortnight after his landing, he opened a ſeſſion of parliament, and made a ſpeech to both houſes of parliament, part of which was as follows:

"My lords and gentlemen,

"I am obliged and directed to lay before you another conſideration of that infinite conſequence; and that is, to put you in mind of the great inequality there is, with reſpect to numbers, between the proteſtants and papiſts of this kingdom, and of the melancholy experience you have had of this ſort of men, whenever they had it in their power to diſtreſs or deſtroy you.

Theſe reflections muſt neceſſarily lead you to think of two things; the firſt is, ſeriouſly to conſider, whether any new bills are wanting to enforce or explain thoſe good laws, which you have already, for preventing the growth of popery. And, in the next place, it makes evident the neceſſity there is of inculcating and preſerving a good underſtanding amongſt all the proteſtants of this kingdom. What the moſt proper methods are to compleat ſo deſirable and neceſſary an end, yourſelves, who have the opportunities of knowing the uneaſineſs that any of your fellow ſubjects may lie under, are the fitteſt to judge.

I will only add, that the queen, who is all goodneſs, never had any thing ſo much at her royal heart, as the bringing to paſs, and perfecting the union of her ſubjects of Great Britain: and I may venture to ſay, that ſhe looks upon her ſucceſs in this great undertaking to equal, if not to exceed, any other of the glories of her reign."

In this ſpeech the lord Wharton recommended a good underſtanding between the churchmen and diſſenters, as the ſureſt means to weaken the popiſh intereſt, by ſtrengthening the proteſtant. The Iriſh papiſts doubted not, by dividing the proteſtants, to find an opportunity to deſtroy them. The lord Wharton was reſolved to let the papiſts know, at his firſt coming, they were to expect no favour from him. As popery had increaſed under the late adminiſtration, he procured a bill to prevent the growth of it, by enacting, "That the eſtates of the Iriſh papiſts ſhould deſcend to their proteſtant heirs." But his care to diſcourage popery did not hinder his being repreſented by the tories, in England, as a perſecutor of the church in Ireland. He had not only made Dr. Lambert dean of Downe, and Dr. Lloyd dean of Connor, but it was alſo reported, that he had ſent a biſhop to priſon. This matter great point they have all along aimed at; which though they have been ſo terribly diſappointed in, they are unwilling to give over, in hopes their conſtancy and firmneſs to the common cauſe would in time be wearied out, and yield to the importunate ſolicitations with which they tempted them.

Though to prevent a new campaign might be a reaſon for haſtening the preliminaries, it was not the only or chief deſign of them. Whenever a treaty ſhould commence, the allies had declared long before, in anſwer to the elector of Bavaria's letters at the end of the Ramilles campaign, they would not enter on it, till ſome fundamental points were firſt ſettled, the neceſſity of which they were convinced of by the dear-bought experience of former treaties: And the ſame experience has taught the allies, that no treaty with France can be effectual, if the fundamental articles are not executed as well as agreed on, before the general treaty is concluded; which ſecurity the marquis would entirely take away, by deferring the execution till after the ratification. Thus the two great ends of a preliminary treaty, which are to agree on ſome fundamental points, and ſecure the execution of them, are by this anſwer entirely deſtroyed; and the allies are not only where they were when that treaty was begun, but are really the worſe for it; it being of greater advantage to the French to know beforehand what are the particular demands, which the emperor and maritime powers inſiſt on for themſelves, and in behalf of the allies. As for ſolving all now by two words, form and ſubſtance, two other words, the letter and ſpirit of the partition-treaty, are ſtill too well remembered for the allies to be again deceived by the French diſtinctions, which, if they could now paſs upon them, it is eaſy to ſee, that the form of theſe articles would have been found to be the ſubſtance of them, and the pretended ſubſtance would have proved a ſhadow only. Here then Dutch bluntneſs and plain-dealing proved too hard for the fineſſe of the French; a word not more peculiar to them, than the thing meant by it.'

was thus: The houſe of peers having (on the 28th of June) adjourned to the next day, the feaſt of St. Peter and St. Paul, Dr. John Pooley, biſhop of Raphoe, took upon him to proteſt againſt it. His reaſon was, "Becauſe he conceived it againſt the laws of the church to do buſineſs upon a holiday, which might hinder divine ſervice, prayers and ſacraments, and catechiſms, leſt it ſhould be a robbery of God, as well as tythes and offerings." The lords, the next day, reſented this proteſt, and ſignified to the biſhop, that, unleſs he withdrew it, they muſt ſend him to the Caſtle. But he being obſtinate, and adhering to his proteſt, the houſe ordered him to be taken into the cuſtody of the Black Rod, and adjourning for a month, the uſher had him ſo long in durance, which, by the lord Wharton's direction, was made as eaſy to him, as was conſiſtent with the orders of the houſe.

The provoſt and fellows of Trinity College near Dublin, having lately expelled Edward Forbes for aſperſing the memory of king William, and they having ſhewn a ſteady adherence to the revolution, a motion was made in the houſe of commons for an addreſs to the lord lieutenant, that he would lay before the queen the deſire of the houſe, that five thouſand pounds might be given for erecting a public library in the college.

The commiſſioners appointed in England for the ſettletlement of the Palatines, having ſent into Ireland five hundred families of theſe refugees; the commons took their diſtreſſed condition into conſideration, and agreed, that the ſending a proportion of theſe Palatines into Ireland was a ſtrengthening the proteſtant intereſt, and the encouraging them to ſettle there would greatly contribute to the ſecurity of the kingdom, and therefore that the queen be addreſſed to allow five thouſand pounds annually for three years towards their ſupport and ſettlement, which ſhould be made good to her in the next aids granted by parliament.

The convocation of the clergy of Ireland ſat with the parliament, and by this time the ſame ill temper, that had prevailed in the Engliſh convocation, began to ferment and ſpread itſelf among the clergy of Ireland. None of the diſputes about the power of proroguing had been thought of formerly in that church, as they had no records or minutes of former convocations. The faction in England found out proper inſtruments, to ſet the ſame humour on foot, during the earl of Rocheſter's government, and, as was ſaid, by his directions: and, it being once raiſed, it continued by reaſon of the indolence of the ſucceeding governors. So that the clergy were making the ſame bold claim in Ireland, that had cauſed ſuch diſputes in England. Accordingly, on the 5th of Auguſt, the power of proroguing was by the lower houſe conteſted in a very high and warm debate. The lord lieutenant (who was reſolved to put a ſtop to theſe matters) being informed of it by Dr. Brown, chairman of the committee, ſent orders in the midſt of the debate to prorogue the convocation to the 5th of October next, to their great ſurprize and mortification. Dr. Brown, for giving this intelligence, was ſome time after, by the procurement of the lord Wharton, promoted to the ſee of Cork; yet upon the change of the miniſtry he became the moſt violent of all the Iriſh prelates againſt the earl of Wharton, the archbiſhop of Canterbury (who was his friend) and indeed againſt the whole whig party, to whom he rendered himſelf ſtill more noxious, by diſcountenancing the drinking 'to the glorious memory of king William.' Againſt which he wrote and preached ſome tracts and ſermons, but ſo little anſwering the purpoſe, that king William's memory was afterwards more frequently drunk than before, with an additional mark of contempt to the biſhop, and the ſacredneſs, which he weakly imagined to be tacked to commemoration-healths, became univerſally exploded.

When the bill to prevent the further growth of popery, with thoſe for the ſupply, were ready for the royal aſſent, the earl of Wharton came, on the 30th of Auguſt, to the houſe of Peers, and concluded the ſeſſion with a ſpeech to both houſes, in which were theſe paragraphs:

"My lords and gentlemen,

"I make no queſtion but that you underſtand too well the true intereſt of the proteſtant religion in this kingdom, not to endeavour to make all proteſtants as eaſy as you can to defend the whole againſt the common enemy.

It is not the law now paſt, nor any other law, that the wit of man can frame, will ſecure you from popery, whilſt you continue divided among yourſelves; it being demonſtrable, that unleſs there be a firm friendſhip and confidence among the proteſtants of this kingdom, it is impoſſible for you either to be happy or to be ſafe.

And I am directed to declare it to you, as her majeſty's fixed reſolution, that as her majeſty will always maintain and ſupport the church, as by law eſtabliſhed, ſo it is her royal will and intentions, that diſſenters ſhall not be perſecuted, or moleſted in the exerciſe of their religion."

The parliament being prorogued to the 13th of March, the lord lieutenant, attended by Mr. Addiſon ſecretary of ſtate, imbarked for England, where he arrived the 9th of September.

The great buſineſs of the ſeſſion of parliament this winter related to Dr. Sacheverel. This affair not only took up moſt of their time, but, in concluſion, had alſo great effects. As it was one of the moſt extraordinary tranſactions of the time, it will deſerve a particular notice. Dr. Sacheverel was a bold, inſolent man, with a very ſmall ſhare of religion, virtue, learning, or good ſenſe; but he reſolved to force himſelf into popularity and preferment by the moſt petulant railings at diſſenters, and low churchmen, in ſeveral ſermons and libels, penned without either chaſtneſs of ſtile, or livelineſs of expreſſion, and full of indecent and ſcurrilous language[q]. When he had purſued this method for ſeveral years without effect, he was at laſt brought up from the country by a popular election to St. Saviour's in Southwark, where he began to make great reflections on the miniſtry, repreſenting, that the church was in danger, being neglected by thoſe who governed, while they favoured her moſt inveterate enemies. At the ſummer aſſizes in Derby, where he preached before the judges, and this winter, on the 5th of November, at St. Paul's, he gave a full vent to his fury, in the moſt violent declamation that he could contrive, upon theſe words of St. Paul's, 'Perils among falſe brethren,' in which, after ſome ſhort reflections upon popery, he let himſelf looſe into ſuch indecencies, that both the man and the ſermon were univerſally condemned. He aſſerted the doctrine of non-reſiſtance in the higheſt ſtrain poſſible; and ſaid, that to charge the revolution with reſiſtance, was to caſt black and odious imputations on it; pretending, that the late king diſowned it, and cited for proof ſome words in his declaration, by which he vindicated himſelf from a deſign of conqueſt. He poured out much ſcorn and ſcurrility on the diſſenters, and reflected ſeverely on the toleration; and ſaid, the church was violently attacked by her enemies, and looſely defended by her pretended friends. He animated the people to ſtand up for the defence of the church, for which, he ſaid, he ſounded the trumpet, and deſired them to put on the whole armour of God. After the preaching of this ſermon, the lord Mayor, ſir Samuel Garrard, invited the doctor to dinner, took him in his coach, carried him to his houſe, gave him thanks for his good ſermon, and told him, that he hoped to ſee it in print. The doctor anſwered, 'that he was apprehenſive he had ſpoken ſome bold truths, which might diſpleaſe ſome people.' Notwithſtanding which, the lord mayor undertook to propoſe to the court of aldermen, that they ſhould return the doctor thanks for his ſermon, and deſire him to print it. But, though that motion was rejected by the court of aldermen, yet the doctor, looking upon the encouragement already given him by the lord mayor as a tacit command, ventured to publiſh his ſermon, with a dedication to his lordſhip. The party, who oppoſed the miniſtry, magnified this ſermon ſo highly, that, as was generally reckoned, forty thouſand of them were printed and diſperſed over the nation. The queen ſeemed highly offended at it, and the miniſtry looked on it as an attack upon them, that was not to be deſpiſed. The lord treaſure was ſo deſcribed, that it was next to the naming him. A parliamentary impeachment was reſolved on; but Eyre, then ſolicitor general, and others, thought the ſhort way of burning the ſermon, and keeping him in priſon during the ſeſſion of parliament, was the better method; but the more ſolemn method was unhappily choſen.

[q] He was grandſon of John Sacheverel, the preſbyterian miniſter of Wincaunton in Somerſetſhire, who was bred in St. John's college, Oxford, and ſilenced ſoon after the reſtoration. This John, being taken at a conventicle, ſuffered three years impriſonment, which occaſioned his death. John's eldeſt ſon (father of Dr. Henry Sacheverel) was bred in King's college, Cambridge, and entertained notions very oppoſite to his father's principles, and died miniſter of St. Peter's church in Marlborough, leaving a numerous family in very low circumſtances. His ſon Henry was put to ſchool at Marlborough at the charge of Edward Hearſt an apothecary, who, being his godfather, adopted him for his ſon. Hearſt's widow ſent him afterwards to Oxford, where he became fellow of Maudlin college. His mother, by procurement of biſhop Burnet, was admitted into the hoſpital for diſtreſſed widows at Saliſbury. He had not been long at Oxford, before he diſcovered his turbulent ſpirit. When he came to be ordained by biſhop Lloyd, he was by the biſhop charged with falſe Latin, but he confidently defended it, till the biſhop ſent for books to convince him. The biſhop, finding him very ignorant in divinity, refuſed to ordain him at that time, but did it afterwards on the biſhop of Oxford's recommendation, with particular marks of favour; yet he ungenerouſly traduced that learned prelate in a libel, called, 'The character of a Low Churchman.' Nor was he leſs virulent againſt biſhop Burnet, his mother's benefactor. Being preſented to a ſmall living in Staffordſhire, he fell in, both there and at Oxford, with the moſt furious of the high church and Jacobite party, made ſcurrilous reflections on the death of king William and the Hanover ſucceſſion, and when the queen appeared againſt the high-church memorial, he called her a waxen queen, alluding to the jeſt paſſed upon her at Oxford by thoſe, who put her motto 'Semper eadem' upon a weather-cock. He was proceeding in this manner, when his friends got him preferment in London.

There had been, ever ſince the queen came to the crown, an open revival of the doctrine of paſſive obedience and non-reſiſtance, by Mr. Charles Leſley, who was the firſt man that began the war in Ireland, ſaying, in a ſpeech ſolemnly made, that king James, by declaring himſelf a papiſt, could no longer be our king, ſince he could not be the defender of our faith, nor the head of our church, dignities ſo inherent in the crown, that he, who was incapable of theſe, could not hold it[r]. As he animated the people with this ſpeech, ſo ſome actions followed under his conduct, in which ſeveral men were killed; yet he changed ſides quickly, and became the moſt violent Jacobite in the nation, and was engaged in many plots, and in writing many books againſt the revolution, and the preſent government. Soon after the queen's acceſſion to the throne, he, or his ſon, as ſome ſaid, publiſhed a ſeries of weekly papers, under the title of the Rehearſal, purſuing a thread of arguments in them, all againſt the lawfulneſs of reſiſtance in any caſe whatſoever; deriving government wholly from God, denying all right in the people, either to confer or to coerce it. The miniſters connived at this, but with what intention is not known.

While theſe ſeditious papers had a free courſe for many years, and were much ſpread and applauded, Mr. Benjamin Hoadly, the preſent biſhop of Wincheſter, being called to preach before the lord mayor, choſe for his text the two firſt verſes of the thirteenth chapter of the Epiſtle to the Romans, and fairly explained the words there, that they were to be underſtood only againſt reſiſting good governors upon Jewiſh principles; but that theſe words had no relation to bad and cruel governors; and he aſſerted, that it was not only lawful, but a duty incumbent on all men, to reſiſt ſuch; concluding all with a vindication of the revolution and the preſent government. Upon this a great clamour was raiſed, as if he had preached up rebellion; ſeveral books were wrote againſt him; and he juſtified himſelf with a viſible ſuperiority of argument to them all, and ſo ſolidly overthrew the conceit of ſir Robert Filmer (at this time eſpouſed by Mr. Leſley) that government was derived by primogeniture from the firſt patriarchs, that for ſome time he ſilenced his adverſaries; but it was eaſier to keep up a clamour, than to write a ſolid anſwer. Dr. Sacheverel reflected with great virulence upon him and on biſhop Burnet, and other of the biſhops, carrying his venom as far back to archbiſhop Grindal, whom, for his moderation, he called a 'perfidious prelate, and a falſe ſon of the church.'

On the 15th of November the parliament of Great Britain being met, the queen, who had not been in perſon there during the laſt ſeſſion, came and made the following ſpeech to both houſes:

My lords and gentlemen,

"It is a great ſatisfaction to me, that I am able to give you ſo good an account of the progreſs of the war ſince the laſt ſeſſion of parliament.

"In the beginning of this year, our enemies made uſe of all their artifices to amuſe us with falſe appearances and deceitful inſinuations of their deſire of peace, in hopes, that from thence means might be found to create ſome diviſions or jealouſies among the allies. But they were entirely diſappointed in their expectation; and ſuch meaſures were taken upon that occaſion, as made it impoſſible for them long to diſguiſe their inſincerity. The operations of the war not delayed; and the campaign, which, notwithſtanding the backwardneſs of the ſeaſon, immediately followed, has been at leaſt as glorious for the allies as any of thoſe which have preceded it.

"God Almighty has been pleaſed to bleſs us with a moſt remarkable victory, and with ſuch other great and important ſucceſſes, both before and after it, that France is thereby become much more expoſed and open to the impreſſion of our arms, and conſequently more in need of peace than it was at the beginning of this campaign.

"However, the war ſtill continuing, I find myſelf obliged again to deſire you, gentlemen of the houſe of commons, to grant me ſuch ſupplies as you ſhall judge neceſſary for the aſſiſting our allies in all parts, and the vigorous proſecution of our advantages, that we may put the laſt hand to this great work, of reducing that exorbitant and oppreſſive power which has ſo long threatened the liberties of Europe.

"I aſſure you, that all you give ſhall be carefully applied to the uſes of the war, if it continues, or to the leſſening of the debts it has neceſſarily occaſioned, in caſe of a peace; which, though the wants and diſtreſſes of our enemies may naturally lead us to expect, yet, our own late experience may fully convince us, is not to be depended upon any other way, than by being in a condition to compel them to ſuch terms as may be ſafe and honourable for all the allies.

My lords and gentlemen,

"I think it proper to take notice to you, that the great dearth and ſcarcity, under which our neighbours abroad have ſuffered this year, begins to affect us in ſome meaſure at home, by the temptation of profit in carrying out too much of our corn, while it bears ſo high a price in foreign parts.

"This occaſions many complaints from the poor; for whoſe ſake I earneſtly recommend to you, to take this growing evil into your conſideration; having not neglected any thing on my part towards the remedying of it, that the law would allow.

"I cannot conclude, without obſerving to you, of what great advantage it will be at this time, to the end we all propoſe to ourſelves, that the greateſt diſpatch be given to the neceſſary preparations for carrying on the war."

The lords, in their addreſs, expreſſed "their joy to ſee her majeſty's royal perſon on the throne, after the great misfortune, which deprived them of her preſence during the laſt ſeſſion of parliament; as alſo their thanks for her ſpeech, whereby it appeared, how ready her tenderneſs for her people inclined her to hearken to propoſals of peace; how wiſely and ſteadily ſhe proceeded in the firſt ſteps of the treaty; and how juſtly ſhe reſented the artifices and inſincerity of the enemy by the vigorous proſecution of the war; which ſoon made it appear, that peace was the choice of her moderation, and muſt prove the only refuge of her enemies:" Concluding with congratulations "on the continued ſucceſs of her arms, and thoſe of her allies, under her general, the duke of Marlborough, whoſe conduct was worthy of the chief command in ſo juſt a war, and his valour equal to the bravery of her troops:" And aſſuring "her majeſty of their utmoſt ſupport to carry on the war, till France was compelled to ſubmit to the terms of a ſafe and laſting peace."

The lord chancellor, by order of the peers, returned the duke of Marlborough the thanks of that houſe, for his continued and eminent ſervices during the laſt campaign. The commons alſo, after an addreſs to the queen, upon her continued ſucceſſes, with aſſurances of granting ſpeedy and effectual ſupplies for the next year's ſervice, amounting to 6,184,466l. 7s. Of this ſum, fifteen hundred thouſand pounds were raiſed by way of lottery, and the reſt put on good funds. Purſuant to the queen's ſpeech, the commons ordered a bill to be brought in againſt the exportation of the corn, and, at their requeſt, an embargo was laid on all ſhips laden therewith.

By this time the affair of Dr. Sacheverel was before the commons. Mr. Dolben, ſon to the late archbiſhop of York, moved with indignation that the lord treaſurer ſhould be reflected on by the doctor under the nick-name of Volpone, complained, on the 13th of December, of the two ſermons before-mentioned. Several paragraphs were read out of each, and ſir Peter King and others having made ſpeeches againſt the audaciouſneſs of the doctor, who had advanced poſitions directly oppoſite to revolution principles, to the preſent government, and to the proteſtant ſucceſſion, and conſequently tending to cheriſh factions, and ſtir up rebellion. Thoſe, who favoured the doctor's cauſe, were ſurprized at this ſudden attack, and, no member offering to ſpeak in his defence, it was reſolved, that the two ſermons were malicious, ſcandalous, and ſeditious libels, highly reflecting on the queen, the late revolution, and the proteſtant ſucceſſion, tending to alienate the affections of her majeſty's ſubjects, and to create jealouſies and diviſions among them. The doctor was ordered to attend at the bar of the houſe the next day, and, being examined, owned the two ſermons. He likewiſe told them, what encouragement he had from the lord mayor to print 'the perils of falſe brethren.' Sir Samuel Garrard, being a member of the houſe, was aſked, Whether the ſermon was printed at his deſire or order? If he had owned it, he would have been expelled the houſe: But he denied, that ever he deſired, or ordered, or encouraged, the printing thereof. Though the doctor offered to prove it, and brought witneſſes for that purpoſe, yet the houſe would not enter upon that examination, but it was thought more decent to ſeem to give credit to their own member, though few indeed believed him.

[r] Biſhop Burnet ſays, Dr. King, archbiſhop of Dublin, told him, He had ſeen Leſley's ſpeech under his own hand.

The doctor ſtanding to what he had ſaid, without expreſſing the leaſt conſciouſneſs of having done amiſs, he was directed to withdraw; and it was reſolved, that he ſhould be impeached of high crimes and miſdemeanors, and Mr. Dolben was ordered to do it at the bar of the houſe of lords, in the name of all the commons of Great Britain. At the ſame time, a committee was appointed to draw up the articles againſt him, and the doctor was taken into cuſtody of the ſerjeant at arms.

The commons having proceeded thus far, ſome members took occaſion to ſpeak in favour of Mr. Hoadly, whoſe principles were more agreeable to the ſenſe of the majority of that houſe; and who, in ſeveral writings, had vindicated the revolution[s]. Upon which it was reſolved, "That the reverend Mr. Benjamin Hoadly, rector of St. Peter's Poor, London, for having often juſtified the principles, on which her majeſty and the nation proceeded in the late happy revolution, had juſtly merited the favour and recommendation of this houſe. 2. That an humble addreſs be preſented to her majeſty, that ſhe would be graciouſly pleaſed to beſtow ſome dignity in the church on Mr. Hoadly, for his eminent ſervices both to the church and ſtate." This addreſs having been preſented to the queen, ſhe anſwered, "That ſhe would take a proper opportunity to comply with their deſires:" Which, however, ſhe never did.

When Mr. Dolben carried up the impeachment againſt Dr. Sacheverel, the lord Haverſham made a ſhort ſpeech, importing, "That it ſeemed ſomewhat ſtrange to ſee a divine impeached for preaching a doctrine, for which he would heretofore have been rewarded, and might, if times changed, be made a biſhop. However, added his lordſhip, ſince he is impeached, I hope a day will come for the calling to account other criminals; for, which way ſoever I caſt my eyes, I ſee matter for impeachments."

Dr. Sacheverel having petitioned the commons to admit him to bail, that he might have an opportunity of making his defence, the committee, who were to draw up the articles of impeachment, were ordered to ſearch for precedents concerning the taking bail in caſe of perſons committed for high crimes and miſdemeanors, and Mr. Dolben reporting they could find none, it was put to the vote, whether he ſhould be admitted to bail, and carried in the negative by a majority of an hundred and fourteen againſt ſixty-four.

The proceedings againſt Dr. Sacheverel occaſioned great jealouſies and animoſities between the two parties of high church and low church; the former gave it out boldly, and in all places, that a deſign was formed by the whigs to pull down the church; and that this proſecution was only ſet on foot to try their ſtrength; and that, upon their ſucceſs in it, they would proceed more openly. Though this was all falſhood and forgery, yet it was propagated with ſo much application and zeal, and the tools employed in it were ſo well ſupplied with money (from whom, was not then known) that it is ſcarce credible how generally it was believed.

Some things concurred to put the vulgar in an ill humour; it was a time of dearth and ſcarcity, ſo that the poor were much diſtreſſed. The coming over of the Palatines, and the relieving of them, both by the queen, and by the voluntary contributions of private people, filled our poor likewiſe with indignation, who thought thoſe charities, to which they had a better right, were thus intercepted by ſtrangers. And all, who were ill-affected, ſtudied to heighten theſe their reſentments. The clergy generally eſpouſed Dr. Sacheverel as their champion, who had ſtood in the breach, and reckoned his cauſe as their own. Many ſermons were preached, both in London and other places, to provoke the people, in which they ſucceeded beyond expectation.

In the mean time the committee ſat ſeveral times at ſir Joſeph Jekyll's houſe, in order to draw up the articles of impeachment; ſo that, the parliament being met again after Chriſtmas, Mr. Dolben reported, that the articles were ready, which were read paragraph by paragraph. The preamble to the articles being read, a motion was made by the doctor's friends, that the report ſhould be recommitted, which occaſioned a very warm debate, wherein Mr. Robert Harding, Mr. Bromley, Mr. Ward, and ſome others, made ſeveral exceptions to the matter and form of the articles, Mr. Harley, in particular, inſiſted on the leaving out the word ſeditious, alledging a precedent in the reign of king Charles the firſt, in the proſecution of Prynn, Baſtwick, and Burton. But all objections were anſwered by Mr. ſecretary Boyle, Mr. Smith chancellor of the exchequer, lieutenant general Mordaunt, Mr. Lechmere, Mr. Thompſon, and ſome others: So, the queſtion for re-committing being put, it paſſed in the negative by a majority of two hundred and thirty-two againſt an hundred and thirty-one; and the articles of impeachment were agreed to, and ordered to be carried up to the lords. Then the laſt paragraph or recapitulation were alſo read and agreed to, and the whole ordered to be ingroſſed. The next day, January 12, the ingroſſed articles being read, Mr. Dolben was ordered to carry the ſame to the lords; which he did accordingly, accompanied by a great number of members. The ſaid articles imported in ſubſtance, That Dr. Henry Sacheverel, in his ſermons and books, did falſely and maliciouſly ſuggeſt and maintain, "1. That the neceſſary means uſed to bring about the happy revolution were odious and unjuſtifiable: That his late majeſty, in his declaration, diſclaimed the leaſt imputation of reſiſtance; and that to impute reſiſtance to the ſaid revolution, was to caſt black and odious colours upon his late majeſty and the ſaid revolution. 2. That the toleration, granted by law to diſſenters, was unreaſonable, and the allowance of it unwarrantable: And that he was a falſe brother with relation to God, religion, or the church, who defended the toleration or liberty of conſcience. That queen Elizabeth was deluded by archbiſhop Grindal (whom he ſcurrilouſly called a falſe ſon of the church, and a perfidious prelate) to the toleration of the Genevian diſcipline: And that it was the duty of ſuperior paſtors to thunder out their eccleſiaſtical anathema's againſt perſons entitled to the benefit of the toleration, and inſolently dared or defied any power on earth to reverſe ſuch ſentence. 3. That the church of England was in a condition of great peril and adverſity, under her majeſty's adminiſtration; and, in order to arraign and blacken the vote or reſolution of both houſes of parliament, approved by her majeſty (mentioned in the preamble, and importing, that the church of England was in a ſafe and flouriſhing condition under the queen's adminiſtration) he did ſuggeſt the church to be in danger; and, as a parallel, mentioned, that the perſon of king Charles was voted to be out of danger, and the ſame time that his murderers were conſpiring his death; thereby wickedly and maliciouſly inſinuating, that the members of both houſes, who paſſed the ſaid vote, were then conſpiring the ruin of the church. 4. That her majeſty's adminiſtration, both in eccleſiaſtical and civil affairs, tended to the deſtruction of the conſtitution; and that there were men of characters and ſtations, in church and ſtate, who were falſe brethren, and did themſelves weaken, undermine, betray, and did encourage and put it in the power of others, who were profeſſed enemies, to overturn and deſtroy the conſtitution and eſtabliſhment: And charged her majeſty, and thoſe in authority under her, both in church and ſtate, with a general male-adminiſtration: And, as a public incendiary, he perſuaded her majeſty's ſubjects to keep up a diſtinction of factions and parties; inſtilled groundleſs jealouſies, fomented deſtructive diſtinctions among them, and excited and ſtirred them up to arms and violence. And, that this malicious and ſeditious ſuggeſtions might make the ſtronger impreſſions upon the minds of her majeſty's ſubjects, he did wickedly wreſt and pervert divers texts and paſſages of holy ſcripture."

1710] After the exhibiting of theſe articles, the ſerjeant at arms attending the commons delivered Dr. Sacheverel to the deputy uſher of the black rod; and the lords, having read the articles, ordered, that a copy of them ſhould be given to the doctor, who was admitted to bail, Dr. Lancaſter, vice chancellor of Oxford, and Dr. Bowes being his ſureties; and, being now at liberty, he conſulted ſome eminent lawyers and divines, and, with their aſſiſtance, drew up an anſwer, wherein he either denied the falſe, malicious, and ſeditious poſitions and ſuggeſtions, charged upon him in the articles, or endeavoured to juſtify, palliate, and extenuate what he had advanced in his ſermons: concluding with the expreſſions: "Hard is the lot of the miniſters of the goſpel, if, when they cite the word of God, in their general exhortations to piety and virtue, or in their reproofs of men's tranſgreſſions, or where they are lamenting the difficulty and conflicts, with which the church of Chriſt, whilſt militant here on earth, muſt always ſtruggle; the ſeveral paſſages, by them cited, ſhall be ſaid to have been by them meant of particular perſons and things, and ſhall be conſtrued in the

[s] Particularly in two books lately publiſhed, the one intituled, 'Some conſiderations humbly offered to the lord biſhop of Exeter, occaſioned by his lordſhip's ſervice preached before her majeſty, March 8, 1708:" The other intituled, 'An humble reply to the lord biſhop of Exeter's anſwer, in which the conſiderations lately offered to his lordſhip are vindicated, and an apology is added for defending the foundation of the preſent government.'

moſt criminal ſenſe, and made, by ſuch conſtruction, one ground of an impeachment of high crimes and miſdemeanors."

This anſwer being ſent from the lords to the commons, and referred to the committee, Mr. Dolben, in a few days reported, that it was in many things foreign to the charge, unbecoming a perſon impeached, and plainly deſigned to reflect upon the honour of the houſe. A replication being ordered to be drawn, a debate aroſe at the ſecond reading, wherein the doctor's friends inſinuated, "That it was adviſeable to leave the offender to the ordinary courſe of juſtice." But this was rejected by a great majority, and the replication ſent up to the lords, averring their charge, and declaring, they would be ready to prove it, at ſuch convenient time, as ſhould be appointed for that purpoſe.

The lords appointed the 9th of March for the trial at the bar of their houſe, and the commons ordered, that the committee, who had drawn up the articles, ſhould be the managers to make good the impeachment[t]. Then it was debated, whether the houſe ſhould attend in a body, or in a committee of the whole houſe, and it was carried for a committee by a majority of an hundred and ninety-two againſt an hundred and eighty. This was done by the doctor's friends, who found, that, by gaining more time, the people were ſtill more inflamed; and therefore it was, they moved, that the trial might be public in Weſtminſter-hall, where the whole houſe of commons might be preſent. They knew the preparing of that place would be a work of ſome weeks. Unthinking people were ſo taken with this, that it could not be withſtood, though the effects it would have were well foreſeen. Accordingly upon the commons requeſt, which was brought up by Mr. Bromley, one of the doctor's chief friends, the lords addreſſed the queen for a place to be prepared in Weſtminſter-hall for the trial. In the mean time the doctor's friends in town and country were extremely buſy, and in their private meetings drank to his happy deliverance.

At length the lords ſent a meſſage to the commons to acquaint them, they had appointed the 27th of February for the trial. On that day (all things being prepared) the lords, in their formalities, went down to the court in Weſtminſter-hall, where vaſt numbers of ſpectators had been admitted. The managers of the commons, and the committee of the whole houſe, having taken their reſpective places, and Dr. Sacheverel, who was lodged in the Temple, and came every day with great ſolemnity in a coach to the hall, being brought to the bar, the trial began, and laſted three weeks, in which all other buſineſs was at a ſtand, for this took up all mens thoughts. The queen herſelf was preſent every day of the trial in a private manner. The managers for the commons opened the matrer very ſolemnly. Their performances were very much and juſtly commended. Sir Joſeph Jekyll, Mr. ſolicitor general Eyre, lieutenant general Stanhope, ſir Peter King, but above all ſir Thomas Parker, diſtinguiſhed themſelves in a very particular manner. They copiouſly juſtified both the revolution and the preſent government. There was no need of witneſſes; for, the ſermon being owned by the doctor, all the evidence was brought from it by laying the words together, and by ſhewing his intent and meaning in them, which appeared from comparing one place with another. When his counſel, Sir Simon Harcourt, Mr. Dodd, Mr. Phipps, Mr. Dee, and Dr. Henchman, came to plead for him, they very freely acknowledged the lawfulneſs of reſiſtance in extreme caſes, and plainly juſtified the revolution and our deliverance by king William. But they ſaid, it was not fit in a ſermon to name ſuch an exception. That the duties of morality ought to be delivered in their full extent, without ſuppoſing an extraordinary caſe. And therefore the doctor had followed precedents ſet by our greateſt divines ever ſince the reformation, and ever ſince the revolution. Upon this they opened a great field; they began with the declarations made in king Henry the eighth's time; they inſiſted next upon the homilies; and from thence inſtanced, in a large ſeries of biſhops and divines, who had preached the duty of ſubmiſſion and non-reſiſtance in very full terms, without ſuppoſing any exception; ſome excluding all exceptions in as poſitive a manner as the doctor had done. They explained the word 'revolution,' as belonging to the new ſettlement upon king James's withdrawing; though, in the common acceptation, it was underſtood of the whole tranſaction, till the ſettlement made by the convention. So that, they underſtanding the revolution in that ſenſe, there was indeed no reſiſtance there. That, if the paſſage quoted from the declaration of king William, while he was prince of Orange, did not come up to that, for which the doctor quoted it, he ought not to be cenſured, becauſe his quotation did not fully prove his point. As for his invective againſt the diſſenters and toleration, they laboured to turn that off, by ſaying, that he did not reflect on what was allowed by law, but on the permiſſion of, or the not puniſhing many, who publiſhed impious and blaſphemous books. And a collection was made of paſſages in books, full of crude impiety and bold opinions. This gave great offence to many, who thought, that this was a ſolemn publiſhing of ſo much impiety to the nation, by which more miſchief would be done than by the books themſelves; for moſt of them had been neglected, and known only to a ſmall number of thoſe, who encouraged them; and the authors of many of thoſe books had been proſecuted and puniſhed for them. As to thoſe parts of the ſermon, which ſet out the danger the church was in, though both houſes had ſome years ago voted it a great offence to ſay it was in danger; the doctor's counſel ſaid it might have been in none four years ago, when their votes paſſed, and yet be now in danger: The greateſt of all dangers was to be apprehended from the wrath of God for ſuch impieties. They ſaid, the reflections on the adminiſtration was not meant of thoſe employed immediately by the queen, but of men in inferior poſts. If the doctor's words ſeemed capable of a bad ſenſe, they were alſo capable of a more innocent one; and every man was allowed to put any conſtruction on his words, that they could bear.

When the doctor's counſel had ended their defence, he concluded it himſelf with a ſpeech, which he read with much bold heat; in which, with many ſolemn aſſeverations, he juſtified his intentions towards the queen and her government. He ſpoke with reſpect both of the revolution and the proteſtant ſucceſſion. He inſiſted moſt on condemning all reſiſtance under any pretence whatſoever, without mentioning the exception of extreme neceſſity, as his counſel had done. He ſaid it was a doctrine of the church, in which he was educated; and added many pathetical expreſſions, to move the audience to compaſſion. This had a great effect on the weaker ſort, while it poſſeſſed thoſe, who knew the man and his ordinary diſcourſes, with horror, when they heard him affirm ſo many falſehoods with ſuch ſolemn appeals to God. It was very plain, that the ſpeech was made for him by others, for the ſtyle was more correct and far different from his own; and it was thought to be the joint work of Dr. Atterbury, Dr. Smalridge, and Dr. Freind, ſuperviſed and corrected by ſir Simon Harcourt and Mr. Phipps[u].

During the trial, the multitudes that followed him all the [t] Theſe were,

Sir John Holland, comptroller of her majeſty's houſhold,
Mr. Secretary Boyle,
Mr. Smith, chancellor of the exchequer,
Mr. James Mountague, attorney general,
Mr. Robert Eyre, ſolicitor general,
Mr. Robert Walpole, treaſurer of the navy,
Sir Joſeph Jekyll,
Mr. Lechmere,
Mr. Dolben,
Sir Thomas Parker,
Sir Peter King, recorder of the city of London,
Sir John Holles,
The lord William Pawlet,
The lord Coningſby,
Mr. Spencer Compton,
Mr. William Thompſon,
Lieutenant general Stanhope,
Lieutenant general Mordaunt,
Mr. Spencer Cowper,
Sir David Dalrymple,

[u] Mr. Maynwaring, in his letters to a friend in North Britain, thus remarks on the doctor's ſpeech: 'But now comes the great ſcope of the doctor's performance, his own harrangue at the bar of the houſe of lords; and here, without entering into a particular examination of the whole piece, I cannot help profeſſing, with ſome ſorrow, that I think he was too hardly dealt with by thoſe that made it for him, when they obliged him to aver, in the face of God and the queen, 'That he had neither ſuggeſted, nor did in his conſcience believe, that the church is in the leaſt peril from her majeſty's adminiſtration.' If thoſe men, he means Atterbury, Smalridge, Freind, Moſs, &c. had been endued with the leaſt mercy, conſcience, or humanity, they would never have put into his mouth ſuch a choaking provocation as this; and I cannot help taking his part againſt them, as abandoned a prieſt as he is. When this holy man had, in his ſermon at St. Paul's, plainly ſhewn, 'How obvious it were to draw a parallel between the ſad circumſtances of the church of England formerly, and of the church of England at preſent, whoſe walls and incloſures are pulled down, and this pure ſpouſe of Chriſt proſtituted to more adulterers than the ſcarlet whore in the Revelations.' What could enter into the heads of theſe penmen of the ſpeech, to make the poor wretch ſwear, that he had never ſuggeſted the church was in danger? With what indignation muſt every one hear ſuch ſolemn appeals made to heaven, for the truth of a fact, which the whole aſſembly knew to be directly contrary? What excuſe ſhall we find out for this moſt hardened ſinner? Will it acquit him to ſay, that he did not compoſe his ſpeech, and only performed his part like an actor: Indeed, it may be ſaid to reſemble a play in one reſpect, becauſe it was a farce very well wrought, and had a wonderful effect on the weak part of his audience: the reſt were amazed, continues Mr. Maynwaring, they trembled at his oaths, when 'he called the Searcher of hearts to witneſs, in the moſt ſolemn and religious manner, as he expected to be acquitted before God and his holy angels, at that dreadful tribunal, before which, way as he came, and as he went back, ſhewed a great concern for him, preſſing about him, and ſtriving to kiſs his hand. And when the queen went, in the afternoon of the day on which the trial began, to the houſe of lords, to give the royal aſſent to ſome bills, a great multitude of people gathered about the ſedan, crying out, 'God bleſs your majeſty and the church; We hope your majeſty is for Dr. Sacheverel. The next day, the mob was ſtill more numerous and louder about Dr. Sacheverel's coach, and obliged all perſons they met to pull off their hats to him, and abuſed thoſe who refuſed to comply; among whom were ſome members of both houſes of parliament. The ſame evening, the rioters went to Mr. Daniel Burgeſs's meeting-houſe, in a court near Lincoln's-inn-fields, of which they broke the windows, and committed ſeveral other outrages and diſorders. Their fury increaſing with their numbers, they advanced to greater enormities, and even to overt-acts of rebellion. For, after they had attended upon Dr. Sacheverel, as uſual, they repaired to that meeting-houſe again, broke it open, pulled down the pulpit, pews, benches, in ſhort, all that was combuſtible; and, having carried theſe materials into Lincoln's-inn-fields, made a bone-fire of them, with repeated cries of 'High-church and Sacheverel.' About the ſame time, other parties of the mob demoliſhed and deſtroyed ſeveral other meeting-houſes[u]. They alſo battered and plundered the houſes of ſeveral diſſenters; threatened to pull down the houſes of the lord chancellor, earl of Wharton, biſhop of Sarum, Mr. Dolben, and other managers for the commons, againſt Dr. Sacheverel; and talked of deſtroying Mr. Hoadly's church and houſe, Salter's-hall, Mr. Shower's, and other meeting-houſes in the city; and even of attacking the bank of England, of which the directors being apprehenſive, they took the neceſſary precautions for its ſecurity, and ſent to Whitehall for aſſiſtance. Theſe diſorders were directed by ſome of better faſhion, who followed the mob in hackney coaches, and were ſeen ſending meſſages to them. Upon the firſt notice of theſe tumults, the earl of Sunderland made his report to the queen, who commanded him to ſend her horſe and foot-guards to diſperſe the mob; and the earl repreſenting the danger of leaving her perſon at that time (it being between ten and eleven o'clock at night) ſhe anſwered, 'God would be her guard.' The earl being returned to his office at the Cock-pit, where were alſo the lord chancellor, the duke of Newcaſtle, and ſome other noblemen, he ſent for captain Horſey, an exempt, who then commanded the guard, and ordered him to mount immediately, and diſperſe the mob. And, as the captain was going out, the earl whiſpered him, and bid him ſend a party to the bank. Before the horſe and foot-guards could reach Lincoln's-inn-fields, the officers had notice, that the mob, which had gathered there, was returned to Drury-lane, where they were making another bone-fire, with the furniture of Mr. Earl's meeting-houſe; whereupon the guards bent their march that way. At their approach moſt of the mob fled before them; and only one of their ringleaders, George Purchaſe, a bailiff (who had before been a lifeguard-man, but was diſmiſſed for ſome miſdemeanor) offered to make a ſtand, with a few of the moſt reſolute of his followers, crying out for High-church and Dr. Sacheverel. From Drury Lane the guards marched towards the city, and met with ſome oppoſition near Fleet-Ditch from the mob, that were rifling the meeting-houſe in Blackfryars; but having wounded ſome of the moſt daring and ſecured others, the reſt were ſoon ſcattered; and the guards, patrolling all night, prevented any farther miſchief. On the 2d of March, the horſe and foot-guards at Whitehall and St. James's were doubled; and the trained bands at Weſtminſter under arms at divers poſts, where they continued as long as Dr. Sacheverel's trial was depending; which both leſſened the number of the mutineers (many of the trained bands being men of low circumſtances, hired by ſubſtantial houſe-keepers) and kept the houſe in awe. The ſame day, the commons reſolved to addreſs the queen, to take effectual meaſures to ſuppreſs the preſent tumults, ſet on foot and fomented by papiſts, nonjurors, and other enemies to her title and government; and to iſſue out a proclamation, promiſing a reward to ſuch as ſhould diſcover and ſeize thoſe incendiaries, who had been the occaſions of the late tumults and diſorders. To this addreſs the queen anſwered, 'That ſhe was extremely ſenſible of the great care and concern of the houſe of commons for the public peace upon this occaſion; and, as ſhe had a juſt reſentment at theſe tumultuous and violent proceedings, ſo ſhe would take immediate care for ſuppreſſing them, and would loſe no time in endeavouring to find out the abettors, in order to bring them to puniſhment, according to the deſire of this houſe." The commons, upon this anſwer, unanimouſly reſolved to preſent an addreſs, importing, "That they begged leave to return their moſt hearty thanks for her moſt gracious anſwer to their addreſs, and for her effectual care in ſuppreſſing thoſe rebellious tumults, which were ſet on foot and fomented by papiſts, nonjurors, and other enemies to her title and government, in defiance of the juſt proſecution of the commons againſt Dr. Henry Sacheveral. And they humbly beſought her to believe, that as this proſecution proceeded only from the indiſpenſable obligation, which her faithful commons looked upon themſelves to lie under, not to ſit ſtill, and patiently ſee the juſtice of the late happy revolution, and the glory of their royal deliverer reflected upon; her majeſty's undoubted title ſtruck at; her adminiſtration, by which ſo many bleſſings were derived upon them, endeavoured to be rendered odious to the people, and repreſented as deſtructive of the church and conſtitution; the preſent eſtabliſhment and proteſtant ſucceſſion undermined; the reſolutions of the parliament treated with contempt; the governors of the church, and her majeſty as ſupreme, aſperſed and vilified; the toleration expoſed, as wicked; and ſedition inſolently invading the pulpit: So the maintenance of her majeſty's right, the ſafety of her perſon, the quiet of her government, the continuance of their happineſs under her excellent adminiſtration, the ſucceſſion in the proteſtant line, the ſupport and honour of the church of England, as eſtabliſhed by law, with that toleration, which was by act of parliament allowed to proteſtant diſſenters, ſhould be their conſtant care and concern. And they would, upon all occaſions, venture all that was dear to them, in defence of ſuch ineſtimable bleſſings." It was moved, that in the firſt paragraph it might be ſuggeſted, 'that the rebellious tumults were ſet on foot and fomented by republicans, as well as by papiſts and nonjurers;' but the motion was rejected. The day before this addreſs was preſented, a proclamation was publiſhed for ſuppreſſing the tumults, purſuant to which ſeveral perſons, who had been active in the late riots, were apprehended, and committed to divers priſons, particularly George Purchaſe, the bailiff; Daniel Damaree, one of the queen's watermen; and Francis Willis, a footman; which three were ſome time after tried for high treaſon; but, though the two firſt were ſentenced to die, yet neither of them ſuffered. The remiſſneſs, in puniſhing ſo great a diſorder, was looked on as the preparing and encouraging men to new tumults; and there was a ſecret management in the whole affair, that amazed all people.

When Dr. Sacheverel had ended his defence, the managers for the houſe of commons replied, and ſhewed very evidently, that the words of his ſermon could not reaſonably bear any other ſenſe, but that, for which they charged him. This was an eaſy performance, and they managed it with great ſtrength and vivacity. But the humour of the town was turned againſt them, and all the clergy appeared for the doctor. Many of the queen's chaplains ſtood about him, encouraging and magnifying him; and it was given out, that the queen herſelf favoured him, though upon biſhop Burnet's firſt coming to town, which was after the impeachment was brought up to the lords, ſhe ſaid to him, that it was a bad ſermon, and that he deſerved well to be puniſhed for it.

Sir John Holt, lord chief juſtice of the queen's Bench, died during the trial of the doctor, upon the 6th of March. He was very learned in the law, and had, upon great occaſions, ſhewed an intrepid zeal in aſſerting its authority; for he ventured on the indignation of both houſes of parliament by turns, when he thought the law was with him. He was a man of good judgment and great integrity, and ſet himſelf with great application to the functions of that important poſt. Sir Thomas Parker was immediately made lord chief juſtice in his room. This great promotion ſeemed an evident demonſtration of the queen's approving the proſecution; for which, not only he, but even their lordſhips muſt appear, that he was far from deſigning to defame her majeſty's adminiſtration.' Good God! And is this the man for whom the people have made an inſurrection? Is this the man for whom their zeal has flamed out in all manner of appearance? Is this the man, whoſe effigies are ſold about, curiouſly done in metzo tinto; whoſe health is drank before the queen's, and next in the ſame glaſs with that of the church? What can he have to do with any church who is a ſhame to chriſtianity itſelf? And is this the man, for whom tears were ſhed, when, by his impudent behaviour, he had made that compaſſion ridiculous, which would otherwiſe have been due to one in his circumſtances? How offenſive was his aſſurance; how nauſeous his preſumption; and how atheiſtical was his purpoſe, in wickedly perverting divers texts of ſcripture, inſtead of preaching the truths. He ſaid, 'He had no intention to aſperſe the memory of his late majeſty;' and he has been often heard to ſay, he ought to be 'De witted,' of which I have myſelf ſeen an affidavit, under the hand of Mr. Eberal.'

[u] Particularly thoſe of Mr. Earle in Long Acre; of Mr. Bradbury in New-ſtreet, Shoe-lane; of Mr. Taylor in Leather-lane; of Mr. Wright in Blackfryars; and of Mr. Hamilton in Clerkenwell.

none of the managers had treated the doctor ſo ſeverely as he had done; yet ſecret whiſpers were very confidently ſet about, that though the queen's affairs put her upon acting the part of the one, who was pleaſed with this ſcene, yet ſhe diſliked it all, and would take the firſt occaſion to ſhew it.

On the 10th of March the earl of Nottingham ſaid, that he had ſomething to propoſe; and the lords being adjourned to their houſe, he ſtarted an unexpected queſtion, "Whether in proſecutions by impeachments for high crimes and miſdemeanors, by writing or ſpeaking, the particular words, ſuppoſed to be criminal, are neceſſary to be expreſsly ſpecified in ſuch impeachments?" After ſome debate, the lords reſolved to conſult the judges, who very readily delivered their unanimous opinions, "That, according to law, the grounds of an indictment or impeachment ought to be expreſsly mentioned in both." Thoſe, who were for puniſhing Dr. Sacheverel, were not a little ſurprized at this unforeſeen difficulty, which was of no leſs conſequence, than to annul the whole proſecution, and to make it neceſſary for the commons to begin anew, which they could not expect to have time to do. But it being ſuggeſted, that the judges had delivered their opinion according to the rules of Weſtminſter-hall, and not according to the uſage of parliament, the lords at laſt reſolved, "That in impeachments they were to proceed according to the laws of the land, and the law and uſage of parliaments;" and, upon ſearching the journals of the houſe for precedents, they found a parallel inſtance to that of Dr. Sacheverel's impeachment, which was that of Dr. Maynwaring, in King Charles I's reign, wherein the words for which he was impeached, were not expreſsly mentioned in the articles. Whereupon it was voted, after ſome debate, "That by the law and uſage of parliaments in proſecutions by impeachments for high crimes and miſdemeanors, by writing or ſpeaking, the particular words, ſuppoſed to be criminal, are not neceſſary to be expreſsly ſpecified in ſuch impeachments:" Againſt which reſolution many lords entered their proteſt.

On the 16th of March, the queen went incognito to the houſe of lords, where a motion being made to declare, "That the commons had made good the firſt article againſt Dr. Sacheveral," a warm debate aroſe. The earl of Wharton, who ſpoke firſt, ſaid, "There is a different ſtrain between the doctor's ſermon and his ſpeech; the ſpeech is a full confutation and condemnation of the ſermon. All he has advanced about non-reſiſtance and unlimited obedience, is ridiculous and falſe; as alſo his diſtinguiſhing in the affair of the revolution, in which there was notorious reſiſtance in the aſſociation begun at Exeter, and in the ſeizing of York and Oxford gates, and breaking the bridge. The doctrine of paſſive obedience, as preſſed by the doctor, is not reconcileable to the practice of churchmen. If the revolution is not lawful, many in that houſe, and vaſt numbers without, were guilty of blood, murder, rapine, and injuſtice; and the queen herſelf is no lawful queen, ſince the beſt title ſhe had to the crown, was her parliamentary title, founded on the revolution." The Lord Haverſham made a long ſpeech in anſwer to this; and the lord Ferrers endeavoured likewiſe to excuſe the doctor, alledging, "That the revolution was not mentioned in his ſermon: That nothing but plain matter of fact ſhould ground ſuch a ſolemn accuſation: That, if the doctor was guilty of ſome fooliſh unguarded expreſſions, he ought to have been tried in Weſtminſter-hall: But he doubted, whether even in the inferior courts there would be ſufficient matter to convict him." He was ſupported by the earl of Scarborough, who ſaid, the revolution was a nice point, and above the law; and moved, that they ſhould adjourn the debate, and take time to conſider, before they gave their judgment.

The lord Haverſham having reflected on ſome biſhops voting contrary to their doctrines, Dr. Talbot, biſhop of Oxford, took from thence occaſion to ſpeak on the other ſide. But Dr. Hooper, biſhop of Bath and Wells, endeavoured to excuſe Dr. Sacheverel; "he allowed, indeed, of what the biſhop of Oxford had advanced, about the neceſſity and legality of reſiſtance in ſome extraordinary caſes; but was of opinion, that this ought to be kept from the knowledge of the people, who are naturally too apt to reſiſt; and that the oppoſite doctrine ought to be maintained and inforced. That the revolution was not to be boaſted of, and made a precedent; but we ought to throw a mantle over it, and rather call it a vacancy or abdication: And the 'original compact' were two very dangerous words, not to be mentioned without a great deal of caution. That they, who examined the revolution too nicely, were no friends to it; for, at that rate, the crown would roll like a ball, and never be fixed." He concluded, "That there ſeemed to be a neceſſity to preach up non-reſiſtance and paſſive obedience at that time, when reſiſtance was juſtified." The duke of Argyle, who ſpoke on the other ſide, ſaid, among other things, "That the clergy, in all ages, have delivered up the rights and liberties of the people, and preached up the king's power, in order to govern him; and therefore they ought not to be ſuffered to meddle with politics." The earl of Angleſey anſwered to this, "That political ſermons were ſometimes neceſſary, and allowed on the 30th of January, and other occaſions. As to the revolution, which was the chief matter now in debate (he ſaid) the vacancy of the throne was properly the thing; and therefore the mentioning neceſſary means, was mere nonſenſe in the doctor; and he would not find him guilty for nonſenſe; the rather, becauſe the doctrine of reſiſtance, which the doctor had confuted, juſtifies rebellion, murder, and all manner of crimes." The duke of Leeds who ſpoke on the ſame ſide, made a very long ſpeech, wherein he owned, "he had a great ſhare in the late revolution, but ſaid, he never thought, that things would have gone ſo far, as to ſettle the crown on the prince of Orange, whom he had often heard ſay, that he had no ſuch thoughts himſelf. That they ought to diſtinguiſh between reſiſtance and revolution; for vacancy or abdication was the thing they went upon, and therefore reſiſtance was to be forgot; for had it not ſucceeded, it had certainly been rebellion; ſince he knew of no other but hereditary right." Upon this the biſhop of Saliſbury made a ſpeech, "wherein he ſhewed the falſhood of an opinion too commonly received, that the church of England had always condemned reſiſtance, even in the caſes of extreme tyranny. The books of the Maccabees, bound up in our bibles, and approved by our articles, as containing examples of life and inſtruction of manners, though not as any part of the canon of the ſcripture, contained a full and clear precedent for reſiſting and ſhaking off extreme tyranny. The Jews, under that brave family, not only defended themſelves againſt Antiochus, but formed themſelves into a free and new government: Our homilies were only againſt wilful rebellion, ſuch as had been againſt our kings, while they were governing by law. But, at that very time, Queen Elizabeth had aſſiſted, firſt the Scots, and then the French, and to the end of her days continued to protect the States, who not only reſiſted, but, as the Maccabees had done, ſhook off the Spaniſh yoke, and ſet up a new form of government. In all this ſhe was not only juſtified by the beſt writers of that time, ſuch as Jewel and Bilſon, but was approved and ſupported in it. Both her parliaments and convocations gave her ſubſidies to carry on thoſe wars. The ſame principles were kept up all king James's reign. In the beginning of king Charles's reign he protected the Rochellers, and aſked ſupplies from the parliament, to enable him to do it effectually, and ordered a faſt and prayers to be made for them. It is true, ſoon after that, new notions of abſolute power, derived from God to kings, were taken up: At the firſt riſe given to theſe by Maynwaring, they were condemned by a ſentence of the lords; and though he ſubmitted, and retracted his opinion, yet a ſevere cenſure paſſed upon him. But, during the long diſcontinuance of parliaments that followed, this doctrine was more favoured: It was generally preached up, and many things were done purſuant to it, which put the nation into the great convulſions, that followed in our civil wars. After theſe were over, it was natural to return to the other extreme, as courts naturally favoured ſuch doctrines. King James truſted too much to it; yet the very aſſerters of that doctrine were the firſt, who pleaded for reſiſtance, when they thought they needed it."

Several other peers, particularly the duke of Devonſhire, the lord Chancellor, and the lords Sommers, Halifax, and Mohun, ſpoke alſo in vindication of the late revolution; and maintained, that in extraordinary caſes reſiſtance is neceſſary and lawful; and concluded, that the commons had made good the firſt article. The archbiſhop of York, the duke of Buckingham, the earls of Nottingham and Rocheſter, the lords Guernſey, North and Grey, and Caermarthen, and the biſhops of London, Rocheſter, and Landaff, who ſpoke on the other ſide, declared, "That they never read ſuch a piece of madneſs and nonſenſe, as Dr. Sacheverel's ſermon, but did not think him guilty of a miſdemeanor." After a long debate, which laſted till paſt nine in the evening, it was at laſt carried by a majority of nineteen, that the commons had made good their firſt article of impeachment againſt him.

The next day, March 17, the Lords took into conſideration the ſecond article of the commons impeachment, and Dr. Wake, biſhop of Lincoln, began the debate with a ſpeech, wherein he gave an account of the deſign of a comprehenſion ſet on foot, towards the end of king James II's reign, by archbiſhop Sancroft, and promoted by the moſt eminent divines of the church of England, particularly Dr. Patrick, late biſhop of Ely, and Dr. Sharpe, the preſent archbiſhop of York, and the biſhops of London and Ely, which was, "to improve, and, if poſſible, to enforce our diſcipline, to review and enlarge our Liturgy, by correcting ſome things, and adding others; and by leaving ſome few indifferent ceremonies, in order to reconcile diſſenters to the church. That Dr. Sacheverel had made a ſtrange and falſe repreſentation of this deſign, which was again ſet on foot, and openly eſpouſed by king William and queen Mary, but which unhappily miſcarried." He then proceeded to offer ſuch paſſages out of Dr. Sacheverel's ſermon, as plainly and fully made out the ſecond article of the commons impeachment, including, "That ſomewhat ſhould be done to put a ſtop to ſuch preaching, as, if not timely corrected, may kindle ſuch heats and animoſities among us, as may truly endanger both our church and ſtate. As for the preacher himſelf, I am (ſaid the biſhop) very willing to come into any meaſures of favour to him, that are conſiſtent with your lordſhips honour and juſtice, and will anſwer the ends of the impeachment, that has been brought before us againſt him." Dr. Trimnell, biſhop of Norwich, enforced what the biſhop of Lincoln had ſaid, about toleration; "inveighed againſt the inſolence of Sacheverel, who had arraigned archbiſhop Grindall (one of the eminent reformers in the reign of queen Elizabeth) as a perfidious prelate, for favouring and tolerating the Genevian diſcipline; checked his preſumption, in taking upon him, in his ſermon, to preſcribe rules to his ſuperiors, by telling them when they are to thunder out their anathema's againſt ſchiſmatics; ſhewed, that the proper uſe of thoſe ſpiritual weapons is to ſuppreſs vice, immorality, and profaneneſs, among the members of the church; and that they were altogether uſeleſs to convince heretics or ſchiſmatics, who are rather to be won by gentle methods and chriſtian forbearance. And to that purpoſe his lordſhip took notice of the toleration act; and mentioned ſeveral inſtances wherein he had himſelf been inſtrumental in reconciling diſſenters to the church. I ſhall not take upon me (ſaid he in the concluſion) to charge the doctor, or any of his particular friends, with this practice (meaning the late tumults) as great temptation as one is under to do ſo from ſeveral circumſtances. And it is not the leaſt, that occurs in his prayers, which he has publiſhed on this occaſion, to repreſent, not ſo much to God, as to the world, that he is under perſecution, when he is proſecuted for offending againſt the law, by thoſe, who, in common juſtice, ought to be thought the faireſt accuſers, and, before your lordſhips, who are juſtly acknowledged to be the moſt impartial judges. However, I will never believe, till I cannot avoid it, that any members of the England, who have acknowledged the government, much leſs any clergyman, who has ſo often profeſſed his obedience to it in church and ſtate, ſhould have been any way acceſſary to theſe threatenings, that have been given out, particularly againſt ſuch biſhops, as ſhould happen to condemn the doctor's proceedings. As far, my lords, as I have ſeen of this cauſe, I am likely to be one of thoſe biſhops; and, though I do not pretend to any great ſhare of courage, I am very free to declare to your lordſhips, that I am in no compariſon ſo apprehenſive of what may befal myſelf for condemning this perſon, as I am of what will probably befal the public, if your lordſhips ſhould not condemn him. However, I wiſh he may be treated with all poſſible moderation; and that the wholeſome ſeverities, he recommends in his ſermon, may not be uſed again him. But that is in your lordſhips judgment, to which I humbly ſubmit it; and only beg pardon for having detained your lordſhips ſo long in giving my reaſons, why I think the commons have made good this ſecond part of their charge." No peer offering to ſpeak in favour of the doctor, it was voted, That the commons had made good the ſecond article of their impeachment. The party, that was for the doctor, made no oppoſition to the third, and little to the fourth. They contented themſelves with proteſting againſt them as they had done againſt the two firſt. The four articles being thus voted to be proved, the lords went down to the hall, when the queſtion being put upon the whole impeachment, guilty or not guilty, the doctor was voted not guilty by fifty two[w], and guily by ſixty nine[x][y].

The next debate was, what cenſure ought to paſs upon [w] The archbiſhop of York; the dukes of Ormond, Beaufort, Northumberland, Shrewſbury, Leeds, Buckingham, Hamilton; the earls of Pembroke, Northampton, Denbigh, Berkſhire, Thanet, Scarſdale, Anglesey, Suſſex, Yarmouth, Nottingham, Rocheſter, Abingdon, Plymouth, Scarborough, Jerſey, Poulet, Mar, Wemyſs, Northeſk; the viſcounts Say and Seal, Weymouth; the biſhops of London, Durham, Rocheſter, Bath and Wells, Cheſter; the barons Ferrers, Willoughby of Brooke, North and Grey, Howard of Eſcrick, Chandos, Leigh, Lexington, Berkley, Craven, Oſborn, Dartmouth, Stawel, Guilford, Butler, Lempſter, Haverſham, Guernſey, Conway.

[x] The lord chancellor, lord treaſurer, lord preſident, lord privy ſeal, lord ſteward of the houſhold; the dukes of Cleveland, Richmond, Grafton, St. Albans, Bolton, Schomberg, Bedford, Montroſe, Roxburgh, Dover; the marquiſſes of Kent and Dorcheſter; the earls of Derby, Lincoln, Dorſet, Bridgewater, Leiceſter, Weſtmoreland, Manchester, Rivers, Stamford, Winchelſea, Sunderland, Carliſle, Radnor, Berkley, Holnerneſs, Portland, Warrington, Bradford, Orford, Greenwich, Grantham, Wharton, Cholmondeley, Crawford, Loudoun, Leven, Orkney, Seafield, Roſeberry, Glaſgow, Ilay; the biſhops of Sarum, Ely, Peterborough, Oxford, Lincoln, Norwich, St. Aſaph; the barons de la War, Fitzwalter, Paget, Hunſdon, Mohun, Biron, Colepeper, Rockingham, Cornwallis, Oſſuliſton, Herbert, Hallifax, Harvey, Pelham.

[y] The proceedings of the peers more at large were as follows:

In relation to the third article, the lord Hallifax made a ſhort ſpeech, and was anſwered by the lord Ferrers and earl of Nottingham. The fourth article occaſioned a longer debate, which was begun by the earl of Wharton, in the commendation of the preſent adminiſtration. The biſhop of Saliſbury ſeconded him, and ſpoke with vehemence againſt Dr. Sacheverel, 'who, by inveighing againſt the revolution, toleration, and union, ſeemed to arraign and attack the queen herſelf, ſince her majeſty had ſo great a ſhare in the firſt, and had often declared, that ſhe would maintain the ſecond; and that ſhe looked upon the third as the moſt glorious event of her reign. That nothing could be more plain than his reflecting on her majeſty's miniſters; and that he had in parliament ſo well marked out a noble peer there preſent, by an ugly and ſcurrilous epithet (which he would not repeat) that it was not poſſible to miſtake him.' Upon this ſome of the younger peers fell a laughing, and cried out, name him, name him; but the lord chancellor interpoſed, declaring, 'that no peer was obliged to ſay but what he thought fit.' The lord Ferrers ſaid ſomething in favour of Dr. Sacheverel, but was anſwered by the earl of Ilay; and then the lord Haverſham made a ſhort ſpeech about that part of the fourth article, wherein Dr. Sacheverel was charged with wreſting and perverting divers paſſages of ſcripture. He ſaid, 'No man on earth has authority to interpret the ſcripture; which, he thought, muſt be interpreted by itſelf: Since the reformation, we had contended againſt the church of Rome, who pretended to that authority: And ſhall we (added he) allow infallibility in the commons, which we deny to the pope of Rome?' And in concluſion he repeated his deſire, that the reverend prelates there preſent would tell the houſe, 'How Dr. Sacheverel could be charged with wreſting the ſcripture?' But none of the biſhops offered to ſatisfy him. The duke of Hamilton having ſaid ſomething in favour of the doctor, he was anſwered by lord Mohun. The duke of Buckingham, the lord Ferrers, the earls of Scarſdale and Abingdon, and the lord Caermarthen, endeavoured likewiſe to extenuate the doctor's offences, but it was voted that the commons had made good the fourth article of the impeachment. However, thirty-eight lords entered their diſſent to the queſtion upon the ſecond, third, and fourth articles. At the cloſe of the debate, the earl of Wharton ſaid, that ſince the houſe had reſolved, 'that the commons had made good their four articles of impeachment againſt Dr. Sacheverel,' the lords ought, by a neceſſary conſequence, to reſolve and declare likewiſe, that the doctor was guilty of the high crimes and miſdemeanors charged upon him. But the earls of Abingdon and Rocheſter, the lord treaſurer, the lord North and Grey, and the lord Ferrers, ſtating ſome difficulties, it was propoſed, that the queſtion to be aſked every lord in Weſtminſter-hall ſhould be as follows: 'That the commons having made good the ſeveral articles of the impeachment againſt Henry Sacheverel, doctor in divinity; the ſaid doctor Henry Sacheverel is guilty of high crimes and miſdemeanors."

Accordingly, on the 18th of March, the queſtion being read, the earl of Rocheſter moved, that the judges ſhould be conſulted; but no peer ſeconding the motion, the lord Guernſey ſaid, 'The queſtion, as ſtated, was not fit to be put in Weſtminſter-hall, becauſe it would ſubvert the conſtitution of parliament, and preclude the peers from their right of giving their judgment, both of the fact, as well as of the law. For in this caſe ſome peers might be ſatisfied as to the fact, but not as to the law, and if they were to give their judgment as the queſtion was ſtated, their freedom of voting would be taken away. Therefore he moved, 'That the firſt part of the propoſed queſtion be left out.' The lord North and Grey, who ſpoke next, ſaid, 'There is no neceſſity of putting the queſtion in Weſtminſter-hall, but only acquainting the commons there, that Dr. Sacheverel is guilty in general: For how can any peer, that thinks him not guilty (as for my part, I don't) ſay in the face of the commons, he is not guilty, and allow at the ſame time, that the commons have made good their articles of impeachment?' The earl of Wharton ſaid, 'He wondered at the lord Guernſey's making that motion, after the houſe had come to a reſolution, that the commons had made good their articles. The queſtion, as ſtated by the lord chancellor, did not preclude any peer from his right of giving his judgment; for every lord was at liberty to proteſt and enter his diſſent, if he would not be convinced by the majority of the houſe; and that the lords, being in the nature of a jury, ought to deliver their opinions ſeriatim.' The lord Ferrers ſupported the lord Guernſey's motion, objecting againſt the preamble of the queſtion as unneceſſary, and urging, that it was only the majority of the houſe, and not the houſe, that came to a reſolution, 'That the commons had made good their impeachment.' On the other hand, the lord Guernſey, in anſwer to the earl of Wharton, ſaid, 'That the lords were not as a jury, for every lord was both a judge and a juror; that ſome peers might think Dr. Sacheverel guilty of one part, and innocent of the other; and yet if they were to give their judgment, as this queſtion was ſtated, how could they ſay he was not guilty, when the preamble ſet forth, that the commons had made good their impeachment?' The earl of Wharton replied, 'That this objection had been much more proper before the houſe had proceeded ſo far.' However, the earl of Rocheſter having moved, that the preamble be left out, the earl of Wharton and the reſt agreed to it; and the lord chancellor ſtated the queſtion thus: 'That the queſtion be put to each lord in Weſtminſter-hall, beginning at the junior baron firſt, ſhall be, 'Is Dr. Henry Sacheverel guilty of high crimes and miſdemeanors?' The earl of Nottingham moved, that the words of high crimes and miſdemeanors be left out, and was ſeconded by the lord North and Grey. But the earl of Wharton ſaid, 'That what was offered was unfair; for the commons having impeached Dr. Sacheverel of high crimes and miſdemeanors, and the lords having agreed and reſolved, that the commons had made good the impeachment, it neceſſarily followed, that he was guilty of the ſaid crimes and miſdemeanors.' To moderate the matter, the duke of Buckingham propoſed, that the queſtion be thus altered, 'of the crimes and miſdemeanors charged upon him by the impeachment;' to which the earls of Wharton and Sunderland readily agreed; but the earl of Jerſey excepted againſt the queſtion, as being complex or complicated. The lord Guernſey purſued the ſame objection, for the reaſon he alledged before, viz. 'That ſome peers might think Dr. Sacheverel guilty of ſome of the crimes charged him. And here a ſtrange turn appeared; ſome ſeemed to apprehend the effects of a popular fury, if the cenſure was ſevere; to others it was ſaid, the queen deſired it might be mild; it was therefore propoſed to ſuſpend him from preaching for one year, others were for ſeven years; but by a vote it was fixed to three years. It was next moved, that he ſhould be incapable of all preferments during theſe three years; upon that the houſe was divided, fifty-nine were for the vote, and ſixty againſt it; ſo that was laid aſide. The ſermons were ordered to be burnt in the preſence of the lord mayor and the ſheriffs of London, which was done; only the lord mayor being a member of the houſe of commons, did not think he was bound to be preſent[z].

With Sacheverel's ſermons, the famous decree of the univerſity of Oxford paſſed in their convocation, July 21, 1683, was, at the ſame time, voted by the lords to be burnt, as containing ſeveral poſitions contrary to the conſtitution of the kingdom, and deſtructive to the proteſtant ſucceſſion. This decree had been given in evidence by the doctor at his trial, in which the abſolute authority of princes, and unalterableneſs of the hereditary right of ſucceeding to the crown, were aſſerted in a very high ſtrain.

The commons alſo, upon a complaint made to them of a book intitled, 'Collections of paſſages referred to by Dr. Sacheverel, in his anſwer to the articles of his impeachment,' ordered the ſame to be burnt. On the other hand, the doctor's friends complained to the houſe, of a book intitled, 'The rights of the chriſtian church,' &c. and a defence of it, in two parts, with 'A letter from a country attorney to a country parſon, concerning the rights of the church; and Le Clerc's judgment of that book in his Bibliothique Choiſie.' All which were condemned to the flames; as was alſo 'A treatiſe of the word Perſon, by John Clendon of the Inner Temple.' Not content with this, the tories moved for an addreſs for a faſt, to deprecate the divine vengeance, which there was juſt reaſon to fear, on account of the horrid blaſphemies lately publiſhed in the kingdom. Thoſe who ſupported this motion, thought not only to caſt a reflection on the whigs, as encouragers of ſuch writings, but alſo to juſtify what the doctor had advanced in his ſermon about the danger of the church, which he had aſcribed to the heretical and blaſphemous poſitions lately printed. But their deſign was eaſily ſeen through, and therefore the majority added to the addreſs, "many of which blaſphemies have again, in a moſt charged upon him by the impeachment of the commons, and innocent of the other; and urged an inſtance of an indictment concerning ſeveral charges, in which caſe the jury is not to anſwer generally, but particularly to each offence, becauſe the judge goes by the verdict, and impoſes the fine accordingly.' Therefore his lordſhip moved, 'That each peer ſhould give his judgment ſeverally to each article.' To this the lord Sommers anſwered, 'That the matter of fact was already ſettled, though every peer might proteſt and diſſent: That the lord Guernſey's objection, grounded on the inſtance he brought of indictments in the courts below, was very improper, becauſe, as his lordſhip himſelf had ſuggeſted, the lords are both judges and jury. That, as jury, they might, in conſcience, pronounce the doctor guilty, though they thought him guilty only of one article: But that the lords, who did not think him guilty of all the four articles, might, afterwards, as judges, moderate the puniſhment.' The earl of Nottingham replied, 'That, for his part, he thought Dr. Sacheverel guilty of no crime;' and moved, that the particle 'the' be left out, and the queſtion put thus; 'Is Dr. Henry Sacheverel guilty of high crimes and miſdemeanors charged upon him by the impeachment?' Which was agreed to.

Then it being propoſed to conſider what anſwer each lord ſhould give, the lord Hallifax ſaid, That according to the uſage of parliament, the lords ought to anſwer, content, or not content. But the lord Ferrers alledged, That content, or not content, was not an adequate anſwer to the queſtion: And both the earl of Nottingham, and the lord Guernſey, his brother, urged, 'That there were ſeveral precedents for guilty, or not guilty upon my honour; but did not remember any for content, or not content. The lord Hallifax maintained his aſſertion, and ſaid, he wondered, the lord Nottingham did not know there were precedents for content or not content; and inſtanced in the lord Sommers's trial, in which the lords gave their judgment that way. On the other hand, the lord Guernſey inſiſted upon anſwering guilty or not guilty; and was ſeconded by the lord treaſurer, who ſaid, 'That there was a difference between the lords voting in their houſe promiſcuouſly, ſometimes in confuſion, and their giving their judgments in Weſtminſter-Hall; and that the precedent mentioned by the lord Hallifax was an extraordinary one, made in an extraordinary caſe.' The lord Hallifax moved for ſearching the journals; and the earl of Wharton for following precedents. The clerk turned to, and read the precedent of lord Sommers's impeachment, in which the peers gave their judgment by content or not content. But the earl of Rochetter deſiring, that other precedents might be ſearched, and urging, that there was a difference between the lords voting in their houſe and in Weſtminſter-hall; the duke of Buckingham anſwered, 'That the trial was the ſame in Weſtminſter-hall, as if the Lords were in their houſe; that they removed to the hall only for the ſpaciouſneſs of the place: And therefore the queſtion ought to be anſwered, as if they were in the houſe, content or not content.' To this the earl of Ilay replied, 'That content, or not content, was a very improper and ungrammatical anſwer to the queſtion, Is Dr. Sacheverel guilty of high crimes, &c. And therefore either the queſtion ought to be altered, or the anſwer be, guilty or not guilty.' Then the lord Ferrers endeavoured to ſhew the inconveniences, that might attend the putting the queſtion, as propoſed, alledging, 'That ſome of the peers there preſent, might hereafter be impeached, and repent too late the having made ſuch a precedent of giving judgment generally.' The earl of Angleſey purſued the ſame argument; adding, that if the queſtion was put, and anſwered generally, the majority of the people would not know what the doctor was condemned for. To which the lord chancellor readily replied, 'That every body would know he was either guilty or not guilty of the crimes charged on him by the impeachment of the houſe of commons.' But the earl of Mar inſiſted, 'That every peer ought to be at liberty to vote, guilty or not guilty to every article; otherwiſe it might happen, that the majority of the houſe might think Dr. Sacheverel innocent upon each article; yet, by this method of a general anſwer, he might be condemned of all; which ſeemed inconſiſtent with the uſual method of juſtice in that houſe.' The duke of Buckingham urged on the ſame ſide, 'that, ſince the judgment of the houſe in this caſe, ought to be a declaration of the law, the condition of the people would be moſt miſerable, to have puniſhment for high crimes and miſdemeanors, and not have a probability of informing themſelves, what the crimes thereby puniſhed were, which they could not learn from this general determination: And that, this uncertainty being in the caſe of a clergyman for preaching, it might create ſome fears in good men, when they preach ſome doctrines of the church of England, particularly that of non-reſiſtance.' The earl of Sunderland calling for the queſtion, the Earl of Angleſey inſiſted on the inconveniences of anſwering generally to it. Whereupon the lord chancellor mentioned four inconveniences that might enſue: 'Firſt, that clergymen would know, that to preach againſt the revolution, was a high crime and miſdemeanor: Secondly, to preach againſt the toleration: Thirdly, againſt the union: And, fourthly, that to reflect on the queen's miniſters, and ſuggeſt, that 'the church is in danger' under her majeſty's adminiſtration, were likewiſe high crimes and miſdemeanors. Theſe, ſaid his lordſhip, are the only inconveniences, that I can foreſee, will attend this judgment.' The Earl of Wharton calling then for the queſtion, the duke of Shrewſbury ſaid, 'That, he did not think the doctor guilty of the firſt article, though he had as great a ſhare as any man in the late revolution, and would ever go as far as any to vindicate the memory of our late glorious deliverer. That he thought the church ſafe under her majeſty's adminiſtration; but he would not have it made a high crime and miſdemeanor to ſay, 'that the church is in danger,' becauſe times might come, when it might really be in danger.' And, in concluſion, his grace inſiſted on voting article by article. The lord Caermarthen, the earl of Angleſey, and the earl of Nottingham, did the like; but, the ſame being oppoſed by ſome other peers, the lord chancellor at laſt propoſed this queſtion, 'Whether the anſwer to be given to each lord ſhould be guilty or not guilty only? Which being reſolved in the affirmative, then the main queſtion was put, 'Whether it ſhould be aſked, Is Henry Sacheverel, doctor in divinity, guilty of high crimes and miſdemeanors, charged upon him by the impeachment of the houſe of commons?' This was likewiſe carried in the affirmative; when four and thirty lords entered their proteſt, importing, in ſubſtance, 'That the obliging every lord to anſwer generally, guilty or not guilty, to a queſtion containing all the articles of his impeachment, was a kind of taking upon themſelves by an unneceſſary joining of matters of a different nature, and ſubjecting them to one and the ſame determination; and conſequently, might prejudice the right every peer had to give a free affirmative or negative; ſince whoever thought Dr. Sacheverel guilty of one part, and innocent of the other, would be obliged either to approve what he condemned, or condemn what he approved. 2. They conceived, there was at leaſt a poſſibility, that though a majority of the houſe was admitted to vote to the articles ſeparately, and might think him innocent upon each article; yet, by this method of a general anſwer, he might be condemned of all; which ſeemed not to be conſiſtent with the uſual method of juſtice in this houſe. 3. That ſince the judgment of the houſe, in this caſe, ought to be a declaration of the law; the condition of the people would be moſt miſerable, to have puniſhment for high crimes and miſdemeanors, and not have a poſſibility of informing themſelves, what the high crimes and miſdemeanors, thereby puniſhed, are. For the peoples only guide is the law; and they can never be guided by what they can never be informed of. And that, this uncertainty being in the caſe of a clergyman for preaching, it might create ſome fear in good men, when they preach ſome doctrines of the church of England, particularly that of non-reſiſtance; and it might be made uſe of by ill ones, as an excuſe for the neglect of that duty, which upon ſome occaſions is required.'

On the 20th of March, about three o'clock in the afternoon, the lords and commons having taken their reſpective ſeats, and their lordſhips houſe being reſumed, the lord chancellor declared, that they had agreed upon a queſtion, beginning at the junior baron firſt, ſixty-nine lords declared Dr. Sacheverel guilty, and fifty-two not guilty. The lord chancellor, having caſt up the votes, declared Dr. Sacheverel guilty; and the uſher of the black rod having brought the doctor to the bar, and cauſed him to kneel down, the lord chancellor told him, that the lords having, with their uſual candour and equity, examined and conſidered the articles exhibited againſt him, with the allegations to make good the ſame, and what had been offered by his counſel and himſelf in his defence, had found him guilty of 'high crimes and miſdemeanors' charged upon him by the commons of Great Britain. Then the doctor, ſtanding up, made a ſhort ſpeech, importing, 'That not having been ſuffered to be at their lordſhips bar, while their lordſhips were giving their votes; he hoped he might now be permitted to put in a plea, before their lordſhips paſſed ſentence upon him. That he was adviſed by his counſel to offer, firſt, That, by the opinion of all the judges, the particular words, ſuppoſed to be criminal, ought to have been expreſsly ſpecified in the articles of impeachment againſt him. Secondly, That, in the title of the ſaid articles, the ſame were ſaid to be 'exhibited in the name of all the commons of Great Britain,' and yet 'the commiſſioners of ſhires,' who make part of the commons of Great Britain, were not mentioned with the knights, citizens, and burgeſſes in parliament aſſembled.' Both which he begged their lordſhips to take into conſideration.' The lords being returned to their houſe, conſidered of the doctor's plea; and reſolved, that the ſame was frivolous, and that they would the next day conſider what cenſure to paſs upon him. Fr. H. L.

[z] The ſentence paſſed upon him was, That Henry Sacheverel, doctor in divinity, ſhall be, and is hereby enjoined not to preach during the term of three years next enſuing. That Dr. Henry Sacheverel's two printed ſermons, referred to by the impeachment of the houſe of commons, ſhall be burnt before the Royal Exchange in London, between the hours of twelve and one, on Monday, the 27th day of this inſtant March, by the hands of the common hangman, in the preſence of the lord mayor of the city of London, and the two ſheriffs of London and Middleſex.

The lord mayor, who was not a little mortified at his being, by the lords ſentence, obliged to aſſiſt at the burning of a ſermon, which he had approved, and commanded to be printed (as Dr. Sacheverel aſſerted in the dedication) deſired and moved, that he might be excuſed from attending at the execution, he being a member of the houſe: And a debate ariſing, it was deferred till the houſe was informed what anſwer the lord mayor had returned to the ſheriffs, when they ſhould demand of him, whether he would attend, or not; and ſo that buſineſs was dropped.

irregular, extraordinary, and inſolent manner been printed, publiſhed, and diſperſed, throughout the kingdom, to the ſcandal of good chriſtians, by Dr. Henry Sacheverel." Upon this addition the tories would have dropped the addreſs, but it was preſented to the queen, who, probably, on that account anſwered, "That, a faſt having lately been obſerved, ſhe did not think proper to appoint another ſo ſoon, but would conſider of it at a more convenient time."

As ſoon as it was known what a mild ſentence the lords had paſſed upon Dr. Sacheverel, thoſe, who ſupported him during his trial, expreſſed an inconceivable gladneſs, as if they had got a victory; bone-fires, illuminations, and other marks of joy, appeared not only in London, but over the whole kingdom. However, much greater effects than theſe rejoicings were produced by it, as will hereafter be ſeen.

This affair being over, and the ſupplies all granted, beſides which little more was done this ſeſſion [a], the queen, on the 5th of April, came to the houſe of peers, and made the following ſpeech to both houſes:

"My lords and gentlemen,

"It is with great ſatisfaction, that I come hither at this time to return you my hearty thanks for the marks of duty and affection, which you have given me through the whole courſe of this ſeſſion.

"And I am to thank you, gentlemen of the houſe of commons, in a very particular manner for the great diſpatch, which you have made in providing, ſo early in the year, ſuch great and effectual ſupplies for the public ſervice. This cannot but make me very deſirous to repeat the aſſurances I gave you at the opening of the ſeſſion, that they ſhould be very carefully applied to the uſes for which you have deſigned them.

"My lords and gentlemen,

"I cannot ſufficiently expreſs to you my great concern, that you have had ſo neceſſary an occaſion of taking up a great part of your time towards the latter end of this ſeſſion,

"I am confident no prince, that ever ſat on the throne, has been more really and ſincerely kind to the church than myſelf, nor ever had a more true and tender concern for its welfare and proſperity than I have, and always ſhall continue to have.

"The ſuppreſſing immorality, and profane and other wicked and malicious libels, is what I have always earneſtly recommended, and ſhall be glad of the firſt opportunity to give my conſent to any laws, that might effectually conduce to that end. But, this being an evil complained of in all times, it is very injurious to take a pretence from thence to inſinuate, that the church is in any danger from my adminiſtration.

"I could heartily wiſh, that men would ſtudy to be quiet, and do their own buſineſs, rather than buſy themſelves in reviving queſtions and diſputes of a very high nature, and which muſt be with an ill intention, ſince they can only tend to foment, but not to heal our diviſions and animoſities.

"For my own part, as it has pleaſed God to give ſucceſs to my endeavours for the union of my two kingdoms, which I muſt ever eſteem as one of the greateſt bleſſings of my reign; ſo I hope his divine goodneſs will ſtill continue favourable, and make me the happy inſtrument of that yet more deſirable union of the hearts of all my people in the bonds of mutual affection, that ſo there may remain no other contention among you, but who ſhall exceed the other in contributing to advance our preſent happineſs, and ſecure the proteſtant ſucceſſion.

"Finding by the advices from abroad, that our army has not yet taken the field, and that the plenipotentiaries of France are ſtill in Holland, I think it proper at preſent to make the prorogation but for a very ſhort time."

Accordingly the lord chancellor prorogued the parliament only to the 18th of April, when it was farther prorogued.

The queen's expreſſing thus her concern, that there was a cauſe given for what had taken up ſo much time, and her wiſhing that all her people would be quiet and mind their own buſineſs, rather than employ themſelves in reviving ſuch diſputes, ſeemed to look a different way from what had been whiſpered about. But ſoon after her proceedings (as will be ſeen) revived thoſe whiſpers again.

As the biſhop of Sarum had been encouraged, this winter, by the queen, to ſpeak more freely to her of her affairs than he had formerly ventured to do, he told her what reports were ſecretly ſpread of her through the nation, as if ſhe favoured the deſign of bringing the pretender to ſucceed to the crown, upon a bargain that ſhe ſhould hold it during her life: He was ſure theſe reports were ſpread about by perſons, who were in the confidence of thoſe, that were believed to know her mind: He was well aſſured, the Jacobites of Scotland had, upon her coming to the crown, ſent up one Ogilby of Boyne, who was in great eſteem among them, to propoſe the bargain to her; he, when he went back, gave the party full aſſurances that ſhe accepted of it: This, he ſaid, he had from ſome of the lords of Scotland, who were then in the ſecret with the profeſſed Jacobites. The earl of Cromarty made a ſpeech in parliament contradicting this, and, alluding, to the diſtinction of the Calviniſts, made between the ſecret and the revealed will of God; he aſſured them, the queen had no ſecret will contrary to that ſhe declared: Yet, at the ſame time, his brother gave the party aſſurances to the contrary. The biſhop told the queen all this, and ſaid, if ſhe was capable of making ſuch a bargain for herſelf, by which her people were to be delivered up and ſacrificed after her death, as it would darken all the glory of her reign, ſo it muſt ſet all her people to conſider of the moſt proper ways of ſecuring themſelves, by bringing over the proteſtant ſucceſſors, in which he told her plainly he would concur, if ſhe did not take effectual means to extinguiſh thoſe jealouſies. He ſaid, her miniſters had ſerved her with that fidelity, and ſuch ſucceſs, that her making a change among them would amaze all the world. The glory of queen Elizabeth's reign aroſe from the firmneſs of her councils, and the continuance of her miniſters, as the three laſt reigns, in which the miniſtry was often changed, had ſuffered extremely by it. He alſo ſhewed her, that, if ſhe ſuffered the pretender's party to prepare the nation for his ſucceeding her, ſhe ought not to imagine, that, when they thought they had fixed that matter, they would ſtay for the natural end of her life, but that they would find ways to ſhorten it; nor did he think, it was to be doubted, but that in 1708, when the pretender was upon the ſea, they had ſome aſſaſſins here, who, upon the news of his landing, would have tried to diſpatch her. It was certain, that their intereſt led them to it, as it was known that their principles did allow of it. This, with a great deal more to the ſame purpoſe, the biſhop laid before the queen, who heard him patiently, and, for the moſt part, ſilently; however, by what ſhe ſaid, ſhe ſeemed deſirous make him think, ſhe agreed to what he had repreſented to her; but he found afterwards it had no effect upon her; for ſhe ſoon began the change of the miniſtry, by the introduction of the duke of Shrewſbury, and diſmiſſion of the earl of Sunderland, as will be related.

It is now time to take a view of the tranſactions abroad, particularly in relation to the negociations for peace, which ſeemed to be proſecuted with warmth.

The treaty at the Hague the laſt year having proved fruitleſs, the French court thought proper to make new overtures of peace. In the beginning of January 1710, the marquis de Torcy ſent another project to Mr. Petkum, reſident of Holſtein, conſiſting of the five following articles:

I. Immediately after the ſigning of the peace, the French king would acknowledge king Charles as king of the whole monarchy of Spain; and not only withdraw all the ſuccours he had given his grandſon, but alſo forbear ſending him any aſſiſtance for the future, and forbid his ſubjects to liſt in his ſervice; and conſent likewiſe, that no part of the monarchy of Spain ſhould ever be united to France.

[a] During the trial, a bill was ordered to be brought in for limiting the number of officers, military or civil, in the houſe of commons. Mr. Wortley Montague was chairman of the grand committee, and general Stanhope, and other leading men of the whig party, promoted it. It paſſed the houſe of commons, but was rejected by the houſe of lords; where not only the earl of Wharton, but the earl of Scarborough, and the lord North and Grey, ſpoke againſt it. The houſe of commons, having examined the ſubject matter of the petition of the creditors of the mine-adventurers, reſolved unanimouſly, March 31, 'That ſir Humphry Mackworth, deputy governor of the mine-adventurers, was guilty of many notorious and ſcandalous frauds, and indirect practices, in violation of the charter granted to the ſaid company, in breach of his truſt, and to the manifeſt wrong and oppreſſion of the proprietors and creditors of the ſaid company:' And, that he might not run away, a bill was ordered to be brought in, 'to prevent ſir Humphry Mackworth leaving this kingdom, and alienating his eſtate, till the end of the next ſeſſion of parliament.' This gentleman had written ſeveral polemical as well as devotional tracts, and was for many years of great note with the high party. For which reaſon, on the change of the miniſtry, nothing more was heard of his proceedings.

A bill was alſo brought in for ſettling the African trade, but was not brought to perfection.

Some of the French refugees ſettled in England, petitioned the houſe of commons, that as the French proteſtants were by the French king declared to be outlawed, and excluded from claiming any inheritance in France, and as, on the contrary, many perſons living in France did frequently claim here and inherit the eſtates of their deceaſed relations, to the prejudice of the remoter relations ſettled in her majeſty's dominions; they begged leave for a bill, to preclude the ſubjects of the French king, reſiding in his dominions, from claiming any eſtates of their relations dying in her majeſty's dominions. Mr. Hampden brought in a bill for this purpoſe; but upon the private ſuggeſtions of ſome eminent French proteſtants, that it would be prejudicial to themſelves and other refugees, who from time to time received conſiderable remittances from their relations in France, the bill was dropped.

II. As for the emperor and empire, the French king would reſtore Straſburg and Briſac; content himſelf with Alſatia, according to the literal ſenſe of the treaty of Munſter; leave the empire Landau; raze the fortifications he had built on the Rhine from Baſil to Phillipſburg; and acknowledge both the king of Pruſſia and the elector of Hanover.

III. As to England, he would acknowledge queen Anne, and the ſucceſſion in the proteſtant line; reſtore Newfoundland, and agree to a mutual reſtitution of all that had been taken in the Weſt Indies on both ſides; demoliſh the fortifications of Dunkirk, and ruin the harbour thereof; and conſent to the pretender's leaving France.

IV. As to the ſtates-general, he would yield to them for a barrier all the places ſpecified in the twenty-ſecond article of the preliminaries, and confirm what he had offered to them with reſpect to their trade.

V. As to the duke of Savoy, that he was willing to grant the demands made for him by the allies; but that he likewiſe demanded, that the electors of Cologne and Bavaria ſhould be reſtored to their eſtates and dignities.

This project being rejected by the allies, the French reſolved to make other overtures, and diſpatched a cabinet courier to the Hague with a letter from the marquis de Torcy to Petkum. The courier arrived the 2d of February, N. S. at the Hague, and brought a freſh project of peace to be communicated to the allies, which differed little from the former, or rather was an amplification of it. It was in the main the ſame with the preliminaries, but caſt into another form, which as effectually deſtroyed the preliminaries, as if it had been put into no form at all, beſides ſeveral material alterations. For the reſtitution of the Spaniſh monarchy, there was a promiſe only. The clauſe in the fourth article, whereby the French king engaged to take in concert with the allies proper meaſures to oblige his grandſon to it, was left out. The reſtoring of the electors of Cologne and Bavaria was inſiſted on as a preliminary, and of the elector of Bavaria in particular to the palatinate, in contradiction to the preliminaries, by which it was agreed it ſhould remain to the elector palatine, whom the emperor had ſome time before put into poſſeſſion of it; than which nothing could be more reaſonable, no prince having ſuffered ſo much from France as one of them, or deſerved ſo ill of the emperor as the other. As for the thirty-ſeventh article, the expedient offered was three towns in Flanders of his own chuſing; an offer of no conſequence, ſince he would never give any towns, that the allies could think a tolerable ſecurity for ſo important a point. But to complete the project, and that the deſign and end of the preliminaries might be entirely ſubverted, it was propoſed, that the execution of all the articles be deferred, till the treaty be concluded, and the ratifications exchanged. The marſhal d'Uxelles and the abbot de Polignac, afterwards a cardinal, were appointed the French king's plenipotentiaries, and to meet thoſe of the allies at Antwerp, or any other place, if the allies would ſend the neceſſary paſſports. This project being communicated by Petkum to the penſionary, and by him to the plenipotentiaries of the emperor and the queen of Great Britain, ſeveral conferences were held between theſe miniſters and the deputies of the ſtates general. The reſult of which was, that the French courier was ſent back, the 13th of February, N. S. with an anſwer from Petkum to the marquis de Torcy's letter, importing, "That the allies required, that his moſt chriſtian majeſty ſhould declare, in plain and expreſſive words, that he conſented to all the preliminaries, except the ſeven and thirtieth article; which done, the allies would ſend paſſports to his miniſters, to treat of an equivalent for that article." When the French court ſaw ſo much firmneſs on the part of the allies, they thought fit to recede, and give the ſtates all the aſſurance the moſt expreſs words could do, that the king agreed to all the preliminaries; and if they would conſent, that his miniſters ſhould come and confer with them on the thirty-ſeventh article, he did not doubt, but what ſhould be propoſed from him, would be to their ſatisfaction. The ſtates therefore ſent back the expreſs (which had brought the French king's anſwer) with paſſports for the French plenipotentiaries. But as the ſuſpicions, which the French gave of their inſincerity, made the ſtates purſue the moſt effectual meaſures for an early campaign; ſo it put them upon taking the beſt care they could, that, if no good ſhould come from the renewing of the conferences, they might prevent the miſchief, which they apprehended was deſigned by them. As they ſaw the ill effects of ſuffering the French miniſters to come into their country, who by their agents, were every where ſtirring up the people againſt the government, as if the war was prolonged without neceſſity; they propoſed upon Antwerp being diſliked, to ſend their deputies, Buis and Vanderduſſen, to treat with the miniſters of France, either at Maerdyke or Gertruydenberg. The French liked neither of theſe places, but, when no other could be obtained, they choſe the laſt, where they arrived the 19th of March, but were met the day before by Buis and Vanderduſſen at Maerdyke, who had a conference with them. The next day they had another with them, which laſted ſeveral hours, and then the deputies ſet out for the Hague to make their report to the ſtates.

By this time the duke of Marlborough was come to the Hague. When the ſtates ſent the paſſports for the French miniſters, they wrote in very preſſing terms to the queen, to ſend over the duke of Marlborough before the end of February. The houſe of commons likewiſe being informed, that advances were made towards renewing a negociation of peace, voted an addreſs to the queen to ſecond the requeſt of the ſtates-general, about ſending the duke of Marlborough to Holland. The lords concurring in the addreſs, it was preſented by both houſes on the 18th of February. As this was the laſt parliamentary reſpect ſhewn the duke, it will not be improper to inſert it at large:

"May it pleaſe your majeſty,

"We your majeſty's moſt dutiful and loyal ſubjects, the lords ſpiritual and temporal, and commons, in parliament aſſembled, having reaſon to believe, that the negociations of peace will ſuddenly be renewed in Holland; and being juſtly apprehenſive of the crafty and inſinuating deſigns of our enemies, to create diviſions among your allies, or by amuſing them with deceitful expectations of peace, to retard their preparations for war, do think ourſelves bound in duty, moſt humbly to repreſent to your majeſty, of how great importance we conceive it is to the intereſt of the common cauſe, that the duke of Marlborough ſhould be abroad at this critical juncture.

"We cannot but take this opportunity to expreſs our ſenſe of the great and unparalleled ſervices of the duke of Marlborough, and, with all imaginable duty, do applaud your majeſty's great wiſdom, in having honoured the ſame perſon with the great characters of general, and plenipotentiary, who, in our humble opinion, is moſt capable of diſcharging two ſuch important truſts. We therefore make it our humble requeſt, That you will be pleaſed to order the duke of Marlborough's immediate departure for Holland, where his preſence will be equally neceſſary, to aſſiſt at the negociations of peace, and to haſten the preparations for an early campaign, which will moſt effectually diſappoint the artifices of our enemies, and to procure a ſafe and honourable peace for your majeſty and your allies."

Her majeſty's anſwer.

"My lords and gentlemen,

"I am ſo ſenſible of the neceſſity of the duke of Marlborough's preſence in Holland, at this critical juncture, that I have already given the neceſſary directions for his immediate departure; and I am very glad to find, by this addreſs, that you concur with me in a juſt ſenſe of the duke of Marlborough's eminent ſervices."

There is no doubt but the ſtates' letter, and the parliament's addreſs, were intended to let the queen ſee what confidence they put in the duke of Marlborough, and how neceſſary they thought his ſervice for carrying on the common cauſe, whether by arms or treaty. But it was without any effect, for, whatever ſoft words the queen made uſe of in her anſwer, ſhe was at that time determined to change miniſters and meaſures. The duke ſet out the next day for Harwich, and landed in Holland the 7th of March, N. S.

Four days after, Buys and Vanderduſſen returned to the Hague. The next morning they had a conference with the duke of Marlborough, the lord Townſhend, and count Zinzendorf, in the preſence of the penſionary and the deputies of the ſtates, wherein they made the following report: 'The French plenipotentiaries had endeavoured, in the firſt place, to perſuade them, that it was the intereſt of the allies to make a ſeparate peace with France, excluſive of Spain; and to render the ſame more effectual, and remove the umbrage the allies ſeemed to have taken, that the king of France might underhand aſſiſt his grandſon, his moſt chriſtian majeſty was willing to enter into the moſt ſolemn engagements to the contrary, and give cautionary towns for the performance of his promiſe.' The deputies of the ſtates anſwered, 'Theſe offers of France were not ſufficient; and, the allies having chiefly undertaken this war for reſtoring the monarchy of Spain to the houſe of Auſtria, they could not treat with the French king (who had placed his grandſon on the Spaniſh throne) without ſtipulating, that he ſhould relinquiſh the ſame; adding, the high allies would be very much ſurprized to hear, that, after the preſſing inſtances, the French had made for theſe conferences, their plenipotentiaries were come to offer what had been already rejected; and would doubtleſs take it as evidence, that their court was not ſincere, and ſought only to amuſe the allies.' Meſſieurs d'Uxelles and de Polignac pretended, 'They did not know that any ſuch thing had been yet offered; but they were told, that, though miniſters might be allowed ſometimes to diſſemble, yet this was not a fit time to make uſe of that privilege, and they ought plainly to ſpeak their minds. Thoſe gentlemen made large proteſtations of their maſter's ſincere inclination for peace: That he could never be prevailed upon to enter into a war with his grandſon, or take any other violent meaſures againſt him. They enlarged on the affection of the Spaniards for that prince; and at laſt declared, they ſaw no other expedient for procuring the Spaniſh monarchy to king Charles, than to give a ſhare of it to king Philip; concluding, if the allies would conſent to give him Naples and Sicily, king Philip might be induced to reſign the reſt to the archduke. They urged, this was the only way for preventing a farther effuſion of chriſtian blood, and which would ſave the allies abundance of trouble, and ſecure to the houſe of Auſtria the monarchy of Spain; whereas, the fortune of the war being uncertain, it might ſtill happen, that the allies would be obliged to make peace upon other terms. The deputies confuted theſe reaſons without any great difficulty; and having repreſented, that ſuch a partition was contrary to the treaties, which the allies had amongſt themſelves, and to the whole tenor of the preliminaries, which the French themſelves acknowledged for the foundation of the treaty, they declared, in expreſs terms, they were ſent to hear what equivalent they had to propoſe for the thirty-ſeventh article of the preliminaries, which they excepted againſt; but not to debate upon any other point. Whereupon they parted.'

The ſame day, to prevent any jealouſies among the other miniſters of the allies, the deputies of the ſtates communicated to the Pruſſian plenipotentiaries what had been tranſacted at Maerdyke; and, the next day, the ſame was in a more ſolemn manner communicated to all the miniſters of the allies, who were deſired to uſe their intereſt with their reſpective maſters, that their troops might be in a readineſs to begin the campaign as early as poſſible, as the moſt effectual means to force the common enemy to accept ſuch conditions, as might ſecure a ſafe and laſting peace.

Six days after, an expreſs from the French plenipotentiaries arrived at the Hague, and acquainted the penſionary, that they had received an anſwer from their court to their laſt diſpatches; and deſired, either that they might be permitted to come to the Hague, or that the ſtates' deputies might again confer with them at Gertruydenberg. The firſt being denied, and the latter granted, Meſſieurs Buys and Vanderduſſen ſet out for Gertruydenberg, where, on the 21ſt and 22d of March, they had ſeveral conferences with the miniſters of France, who again propoſed a ſeparate peace, excluſive of Spain; offering, as before, all manner of ſecurity, that the moſt chriſtian king ſhould not aſſiſt his grandſon: Which being rejected, they propoſed ſeveral ſchemes of partition of the Spaniſh monarchy. They mentioned, in the firſt place, Naples and Sicily for king Philip: Afterwards, that the allies would leave him in poſſeſſion of the kingdom of Arragon: And laſtly, that he would content himſelf with Sicily, Sardinia, and the Spaniſh places on the coaſt of Tuſcany. The Dutch deputies told the French miniſters they were ſurprized to hear of no equivalent for the thirty-ſeventh article of the preliminaries, as their court had promiſed, and on which conſideration alone the preſent negociation was agreed on by the allies; adding, they had no power to treat of any partition. Having ſaid this, they took their leave of the French plenipotentiaries, who ſent an expreſs to Verſailles for farther inſtructions. On the other hand, Buys and Vanderduſſen, being returned to the Hague, made a report of theſe conferences to the penſionary, in the preſence of the Imperial and Britiſh miniſters, who diſpatched expreſſes to their reſpective courts, with an account of the propoſals made by France, which were alſo communicated to the ſtates of Holland, and other provinces.

On the 22d of March, Petkum went from the Hague to Gertruydenberg, but without any commiſſion on the part of the allies, and ſolely at the deſire of the French plenipotentiaries; who, not many days after, having given notice of the return of the expreſs they had ſent to their court, the deputies of the ſtates ſet out again for Gertruydenberg. In theſe new conferences, the French plenipotentiaries inſiſted on a partition of the Spaniſh dominions, according to the ſchemes they had propoſed before; but ſeemed, however, to depart from what they had advanced in relation to Sicily and Sardinia, pretending that was only by way of converſation, and demanded either Naples, with the places on the coaſt of Tuſcany, or the kingdom of Arragon; which occaſioned great debates. The French miniſters mentioned afterwards the article of ſecurity for the performance of what ſhould be ſtipulated in the preliminaries, and propoſed what they expected from the allies for themſelves; but would not explain their meaning on the ſecurity to be given by France to the allies for the performance of the preliminaries. The deputies of the ſtates, being very much diſſatisfied with the plenipotentiaries of France, frankly told them, 'The allies were tired with this way of treating, and therefore expected a full and clear declaration on the part of France on the matters already debated; or elſe they would break off all manner of conference with them.' Hereupon d'Uxelles and Polignac deſired time to ſend another courier to Verſailles, for further inſtructions; pretending, 'That the final reſolution of their maſter depended upon that of the court of Madrid, which was expected about that time at Verſailles.' This dilatory way of treating confirmed the general opinion, that the French had not a real intention to come to a peace, even by way of partition; and that they had no other deſign in theſe conferences, than either to divide or amuſe the allies. In both of which, however, they were equally diſappointed; for prince Eugene being come to the Hague on the 12th of April, and having, with the duke of Marlborough and the deputies of the ſtates, concerted the operations of the next campaign, for the early opening of which, great magazines of dry forage and other neceſſaries had been provided, thoſe two generals ſet out, on the 15th, for Tournay, near which place the confederate forces, quartered on the Maeſe, and in Brabant and Flanders, were ordered to rendezvous.

It was by many expected, that the early ſucceſs of the confederate armies in paſſing the lines, and inveſting Douay, would have quickened the negociation at Gertruydenberg. But Buys and Vanderduſſen being again returned thither on the 24th of April, N. S. at the deſire of the French plenipotentiaries, they had the ſame day a conference, in which they deſired to know, 'Whether by the laſt courier they had received any further inſtructions on the grand affair, for which they were come into theſe provinces?' The French miniſters anſwered, they had no other propoſal to make, but what they had already offered; and told the deputies they had expected the anſwer of the allies on their propoſals. This declaration occaſioned ſome warm debates among them; and the deputies complained of the inſincerity of the French court, telling them in expreſs terms, 'That the miniſters of France having ſo often and ſo poſitively declared by letters, and otherwiſe, that their plenipotentiaries were to propoſe an expedient for the thirty-ſeventh article; the allies could not but be ſurprized, that, after ſo many conferences, they ſhould hear nothing from them but a propoſal for the partition of the Spaniſh monarchy.' And ſo the conferences broke up without any ſucceſs. The next morning the deputies of the ſtates went to take their leave of the French plenipotentiaries, and inſinuated to them in general terms, 'That, the armies being actually in the field, and no advances made in the late conferences towards procuring a general peace, they thought it was to no purpoſe to continue them.' The French miniſters alledged, they had made ſeveral propoſals, which, in their opinion, might have conduced to a general peace; and that they wondered the allies had made none on their part, ſince they were not ſatisfied with thoſe of France. They deſired likewiſe the Dutch deputies to give them their anſwer or declaration in writing, that they might tranſmit it to their court: But, this being denied, the deputies took their leaves, and the French plenipotentiaries diſpatched d'Uxelles's ſecretary to Verſailles. Many were ſtill of opinion, that the late ſucceſs of the allies, and the ſiege of Douay, would have obliged the court of France to alter their ſtyle; and it was then ſtrongly reported, that, in the council held at Verſailles, upon the firſt advice of the allies having paſſed the lines, there appeared a great diviſion among the princes of the blood; ſome inſiſting upon the neceſſity of peace to preſerve France from entire ruin; and others perſiſting in their former opinion, that it was better to venture the fate of another campaign, than to ſubmit to ſuch ignominious terms, as were inſiſted on by the confederates.

Upon the report made at the Hague by Buys and Vanderduſſen of the laſt fruitleſs conferences, the Imperial miniſter thought fit to declare, 'That the emperor, his maſter, could not conſent to any partition of the Spaniſh dominions; and therefore propoſed, that the French plenipotentiaries ſhould be forthwith diſmiſſed.' But the Dutch were of a different opinion, alledging, that, ſince the French miniſters had ſent an expreſs to their court, it was but reaſonable to expect his return, and ſee whether the late progreſs of the confederate arms had cauſed any alteration in the meaſures of that court. The expreſs being returned on the 3d of May, N. S. the French plenipotentiaries wrote the next day the following letter to Petkum:

"We could wiſh our conferences had produced a peace; but as we have no order to make any other propoſition than thoſe we have already made, we patiently expect, that the deputies will come hither, to declare themſelves in a more open manner than they have done hitherto, or to give us our diſmiſſion; or, at leaſt, that the penſionary will ſend us an order to be gone."

This letter being communicated to the ſtates-general, and by the penſionary to the Imperial and Britiſh miniſters, it was thought fit to impart it to all the miniſters of the allies, who, being met on the 9th of May, unanimouſly reſolved, Monſieur Petkum ſhould be deſired to write to the French plenipotentiaries, That, ſeeing they had nothing further to propoſe, and the allies nothing more to ſay than what they had ſaid before, it was to no purpoſe to continue uſeleſs conferences; but he ſhould avoid to ſpeak any thing of diſmiſſion, or order to depart. Petkum having writ a letter to that purpoſe to the French plenipotentiaries, they ſent him the next day an anſwer, importing, They were extremely concerned to ſee, that, notwithſtanding all the advances of the king their maſter for procuring peace, the allies ſo reſolutely refuſed it; and, ſince it was thought fit to break off the negociations, they were preparing to depart. Upon this declaration, it was generally believed, the French plenipotentiaries would have ſet out for Paris, for which purpoſe they had cauſed their baggage to be packed up. But, having received another courier from Verſailles, they gave notice of it to Petkum, deſiring at the ſame time, that the ſtates would once more ſend their deputies to Gertruydenberg. Theſe new conferences met with ſome difficulties, count Zinzendorf, the Imperial miniſter, having inſiſted on his being preſent: But his demand being over-ruled (by reaſon of the other miniſters of the allies, particularly Britiſh, might with equal juſtice have claimed the ſame privilege) Buys and Vanderduſſen ſet out the 23d of May for Gertruydenberg. Being returned to the Hague, they made the next day their report to the penſionary in the preſence of the Imperial and Britiſh miniſters, to this effect: After many proteſtations of their maſter's ſincere inclination to peace, the French plenipotentiaries ſaid his moſt chriſtian majeſty had been prevailed upon to recede from the former demand he had made of Naples, Sicily, Sardinia, and the places on the coaſt of Tuſcany; and therefore was willing, that Naples ſhould remain to the houſe of Auſtria, and that king Philip ſhould content himſelf with Sicily, Sardinia, and the places on the coaſt of Tuſcany. The deputies upon this thought fit, without granting any part of the propoſals, to aſk the French plenipotentiaries, what ſecurity they had to propoſe to the allies for the evacuation of Spain and the Indies by the duke of Anjou, ſuppoſing that theſe propoſals of a partition ſhould be accepted. But they declined to give them any ſatisfactory anſwer. Whereupon the deputies told them, the allies being daily more and more convinced, that the French court continued the negociation, not out of a ſincere deſire of peace, but only to encourage their ſubjects to bear the more patiently the burthen of the war, they would be obliged to break off all further conferences with them, to remove all occaſions of jealouſy amongſt themſelves. The French made great proteſtations of their maſter's ſincerity, and ſaid, they would ſend him another expreſs, with an account of theſe conferences.

The Dutch deputies having made the like report to the ſtates of Holland, they took no final reſolution, but deferred it to another meeting, in order to give the French plenipotentiaries time to receive new inſtructions from their court; which they did the 6th of June, and immediately writ a letter to Petkum, with one incloſed for the penſionary, acquainting him, that, having new overtures to make, they deſired, that Meſſieurs Buys and Vanderduſſen would once again return to Gertruydenberg. The Imperial plenipotentiary renewed his former pretenſion of aſſiſting at the conferences; and being again refuſed, and his orders from Vienna, to perſiſt in his demand, being poſitive, he ſent an expreſs to prince Eugene for his opinion, who adviſed him to follow the example of the Britiſh miniſters, whoſe miſtreſs, though ſhe contributed more to the war than any other of the allies, was yet ſo well ſatisfied of the wiſdom and integrity of the ſtates-general, as to truſt to them that preliminary negociation of peace.

Buys and Vanderduſſen being abſent from the Hague, when the French courier, ſent to Petkum, arrived there, they did not ſet out for Gertruydenberg till the 14th of June. The two following days they had ſeveral conferences with the French plenipotentiaries, who declared, Their maſter receded from the demand made in the laſt conference, of the Spaniſh places on the coaſt of Tuſcany, and would content himſelf with Sicily and Sardinia for king Philip; and uſe all poſſible means to perſuade his grandſon to conſent to that partition: This required ſome time; but, if that prince would not acquieſce in this propoſal, the moſt chriſtian king, though he could by no means declare war againſt his grandſon, would yet furniſh a ſum of money towards the charges of a war to be continued againſt him, till he had ſurrendered Spain and the Weſt Indies to the houſe of Auſtria. This declaration of the French plenipotentiaries being reported to the penſionary, in the preſence of the Imperial and Britiſh miniſters, occaſioned two or three conferences between them, and confirmed the general opinion, that the French had no other deſign, than either to amuſe the allies, or to decoy them to a ſeparate peace, excluſive of Spain; where, notwithſtanding their promiſes to the contrary, they might underhand aſſiſt king Philip, and carry on the war with ſuch advantage, as might in the end tire out, if not exhauſt the principal members of the alliance. The Imperial miniſter was ſtill of opinion, that, ſince the French plenipotentiaries did not propoſe any equivalent or expedient for the thirty-ſeventh article of the preliminaries, which was the main intention of the preſent negociation, they ought to be immediately diſmiſſed; and therefore moved, that Petkum, who, on the 21ſt of June, went to Gertruydenberg, as he pretended, for ſome private concerns, ſhould be deſired to ſignify to the French plenipotentiaries, that the allies would not conſent to any further conferences. But it was thought more adviſeable to ſend him to make the following declaration on the part of the allies: I. The laſt propoſal made by the French king, of contributing a ſum of money towards the charges of the war, to oblige the duke of Anjou to quit the monarchy of Spain, and content himſelf with Sardinia and Sicily, if he would not do it voluntarily, was not acceptable to the allies upon ſeveral accounts; and namely, becauſe this would produce but a ſeparate, and not a general peace, which was the end the allies propoſed to themſelves. II. The allies inſiſted to have Spain and the Indies delivered up, according to the tenor of the preliminaries. III. This foundation being laid and agreed upon, the allies would conſent to continue the conferences on other articles. The French miniſters deferring their anſwer to this declaration, Buys and Vanderduſſen were directed to ſend an expreſs to Gertruydenberg, who returned to the Hague the 10th of July, with an anſwer, importing, "That, by virtue of their powers and inſtructions, they were always in a condition to explain the ſentiments of the king their maſter; and therefore deſired, that the deputies would come once more to Gertruydenberg." This being communicated to count Zinzendorf and the lord Townſhend, thoſe miniſters met at the penſionary's, where, after a long debate, it was reſolved to ſend back the Dutch deputies to Gertruydenberg with this inſtruction, That they ſhould inſiſt upon a plain and poſitive anſwer to the articles delivered to the plenipotentiaries by Petkum. Buys and Vanderduſſen ſet out the next day, and had a conference with the French plenipotentiaries, that laſted about four hours, though to as little purpoſe as the former. For the Dutch deputies inſiſting on the declaration made on the part of the allies by the reſident of Holſtein, the French ſaid, They had no further inſtructions, but would ſend another expreſs to their maſter for a final anſwer, which they would communicate upon the return of the courier, for whoſe journey fifteen days were allowed. The Dutch deputies being by this time convinced of the inſincerity of the French, Vanderduſſen could not forbear making ſome warm expoſtulations about it; to which the Abbot de Polignac replied in very high terms, not without reproaching the Dutch with ingratitude towards the crown of France, which had been their main ſupport upon their defection from Spain. Whereupon the conference, which proved to be the laſt, broke off unkindly. The French miniſters, not thinking it proper to demand another interview, on the 20th of July ſent a letter to the penſionary, wherein they repreſented the propoſals made in the laſt conference by the deputies to be unjuſt, and impoſſible to be executed, and complained of the ill treatment they pretended they had received in contempt of their character; of the injurious, falſe, and ſcandalous libels, which had been ſuffered to be diſperſed during their ſtay at Gertruydenberg, to inflame the minds of thoſe, whom they were endeavouring to reconcile; and of all the letters, which they either received or writ, having been opened, in breach of the public faith. This letter being communicated to the ſtates-general, they came to a reſolution, 'That the contents of it concerned not only their ſtate, but likewiſe all the allies, and therefore they thought it their duty to communicate it to their miniſters reſiding at the Hague, that every thing might be done in concert with them, as it had been hitherto. That the French plenipotentiaries rejecting, by their anſwer, the propoſitions made to them, declaring, that it was uſeleſs to hold any more conferences upon theſe propoſitions, and thereby breaking off the negociations on that ſubject, nothing more remained to be done on the part of the allies, than to acquieſce therein, and to enter into no more conferences, as long as the enemy ſhould continue in ſuch ſentiments. And the Sieurs Buys and Vanderduſſen were, by this reſolution, required to ſignify the ſame by a letter to the French plenipotentiaries, without entering into a debate upon the contents of their letter, notwithſtanding it might be eaſily confuted, as well with reſpect to things as words.' Accordingly Buys and Vanderduſſen returned a ſhort anſwer to the French miniſters, importing, 'That, ſince their court would not give a ſufficient ſecurity for the delivering up of Spain, it was to no purpoſe to continue the conferences.' Upon this the French plenipotentiaries ſet out the 25th of July, from Gertruydenberg, to return home[b]. It was obſerved, that, about this time, the French began to talk of peace with [b] Dr. Hare, in his fourth letter to a Tory Member, part II. p. 42. obſerves, 'that the ill ſucceſs of theſe negociations was entirely owing to the French; the king of France having put it out of the power of the allies to make a general peace, by refuſing to give them Spain and the Indies, without which a good peace could never be made, or the end, for which they went into the war, tolerably anſwered. And the more, ſays he, this affair is examined into, the more you will be convinced of the inſincerity of the French, and the neceſſity the allies were under to act as they did.

First, it is indiſputably true, and confeſſed on all hands, that the reſtitution of Spain and the Indies, whatever became of the monarchy, was promiſed from the very firſt. They did not pretend to deſire ſo much as one ſingle conference for peace on any other terms.

Now if the king could do what he promiſed, what became of the pretended impoſſibility? And if he could not, what could he mean by ſuch a promiſe but to amuſe and deceive? But, if he deſigned that, then it undeniably follows, all theſe negociations, on his part, have been one continued cheat from the beginning to the end. And, that this is the truth of the caſe, I have given you many proofs both in my laſt letter and in this. All the expedients, he propoſed, were ſo many ſhams, and had no other meaning in them but to gain time, quiet his people, and ſow jealouſies among the allies; and defeat, if poſſible, by a treaty thoſe he cannot defeat by his arms. What elſe could he mean by propoſing a partition as an expedient, and yet refuſing to let it have the effect of one? To aſk the ſtates to conſent to a partition, and not ſuffer them to aſk for what, is a little too barefaced. Could they think the Dutch would conſent to this expedient, for the ſake of a general peace, without being ſure a general peace would be purchaſed by it? I ſcarce believe, they expected that of them; but nevertheleſs hoped, they ſhould gain their ends by it; and that the very hearkening to the propoſal of a partition would create jealouſies, and divide the allies, in which they did not judge very ill; for the conferences upon this foot very much alarmed the miniſters of the emperor and king Charles, who were utterly averſe to a partition of any kind; and it was with great difficulty they were prevailed with to conſent to let the conferences with the miniſters of France be managed by the deputies of the ſtates, without their being themſelves preſent at them, which would have rendered the negociations for a general peace much more difficult than they were, though France had been in earneſt for it. And this was all France aimed at by propoſing a partition: Some of the allies, they knew, would be extremely againſt it, while the ſtates, they hoped, would, for ſo deſirable an end, be willing enough to come into it. And this difference they promiſed themſelves much from. But, for fear this difficulty ſhould be overcome, and the allies ſhould take them at their words, and accept ſome of the expedients offered, they had another reſort behind, by which they could at any time confound all that had been done, and had great hopes, at the ſame time, that the alliance might be broke by it. And that was this; they pretended they could not execute any part of the preliminaries, unleſs the allies would oblige themſelves not to make any further demands, than what were already contained in thoſe articles, or that they ſhould be now declared; which is contrary to the 32d article, in which there is a power expreſsly reſerved for the empire, the four aſſociated circles, the kings of Portugal and Pruſſia, and the duke of Savoy, to make what further demands they ſhould find reaſonable. This the French inſiſted on for no other reaſon, but becauſe they knew it was impoſſible for the allies in juſtice to comply with it, unleſs the reſpective powers abovenamed, had had miniſters at the Hague, with full inſtructions from each of them, which they knew they neither had, nor could have, without loſing a great deal of time. Beſides, this demand of the French is contrary, not only to the expreſs terms of the preliminaries, but to the very nature of them; for, if nothing is to be left to be adjuſted at a general treaty, how does a preliminary treaty differ from it? But it was very much for the purpoſe of the French,—who meant nothing but to amuſe the allies, and make miſchief, to inſiſt on it; which accordingly they did, being ſure which ever part the allies took, they ſhould find their account in it. For, the allies would not agree to this demand, then there was always a handle ready to break off the treaty upon: As long as further demands may be made upon them, they cannot be ſure any conceſſions will procure a laſting peace, and they ſhall be in danger of having the war renewed upon them, after all they ſhall have done to put an end to it. And this is very plauſible and ſpecious; but has at the bottom nothing at all in it. But, if the allies had complied with this demand, and declared no further demands ſhould be inſiſted on, what a fine game would the French have had? They had nothing elſe to do to break the alliance, but to repreſent to ſome of theſe members of it, how their intereſts were neglected, and what poor terms the maritime powers and the emperor had made for them. You ſee, gentlemen, the utmoſt your allies aſk for you; you ſee the whole you are to expect from them. Theſe are the terms they have made for you; and they have promiſed to oblige you to acquieſce in them. Are theſe allies worth adhering to? Come over to the intereſt of the king, and ſupport his firſt pretenſions; and you will find both him and his grandſon more grateful. You ſhall have this and that, and the other good thing; this town, that principality, ſo much money, ſuch a valuable match; in ſhort, terms infinitely more advantageous to your maſters, and the intereſt of their families, than any thing the allies will do for you. This artifice the French found the good effects of the laſt war; and their fingers itch to be at it again; for this was the way they drew off a certain prince then, which was the ruin of that confederacy. After their emiſſaries had been for ſome time in Holland, propoſing, under-hand, terms of peace, and endeavouring to find, what articles the principal allies would be content with for the reſt; when they had learned this, the uſe they made of it, was to ſeduce one of them, by offering much better terms than had been aſked for him. The bait took, and it was agreed to leave the ſide he thought himſelf ill uſed by. Nothing remained but to contrive how this might be done moſt decently. The way agreed on was to invade his country with a great army, and lay ſiege to his capital. What could the unhappy prince do in theſe circumſtances? He is in the utmoſt danger; his allies neither do, nor can ſupport him. There is no ſafety for him but in a peace. Thus a member was brought off from the laſt confederacy; and the ſame play they want to be again at. This is ſo certain, that we are ſure they were trying this very trick with the ſame prince. While the marquis de Torcy made at the Hague ſuch mighty difficulties in complying with the terms demanded for the duke of Savoy, whom he pretended his maſter had great reaſon to be diſſatisfied with, this falſe perfidious court was at that very time tempting him with better offers at Turin; but that prince underſtood his intereſts too well, to hearken again to them.

This is the uſe the miniſters of France hoped to make of this demand of theirs, if the allies had been weak enough to have agreed to it. But they were not to be ſo impoſed on, nor would they act in ſo arbitrary a manner, as to force any of their allies to ſubmit to terms made againſt their conſent, or without their knowledge; and therefore could not, by all the artifice of France, be prevailed with to preclude them from making ſuch further demands as they ſhould think reaſonable. But to ſhew they were ſincere, they were willing to deſiſt from all further demands for themſelves, according to the 31ſt article. This they could do; more injuſtice they could not. And, had the French been in earneſt on their part, they would, without difficulty, have truſted the allies in this point; for they could not, with any colour of reaſon, believe, that, when the maritime powers and the emperor were ſatisfied, they would renew the war at the end of two months, or what other time ſhould have been agreed on, for the ſake of any further demands on the part of the other allies, which it would not be very reaſonable for France to grant them. And therefore it cannot be thought they meant any thing elſe by urging this point, but to make miſchief, and, draw the allies, if they could, into a ſnare; and, if that did not ſucceed, that they might always have it in their power to go off.

To reduce the whole management of the French in this affair under one ſhort view: They preſs the allies to an impoſſibility contrary to the preliminaries, and complain at the ſame time of being preſſed to an impoſſibility themſelves, though the allies aſk nothing but what they themſelves offered from the beginning; and the ſteps they have taken are very extraordinary. First, Negociations are broke off upon the ſingle point of the 37th article. Then an expedient is offered of cautionary towns; then the conferences are again deſired to be renewed, upon repeated aſſurances of agreeing to all the other preliminaries, except the 37th. Then, as what would ſolve all difficulties, a partition is propoſed, which is at laſt reduced to Sicily and Sardinia. And what is all this for? Will they ſign the preliminaries if this partition is agreed to? By no means; they take the very aſking of this queſtion for a plain deſign in the allies to break off the conferences; and they, who would have given you before all the preliminaries, except the 37th article and three cautionary towns, now take it very ill you will not accept the preliminaries, not only without that article, but without any cautionary towns, or other expedients, though Sardinia and Sicily be taken out of them, without having for this any more ſecurity given than before, that Spain and the Indies ſhall be reſtored, though the propoſing a partition could not poſſibly have any other meaning in it. For it was propoſed as an expedient; but for what? To leave the allies where it found them? No ſure; but to remove the pretended difficulty of evacuating Spain and the Indies, in favour of king Charles. But, if this be the plain meaning of this propoſal, how came the treaty to break off upon this point? What can be more unjuſt, than to deſire the allies to quit part of what the preliminaries give them, for the ſake of the reſt, and yet not tell them, which way the reſt is to be had? What is more ridiculous than to preſs the ſtates to all the inconveniences, which the conſenting to a partition might be attended with, without allowing them the leaſt advantage from it? How can one reconcile the aſking a partition at the beginning of the conferences, and then breaking them off, becauſe the allies deſire to be ſecured of the effect propoſed from it? Now after all that has been ſaid upon this ſubject, can there be any doubt, which ſide is in fault, or at whoſe door it lies, that thoſe conferences did not ſucceed?—It is plain they broke off, becauſe the French would not ſecure to the allies the reſtitution of Spain and the Indies. And it is as plain, the French ought to have done this: It is what they promiſed from the beginning, and undertook for at the opening of thoſe conferences, the propoſal of a partition being incapable of any other fair conſtruction. And therefore the blame of the rupture can lie only upon the French, or on thoſe who have encouraged them to act thus, by diſcovering the mighty haſte they were in for peace. For whether the French, when they firſt began theſe conferences, intended they ſhould end as they did, may poſſibly be a queſtion. I muſt own, when I heard they had propoſed a partition, I thought the neceſſity of their affairs had at laſt forced them to be ſincere; and that they would have ſtruck up a peace before Doway was taken, that the allies might not extend their conqueſts beyond the bounds of their preliminaries. And perhaps, even after this, they might balance with themſelves, and were for ſome time irreſolute with intention to conſent, or not conſent to the allies, as they found themſelves preſſed by the war. And, could the duke of Marlborough have either beat their army, or beſieged Arras, I believe they would have thought the king might with honour have abandoned his grandſon, after he had ſacrificed ſo much for the ſupport of him; and the ſafety of France would have excuſed to all the world his quitting Spain. And it was with this view principally they kept their miniſters ſo long at Gertruydenberg, that they might be upon the ſpot, to clap up a peace immediately, if there ſhould be occaſion. By this they were ſure to have an advantage, in caſe of a battle, which ever way it turned; for, if they loſt it, they would have been able to prevent the fatal conſequences of a great defeat by cloſing with the terms of the allies, before a victory could be purſued; and, if they had won it, they would have made uſe of the firſt conſternation, which the loſs of a battle would have put the Dutch indifference, either, as ſome conjectured, in hopes of a diverſion in the north, or, which is much more probable, from an expectation, that the ferment, raiſed in England by the late trial of Dr. Sacheverel, would be ſo induſtriouſly fomented and improved by their friends, as to produce a favourable turn. On the other hand, the ſtates-general were ſo exaſperated by the late evaſive conduct of the court of France, that on the 27th of July, N. S. they came to another vigorous reſolution, in confutation of the letter from d'Uxelles and Polignac to the penſionary, and in particular to ſhew, 'That the enemy had departed from the foundation on which the negociation had begun, and ſtudied pretences to evade the execution of the capital points, the reſtitution of Spain and the Indies; and, in ſhort, that France had no other view, than to ſow and create jealouſy and diſunion among the allies. As to the complaint of the plenipotentiaries relating to their perſons, the pretended contempt of their character, the publication of abuſive libels, the opening of their letters, the hindering the making any viſits to them and their lodging, as if they had been in a kind of priſon; the ſtates obſerved, That, purſuant to the agreement, the plenipotentiaries came without any character, for which reaſon no ceremonial was obſerved on either ſide; but that all manner of conſideration was had for their birth, quality, and merit. That libels were ſeverely forbidden in Holland, and the authors and printers liable to puniſhment. That none of the many couriers, the French plenipotentiaries had received and diſpatched, had been ſtopped; nor were any of the letters, which they ſent by the ordinary poſt, intercepted. That no perſon was ever hindered from going to them; nor was any order given to take notice who viſited them. But as, in all frontier towns, it is the cuſtom, that none enter, unleſs they declare who they are, both at the gate and to the governor; it ought not to be thought ſtrange, nor ought exceptions to be taken, if this cuſtom were not diſcontinued during the ſtay of the French miniſters at Gertruydenberg. And, in the Dutch into, to preſs them to a peace on their terms. That this was the moſt the French meant by theſe conferences, is evident from what was doing at the ſame time in Spain. I have obſerved before, that either the Spaniards or we muſt have been deceived; and therefore the French kept it in their power, by the moſt artful ways they could, to do either as they found moſt convenient; but that the king's inclination and intereſt were too well known to leave room to doubt, that he would keep his promiſe to the Spaniards, if he could. Accordingly we ſee, he did not only enable his grandſon, as I have obſerved before, to put Spain into the beſt poſture of defence it was capable of, and ſupply him with every thing that was neceſſary; but promiſed to make the ſiege of Gironne early in the ſpring, and was making a new offenſive and defenſive treaty with him during theſe very conferences. And the aſſiſtance and aſſurance, the duke of Anjou had given him, made him think of nothing leſs than quitting Spain. In the ſpring he pretended to have an army of one hundred and twenty-two battalions, and one hundred and forty-five ſquadrons, beſides the troops that were coming to him from Flanders. Before the conferences begun, the king received an expreſs from his grandſon, to acquaint him with the zeal the Caſtilians expreſs for him, and his reſolution to ſtand by them; and the French miniſter at Madrid in April gave out, that the conferences were broke off. At the ſame time the duke of Anjou was haſtening to put himſelf at the head of his army, but was ſtopped by the affair of the duke de Medina Celi; which, as great a myſtery as it was, was probably at bottom a French trick. It was very natural for the Spaniards to take umbrage at the conferences, and to think it was time to take care of themſelves; and that, if the king ſhould in earneſt abandon them, it was to no purpoſe for them to adhere to his grandſon. To feel their pulſe upon this point, it is probable the French miniſters, either Belcour or Ibbeville, or ſome others of their emiſſaries, had pretended to treat with ſome of the grandees upon this foot, and acquainted them, that the king's affairs would not permit him to ſupport his grandſon any longer, and that the king did not expect they ſhould ruin themſelves to maintain him on the throne, ſince in that caſe it would be impracticable: But that, if they would diſpoſe him to reſign, the king would endeavour to get ſome partition for him. It is extremely probable, this trick was tried at Madrid, to find how the grandees were inclined to act on this occaſion; the duke of Medina in particular, who was the firſt miniſter; and that, when they had got out of him the ſenſe of him and his friends on this nice ſubject, the uſe they made of it was to betray him to the duke of Anjou. And poſſibly the thing went farther; and that in concert with the French, to ſave the king's honour, they had agreed to ſeize his perſon, and carry him off; which I remember, was the firſt report we had upon that miniſter's diſgrace. After this affair was over, which had ſufficiently intoxicated the Spaniards, the duke of Anjou left Madrid, and joined his army near Lerida. And the duke of Noailles was advanced to the banks of the Ter, the river Gironne ſtands upon, to favour his deſigns. In June the duke of Anjou was ſo ſanguine, that he made no doubt of being able to drive king Charles out of Catalonia that campaign, eſpecially if the duke of Noailles could but make the ſiege of Gironne. This appears at large in ſome letters of his, that were intercepted, to the king and the duke of Burgundy, writ to congratulate the marriage of the duke of Berry, which he ſhews himſelf not all pleaſed with. Upon his diſappointment in Catalonia, when he could neither attack marſhal Staremberg, nor beſiege Balaguer, he grew diſſatisfied with his Spaniſh generals: And in July both he and his princeſs ſolicit the king in very preſſing terms to ſend the duke of Vendoſme to him; which was ſoon complied with, and, that the duke might have no apprehenſions of the king's deſigning to abandon him, he entered into a new alliance with him. This alliance was framing while the miniſters of France were at Gertruydenberg; which place they left but the 25th, and the 8th of Auguſt, or before the articles of this new treaty were known publicly at Paris: which makes it plain to a demonſtration, that this treaty was forming before the conferences were broke off.

From this account, it is exceeding evident, that the French were taking the moſt effectual methods to ſupport the Duke of Anjou, and make the Spaniards faithful to him, while they were perſuading the allies, the king would in earneſt abandon him, and give him no aſſiſtance directly or indirectly; nay, while they were making terms for him, upon which they would oblige him to reſign. And, if this be not inſincere in the laſt degree, I would be glad to know what is. If he was ſincere, why did he treat for a general peace, when either he would not, or could not make the neceſſary conditions of it practicable? Why, when he meant nothing but a ſeparate peace, did he not frankly from the beginning tell the allies, that he was willing to make terms with them for himſelf, but that he could make none for Spain? Was this for any thing elſe but to amuſe the allies, who, he knew, would flatly have refuſed entering into any negociations, if he had ſpoke out plainly what he meant? Did not he intend, from the beginning, to defeat by an exception a general peace, while he pretended all the while to be for it? As old managers ſometimes do with a bill in parliament, which they contrive ſhould be loſt by an amendment, while they would be thought zealous for it; which they could not have been able to effect, had they openly declared againſt the bill itſelf. Thus they gain the point they would have, by ſeeming to be for what in truth they would not have: And the ſame part the king of France has acted with reſpect to peace, but not with the ſame ſucceſs. He has not got yet what he wants, I mean a ſeparate peace, by affecting to treat for a general one, which he would of all things keep off. A man muſt ſhut his eyes very hard, not to ſee the French meant nothing by theſe conferences but to amuſe the allies, and keep it in their power to make what uſe of them they ſhould have occaſion for; and that they never deſigned to conſent to what was neceſſary to make a general peace practicable. They meant either no peace at all, or only a ſeparate one for themſelves; which they hoped from the temper of the Dutch, the nature of their government, and the experience they have formerly had of them, they might be frightened into. To which end they affected from the very firſt conference to let nothing fall from them, that might look like a deſire to retard the operations of the campaign, but on their own part threatened what mighty things they would do upon the Rhine and in Spain; and, to intimidate them the more, marſhal Villars condeſcended to the mean artifice of writing to the French miniſters, from time to time, letters filled with the groſſeſt gaſconade, what a brave army he had; how deſirous they were to come to an engagement; and that, if the allies had a mind to a battle, they ſhould meet with no intrenchments, but ſhould find him ready to receive them in an open plain. Theſe poor tricks they fancied would paſs upon the Dutch deputies; but they were too well known to be believed; and the event ſhewed there was nothing elſe in all theſe boaſts aimed at, but to deceive; for, the minute Doway began to capitulate, the marſhal retired to ſafe ground, and intrenched with all his might, and dared not offer them battle all the reſt of the campaign, though more battalions had been weakened by the ſieges of Doway and Bethune, than the battle of Blenheim was fought with; and almoſt as many more were afterwards at the ſame time employed in the ſieges of St.-Venant and Aire. But theſe and all the other artifices of France could not delude or drive the States to quit the common intereſt, or induce the allies to hearken to a ſeparate peace with the French, who, they knew, were taking the moſt effectual means to make the reduction of Spain impoſſible, while they were treating of terms for the ſurrender of it. But nothing can diſcover more plainly the inſincerity of France, than what happened after theſe conferences were ended. Two days after their plenipotentiaries were gone, the duke of Anjou received a conſiderable diſgrace at Almanara; and, in about three weeks after that, his army was entirely defeated at Saragoſſa, beyond a poſſibility of maintaining his ground, or recovering his affairs, without the aſſiſtance of France. Here was now a fair occaſion for the French king to ſhew himſelf; his language had been all along, that he could not be active to dethrone his grandſon, but would conſent abſolutely to abandon him, if that would procure a peace. The allies cannot take his bare word: His miniſters make the moſt ſolemn proteſtations in his name, and give repeated aſſurances of this in the moſt expreſs words, and complain heavily, that they are not believed. Now, in leſs than a month after the conferences were ended, there happens the beſt opportunity in the world for the king to ſhew his great ſincerity: The obſtruction to a peace is the evacuation of Spain. Let now the king but keep his word, and be paſſive only, and the thing will do itſelf: The allies cannot fail of Spain, if the king does not ſupport his grandſon againſt them. What part now does the king take? Does he ſend to the allies, that he will abandon his grandſon in earneſt, if that will content them? Nothing like it; he balances, indeed, for ſome time what to do, and holds frequent councils: But for what? Not becauſe he was in any doubt, whether he ſhould act agreeably to his word, or ſhew he is ſincere; for that I have already obſerved he could not be; he muſt deceive either us or the Spaniards. All the debate therefore was, which he ſhould do: At firſt their affairs ſeemed to be in ſo deſperate a condition, as to be beyond retrieve; and that all the ſupport he could give his grandſon would be inſignificant: and therefore there were ſome thoughts of making a virtue of neceſſity, and to procure a peace to France by abandoning Spain; ſince, if he did not abandon it, it muſt be loſt. And had the action of Saragoſſa happened a month ſooner, it is very likely it had proved ſo, for the hands of the French were too full of other work to ſend any conſiderable force to Spain, till the campaign was in other parts, Savoy particularly, drawing to an end. After many conſultations, it is reſolved to make the utmoſt efforts to ſupport the duke of Anjou, notwithſtanding all their pretences to leave him to himſelf, or rather to perſuade him to quit a kingdom, which, without their help, all the world ſees he could not have kept. What ſucceſs this aſſiſtance, that has been given him, has had, I need not tell you; nor what further miſchief the common cauſe is like to ſuffer from it. It is a great pity the conference did not laſt one month longer, which would have put the French under a neceſſity of keeping their word, or in the moſt infamous manner breaking it, to ſupport a cauſe they had ſo often, and with ſo much ſeeming earneſtneſs, promiſed to renounce. As it is, there is but one excuſe for them,—which thoſe, I am arguing againſt, had rather ſhould not be made; and that is, to plead, that the caſe is altered: Affairs are not in the ſame condition they were in, when they made thoſe promiſes. They have a political obſervatory at Paris, where the marquis de Torcy and the French miniſters frequently examine what appearances there are in the heavens of all the countries in war with them; and according to theſe they take their meaſures of war and peace; and it is by this they juſtify their aſſiſting the duke of Anjou. What paſſed in Spain, the 20th of Auguſt, they thought ſufficiently balanced by what happened to the north-weſt of them the 19th. What preceded that phænomenon, and has ſince followed it, has determined the French not only to ſupport the Duke of Anjou, but to deſiſt for the preſent from all further offers of peace, by which we are as much plunged into the war, as we were ſeven years ago; and there ſeems no remedy for it, but, what is worſe than the diſeaſe, an ill peace.'

laſt place, they could not call a kind of priſon the town, which they pitched upon for their reſidence, and which they preferred to Antwerp, a large and noble city.

On the 7th of Auguſt, the lord Townſhend delivered to the ſtates-general a memorial, wherein he acquainted them, that the queen entirely approved their reſolution, in anſwer to the letter of the French plenipotentiaries, and all the ſteps they had taken during the late negociations; giving them, at the ſame time, freſh aſſurances of her majeſty's firm reſolution to proſecute the war with all poſſible vigour, till the enemy was brought to accept ſuch terms of peace, as might ſecure the tranquility of the Chriſtian world.

By this time the confederate armies under prince Eugene and the duke of Marlborough had made a conſiderable progreſs in Flanders. On the 14th of April, the earl of Albemarle, governor of Tournay, in concert with lieutenant-general Cadogan, cauſed the caſtle of Mortagne to be attacked, which was executed with ſo much ſucceſs, that the garriſon, conſiſting of a captain, four ſubalterns, five ſerjeants, and 65 private men, ſurrendered priſoners of war. But the next morning the enemy retook that poſt with about ſixty men. The earl, reſolving to be maſter of it again, made a ſecond attack with ſix hundred men of the garriſon of Tournay; and though the French garriſon, which conſiſted of two hundred grenadiers, were aſſiſted by twelve or fifteen galliots from Condé; yet the confederate troops, being ſupported by a detachment from the body of Count Feltz, and favoured by the cannon, which they had planted on the heights of Munde, the enemy were obliged again to ſurrender priſoners of war. The allies, conſidering the great conveniency and advantageous ſituation of that poſt, left there two hundred men, and four pieces of cannon.

The French had all the winter been ſtrengthening their lines for covering Doway, and other frontier towns, and boaſted they were impregnable; but not being able to ſupply their troops with proviſion, and eſpecially forage for their horſe, the two confederate generals, with count Tilly and monſieur de Claerbergen, one of the ſtates' deputies, made all the neceſſary diſpoſitions for advancing towards the enemy's lines; and the army began their march in two columns; the right commanded by the duke of Marlborough to Pont-a-Vendin, and the reſt by prince Eugene to Pont Oby, on the Deule. This march was ſo well contrived, and ſo ſudden, that notwithſtanding the great preparations, which the French had made for fortifying and defending their lines; the chevalier de Luxemburg, being for that purpoſe encamped with about four thouſand men near St. Amand, and the marſhal de Monteſquieu, having aſſembled about forty battalions, and ſixty ſquadrons, near Lens and Bethune; yet the prince of Wertemberg, and lieutenant-general Cadogan, with a detachment of fifteen battalions and fifty ſquadrons from the duke of Marlborough's column, entered thoſe lines at Pont-a-Vendin, without any oppoſition. The few troops they had there, for the defence of that poſt, retired without firing a gun; and the battalions and ſquadrons, poſted near Lens and Bethune, made likewiſe their retreat, partly towards Arras, and partly towards Doway. The allies having laid bridges over the Scarpe, the prince of Heſſe Caſſel was detached with twelve ſquadrons to fall upon their rear; but they broke down ſo many bridges, and retired ſo faſt, that he could not put his deſigns in execution, and only took a few priſoners. The army under the duke of Marlborough paſſed the Scarpe, encamping his right near Vitri, and his left at Gouy; the extremity of his left at Gouleſſin. The army under prince Eugene remained on the other ſide of the river to inveſt Doway, the ſiege of which was reſolved upon; and for that purpoſe lieutenant-general Cadogan marched to take poſt at Pont-a-Rache, and other detachments were made to open a communication over the lower Scarpe with Liſle and Tournay. The enemy quitted St. Amand, Marchienne, and the abbey of Haſnon below Doway; and their army retired towards Cambray, upon the news that the confederates had paſſed the Scarpe at Vitri. This opened the way to Doway, which was immediately inveſted.

On the 8th of May, eight hundred men were detached from prince Eugene's army to attack the caſtle of Pignonville near Fort Scarpe, which would have diſturbed the beſiegers in their approaches; and after an hour's reſiſtance, the garriſon, conſiſting of about one hundred men, ſurrendered priſoners of war. At the ſame time the neceſſary preparations for the attack of Doway being made, forty battalions were appointed for that ſervice, under the command of the prince of Anhalt Deſſau, and the prince of Naſſau Frieſland, both generals of foot. And, on the 4th at night, the trenches were opened with ſo much precaution and regularity, that the men were covered before they were perceived from the town; ſo that all the fire, which the enemy then made, proved ineffectual. The ſiege was carried on in the uſual methods till the 7th; when about ten at night the beſieged, to the number of one thouſand foot, (moſt grenadiers) and two hundred dragoons, made a vigorous ſalley, under the command of the duke of Mortemar, againſt the left attack, commanded by the prince of Naſſau; put the workmen into great diſorder, and levelled ſome paces of the parallel. Colonel Sutton's regiment ſuffered very much, being the firſt that ſupported the workmen; but, Macartney's and ſome other regiments coming up to their relief, the enemy were repulſed with conſiderable loſs, and purſued to their counterſcarp. The beſiegers had above three hundred men killed or wounded upon this occaſion, and among the latter, lieutenant-colonel Gledhil, who was taken priſoner.

By this time the enemy's troops began to aſſemble in different bodies near Bethune, Bapaume, Arras, Cambray, Landreci, and behind the river Somme; and marſhal Villars, whom the French court had appointed to command their forces in the Netherlands, being arrived at Peronne on the 14th of May, the confederate generals received advice, that he deſigned to paſs the Scheld, between Bouchain and Denain, in order to advance towards the allies. And indeed he made ſuch ſpeeches to his army, that it was generally believed he would venture a battle, rather than look on and ſee Doway loſt.

On the 17th of May, in the morning, the beſieged made a ſecond ſalley with nine companies of grenadiers, and a detachment of dragoons upon the left. But colonel Preſton, who commanded there, gave them ſo warm a reception, that, upon the firſt firing of his men, the enemy retired with precipitation. The 21ſt, at night, the beſieged made another ſalley on the left, wherein ſeveral men were killed on both ſides; and, notwithſtanding they were diſappointed, they made a fourth attempt on the trenches, the 23d at night. But, the beſiegers, who had notice of it, having killed about twenty of their men, upon the firſt diſcharge, the reſt retired in great confuſion.

During theſe tranſactions before Doway, Villars ſet out from Peronne, and arrived the ſame day at Cambray, where he held a grand council of war, in which it was reſolved, immediately to aſſemble the French army, in order to attempt the relief of Doway. Accordingly, Villars ſent expreſſes to ſome reinforcements, that were commanded to join him from the Upper Rhine, to advance with all poſſible expedition; and having drawn together all his troops, paſſed the Scheld, and encamped with his right near Bouchain, and his left at Ribecour. Upon advice of this motion, the duke of Marlborough and prince Eugene thought fit to alter the diſpoſition of their forces, except thirty battalions left at the ſiege, and twelve ſquadrons at Pont-a-Rache. The 24th, all the cavalry of the duke of Marlborough's army marched over the Scarpe, and encamped near Gouleſſin; and, the next day, the infantry moved the ſame way, encamping with the right over againſt Vitri, and the left near Arleux. At the ſame time, prince Eugene made a motion with his army, placing his right at Iſe-les-Eſquerchien; by which ſituation, the confederate troops were ready to repair immediately to either of the fields of battle, already marked out, according to the next motions of the enemy; for which purpoſe roads were made for the armies to march in four columns either way. The 25th, bridges were laid in ſeveral places over the Scarpe, (which parted the two armies) for the more eaſy communication of the troops; and, the ſame day, upon advice that the enemy were in motion, all the troops were ordered to be in readineſs to march. The four following days, both armies made ſeveral motions; and, on the 30th, the Dutch infantry, under count Tilly, was ordered to join the duke of Marlborough's army; which was by this time reinforced by the arrival of the Pruſſians, Palatines, and Heſſians, and the recalling of ſeveral detachments. Upon intelligence, that Villars had poſitive orders from court to venture a battle, the expectation of a ſudden engagement increaſed on both ſides; and that general, who was incamped with his right at Roquelincourt, near Arras, and his left at St. Eloy, advancing with his troops in order of battle, the confederate generals repaired to their reſpective poſts; the cannon was placed on the batteries that defended the avenues to their camp; and all other neceſſary diſpoſitions were made to receive them. Villars, with a great detachment, advanced ſome time after, within muſket-ſhot of the confe-derates' guard, and took a view of the army and its ſituation. But inſtead of attacking them (as he had ſo confidently given out in the morning, he marched back, and joined the centre of his army, and incamped between Noyelles Sous-Lens and the heights of St. Laurenes. The confederates, judging he did not deſign to attack them, but only to retard the ſiege, ſent the troops back, which they had drawn from before Doway; and thoſe under general Fagel returned into the lines on the other ſide of the Scarpe. And, to prevent any ſurprize from the enemy, orders were given to join the ſeveral redoubts, in the front of the camp by a line to extend from Montignon to Vitri, which was finiſhed on the laſt of May.

The ſiege of Doway, which by all theſe motions had been retarded, was carried on with all imaginable vigour, notwithſtanding the many obſtacles the allies met with in their approaches, both from the difficulty of the ground, and the reſolute defence of the garriſon. On the 29th of May, the beſieged made a fifth ſalley on the right attack, and penetrated into the trenches; but, after an obſtinate engagement, they were repulſed with the loſs of twenty-five officers, and about one hundred private men. The next day a party of the garriſon of Fort Scarpe made a ſalley, and advanced to Pont-a-Rache, with a deſign to intercept the bread waggons of the allies. But colonel Caldwell, who commanded there with three hundred dragoons, vigorouſly repulſed them, though he had the misfortune of being wounded in one of his arms. The laſt day of May, the beſieged made a vigorous ſalley, burnt ſeveral villages, took part of the equipage of general Fagel, and returned into the town with a good number of cattle. The beſieged continued to defend their out-works with the utmoſt obſtinacy; but notwithſtanding their frequent ſallies and mines, on the 5th of June, the allies made two lodgments on the glacis of the counterſcarp at the right attack; as alſo lodgments on the right and left of the other attack of the counterſcarp of the ravelins, and fired briſkly from the batteries of cannon and mortars, to drive the enemy from their traverſes. The 10th in the morning, the allies fired five pieces of cannon into the covered way, and continued the ſap, which went on but ſlowly, by reaſon of the great fire of the enemy. However the beſiegers in the night, between the 14th and 15th, perfected a lodgment on the covered way at the right attack, and repaired the damages their works received at the left by the great number of bombs, that were thrown into them. On the 16th, the beſiegers began to fire againſt the ravelins, from a battery of ſeven pieces of cannon, and made a line of communication on the left attack. They ſprung likewiſe two mines, that night, at the right attack with ſo much ſucceſs, that the enemy abandoned all their places of arms, and the beſiegers made lodgments at both attacks. After this they brought ſeveral pieces of cannon on their batteries, and fired ſo effectually, that, the breaches in the ravelins being judged wide enough, and all things being in a readineſs to ſtorm both of them by the 19th, the troops commanded for the aſſault performed that ſervice with great bravery, but met with ſo vigorous a reſiſtance, that many were killed on both ſides. On the 23d at night the prince of Anhault having made the neceſſary diſpoſitions for attacking the two ravelins at the right attack, they ſtormed the ſame on the 24th, and lodged themſelves thereon after a ſmall reſiſtance. Soon after the enemy ſprung two mines under the ravelin of the right, whereby the beſiegers loſt ſome workmen: However they enlarged the lodgments and communication at the left. At length the garriſon, being reduced to the laſt extremity, on the 25th at two in the afternoon beat a parley, and offered to capitulate for the town only, without including Fort Scarpe. But this being refuſed, they ſent hoſtages to both attacks, who were conducted to the duke of Marlborough's quarters; where being again told, that no capitulation could be granted to the town without including Fort Scarpe; on the 26th in the morning, monſieur Albergotti ſignified, that he was willing to ſurrender that fort with the town, provided he might have liberty to remove all their proviſions and ammunition. This pretenſion occaſioned a conference in prince Eugene's quarters, where it was agreed, that the garriſon of Fort Scarpe ſhould be allowed to march out with two cannon, two covered waggons, twenty others, and two days proviſions; but they were to leave their muſkets in the magazine. So the capitulation for the town and Fort Scarpe were ſigned on the 26th, after fifty-two days open trenches. Purſuant to this capitulation, on the 29th, about ten in the morning, Albergotti, marched out of Doway [c] with his garriſon (which amounted to no more than four thouſand five hundred and twenty-ſeven men) and lieutenant-general Hompeſch took poſſeſſion of the town as governor. Brigadier Des Roques, engineer-general of the ſtates, was likewiſe made governor of Fort Scarpe at the ſame time. The allies found in the place forty pieces of braſs cannon, two hundred of iron, and eight mortars, with ammunition and ſmall arms, but a very ſmall ſtock of proviſions [d]. As ſoon as the trenches and other works before the place were levelled, and the breaches repaired, the confederate armies, being joined by ſeveral detachments, advanced to Vitri, and from thence to the camp at Villars Brulin. Villars being likewiſe reinforced with ſeveral detachments, and having drained the garriſons of Condé, Queſnoy, Valenciennes, and Cambray, inſtead of attacking the confederates, encamped within his new lines from Arras, towards Miramont. The confederate generals finding it impracticable, either to attack the enemy, or beſiege Arras, turned their army againſt Bethune [e], which was inveſted the 15th of July, N. S. and on the 29th of Auguſt the place was ſurrendered by Monſieur du Pay Vauban, who commanded there, and was nephew to the famous engineer of that name.

During the ſiege of Bethune, Villars, with his army, marched out of their entrenchments, and poſitively declared, that he would attack the confederates, and endeavour to raiſe the ſiege. Upon this the duke of Marlborough and prince Eugene formed their armies in order of battle, and the duke advanced with a detachment to obſerve the French army, who, inſtead of preparing for a battle, were caſting up a new line and entrenchments for the better ſecurity of their troops. On the 24th of Auguſt, the right wing of prince Eugene's army foraged in the front towards St. Pol near the enemy's camp, under a guard of five hundred horſe, and one thouſand Daniſh and Heſſian foot. Villars, having notice of it the night before, detached thirty ſquadrons under the command of the count de Broglio, to attack the foragers; and, in order to be an eye-witneſs of that enterprize, he followed in perſon, and arrived on the mount of St. Pol, where he ordered four ſquadrons of carabineers to attack the foragers on that ſide, while ſome other ſquadrons were advancing to attack them another way. They fell upon three ſquadrons of the allies, which gave way; but the foragers, joining with their guard, beat the enemy back with great ſlaughter. However, the French growing too numerous, the allies retired in very good order to an adjacent village, from whence the Daniſh and Heſſian infantry made ſuch a fire upon the enemy, that they loſt a great many men. Villars advanced in perſon, and having ſurrounded that poſt, ſummoned the infantry to ſurrender, and, upon their refuſal, ordered part of his horſe to diſmount and attack them; but they were ſo warmly received, that they retired in diſorder. In the mean time the picquet guard of the army advancing, and prince Eugene marching with part of his cavalry, Villars thought fit to retreat, leſt this ſkirmiſh ſhould occaſion a general engagement, having loſt a great many men in this fruitleſs attempt, beſides a colonel, twenty other officers, with three hundred private men, who were made priſoners, and a booty of one hundred and fifty horſes.

As Villars ſtill declined an engagement, the confederate generals, in order to ſecure the head of the Lys, reſolved to beſiege St. Venant [f] and Aire [g] at the ſame time. Both theſe

[c] Doway, or Dovay, a ſtrong city of the Low-Countries, in the earldom of Flanders, the marquiſate of the territory of Doway. An univerſity, ſubject to the French, and taken by them in 1667. It ſtands on the river Scarpe, between Artois and Hainault, thirteen miles almoſt north of Cambray, fifteen almoſt eaſt of Arras, and thirty-five weſt of Mons.

[d] The French, according to their cuſtom, very much magnified the loſs ſuſtained by the allies in the ſiege of Doway. And it is certain, the reduction of ſo ſtrong and important a place muſt be attended with no ſmall danger and difficulty; and according to the computation, which was made by the allies of their killed and wounded, there were three lieutenant-colonels, three majors, twenty-three captains, thirty-five ſubalterns, one hundred ſerjeants, and one thouſand eight hundred and ninety-nine private men killed: Two lieutenant-colonels, four majors, fifty captains, one hundred and fifty-two ſubalterns, two hundred and forty-two ſerjeants, and five thouſand two hundred and ſixty-ſeven private men wounded. Of the artillery, fifty-four killed, and ninety-ſix wounded: engineers, thirteen killed, and thirty-three wounded: miners, twelve killed, and twelve wounded. Total at both attacks, two thouſand one hundred and forty-two men killed, and five thouſand eight hundred and ſixty-five wounded.

[e] Bethune is a town of the Low-Countries, in the earldom of Artois, vaſtly ſtrong, and in extraordinary repair. A nobleman, in his travels, was ſo extremely pleaſed with it, that he declared, it gave him ſuch ſurprizing ideas of the great loſs of France, in the death of monſieur Vauban (who drew the plan of it) that he could not but paſs away a melancholy thought upon mortality, and regret the ſhort duration of inventors of arts and ſciences, when the works, that are done by them, are of ſo long continuance. It ſtands on the river Biette, eighteen miles north-weſt of Arras, and eighteen ſouth-eaſt of Aire.

[f] St. Venant is a town of the Low-Countries, in the earldom of Artois. It ſtands by the borders of Flanders, about four miles eaſt of Aire, twenty-ſix ſouth of Dunkirk, and as many north of Arras.

[g] Aire is a large and handſome city of France. It ſtands upon the Lys, twenty-five miles ſouth of Dunkirk, twenty-eight north-weſt of Arras, and twenty-ſix eaſt of Boulogne.

places were inveſted on the 6th of September, and both ſurrendered on honourable terms. St. Venant the 30th of September, and Aire the 9th of November.

Notwithſtanding the great precaution of the allies, for the ſecurity of their artillery and ammunition, which were to be uſed in theſe ſieges, the enemy formed a deſign of ſurpriſing a convoy of ſeveral boats coming up the Lys from Ghent, under a guard of twelve hundred men, who were to be reinforced by another detachment. But monſieur de Ravignan, with four thouſand men from Ypres, not far from Courtray, beat the guard; killed about two hundred men; took ſix hundred ſoldiers; blew up ſome boats laden with ammunition, ſunk others laden with cannon-ball and bomb-ſhells, to interrupt the navigation of the Lys, and then retired with ſo much precaution, that a detachment of the allies, ſent out to cut off his retreat, could not effect it. There was no time loſt in repairing the damages occaſioned by this misfortune; and the country people were immediately ſummoned to weigh up the boats, which the enemy ſunk in the Lys, and clear the paſſage of that river.

On the 26th of September, the chevalier de Luxemburg having formed a deſign to ſurpriſe Fort-Scarpe, marched from Bouchain with a ſtrong detachment to Pont-a-Rache, ſent two hundred men in the night into the wood of Bellifonties near the fort, and had two waggons loaded with hay, in which ſeveral grenadiers were concealed. Theſe waggons were driven by ſome other ſoldiers diſguiſed as boors, who were to ſeize the barrier, and, upon a ſignal, to be ſupported by others, and then by the chevalier himſelf. But major-general Amama coming at the ſame time to viſit general Hompeſch, who, having ſome ſuſpicion of the deſign of the enemy, was gone into the fort to give the neceſſary orders for its ſecurity, left his guard without the barrier, who walking their horſes, and following the waggons by mere chance, the enemy believed they were diſcovered, and ſo ran away, leaving their captain and one of their men priſoners.

Six days after the ſurrender of Aire, the confederate armies broke up and marched into winter-quarters.

Thus ended the campaign in Flanders, which, though not of ſuch luſtre as the former, becauſe no battle was fought, yet was, by military men, eſteemed very extraordinary in this reſpect, that our men were about a hundred and fifty days in open trenches, a thing ſaid to be without example.

Nothing conſiderable paſſed on the Rhine, they being equally unable to enter upon action on both ſides. The French, who, in the winter, had threatened the empire with a new invaſion, were obliged to weaken their forces, in order to cover their frontiers, and ſtrengthen their armies in the Netherlands; and the Germans were not in a condition to improve ſo fair an opportunity of invading France. The elector of Brunſwick, who commanded the Imperial army, diſſatisfied with theſe proceedings, deſired leave to reſign a command, from which, as he ſaid, he could not promiſe himſelf any honour, nor the public expect any advantage. As he could not be prevailed with to deſiſt from his purpoſe, the command of the army of the empire was given to count Gronsfelt.

Nor was the campaign on the ſide of Piedmont more conſiderable than on the Rhine. The march of the confederate troops met with ſuch difficulties and delays, that the army was not formed till about the middle of July; and the duke of Savoy, beſides his former pretences for not putting himſelf at the head of the army, was now indiſpoſed, as well as the prince of Piedmont, his eldeſt ſon, and his brother, the duke of Aoſta. In this ſituation, count de Thaun, veldtmarſhal of the Imperial forces, took upon him the command of the confederate army, the Piedmonteſe generals being directed to comply in every thing with his orders. But, notwithſtanding the preparations made to paſs the Alps, and penetrate into Dauphiné, they found it impoſſible to force their way through the mountains; ſo that, after having diſlodged the French from Arches, and ſome other poſts at the entrance of the valley of Barcelonette, they gave over that deſign, and the army marched to Suza, where they continued, as long as the ſeaſon permitted, to hinder the duke of Berwick, who commanded the enemy's forces, from making any detachments into Spain. The French were ſo apprehenſive of an invaſion on the ſide of Dauphiné, that, beſides the intrenchments they caſt up in the mountains with great labour and expence, they were obliged to keep there ſeventy-two battalions, and a good number of horſe.

The campaign this year in Spain was very remarkable, where both parties were conquerors and conquered by turns. In April a great council of war was held (ſays our author *) in which it was reſolved to take the field on the firſt of May, and that the fleet (lately arrived at Barcelona, under the command of ſir John Norris) ſhould immediately ſail for Cagliari, to ſecure the iſland of Sardinia, which was performed in a ſhort time. Purſuant to this reſolution, our army aſſembled near Agramont. The enemy, under the command of the marquis de Villadarias, had already taken the field, and were incamped at Balaguer. Upon our approach they marched to Lerida, and we took poſſeſſion of their camp. Here king Charles, with general Stanhope (who was come from Italy with money and a thouſand recruits) came and reviewed the whole army. On the other hand, king Philip, who was likewiſe come to head his army, gave it out, that he was reſolved to put all to a deciſive battle; and, accordingly, the enemy, conſiſting of forty-two battalions and ſixty ſquadrons, marched along the plain in our full view, in nine columns, to attack us. Marſhal Staremberg immediately prepared to receive them, but they did not think fit to come within cannon-ſhot that day, and only drew up in battle on the hills on our left, from whence they could eaſily diſcern every thing in our camp. In the evening they retired to Belcaire, in the way to Balaguer, about four miles diſtant. The next day they came again, and, forcing in our grand guard, halted an hour or two; after which they marched towards our front, raiſed a battery, and began to fire. This was anſwered by one of ours, which did ſome execution on their foot. Having halted ſome time, they retired a ſecond time to the ſame place, and were purſued by general Stanhope with ſome ſquadrons, who fell upon their rear, and killed ſeveral hundreds. A few days after, the enemy ſent a large detachment, with ſix pieces of cannon, to take the town of Calaf, where we had ſome men, but they met with ſo warm a reception, that they were glad to return to their camp.

On the 15th of July, it was reſolved in a council of war, to march down the plain in our turn, and attack the enemy before they had paſſed the river at Lerida: But that evening, news being brought that all had paſſed, or would have paſſed before we could come up with them, that deſign was laid aſide, and another was put in execution. The next morning ſome ſquadrons of dragoons, and twenty companies of grenadiers, with cannon and pontons, marched very early to make a bridge over the Noguera at Alfaras, and the whole army followed. When our horſe came upon the hills, they ſaw forty-two ſquadrons drawn up, with nine battalions, upon ſome high grounds near Almanara, who were followed by their whole army, which was in the valley, on the other ſide the hills. General Stanhope, rightly judging that we had a fair opportunity of falling upon theſe ſquadrons before their whole army was joined, went with general Belcaſtle to king Charles (who was near with marſhal Staremberg and count Attalaia) and preſſed his majeſty very warmly to attack the enemy with the horſe, ſuſtained by the whole army; but, perceiving the king and the marſhal did not ſo readily come into his propoſal as he expected, he ſaid aloud, that if they let ſlip ſo fair an opportunity, general Belcaſtle and he had orders to withdraw his troops, which he would inſtantly obey and leave the country. Upon theſe words he went away to a great number of general officers and colonels, who were got together about fifty paces from the king, viewing the enemy, and expecting what news the general would bring them. In a few minutes, count Attalaia came to Stanhope from the king, to inform him that he complied with his deſire and advice, but wanted to know, Who was to command? Who but myſelf, anſwered the general, being the lieutenant-general of the day. He immediately ſends his aid de camps to the regiments he intended to take with him, with orders to mount and follow him. Theſe were all the horſe and dragoons on our left, in all ſixteen ſquadrons. The reſt of the horſe were commanded by the marſhal to follow, and all the foot to form and be ready to march. Orders were alſo ſent to the commander of the train to fix a battery of ſix guns upon a riſing ground of our left. The ſun was not above half an hour high, when general Stanhope marched up to the enemy, who were in two lines, twenty-two ſquadrons in the firſt, and in the ſecond, twenty, beſides the nine battalions, who were a little behind them on their right. Stanhope put himſelf at the head of the firſt ſquadron of Harvey's horſe, and Carpenter at the head of the other. He made a very ſhort ſpeech to the men, and deſired them to keep very cloſe, and not break themſelves, for he was ſure they would be as firm as a rock, and all the enemy's ſquadrons could not break them. Then he marched and attacked the guards commanded by general Ameſſaga, who, as their horſes' cloſed, ſpoke ſome words to him, which Stanhope anſwered with a ſtroke of his ſword, that killed the Spaniard. The whole ſquadron, as indeed all the reſt, animated with the example of their general, performed wonders, puſhed the firſt line upon the ſecond, and entirely routed the Spaniſh horſe. The nine battalions ran away, and all were purſued till dark. We lay upon our arms all night, and the next day incamped on the field of battle. In this ſhort action we took lieutenant-general Verboon, and loſt the earl of Rochfort and count Francis Naſſau, both killed at the head of their regiments of dragoons, and both officers of great merit and diſtinction. About four hundred men were killed and wounded on our ſide; but the the enemy's loſs was conſiderable, the number of their ſlain and wounded not being leſs than fifteen hundred. Many more would have been made priſoners, if our men, in the heat of action, could have charged themſelves with them. The enemy retired that night in ſuch haſte to Lerida, that they left behind a great deal of their baggage (amongſt which was ſome of king Philip's plate) and in two days marched on towards Saragoza, the capital of the kingdom of Arragon.

* Namely, of the manuſcript account of the campaigns in Spain. This Manuſcript uſes the Old Style.

We left our camp of Almanara to purſue them, and took the caſtle of Monſon, and fortified the head of the bridge. From hence a thouſand horſe were detached to ſeize the town of Albaſtro, and the day after a thouſand foot, with four pieces of cannon, were ſent to the town of Stadilla, which was defended by above five hundred men, and where the enemy had ſome magazines, which were all taken. Stanhope marched all that night for Sarimana, where he found two regiments of horſe, which he ſoon put to flight. A party of four hundred horſe marched to Candaſmos, and ſurprized a convoy of forty waggons with ſtores, ſixty laden mules, and two thouſand ſheep, guarded by two troops of horſe, which they routed and brought away the whole convoy. This ſupply was very acceptable in a country, where proviſions for man and beaſt began to grow very ſcarce, being at ſo great a diſtance from Barcelona, where our magazines were.

On the 2d of Auguſt [1710] general Stanhope, after having been away ſeveral days with two thouſand horſe, joined the army, and all marched to Cajadin. Here we ſaw the enemy plant their camp near Fraga, on the other ſide the river Cinca, which it was reſolved we ſhould paſs that evening to attack them the next morning: But they marched all night towards Saragoza, ſo that inſtead of fighting we were put to a long and tedious march after them, in which we overtook part of their rear, and ſeveral ſkirmiſhes enſued, which might have drawn us into a general battle, very much to our diſadvantage; becauſe the main of our army was ſtill at a diſtance over a very long heath, where no water was to be found, and the weather exceſſively hot; whilſt the enemy's were altogether behind a brook and ſuch high eminences as were almoſt inacceſſible, and the ford through which they had paſſed the brook very narrow. When general Stanhope came up to the advanced guard, and to ſome ſquadrons ſent to ſuſtain it, he immediately formed all the horſe of the left, and ſent with all ſpeed the generals Belcaſtle and Wills to march up the foot as faſt as they could. Preſently after marſhal Staremberg came up with the right of our horſe and formed immediately; for the enemy was not then half a mile from us. Freſh orders were ſent to the foot and artillery to make all poſſible haſte. The enemy ſent ſeveral ſmall parties to the riſing grounds to obſerve us. Some of their horſe came through the narrow ford, but, when they ſaw ours drawn up, they quickly retired. At laſt the foot and train being arrived, diſpoſitions were made to receive the enemy, if they thought fit to come from behind their ſtrong natural intrenchment and attack us: but they ſuffered our army to refreſh themſelves after ſo great a fatigue, and marched away in the night, leaving at a ſmall town on this ſide the ford, ſome of their baggage, which was ſecured the next morning. Here we reſted ourſelves that night without pitching our tents, and early in the morning marched after the enemy to the large town of Candaſmos, where we were in danger of periſhing with thirſt, there being neither pump nor well, nor ciſtern in the place, but only one large pond of water, which the troopers, as they came up, marched their horſes into, and by that means the water was ſo ſpoiled, that it could not be uſed. The pond was ſupplied by two ſprings, which the foot-ſoldiers entirely ruined by their great eagerneſs to come at the water. Wine was as ſcarce as water, none being to be found in the town, nor even in the convent, and what the ſutlers had was all turned ſour [a]. We were glad to march out of this place the next morning, but found ourſelves in as great diſtreſs for want of water as the day before, till we came to Bucarolos, where we incamped, the enemy ſtill retiring before us. At break of day the army marched on in four columns, in expectation of overtaking the enemy, but were diſappointed, and inſtead of them had to encounter, on our march to Uſera on the Ebro, with violent thirſt and heat, without a drop of water; and, to incommode us the more, the enemy had ſet fire to a very long heath, we were to paſs over. It is not to be conceived what we ſuffered upon ſuch a march, ſmothered all that day with clouds of aſhes, eſpecially the foot. About five in the evening, and not before, the horſe of both lines got to the river Ebro, whoſe waters did not a little refreſh us. Some generals rode up by the river ſide, and diſcovered at a ſmall diſtance the tops of the enemy's colours behind a riſing ground. A party of huſſars being ordered to advance, brought word in a quarter of an hour, that their army was there in a marching poſture. Staremberg inſtantly made a diſpoſition, in caſe they ſhould come back, and the foot formed as they came up. We ſtayed upon our arms till night, when we could hear the enemy's drums, who then began to march to Saragoza.

General Stanhope, perceiving no great inclination in the marſhal to paſs the river that night, prevailed ſo far as to have Carpenter detached with two thouſand horſe to ford it over, and went with him as a volunteer. We expected to hear every moment, that the pontons were ordered to be laid over the river for the whole army to paſs; but no ſuch thing, till at laſt the generals Belcaſtle, Wills, Fraucomberg, and Lepel went to Staremberg, and, after a long conſultation, gained the point, in which it was ſaid, the marſhal was determined by the king, as well as convinced by the reaſons of the generals. The pontons, after this, were laid with all expedition, and the army began to paſs the river between one and two in the morning, on the 8th of Auguſt. Carpenter, finding the enemy were gone to Saragoza, marched with his detachment of horſe by the ſide of the Ebro, over-againſt Villa-Franca, and having notice that the army had paſſed the river, he marched as an advanced guard towards that city, where he found the enemy's horſe drawn up. We marched with great ſpeed, and came in the evening before the town, where we ſaw the enemy's whole army in order of battle (being within leſs than cannon-ſhot of them) on a riſing ground on the right of the city. Here we continued all night on our arms, and ſome of the horſe moved towards us, as if they intended to ſurprize us, but we were too well upon our guard for them to attempt any thing that night.

When General Stanhope viewed the enemy's diſpoſition that evening, he obſerved their right line was extended far beyond our left, theirs conſiſting of thirty-two ſquadrons, and ours of twenty. Whereupon he formed a deſign, which he communicated at ſupper to ſome officers, and which proved of great ſervice the next day. He commanded the left of the army, and the body of reſerve under Brigadier Hamilton was by the marſhal ordered to obey his directions. This body conſiſted of eight ſquadrons of Portugueſe horſe, who were cloathed in red. The general rightly judged the enemy would take them for Engliſh (as they did) and ſo reſolved to have them drawn up before the battle at a diſtance from his left, and to flank it, all which ſucceeded to his wiſh.

The next morning very early the cannon began to fire on both ſides. The moſt part of the morning was ſpent in viewing the lines and making alterations. King Charles with marſhal Staremberg rode from the right to the left, notwithſtanding the danger, which animated the troops. The convoy of bread was expected every moment, and was much wanted, conſidering the laſt three days march, but it came not before the ſignal for the attack was given; ſo that the ſoldiers, as well as many officers, fought with empty bellies. General Stanhope was obliged to march the horſe more to the left, by reaſon of a very large dry ditch made by the torrents, that come down from the hills, and which is very famous in the hiſtory of Arragon; for here it was, that king Ferdinand overthrew the Moors, and made ſuch a ſlaughter of them, that the ditch is from thence called, 'the 'ditch of the ſlain'. We loſt many men this morning, who, preſſed by hunger and thirſt, ventured to go and gather grapes in the vale between the two armies, and were ſhot by the enemy's advanced guard. Major-general Wade came to the left ſome time before the attack, and adviſed general Stanhope, beſides his other project (which he much liked) to have three or four battalions ſent for, to interline with his ſquadrons, which was done, and they performed very great ſervice. About noon the ſignal for battle was given; the body of reſerve immediately marched up and flanked our left, which had the deſired effect; for the enemy obſerving this body of red coats beyond our line, ordered ten or twelve ſquadrons of their right to march and attack them. General Stanhope ſoon came up with the enemy's horſe, which he did not find much ſuperior to his, by reaſon of the detachment juſt made, but ſtill they were ſuperior. He received their fire, which killed and wounded ſome men, which put two ſquadrons into diſorder, but they rallied in an inſtant. Then the whole left fell upon the enemy ſword in hand with ſuch order and courage, that, notwithſtanding an obſtinate reſiſtance, the firſt line was entirely broke. The ſecond made but a ſhort ſtand, and ran away with the firſt. They were purſued very far, and in the flight many were taken and killed. Our right and centre were no leſs ſucceſsful. For their left wing of horſe was overpowered and put to flight in a ſhort time by our right. The foot indeed made a longer defence, which laſted above two hours, but with ſuch ſlaughter of their men, that the field of battle was covered with the dead. The enemy's horſe of the left wing being gone, and our right being come up to the walls of the city, our horſe had time to breathe, for the ground would not permit them to be in the lines, and the right of our foot was cloſe to the walls. Here the marſhal was at the head of his own regiment, making it fire by platoons, as regularly as any of ours do at their exerciſe. The detachment, the enemy had made againſt the body of reſerve, put them to flight as was expected, and purſued them a great way, till they found their miſtake. Then returning towards the field of battle, and finding their right was gone off, they fell very furiouſly upon our battery, cut to pieces all the guard, and killed or wounded all the officers and men belonging to it. Our author (a chaplain in the army) was upon the battery, and firſt diſcovered theſe ſquadrons advancing towards it; upon which he thought it high time to ſecure himſelf by galloping away to our right. When he came there, through the field of battle (which, ſays he, was a terrible ſight) he met cloſe by the walls with general Wetzel, whom he informed of the ſucceſs of our left, and of what the enemy's detachment of horſe was doing in our rear. Wetzel deſired him to go to the marſhal, and ſent his aid de camp with him. He found the marſhal (as was ſaid before) exerciſing his men againſt a brigade, that had turned their backs upon us. When he told him, that general Stanhope had defeated the enemy's right, and was purſuing them, but that ten or twelve ſquadrons were in our rear and falling upon our batteries: That is no great matter (ſays the marſhal) if general Stanhope has beat the right, we are ſure of a complete victory. And ſo indeed it proved, for quickly after all the foot threw down their arms and ran away, or were taken priſoners. However, upon the intelligence given the marſhal, he ordered Wetzel to be upon his guard, and prevent any ſurprize from thoſe ſquadrons, who, in a few minutes, came in ſight of our rear; but upon our firſt motion galloped away and were ſeen no more. A great ſlaughter was made of the enemy's foot, to the number of five or ſix thouſand, and about ſeven thouſand were taken priſoners. We took all their colours and cannon, and ſhould have made more priſoners, had the horſe of our right had room to purſue them; but the ſituation was ſuch, that they could not paſs by or through the foot. However the victory was entire and glorious, conſidering the great diſproportion of numbers, the enemy having ſixty ſquadrons to our forty-ſeven, and forty-two battalions to our thirty-three. The army encamped that night in a very commodious and pleaſant ground near the city.

[a] A general officer gave fifteen piſtoles for a cheſt of Florence, and had but three flaſks out of it that could be drunk. M. S.

King Charles, in the evening, entered Saragoza, attended by moſt of the general officers, and was received with loud acclamations by the people, who looked upon him as their deliverer from the yoke they had ſo long groaned under, and as come to reſtore them to the form and privileges of their ancient government, which had been taken from them. And in this he anſwered their expectations; for the king's firſt care, that very night, was to aboliſh the Caſtilian government (which had been introduced by king Philip, and conſiſted of chancellors, ſyndics, &c. in every city, of his appointment) and gave them their old magiſtrates or jurats, as well in the kingdom of Arragon, as in Valencia and Catalonia, who are choſen by the people. During the public rejoicings, the populace fell upon the houſes of king Philip's magiſtrates in a very riotous manner, and committed great outrages, as they did alſo upon all the perſons of diſtinction, that were reputed to be better affected to the houſe of Bourbon than to that of Auſtria. Nor would this tumult have been ſo ſoon appeaſed, if parties of ſoldiers had not been ſent to diſperſe them.

In this large city we found very conſiderable ſtores of all ſorts of proviſion, ammunition, and entire cloathings of regiments. The ſituation of Saragoza is extremely pleaſant, being ſeated on the river Ebro, in a very plentiful country, abounding with every thing neceſſary for the ſupport and convenience of life. The ſtreets are broad and long, adorned on both ſides with ſtately palaces, belonging to the grandees of the kingdom of Arragon. This city was the delight of Julius Cæſar, who erected here a very magnificent palace for himſelf (inhabited now by the archbiſhop) and built a large ſtone bridge over the Ebro, oppoſite the middle of the town, with a great number of arches, which is now as firm and ſtrong as if it was a modern ſtructure. To perpetuate the memory of his benefactions to this city, he called it after his own name, Cæſaris Auguſta. Here the army refreſhed themſelves, after their fatigues, a whole week, which time was employed by king Charles, in ſettling the civil government of this kingdom upon the old eſtabliſhment, and not in diverſions.

The generals were daily conſulting among themſelves what was proper to be done to improve their late ſucceſs, in order to put an end to the war, and fix King Charles on the throne of Spain. A great council of war was held, in which it was reſolved to march to Madrid. General Stanhope did not think fit to lay before this council a project of his own (which he had communicated only to one or two friends, particularly to general Wade) becauſe the march towards Madrid was, for ſome days, in the way to the place he intended to propoſe. On the 16th of Auguſt, we broke up our camp at Saragoza, and were ſeven days before we reached Calataynd, where we halted three days. At this place a council of war was held, in which general Stanhope opened his project, namely, That, ſince there was no bodies of the enemy able to oppoſe our march to Madrid, a ſtrong detachment ſhould be ſent to Pampeluna (which was not very far from Calataynd) the only paſs by which the French could ſend any forces into Spain: that all we had to fear was from the French reinforcements; and, if that paſs was well ſecured, they could not penetrate into Spain but by Gironne, on the other ſide of the kingdom: that, if our forces once took poſt at Pampeluna, they could not be diſlodged by all the troops the French king could ſend to the aſſiſtance of his grandſon: that there we might have freſh troops, ſent us from England and Holland, and not only troops, but all manner of neceſſaries, it being a much ſhorter voyage to the Bay of Biſcay, than to any port in the Mediterranean: that, if they could prevent any ſuccours from joining the enemy the latter end of this year, ſuch meaſures might be taken in the winter, as would ſecure the quiet poſſeſſion of the kingdom. Theſe, with many other reaſons, were urged by general Stanhope, and heard with ſurprize. He anſwered, in a very plain and ſatisfactory manner, all the objections that were made againſt his propoſal, but his anſwers did not content all the members of the council, who perhaps had their private views [i]. However, marſhal Staremberg approved of this well-concerted project; but, as his ſingle approbation was not ſufficient to bring over the reſt, it was reſolved the whole army ſhould march to Madrid, which gave general Stanhope a very great concern, and very juſtly; for, had his project been put in execution, it would very probably have ſoon brought the war to a happy concluſion, and prevented the ſhocking turn of affairs, which happened in leſs than three months [k].

On the firſt of September we got to Seguença, a city of Caſtile. Here another council of war was held, and it was again reſolved to continue our march towards Madrid. On the 9th, the army arrived at Alcala; and, the next day, general Stanhope went with a thouſand horſe to Madrid, followed by all the troops. King Charles came thither the 17th, but made no ſtay. He found none of the grandees there, and it appeared, that the Caſtilians were firmly united to king Philip, and reſolved to adhere to him at all hazards. A detachment was ſent to take and fortify Toledo; and about that city, and the neighbouring country, the army continued in ſeveral incampments till the latter end of October, when they began to march into cantons. The king of France now ſhewed he was reſolved to maintain his grandſon, ſince, if it had ever been his intention, it was now very eaſy to oblige him to evacuate Spain. But he had no ſuch deſign, but the contrary, as appeared by his proceedings. For after the battle of Saragoza, which had cauſed a great conſternation in the court of France, it was reſolved in a council at Verſailles, that the Duke of Vendoſme ſhould immediately ſet out for Navarre, and put himſelf at the head of the remains of the Spaniſh troops, which were to be reinforced with detachments from ſeveral parts of France. King Philip, after the battle, got off with a very ſmall body to Madrid. But he ſoon left it, and retired with all the tribunals following him to Valladolid, and ſent his Queen and ſon to Victoria. Some of his troops got off in ſmall bodies, and theſe were in a little time brought together to the number of ten thouſand men; the troops, they had on the frontier of Portugal, were brought to join them, with which they ſoon made up the face of an army. The duke of Vendoſme, in the beginning of September, arrived at Bayonne, and orders being given for the garriſons of Pampeluna, Jaca, and other towns in Navarre, to march and join the Spaniſh army, he and the duke de Noailles purſued their journey to Spain. When they came to Valladolid, where king Philip kept his court, it was reſolved in a council of war, that the duke de Noailles ſhould return to Paris, and from thence proceed with the utmoſt diligence to Rouſillon, in order to act offenſively in Catalonia, and that, as ſoon as the Spaniſh army was recruited, the duke of Vendoſme ſhould repair thither.

[i] Of which views the plunder of Caſtile is ſaid to be none of the leaſt.

[k] Contrary to this account of our author, who was on the ſpot, a letter from the Condé d'Aſſumar, the Portugueſe ambaſſador in Spain, is quoted by Boyer and others, aſſerting, That a certain foreign general (meaning Stanhope) with ſome Spaniſh general officers, prevailed with king Charles to march into Caſtile, in oppoſition to the opinion of Staremberg and Belcaſtle.

In the mean time, though the French were preparing to ſupport king Philip's broken affairs, no care was taken by the allies to ſupply or ſupport king Charles. We were ſo engaged in our party-matters at home, that we ſeemed to take no thought of things abroad, and without us nothing could be done. The court of Vienna was ſo apprehenſive of the danger of a war, like to break out between the Grand Signior and the Czar, that they would not diminiſh their army in Hungary. But to return to the army in Spain:

On the 5th of November a council was held, in which it was reſolved, that Toledo ſhould be abandoned, and king Charles ſhould move towards Saragoza, and the army follow in a few days. Accordingly, on the 22d, the generals of the ſeveral nations began to march ſeparately at the head of their reſpective troops, and all were ordered into cantons in the neighbourhood of Cifuentes, where marſhal Staremberg with the Germans was to canton. Colonel Du Bourgay, with his regiment, was detached two days before to guard the train, and march to the ſame place. Count Attalaia came, on the 25th, to Aſignan with all the Portugueſe going to his cantons. Brigadier Lepel marched out by order with his own and Richards's regiment to Gargules, within a few miles of Cifuentes, where, on the 27th, Staremberg, who was then getting into that town with the Germans, ſent him word by his aid de camp, major Nugent, to make all poſſible haſte to join him, leſt he ſhould be ſurprized by the active French partiſan Vaillejo, who was at the head of a thouſand horſe [l]. Lepel with the two regiments got into Cifuentes, in the cloſe of the evening, without being attacked. The brigadier (in company with our author) waited preſently after upon Staremberg, whom he had not ſeen ſince the beginning of September, having been upon a ſeparate command. In above an hour's converſation the marſhal told the brigadier, he hoped he thought him very kind to receive him that night into his head-quarters among his Germans, for that he ſhould have marched on to Brihuega, the canton of the Engliſh, where, he had received a letter, general Stanhope was arrived with his troops; but he hoped colonel Du Bourgay would come up that night with the train, and the three regiments might march together the next day to Brihuega without any great riſque. And ſo brigadier Lepel took his leave.

The generals Stanhope, Carpenter, Wills, Pepper, and Gore, with the Engliſh forces, marched along the Tajuna, and on the 26th of November, came to their canton at Brihuega, a town of about a thouſand houſes, ſituated on the ſide of a hill near that river. The next day a body of the enemy appeared about three on the hills above the town, to the great ſurprize of the Engliſh, who had ſeen no troops in their march from Chincon to Brihuega, except ſome ſmall ſtraggling parties of horſe: Nor had they any intelligence of an army being aſſembled, though all poſſible care had been uſed, and great rewards promiſed to get early notice of it; ſo well affected were the Caſtilians to their king Philip. The duke of Vendoſme, having joined the Spaniſh army with freſh ſuccours, had marched three days and three nights with incredible expedition; and the foot, which appeared on the hills over Brihuega, were brought thither behind the troopers; but the whole army and train did not come up till late that night. This army conſiſted of thirty-two battalions (which had been reduced from forty-five to that number) and eight thouſand horſe, with thirty-two pieces of cannon, ſome whereof were twenty-four pounders. That very night Vendoſme ſent a ſummons to general Stanhope, which was anſwered as uſual in ſuch caſes. Stanhope diſpatched captain Coſby, his aid de camp, to Staremberg, to inform him of his unexpected and unhappy ſituation, which, it was ſaid, might have been prevented, if an advanced guard had been kept on the high grounds; for they might have given notice of the enemy's approach time enough for our troops to retire to Cifuentes. This, it is aſſured, was the advice of one of our generals, which unfortunately was not followed. In the night the enemy marched ſome of their foot, and took poſſeſſion of the bridge over the Tajuna.

The next day about noon many regiments, with their colours flying, came and ſurrounded the town within cannon-ſhot. We had no artillery, and ſo little ammunition (which was reſerved for the attack) that we could not moleſt them. Their whole army joined, and made four different attacks at once, which were ſoon turned into breaches in the ruinous wall. Our troops were diſpoſed in excellent order for a vigorous defence, every attack being defended by a general officer. The enemies opened one of the gates with their cannon, made a large breach, and gave a general aſſault, but were repulſed. At laſt about eight hundred men got into the town and into houſes, from whence they made a terrible fire, which we could not anſwer, our ammunition being quite ſpent; ſo that about ſun-ſet it was thought adviſeable to beat a parley, and thoſe brave troops, that had behaved ſo gallantly all the campaign, were forced to ſurrender priſoners of war, and to march out the next day towards Valladolid and the neighbouring towns, where they were to remain [m].

Captain Coſby, who was ſent to marſhal Staremberg with an account of general Stanhope's being ſurprized, did not come to Cifuentes till late at night. The marſhal immediately ſent to the generals of the three nations, the Portugueſe, Dutch and Palatines, to march their troops with all poſſible expedition to Cifuentes. They were indeed cantoned in towns very near, and got ready ſo quickly, that at break of day they were all aſſembled before one of the gates of the town. The marſhal had ordered the Germans to beat to arms, which much alarmed us (ſays our author, who was then with Lepel at Cifuentes) and we were not a little ſurprized to ſee, upon opening one of Brigadier Lepel's windows, great bodies of troops cloſe to the walls; but it was ſo dark we could not diſtinguiſh what they were. An officer ſent by the brigadier to the marſhal brought word, that the Engliſh were ſurrounded in Brihuega by the enemy; that the troops about the town were our own; and that he muſt not loſe a moment to get ready to march. This order was immediately obeyed, and we were out before we could well ſee. The Germans came out ſoon after, and the marſhal himſelf about eight o'clock, when we expected to march every minute; but he was reſolved to ſtay for Du Bourgay's regiment and the train. At laſt, after waiting three hours in vain, about eleven, orders were given to march, and brigadier Lepel was ſent back with his regiment to meet Du Bourgay. We paſſed the Tajuna at Olmeda, and marched through ſuch very narrow and difficult roads, that it was quite dark before we were clear of the defiles, and got to the high grounds in the way to Brihuega. As ſoon as our field-train (which had much retarded our march) came up to the ground, where we lay that night on our arms, the marſhal ordered ſeveral pieces of cannon to be fired, as a ſignal to general Stanhope, that we were marching to his relief; but it was too late and to no purpoſe; for they were not heard, it being juſt at the time the enemy got into the town, when they made their laſt and greateſt fire before the capitulation began. So it may truly be ſaid, that the ſaving one regiment was the cauſe of our loſing ſuch a conſiderable body of Engliſh. For, had we marched to the relief of Brihuega, as ſoon as all the troops were ready about Cifuentes, we ſhould have been there between two and three in the afternoon, and very probably ſaved that valuable part of our army; for the enemy muſt have either retired or fought between two fires. About [l] Our author ſays here, I am obliged to relate more minute particulars than I ſhould do, in order to do juſtice to a great man (general Stanhope) who has been much aſperſed, upon the account of one misfortune, both before and after his death.

[m] There were taken in Brihuega three lieutenant-colonels, Stanhope, Carpenter and Wills; major-general Pepper; brigadier Gore; colonel Dormer; fifteen lieutenant-colonels, Moyſer, Otway, Montague, Benſon, Hawker, Varrier (died), Dalzel, Faulkland, Richardſon, Ramſey, Howard, Whitmore, Strickland, Nevil, Pearſon: nine majors, Bland, Cotton, Wyvil, Erle, Keitley, Wheeler, Douglas, Pinſold, Savage; ſixty captains, ſeventy-ſix lieutenants, ſixty-four enſigns, three adjutants and quarter-maſters, three ſecretaries of general Stanhope, and one of general Carpenter's; Laroon, quarter-maſter general, and about two thouſand men belonging to the following regiments: Harvey's horſe; the royal dragoons; Pepper's dragoons; Stanhope's dragoons; battalion of foot-guards; the foot regiments of Harriſon, Wade, Dormer, Bowles, Gore, Munden, Dalzel.

By this means brigadier Lepel became the commander in chief of the Queen's troops, conſiſting of his own regiment of dragoons, with the two regiments of foot of Richards and Du Bourgay. M. S.

eight, Brigadier Lepel joined us, with Du Bourgay's regiment and the train, having ſkirmiſhed above three hours with Vaillejo, who had purſued them till they came to the army.

On the 29th, early in the morning, we marched upon four columns towards Brihuega, though it was believed Stanhope had ſurrendered, the firing of ſmall arms having been heard by the advanced guard, from the time we came to that ground. About eleven the marſhal, with his adjutant-general, and ſome aids de camp, went about half a mile before the army to try whether he could get a ſight of the town from the riſing ground. After ſome minutes ſome ſmoke was diſcovered to riſe from the bottom between the hills, and he was ſoon ſatisfied there was the place, by hearing the enemy's horſe marching up the high grounds before he could ſee them; but it was not long before he ſaw them plain enough, upon which he galloped back, and ordered his army to form. The enemy was alſo forming; but their lines extended as far again as ours; conſiſting of twenty-five thouſand men to our thirteen thouſand. Between twelve and one, the armies began to cannonade one another; but as the enemy ſaw how weak we were ſince the loſs of the Britiſh troops, they ſoon began the attack on their right, flanking and almoſt ſurrounding our left, which had no more than thirteen weak ſquadrons who behaved very ill, and ran away as ſoon as the enemy charged them [n]. By that means our foot were left to mercy, and two Engliſh battalions, two Dutch, four Palatines, two Spaniſh, and one Neapolitan, were cut in pieces or taken priſoners. Here the generals Belcaſtle and St. Amand were killed, beſides many field-officers and others. By good fortune, the victorious right, inſtead of purſuing their blow, fell to plundering the baggage of the whole army, which was very conſiderable, and could not ſtir from the place, Vaillejo being in the rear of it with his party. Beſides the baggage they met with another great booty. Many perſons of quality and diſtinction (chiefly ladies and eccleſiaſtics) having left Madrid to follow king Charles to Saragoza or Barcelona, fell into their hands with a great number of coaches, and all the riches they could bring away. Unfortunately for them they came into the field of battle, which was on the high-road, juſt before the action began, and could not proceed, for fear of falling into the hands of the partiſan Vaillejo.

The enemy's right being thus employed, the marſhal fought the left with great ſlaughter and ſucceſs till night, when both horſe and foot retired in diſorder. The duke of Vendoſme, with king Philip (who was preſent during the whole action) galloped away in ſuch haſte, that they paſſed by the Engliſh priſoners before they got to Guadalaxara. Thus the marſhal remained maſter of the field, took all their cannon, and retook ours, but was forced to nail it all up for want of mules to draw it away. The Germans made uſe of their cheveaux de friſe, which were of ſingular ſervice, and the Portugueſe horſe behaved very well. Some of their ſquadrons were mixed with the foot, and fell upon the enemy's infantry ſword in hand, as ſoon as ours had put them in diſorder, and made a very great ſlaughter. It was computed the next day that no leſs than ſeven thouſand were killed on the ſpot, beſides the wounded. General Frankenberg and brigadier Lepel had rallied the horſe of the left, within half a mile of the field, and would have marched them to count Staremberg; but they were ſeized with ſuch a panic at the ſight of ſome ſtraggling ſquadrons, that they galloped away the ſecond time, and did not ſtop in three or four miles, when we overtook them in ſmall parties, and made up at laſt a body of about ſix hundred horſe with which we made haſte to Seguença, leſt Vaillejo ſhould overtake us, who followed us ſo cloſe, that we did not halt above three hours in that city, but continued on long marches, till we got to Saragoza [o].

[n] Lepel's regiment is ſaid to behave very ill.

[o] The affair of Brihuega has been variouſly related, and general Stanhope much cenſured, but by this account of an eye-witneſs, he was by no means to be blamed. Our author undertakes to anſwer the falſities publiſhed in a pamphlet called the Romance, (wherein general Stanhope is introduced under the name of Celſus) particularly thoſe relating to this affair.

The Romance ſays, Celſus was left at Brihuega by count Staremberg with the Engliſh troops and ſome battalions of the Dutch, to cover his march as well as the cannon and heavy baggage, being himſelf to incamp about three leagues further, and that he gave him orders to come and join him the next day.

To this our Author anſwers: That Celſus was not left at Brihuega to cover the count's march, is very plain from the diſpoſition that was made ſome days before, when it was reſolved in a council of war, that the army ſhould canton upon the borders of Arragon, to ſecure that kingdom. Brihuega then fell to the Engliſh for their canton, as Cifuentes did to the Germans for theirs; and the towns and villages near Cifuentes to the troops of other nations.

That there were no battalions of the Dutch in Brihuega, is evident from this, that none of them were taken in that town with the Engliſh: Neither was the cannon or heavy baggage there, both being with count Staremberg's army at the battle of Villa Vicioſa; and one may eaſily conclude, that, had Celſus had the Engliſh train with him, he would not have ſurrendered with ſuch a conſiderable body of Engliſh officers and ſoldiers, who had ſignalized themſelves all that campaign, and were fluſhed with victory and ſucceſs; but would have given time to count Staremberg to have come to his relief.

But the moſt malicious falſehood of all is, that Celſus had orders to join count Staremberg the next day.

Count Staremberg could have given no ſuch orders, ſince Brihuega, as I have obſerved before, was the canton aſſigned to the whole Engliſh body of troops and artillery; and where they were to continue till count Staremberg thought fit to remove the whole army from their ſeveral cantons.

The truth of this will appear from the following narration: The ſame day that the troops marched into their cantons, brigadier Lepel's regiment of dragoons, which was within four or five miles of Cifuentes, and where it was left to ſecure Du Bourgay's regiment from falling into the hands of Vaillejo the partiſan, received orders from count Staremberg to march with all haſte into Cifuentes. The regiment loſt no time, and narrowly eſcaped the partiſan with his thouſand horſe, who fell upon ſome part of the rear of the Germans, as they were marching into that town.

About ſeven that evening, brigadier Lepel waited on count Staremberg, who told him that he was reſolved to cover the kingdom of Arragon, and ſecure it from the inſults of the enemy: That he had ordered the troops into ſeveral cantons, each nation by itſelf: That the Engliſh had Brihuega, and he wiſhed that all the regiments were there together. But till Du Bourgay's was come up, he would ſuffer Lepel's dragoons to continue with him in Cifuentes, and that, as ſoon as it had joined, the three regiments of Lepel, Richards, and Du Bourgay, with the train, would be able to make their way to Brihuega, without any danger from Vaillejo's party. Now let it be judged, whether this is conſiſtent with what the Romance tells us, that Celſus had orders to join count Staremberg the next day? Neither is there more truth in what it relates, That Celſus diſpatched one of his aid de camps to count Staremberg, to let him know that he thought proper to reſt his troops one day more at Brihuega, but that he would certainly join him the day after, ſince no other aid de camp was ſent from Brihuega to count Staremberg, but Mr. Coſby, who came to acquaint him late in the evening, that the enemy's troops had ſurrounded that town.

It appears alſo from our author's account, why Staremberg delay'd his marching to Stanhope's relief ſo many hours; namely, his waiting for Du Bourgay's regiment and the train, though he marched without them at laſt. Biſhop Burnet indeed ſays, Staremberg might have come time enough to have ſaved Stanhope, but he moved ſo ſlowly, that it was conjectured, he envied the glory that general had got, and was not ſorry to ſee it eclipſed, and therefore made not that haſte he might and ought to have done. But this, as the biſhop obſerves, is only conjecture.

The following letter was written by brigadier Lepel, to the lord Dartmouth, then ſecretary of ſtate, concerning the Brihuega affair, and the battle of Villa Vicioſa.

My Lord,

Saragoſſa, Dec. 10, 1710. O. S.

I think myſelf obliged to inform your lordſhip of the misfortune that has befallen her majeſty's troops, in our retreat from Caſtile towards the borders of Arragon. The army marched upon three columns, the generals of each nation at the head of their own people: General Stanhope led the left, and the rear of all, and had with him the regiments of Harvey, Raby, Pepper, and his own, of the foot-guards; and Harriſon's, Wade's, Dormer's, Bowles's, Munden's, Gore's, and Dalzeel's regiments. The enemy had detached ſome ſquadrons to obſerve him. On Sunday the 26th of November, O. S. he got into a little walled town in the mountains of Caſtile, called Brihuega, where he reſolved to halt a day and refreſh his men and horſes, who were much fatigued by their long marches, eſpecially the laſt, which was of ſeven leagues. But, being among enemies from whom no intelligence could be had, tho' he had offered large ſums to encourage the peaſants, he was inveſted that very night by the enemy's whole army. The 27th, they erected three batteries againſt the town, which in a ſhort time made very conſiderable breaches. That night Mr. Stanhope ſent out with much difficulty captain Coſby, his aid de camp, to inform the marſhal of his condition. The marſhal, who was at Cifuentes, four leagues from Brihuega with the German troops, gathered immediately all the reſt of his army, and marched the 28th to endeavour to relieve Mr. Stanhope; but the road was ſo difficult by reaſon of the defiles through the mountains, that the army could not advance that day above two leagues. The 29th we began to march at break of day, and got by noon to the riſing grounds above Brihuega, within half a league of the town; where having halted a ſhort time, and perceiving no ſignals from Mr. Stanhope, the marſhal concluded he was taken, and reſolved to attack the enemy, who ſoon after marched to us in order of battle.

The cannonading began about one on both ſides; and between three and four, their right attacked our left with much vigour, which was ſoon overpowered by their great numbers, they having by the beſt accounts we can get, eighty ſquadrons, and about forty battalions, and we in the whole not above ten thouſand men, and on our left, not ſeven hundred horſe; thus was our horſe forced to retire, and our foot was almoſt cut to pieces. The right of their horſe in the purſuit of ours, fell in with the baggage, and betook themſelves to plunder. The marſhal improved that opportunity, and with his right fell upon the enemy with ſuch bravery and conduct, that he put them to the route, retook our cannon, took theirs, and remained maſter of the field, where he continued till eight of the clock the next day; and, for want of mules to carry away the cannon, was obliged to nail them up; and then began his march towards Arragon to get bread and proviſions for his army; where he is now at a place called Daroca, gathering his people from all parts, in order to ſecure this country.

As to Mr. Stanhope, what I can learn, which comes from ſome ſoldiers that have made their eſcape, and ſome of the enemy's officers that were taken in the battle, is this: That he was attacked ſeveral times at three different reaches the day before the battle, and always repulſed the enemy; but at laſt, for want of ammunition, was forced to ſurrender priſoners of war; that he began to capitulate about ſeven in the evening, and marched out the 29th about noon; that beſides lieutenant-general Carpenter, who was killed at one of the breaches, we have loſt above three hundred men killed, and as many wounded; among the killed are ſome field-officers, whoſe names and ranks I do not know.

In the battle, my lord, our greateſt loſs has been ſuſtained on the left, where colonel Richards, and colonel Du Bourgay's regiments have been entirely cut Staremberg, who had ſuffered ſo much in the action, that he was not in a condition to purſue the enemy, left the field of Villa Vicioſa, and marched with his army to Saragoza, the enemy not thinking it convenient to give him any diſturbance. As he did not judge it ſafe to ſtay long in Arragon, he marched into Catalonia, and the duke of Vendoſme with his army, came and took poſſeſſion of Saragoza, two days after, to the inexpreſſible grief and great loſs of the Arragoneſe.

The marſhal, though cloſely purſued by ſeveral parties of the enemy, paſſed the Cinca and Noguera, and, leaving a ſmall garriſon in Balaguer, came, in the beginning of February, to Barcelona with the remains of his army. Some days before his arrival, count Tattenbach, governor of Gironne, was obliged to capitulate. The French, under the command of the duke of Noailles, had inveſted that place in December, the very day king Charles came to Barcelona, and had carried on the ſiege with great reſolution, notwithſtanding the difficulties they met with, both from the badneſs of the weather, and the vigorous defence of the garriſon, who obtained very honourable terms. Not long after, upon the approach of the marquis de Valdecannas with a body of troops in order to attack Balaguer, the garriſon which count Staremberg in his march had left there, conſiſting of two battalions and one hundred horſe, thought fit to abandon the place; ſo that king Charles's affairs had now a very ill aſpect, being confined within the narrow bounds of the principality of Catalonia, which, by the loſs of Gironne, was open to the enemies on all ſides. On the other hand, king Philip gained this ſummer a very material advantage, by having unqueſtionable demonſtrations of the affection of the Caſtilians, which neither his defeats at Almanara and Saragoza, nor his retreat from Madrid, nor the preſence of king Charles with a veteran victorious army, were able to ſhake.

The Spaniſh grandees ſeemed indeed to be in ſome apprehenſion of their being given up by the French; and there was a ſuſpicion of ſome caballing among them: Upon which the duke of Medina Celi, king Philip's chief miniſter, was ſent a cloſe priſoner to the caſtle of Segovia, and was kept there very ſtrictly, none being admitted to ſpeak with him. He was not brought to any examination; but, after he had been ſome months in priſon, being often removed from one place to another, it was at laſt given out that he died in priſon, not without the ſuſpicion of ill practices.

Nothing material happened this year in Portugal, except only, that, about the beginning of July, the marquis de Bay, who commanded the Spaniſh forces in Eſtremadura, made himſelf maſter of the town of Miranda de Duero by ſurprize; took in it four hundred men of regular troops and militia; and then formed the blockade of Bragança, which was raiſed by the marquis de Riſbourg, upon the news of the battle of Saragoza; and ſoon after the Portugueſe took from the Spaniards, Xeres de los Cavaleros, Barcarota, Alcanza, and Puebla, places of no great conſideration. Some time before, the earl of Galway, who found himſelf uſeleſs in Portugal, had deſired and readily obtained leave to return to England.

The Czar of Muſcovy made a very conſiderable improvement of his great victory at Pultowa; for in this year's campaign he reduced to his obedience, Elbing, in Poliſh Pruſſia; Wyburgh, the capital of Carelia; Kenholm, in Finland; Arembergh, in the iſland of Oezel; Pernau, Revel, Riga, the Dunamunder-fort, and, in a word, all Livonia, the moſt valuable province in the Swediſh dominions. It is very probable, the united forces of the Czar and king Auguſtus would have made a greater progreſs; but the allies having with great wiſdom taken early meaſures, and interpoſed their good offices and power, to prevent the northern war from ſpreading into the empire, the province of Pomerania, where general Craſſau had retired out of Poland, enjoyed a perfect tranquillity. The treaty, or project of neutrality, which was made for that purpoſe, was accepted by the Czar and king Auguſtus, and by the king of Denmark with ſome exceptions; as it was by the regency of Stockholm for the Swedes; though the laſt did it only to ſerve a turn. For their Czariſh and Poliſh majeſties demanding, that the troops under general Craſſau ſhould be either diſbanded, or put into the ſervice of the allies; this laſt was not agreed to by the Swedes, though a treaty was ſet on foot for that purpoſe. At the ſame time the Swediſh miniſters at Vienna, Ratiſbon, and other places, notified that their maſter, who ſtill continued at Bender, was diſſatisfied with that neutrality: And, on the other hand, notwithſtanding the earneſt endeavours of the Britiſh and Dutch miniſters at the Ottoman Porte to baffle the artifices of the French and Swedes, the Grand Signior by the advice of the cham of Tartary, reſolved at laſt, openly to eſpouſe the quarrel of the king of Sweden. The Muſcovite ambaſſador at Conſtantinople was ſeized and confined; and not long after the Grand Signior declared war againſt the Czar, having, for that purpoſe ſent circular letters by way of manifeſto to the baſhas and governors in his dominions.

About the beginning of April the Swedes publiſhed likewiſe a manifeſto, in anſwer to one put out ſome months before by the king of Denmark, upon his landing in Schonen, and pretending to ſhew, that the reaſons alledged by the Danes to juſtify that invaſion, were ſo far from being a ſufficient cauſe of war, that they did not amount even to a plauſible pretence. Not long after, both the Swedes and Danes ſent out their fleets to ſea; and the Daniſh fleet having on the 14th and 15th of September, N. S. met with a violent ſtorm by which they were ſeparated, and ſeveral of their ſhips damaged in their rigging, they were obliged to return to the Kioger Bogt. The Swedes, imagining their loſs to have been much greater, went in queſt of them; and on the 4th of October, attacked them with twenty-one ſhips of the line of battle, and ten frigates. Upon this ſurprize, the Danes immediately cut their cables, and endeavoured to gain the wind, ſo as to get between Copenhagen and the Swediſh fleet, whilſt the Swedes endeavoured to intercept them. This occaſioned a cannonading between the foremoſt ſhips; during which, a Daniſh ſhip of ninety guns called the Danebrag blew up. But, though the Swedes gained their point, yet, advancing too far towards the Daniſh coaſt, two of their flag-ſhips, an admiral and a rear-admiral, ſtruck upon a ſand-bank, near the iſland of Amack, where the whole Swediſh fleet came to an anchor, to endeavour to recover them. This being impracticable, they ſaved the men, and ſet fire to their two ſhips, as they did to a Daniſh tranſport. In the mean time the Daniſh fleet returned to their former poſts before Koeg; and, the wind bearing hard on the coaſt, the Swedes were unwilling to attack them a ſecond time; and, on the 7th of October in the morning, weighed anchor, and ſailed towards the eaſt ſea. The Danes purſued them, but at ſuch a diſtance, as ſhewed they had no mind to another engagement.

The Imperial arms were this year attended with great ſucceſſes in Hungary, where they reduced ſeveral important towns. Some of the chief of the malecontents con-cut off; and of my regiment above one hundred private men are ſtill miſſing, and ſeven officers. Of the other nations the regiments of St. Amand, Dutch; Lucini, Neapolitan; Albuquerque, Portugueſe; and Umadas, Spaniſh; are totally deſtroyed: Lieutenant-general Belcaſtle, and major-general St. Amand killed. The enemy's loſs is modeſtly computed to amount to above ſix thouſand men killed on the ſpot.

By this great turn of affairs, my lord, the command of the remnant of her majeſty's troops is devolved on me. I am endeavouring, by the marſhal's directions and deſire, to make up the regiments of Richards and Du Bourgay, out of the few people that are come off, and thoſe that were left in the hoſpitals. The greateſt difficulty attends my own, which is reduced to betwixt eighty and a hundred men, and as many horſes, and no fund to go upon; but, if I can get money from Mr. Mead, or credit, I ſhall uſe my beſt endeavours to get men and horſes to repair my regiment, and put it in a condition to ſerve next campaign, if my deſigns are approved of. This I humbly pray your lordſhip to lay before her majeſty, and that ſpeedy ſupplies may be ſent to us, to keep up the few bodies that are left, if it be thought fit for the ſervice; for Mr. Mead complains very much for want of money and credit, by which we are already reduced to great ſtreights here, where our credit is very indifferent, and our wants extremely great, having loſt all our equipages in the battle, and ſaved nothing but what we had on our backs; and, as my loſs in particular is very conſiderable, I hope your lordſhip will be ſo kind as to repreſent it as ſuch, that her majeſty will be pleaſed to conſider me in it, and grant me ſome compenſation, which may enable me to ſerve the next campaign with ſome ſatisfaction.

To this letter, our Author had added the memorial ſent to the queen by the officers of the two regiments commanded by the colonels Richards and Du Bourgay, which begins thus:

That the ſaid two regiments were the only Engliſh battalions, that were at the battle of Villa Vicioſa: That, being poſted on the left of the two lines, the horſe, who were on our flanks gave way, and left us naked, and expoſed to the weight and ſhock of the whole right wing of the enemy; who like a torrent not to be reſiſted, ſoon over-bore us. Many of your majeſty's faithful officers loſt their lives upon the ſpot; many more were wounded, and all were at laſt made priſoners: Though ſome few of us were fortunate enough to be retaken. Fortunate indeed we eſteem it; becauſe we hope to be able to ſerve your majeſty again this campaign, and to revenge the wrongs our country ſuffered in the laſt. With regard to every thing elſe, our miſery is equal to that of the poor captives.——For never certainly in any nation, or in any age, where Chriſtianity, or the civil arts have been planted, have ſuch barbarities been practiſed, as by this ungenerous enemy, of whom it may truly be ſaid, Their very tender mercies were cruel. For, after their officers had taken from us what money or whatever elſe of value we had about us, and had promiſed us their protection, they ſuffered, nay, encouraged their ſoldiers to ſtrip us of our cloaths, to inſult, and to wound us. In this miſerable condition were we found, when ſome of us were reſtored to our liberty; and in this condition we retreated with the body of the army, having loſt the entire baggage of the two regiments.

ſidering, that their affairs were deſperate, inclined to conſult their ſafety, by making their ſubmiſſion to the emperor. But, upon the Turks declaring war againſt the Muſcovites, prince Ragotſki encouraged them to ſtand out to the laſt, by giving them hopes, that the Turks would aſſiſt them with men, and the French with engineers and money.

The Imperial court perſiſting in their reſolution not to grant the exerciſe of the Proteſtant religion in Sileſia, upon pretence that they were not included either in the treaty of Weſtphalia, or in the convention of Alt Ranſtadt; the queen of Great-Britain ordered lieutenant-general Palmes her envoy extraordinary to the emperor, to make new inſtances in their favour. And the ſtates-general ordered the ſieur Bruyninx, their envoy, to uſe his good offices, in concert with the Britiſh miniſters. They preſented a joint-memorial to the emperor, which, however, had but little effect; though, at this time, the Imperial court had more reaſon than ever to keep meaſures with the Proteſtant powers. Theſe were the tranſactions abroad this campaign, during which great changes had happened in England.

The trial of Dr. Sacheverel had given, as was obſerved, great advantages to the Tory party, who ſet on foot addreſſes from all parts of the nation, in which the abſolute power of our princes was aſſerted, and all reſiſtance was condemned, under the deſignation of anti-monarchical and republican principles; the queen's hereditary right was acknowledged; and yet a zeal for the proteſtant ſucceſſion was likewiſe pretended, to make thoſe addreſſes paſs the more eaſily with the unthinking multitude. Moſt of theſe concluded with an intimation of their hopes, that the queen would diſſolve the preſent parliament, giving aſſurances, that in a new election they would chuſe none, but ſuch as ſhould be faithful to the crown, and zealous for the church. Theſe were at firſt more coldly received; for the queen either made no anſwer at all, or made them in very general words. Addreſſes were brought up on the other hand, magnifying the conduct of the parliament, and expreſſing a zeal for maintaining the revolution and the proteſtant ſucceſſion.

But the queen's reſolution of changing her miniſtry had begun to appear very early this year; for in the beginning of January 1709-10, upon the death of the earl of Eſſex, ſhe wrote to the duke of Marlborough to give his regiment to Mr. Hill, a man who had been extremely ungrateful to the ducheſs of Marlborough, and whoſe ſiſter, Mrs. Maſham, the duke well knew, was at this time undermining the intereſt of himſelf, his family and friends. The ſcheme of the queen's new counſellors to make her miniſters quit her ſervice, or engage her to diſcard them, now ſhewed itſelf without diſguiſe. They durſt not tell her at once all they deſigned; but, propoſing to her only one thing at a time, led her, by inſenſible degrees, to the accompliſhment of the whole. They began, as has been related, with engaging her to nominate perſons to biſhopricks, without conſulting her miniſters. And now they prevailed with her to appoint military officers, without adviſing with her general. And nothing could be more to their purpoſe, than this choice of Mr. Hill for lord Eſſex's regiment, becauſe they knew, that nothing could be more diſagreeable to the duke of Marlborough, or would tend more to leſſen his weight and authority in the army, and conſequently at home too. The new counſellorsſaw, that, if the duke readily yielded in this matter, it would ſow diſcontent among the officers; and that a door would be opened for his enemies to come into the army, and inſult him. And, on the other hand, if the duke ſhould not comply, or ſhould ſhew any reluctance in complying, this would furniſh an excellent pretence for grievous complaints, that the queen was but a cypher, and could do nothing. Upon the queen's letter, the duke waited on her, and with all humility repreſented to her, what a prejudice it would be to her ſervice, to have ſo young an officer preferred before ſo many others of higher rank and longer ſervice; beſides, that the ſhewing ſo extraordinary and partial favour to Mrs. Maſham's brother could be interpreted no otherwiſe, than as a declaring againſt all thoſe, who had ſo much reaſon to be uneaſy with her; and that, indeed, it would be ſetting up a banner for all the diſcontented perſons in the army to repair to. In ſhort, the duke ſaid every thing he could think of, and with all the moving concern that the nature of the affair created in him, to engage her to change her reſolution. But all ſeemed to no purpoſe. He could not draw one kind expreſſion from her, nor obtain any anſwer, but "that he would do well to adviſe with his friends."

The earl of Godolphin ſpoke often to her upon the ſame ſubject, repreſenting to her the Duke's long, great, and faithful ſervices, and the very bad influence, which her intended favour to Mr. Hill, muſt neceſſarily have in the army. But neither had this ſo much effect as to engage her to ſay one favourable word about the duke. Wherefore, on the 15th of January, he left the town, and went to Windſor in great diſcontent. It was council-day. The queen did not aſk where he was, nor take the leaſt notice of his abſence. His withdrawing himſelf made a great deal of noiſe in the town. Many of the nobility ſpoke with earneſtneſs to the queen of the very ill conſequences of mortifying a man, who had done her ſo long and important ſervices. She anſwered, that his ſervices were ſtill freſh in her memory, and that ſhe had as much kindneſs for him as ever ſhe had. The noiſe, however, ſtill continued and increaſed, and there was great diſcourſe, not without probability, that ſome notice would be taken of the matter in the houſe of commons, and ſome votes paſſed diſagreeable to the queen and her new counſellors. This deſign was laid to the ducheſs of Marlborough's charge; but ſhe ſaid enough to the queen to vindicate herſelf. And indeed it was owing to the duke's particular friends in the houſe, that no ſuch notice was taken.

The new counſellors being alarmed with apprehenſions of what the parliament might do, and believing that they ſhould be able, at a proper ſeaſon, to make better uſe of the queen's yielding up the point, than of her inſiſting upon it, gave her advice accordingly; ſo that, on the 20th of January, ſhe ordered the earl of Godolphin to write to the duke, "that he might diſpoſe of the regiment, as he himſelf thought fit;" and to deſire him to come to town. But, before this reached the duke, he had written the following letter to the queen:

MADAM,

"By what I hear from London, I find your majeſty is pleaſed to think, that, when I have reflected, I muſt be of opinion, that you are in the right in giving Mr. Hill the earl of Eſſex's regiment. I beg your Majeſty will be ſo juſt to me, as not to think I can be ſo unreaſonable, as to be mortified to the degree that I am, if it proceeded only from this one thing; for I ſhall always be ready and glad to do every thing that is agreeable to you, after I have repreſented what may be a prejudice to your ſervice. But this is only one of a great many mortifications that I have met with. And, as I may not have many opportunities of writing to you, let me beg of your majeſty to reflect what your own people, and the reſt of the world, muſt think, who have been witneſſes of the love, zeal, and duty, with which I have ſerved you, when they ſhall ſee, that, after all I have done, it has not been able to protect me againſt the malice of a bed-chamber woman. Your majeſty will allow me on this occaſion to remind you of what I wrote to you the laſt campaign of the certain knowledge I had of Mrs. Maſham's having aſſured Mr. Harley, that I ſhould receive ſuch conſtant mortifications as ſhould make it impoſſible for me to continue in your ſervice. God Almighty and the whole world are my witneſſes, with what care and pains I have ſerved you for more than twenty years; and I was reſolved, if poſſible, to have ſtruggled with the difficulties to the end of this war. But the many inſtances I have had of your majeſty's great change to me, has ſo broke my ſpirits, that I muſt beg, as the greateſt and laſt favour, that you will approve of my retiring, ſo that I may employ the little time I have to live, in making my juſt acknowledgments to God, for the protection he has been pleaſed to give me. And your majeſty may be aſſured, that my zeal for you and my country is ſo great, that in my retirement I ſhall daily pray for your proſperity, and that thoſe, who ſhall ſerve you as faithfully as I have done, may never feel the hard return, that I have met with."

The queen wrote the duke an anſwer, expreſſing ſome concern at ſeveral parts of his letter, aſſuring him, without entering into particulars, that he had no ground for ſuſpicions, and deſiring him to come to town. But fearing, at the ſame time, that ſome motion might be made in parliament againſt Mrs. Maſham, which might be attended with very diſagreeable conſequences, ſhe ſent about in much concern to many perſons to ſtand by her, as if ſome great attack was going to be made upon her. This application, and the cloſeting ſome perſons, who were known enemies to the revolution, gave encouragement to the jacobites; ſeveral of whom were now obſerved running to court with faces full of buſineſs and ſatisfaction, as if they were going to get the government into their hands. And this being repreſented to the queen, as a kind of victory gained by her over the Marlborough family, was doubtleſs one means of hindering all thoughts of a real accommodation.

In about a month after this it was, that both houſes of parliament addreſſed the queen, to order the duke of Marlborough over into Holland, to attend to the great affair of a peace, and in caſe that project did not take effect, to prepare for an early opening the campaign. In her anſwer to this addreſs (as hath been ſaid) ſhe uſed theſe words: "I am very glad to find, that you concur with me in a juſt ſenſe of the Duke of Marlborough's eminent ſervices." But, notwithſtanding this, he had not been long gone, before ſhe gave a ſignal proof how much his declared enemies were in her favour, by granting Mr. Hill a penſion of one thouſand pounds a year; and in ſome time, ſhe made both him and Mr. Maſham, men of little or no ſervice, general officers over the heads of many brave men, who had frequently hazarded their lives in her ſervice, and had gone through the toils and hardſhips of a tedious war.

In the mean time the ducheſs of Marlborough learnt, that the queen was made to believe, that ſhe often ſpoke of her in company diſreſpectfully; upon which ſhe deſired an audience, in order to juſtify herſelf, which ſhe obtained on the 6th of April; but could make no impreſſion upon the queen, whom ſhe never ſaw afterwards, nor ever had any correſpondence with her majeſty, except upon two occaſions relating to the public[P]. However, notwithſtanding this thorough alienation of the queen's affections from the ducheſs, ſhe was not yet diveſted of her employments; it being, perhaps, not yet determined, who ſhould ſucceed her, nor whether it were proper, that the duke of Marlborough ſhould have that mortification, before the ſeaſon was fully ripe for the execution of the new ſcheme; though it now was greatly advanced, ſince the duke of Shrewſbury, who had voted for the acquittal of Dr. Sacheverel, was ſoon after appointed lord-chamberlain, in the room of the marquis of Kent, who was made a duke. The duke of Shrewſbury had gone out of England, towards the end of the reign of king William, thinking, as he gave out, that a warmer climate was neceſſary for his health. He ſtaid ſeveral years at Rome, where he became acquainted with a Roman lady; who, upon his leaving Rome to return to England, went after him to Augſburg, where ſhe overtook him, and declared herſelf a Proteſtant; upon which he married her there, and came with her back to England in 1706. Upon his return, the Whigs lived in civilities with him; but they thought his leaving England, and his living ſo long out of it, while the nation was in ſo much danger, and his ſtrange marriage, gave juſt cauſe of ſuſpicion. The duke of Marlborough and the lord Godolphin lived ſtill in friendſhip with him, and ſtudied to overcome the jealouſies that the Whigs had of him; for they generally believed, that he had adviſed king William to the change, which he made in his miniſtry towards the end of his reign. He ſeemed not to be concerned at the diſtance in which he was kept from buſineſs; but, as was obſerved above, in the trial of Dr. Sacheverel, he left the Whigs in every vote; and the change of his principles, which he had diſcovered by this, was imputed to a ſecret management between him and Mr. Harley with the new favourite. But, before the queen declared her intention of giving him the lord chamberlain's ſtaff, ſhe thought fit, for form ſake, and perhaps to cover her further deſigns, to communicate her reſolutions to the earl of Godolphin, who, being then at Newmarket, ſent a letter to the queen; to which her majeſty wrote, with her own hand, on the 13th of April, the following anſwer:

"I am ſorry to find by your letter, you are ſo very much in the ſpleen, as to think you cannot, for the future, contribute any thing towards my quiet but your wiſhes. However, I will ſtill hope you will uſe your endeavours. Never was there more occaſion than now; for, by all one

[P] The ducheſs of Marlborough, in the account of her conduct, ſays: As I knew myſelf wholly free from the guilt of this charge, and indeed incapable of it, I waited on her majeſty the 3d of April, 1710, and begged of her that ſhe would be pleaſed to give me a private hour, becauſe I had ſomething which I was deſirous of ſaying to her majeſty, before I went out of town. I named three ſeveral hours, in which I knew the queen uſed to be alone, but ſhe refuſed them all in a very unuſual and ſurprizing manner; and at laſt ſhe herſelf appointed ſix o'clock the next day, the hour for prayers, when ſhe could leaſt of all expect to be at leiſure for any particular converſation. But even this ſmall favour, though promiſed, was not thought adviſeable to be granted by her new counſellors. For that night ſhe wrote a letter to me, in which ſhe deſired me 'to lay before her in writing whatever I had to ſay, and to gratify myſelf in going into the country as ſoon as I could.' I took the firſt opportunity of waiting upon the queen again, and uſed all the arguments I could to obtain a private hour; alledging, that when her majeſty ſhould hear what I had to ſay, ſhe would herſelf perceive it impoſſible to put things of that nature into writing: That I was now going out of town for a great while, and perhaps ſhould never have occaſion to give her a like trouble as long as I lived. The Queen refuſed it ſeveral times in a manner hard to be deſcribed; but at laſt appointed the next day after dinner. Yet upon further conſideration it was thought adviſeable to break this appointment; for the next morning, ſhe wrote to me, to let me know, that 'ſhe ſhould dine at Kenſington, and that ſhe once more deſired me to put my thoughts into writing.' To this, I wrote an anſwer, begging that her Majeſty would give me leave to follow her to Kenſington; and that ſhe might not apprehend a greater trouble than ſhe would receive, I aſſured her majeſty, that what I had to ſay, would not create any diſpute or uneaſineſs (it relating only to the clearing myſelf of ſome things, which I had heard had very wrongfully been laid to my charge) and could have no conſequence either in obliging her majeſty to anſwer, or to ſee me oftener than would be eaſy to her: Adding, that, if that afternoon were not convenient, I would come every day, and wait till her majeſty would pleaſe to allow me to ſpeak to her. Upon the 6th of April, I followed this letter to Kenſington, and by that means prevented the queen's writing again to me, as ſhe was preparing to do. The page, who went in to acquaint the queen, that I was come to wait upon her, ſtaid longer than uſual; long enough, it is ſuppoſed, to give time to deliberate, whether the favour of admiſſion ſhould be granted, and to ſettle the meaſures of behaviour, if I were admitted. But at laſt he came out, and told me, I might go in. As I was entering, the queen ſaid, ſhe was juſt going to write to me. And when I began to ſpeak, ſhe interrupted me four or five times with theſe repeated words 'Whatever you have to ſay, you may put it into writing.' I ſaid, her majeſty never did ſo hard a thing to any, as to refuſe to hear them ſpeak, and aſſured her, that I was not going to trouble her upon the ſubject, which I knew to be ſo ungrateful to her; but that I could not poſſibly reſt, till I had cleared myſelf from ſome particular calumnies, with which I had been loaded. I then went on to ſpeak (though the queen turned away her face from me) and to repreſent my hard caſe: that there were thoſe about her majeſty, who had made her believe, that I had ſaid things of her, which I was no more capable of ſaying, than of killing my own children: that I ſeldom named her majeſty in company, and never without reſpect, and the like: The queen ſaid, 'Without doubt there had been many lies told.' I then begged, in order to make this trouble the ſhorter, and my own innocence the plainer, that I might know the particulars, of which I had been accuſed; becauſe, if I were guilty, that would quickly appear; and if I were innocent, this method only would clear me. The queen replied, that 'ſhe would give me no anſwer;' laying hold on a word in my letter, that what I had to ſay, in my own vindication, would have no conſequence in obliging her majeſty to anſwer, &c. which ſurely did not at all imply, that I did not deſire to know the particular things laid to my charge, without which it was impoſſible for me to clear myſelf. This I aſſured her majeſty was all I deſired, and that I did not aſk the names of the authors or the relators of thoſe calumnies; ſaying all that I could think reaſonable to inforce my juſt requeſt. But the queen repeated again and again the words ſhe had uſed, without ever receding. And it is probable, that this converſation had never been conſented to, but that her majeſty had been carefully provided with thoſe words, as a ſhield to defend her againſt every reaſon I could offer. I proteſted to her majeſty, that I had no deſign in giving her this trouble, to ſolicit the return of her favour; and that my ſole view was to clear myſelf, which was too juſt a deſign, to be wholly diſappointed by her majeſty. Upon this the queen offered to go out of the room, I following her, and begging leave to clear myſelf; and the queen repeating over and over again, 'You deſired no anſwer, and ſhall have none.' When ſhe came to the door, I fell into great diſorder; ſtreams of tears flowed down againſt my will, and prevented my ſpeaking for ſome time. At length I recovered myſelf, and appealed to the queen in the vehemence of my concern, whether I might not ſtill have been happy in her majeſty's favour, if I could have contradicted or diſſembled my real opinion of men or things? Whether I had offended in any thing, unleſs in a very zealous preſſing upon her that, which I thought neceſſary for her ſervice and ſecurity? I then ſaid, I was informed by a very reaſonable and credible perſon about the court, that things were laid to my charge, of which I was wholly incapable: that this perſon knew that ſuch ſtories were perpetually told to her majeſty to incenſe her, and had begged of me to come and vindicate myſelf: that the ſame perſon had thought me of late guilty of ſome omiſſions towards her majeſty, being intirely ignorant how uneaſy to her my frequent attendance muſt be, after what had happened between us. I explained ſome things, which I had heard her majeſty had taken amiſs of me; and then with a freſh flood of tears, and a concern ſufficient to move compaſſion even where all love was abſent, I begged to know what other particulars ſhe had heard of me, that I might not be denied all power of juſtifying myſelf. But ſtill the only return was, 'You deſired no anſwer, and you ſhall have none.' I then begged to know if her majeſty would tell me ſome other time?—'You deſired no anſwer, and you ſhall have none.' I then appealed to her majeſty again, if ſhe did not herſelf know, that I had often deſpiſed intereſt in compariſon of ſerving her faithfully, and doing right: and whether ſhe did not know me to be of a temper uncapable of diſowning any thing, which I know to be true?—'You deſired no anſwer, and you ſhall have none.' This uſage was ſo ſevere, and theſe words ſo often repeated, were ſo ſhocking (being an utter denial of common juſtice to one, who had been a moſt faithful ſervant, and now aſked nothing more) that I could not conquer myſelf, but ſaid the moſt diſreſpectful thing I ever yet ſpoke to the queen in my life, and yet, what ſuch an occaſion, and ſuch circumſtances might well excuſe, if not juſtify; and that was, 'I was confident her majeſty would ſuffer for ſuch an inſtance of inhumanity.' The queen anſwered, 'That will be to myſelf.' Thus ended this remarkable converſation, the laſt I ever had with her majeſty. I ſhall make no comment upon it. The queen always meant well, how much ſoever ſhe might be blinded or miſguided. But in a letter, which I had from the duke of Marlborough about eight months before, there is ſomething ſo pertinent to the preſent occaſion, that I cannot forbear tranſcribing the paſſage:

Aug. 26. 1709.

"It has always been my obſervation in diſputes, eſpecially in that of kindneſs and friendſhip, that all reproaches, though ever ſo juſt, ſerve to no end but making the breach wider. I cannot help being of opinion, that, however inſignificant we may be, there is a power above, that puts a period to our happineſs or unhappineſs. If any body had told me eight years ago, that after ſuch great ſucceſs, and after you had been a faithful ſervant twenty-ſeven years, that even in the queen's life-time we ſhould be obliged to ſeek happineſs in a retired life, I could not have believed that poſſible."

hears and ſees every day, as things are at preſent, I think one can expect nothing but confuſion. I am ſure, for my part, I ſhall be ready to join with all my friends in every thing, that is reaſonable, to allay the heat and ferment, that is in this poor nation. Since you went to Newmarket, I have received ſeveral aſſurances from the duke of Shrewſbury of his readineſs to ſerve me upon all occaſions, and his willingneſs to come into my ſervice; which offer I was very glad to accept of, having a very good opinion of him, and believing he may be of great uſe in theſe troubleſome times. For theſe reaſons I have reſolved to part with the duke of Kent, who, I hope, will be eaſy in this matter, by being made a duke; and, I hope, this change will meet with your approbation, which I wiſh I may ever have in all my actions. I have not yet declared my intentions of giving the ſtaff and the key to the duke of Shrewſbury, becauſe I would be the firſt, that ſhould acquaint you with it."

The lord-treaſurer, who well underſtood the meaning, and foreſaw the conſequences of ſuch a change, wrote to the queen the following letter:

Newmarket, April 15, 1710.

"I have the honour of your majeſty's letter of the 13th, by which I have the grief to find, that what you are pleaſed to call ſpleen in my former letter, was only a true impulſe and conviction of mind, that your majeſty is ſuffering yourſelf to be guided to your own ruin and deſtruction, as faſt as it is poſſible for them to compaſs it, to whom you ſeem ſo much to hearken.

"I am not therefore ſo much ſurprized, as concerned at the reſolution, which your majeſty ſays you have taken, of bringing in the duke of Shrewſbury. For when people began to be ſenſible it would be difficult to perſuade your majeſty to diſſolve a parliament, which, for two winters together, had given you above ſix millions a year for the ſupport of a war, upon which your crown depends; even while that war is ſtill ſubſiſting, they have had the cunning to contrive this propoſal to your majeſty, which, in its conſequence, will certainly put you under a neceſſity of breaking the parliament, though contrary (I yet believe) to your mind and intention.

"I beg your majeſty to be perſuaded, I do not ſay this out of the leaſt prejudice to the duke of Shrewſbury. There is no man, of whoſe capacity I have had a better impreſſion; nor with whom I have lived more eaſily and freely for above twenty years. Your majeſty may pleaſe to remember, that, at your firſt coming to the crown, I was deſirous he ſhould have had one of the chief poſts in your ſervice; and it would have been happy for your majeſty and the kingdom, if he had accepted that offer. But he thought fit to decline it; and the reaſons generally given at that time for his doing ſo, do not much recommend him to your majeſty's ſervice. But I muſt endeavour to let your majeſty ſee things as they really are. And to bring him into your ſervice and into your buſineſs at this time, juſt after his being in a public open conjunction in every vote with the whole body of the Tories, and in a private conſtant correſpondence and caballing with Mr. Harley in every thing, what conſequence can this poſſibly have, but to make every man, that is now in your cabinet-council, except———to run from it as they would from the plague? And I leave it to your majeſty to judge, what effect this intire change of your miniſters will have among your allies abroad; and how well this war is like to be carried on, in their opinion, by thoſe who have all along oppoſed and obſtructed it, and who will like any peace the better, the more it leaves France at liberty to take their time of impoſing the Pretender upon this country.

"Theſe conſiderations muſt certainly make Holland run immediately into a ſeparate peace with France, and make your majeſty loſe all the honour and all the reputation your arms had acquired by the war; and make the kingdom loſe all the fruits of that vaſt expence, which they have been at in this war, as well as all the advantage and ſafety, which they had ſo much need of, and had ſo fair a proſpect of obtaining by it. And can any body imagine, that, after ſo great a diſappointment to the kingdom, there will not be an enquiry into the cauſes of it; and who have been the occaſion of ſo great a change in your majeſty's meaſures and counſels, which had been ſo long ſucceſsful, and gotten you ſo great a name in the world? I am very much afraid your majeſty will find, when it is too late, that it will be a pretty difficult taſk for any body to ſtand againſt ſuch an enquiry. I am ſure, if I did not think all theſe conſequences inevitable, I would never give your majeſty the trouble and uneaſineſs of laying them before you. But perſuaded as I am, that your majeſty will find them ſo, it is my indiſpenſable duty to do it of pure faithfulneſs and zeal for your majeſty's ſervice and honour. Your majeſty's having taken a reſolution of ſo much conſequence to all your affairs both at home and abroad, without acquainting the duke of Marlborough or me with it, till after you had taken it, is the leaſt part of my mortification in this whole affair, though perhaps the world may think the long and faithful ſervices, we have conſtantly and zealouſly endeavoured to do your majeſty, might have deſerved a little more conſideration. However, for my own part, I moſt humbly beg leave to aſſure your majeſty, I will never give the leaſt obſtruction to your meaſures, or to any miniſters you ſhall pleaſe to employ. And I muſt beg further, to make two humble requeſts to your majeſty; the one, that you will allow me to paſs the remainder of my life always out of London, where I may find moſt eaſe and quiet. The other, that you would keep this letter, and read it again about next Chriſtmas, and then be pleaſed to make your own judgment, who hath given you the beſt and moſt faithful advice."

This letter made no impreſſion upon the queen, who, two days before ſhe received it, being already fixed in her choice, delivered on the 14th of April, the ſtaff and key to the duke of Shrewſbury, who gave the miniſters very poſitive aſſurances, that his principles were the ſame they had been during the laſt reign, and were in no reſpect altered. Upon which he deſired to enter into confidences with them; but there was now too much ground given for ſuſpicion.

About the beginning of June, the deſign of turning out the earl of Sunderland from the poſt of ſecretary of ſtate began to be talked of. As ſoon as this deſign reached the duke of Marlborough, who was then abroad at the head of the army, he wrote a very moving letter to the queen, repreſenting the very ill conſequences it would neceſſarily have upon all affairs abroad, to have his ſon-in-law, againſt whoſe fidelity nothing could be objected, and in whom the allies had ſo intire a confidence, turned out of her ſervice in the middle of a campaign; and begging it as a reward of all his paſt ſervices, that ſhe would at leaſt delay her reſolution till the campaign was ended. The ducheſs of Marlborough was likewiſe urged by ſome friends to try to ſay ſomething, to divert, if poſſible, ſuch a ſtroke; becauſe it was given out, that the queen would do this chiefly on the ducheſs's account, that ſhe might feel the effects of her diſpleaſure in ſo ſenſible and tender a point. No conſideration proper to herſelf could have induced the ducheſs to trouble the queen again after that laſt converſation: but ſhe was overcome by the conſideration of the duke of Marlborough, the earl of Sunderland, and the public intereſt, and wrote to the queen, on the 7th of June 1710, begging, for the duke of Marlborough's ſake, that her majeſty would not give him ſuch a blow, of which ſhe dreaded the conſequence; putting her majeſty in mind of her letter about the duke upon the victory of Blenheim, and adding the moſt ſolemn aſſurances, that ſhe had not ſo much as a wiſh to remove Mrs. Maſham; and that all the noiſe, which had been about an addreſs for that purpoſe, had been occaſioned by the duke of Marlborough's diſcontents at that time. To this the queen wrote a very ſhort and harſh anſwer, complaining, that the ducheſs had broke her promiſe of not ſaying any thing of politics or of Mrs. Maſham, and concluding, that it was plain from this ill uſage, what ſhe was to expect for the future. The ducheſs upon this wrote a ſecond letter, in which ſhe aſſured her majeſty, that ſhe ſhould not have troubled her with the firſt, but that ſhe had heard it reported, that the perſecution, begun againſt the duke of Marlborough and his family, was chiefly occaſioned by her majeſty's diſpleaſure and averſion to her, as having promoted an addreſs againſt Mrs. Maſham: that it was only to vindicate herſelf from that aſperſion, that ſhe had preſumed to trouble her majeſty: that ſhe could not imagine it could be interpreted as an offence, to vindicate herſelf from what was now made the pretence for turning out the earl of Sunderland, and puſhing the duke of Marlborough to extremities; that ſhe had no reaſon to think, that the aſſuring her majeſty, that ſhe would never have any hand in any thing againſt Mrs. Maſham, could have been conſtrued as an ungrateful ſpeaking about her, or called a continuation of ill uſage: that ſhe thought this was rather a complying with her majeſty's inclination, and ſaying what ſhe could not but approve: that all the politics in her letter was her concern for the duke; making it her laſt requeſt, that her majeſty would only defer the blow till the end of the campaign. This (ſhe added) ſhe begged upon her knees, and left her majeſty to judge, whether, after ſuch an expreſſion, it was likely that ſhe ſhould ever enter into any thing that could diſpleaſe her.

Whether the ducheſs's interfering in this matter haſtened the execution of the deſign, is not known; but it is certain, that it did not retard it; the lord Sunderland was, on the 14th of June, diſmiſſed the office, and the ſeals given the next day to the lord Dartmouth, one of the lords commiſſioners of trade and plantations, and ſon-in-law to the earl of Nottingham. On this occaſion ſeveral great men, who wiſhed well to their country, and who feared that the duke of Marlborough might in diſguſt quit the ſervice, immediately wrote him a joint letter in the following terms:

My Lord, June 14, 1710.

"We ſhould not have given your grace the trouble of this joint-letter, but for the great concern and uneaſineſs in which we find you, on account of my lord Sunderland, by your letter of the 20th to my lord-treaſurer, which he has communicated to us. That letter, as moving and reaſonable as it was, has not hindered the ſeals from being taken this morning from my lord Sunderland. No wonder then, if the utmoſt endeavours, which could be uſed to prevent it, and the ſtrong arguments, which have been made of the ill conſequences that muſt attend ſuch ſteps both at home and abroad, have met with ſo little ſucceſs. We find ourſelves ſo much afflicted with this misfortune, that we cannot but be extremely ſenſible of the great mortification this muſt give you at this critical juncture, when you are every moment hazarding your life in the ſervice of your country, and whilſt the fate of Europe depends, in ſo great a degree, on your conduct and good ſucceſs: But we are alſo as fully convinced, that it is impoſſible for your grace to quit the ſervice at this time, without the utmoſt hazard to the whole alliance. And we muſt therefore conjure you, by the glory you have already obtained, by the many ſervices you have done your queen and country, by the expectation you have juſtly raiſed in all Europe, and by all that is dear and tender to you at home, whoſe chief dependance is upon your ſucceſs, that you would not leave this great work unfiniſhed, but continue at the head of the army. This we look upon as the moſt neceſſary ſtep, that can be taken to prevent the diſſolution of this parliament. Your grace's compliance with this our earneſt requeſt would be the greateſt obligation to us, and all that wiſh well to our country. And, you may depend upon it, that the contrary will be the greateſt ſatisfaction to your enemies."[q]

The high-church party were much pleaſed and elated upon this alteration, which they looked upon as a ſure forerunner of greater changes; "extolling the queen for aſſerting her juſt prerogative, and ſetting herſelf free from an arbitrary junto, who kept her in an inglorious dependance on their will and caprice." And it was ſaid, the duke of Beaufort being, about this time, come to court to pay his reſpects to her majeſty, told her, "That he was extremely glad he could now ſalute her Queen." On the other hand, the Whigs were the more alarmed, as the beſt part of their wealth was lodged in the Exchequer and public funds; and, as they rightly conſidered, that the removal of the Earl of Sunderland was but a ſtep to come at the lord-treaſurer, in whoſe capacity, punctuality, and integrity, the monied men repoſed an intire confidence; and they foreſaw that his being laid aſide would very much affect the public credit, as it immediately did. Whereupon ſir Gilbert Heathcote, governor of the bank of England; Nathaniel Gould, deputy-governor; Francis Eyles and ſir William Scawen, two of the directors, made their application to the duke of Newcaſtle, lord privy-ſeal, to whom having repreſented the dangers likely to attend the change of the miniſtry, the duke introduced them to the queen, who told them, "That ſhe, for ſome time before, had reſolved to remove the earl of Sunderland for particular reaſons of ſtate; but that ſhe had not yet determined to make any other changes; and whenever ſhe ſhould, ſhe would take care, that the public credit might not be injured thereby."

[q] This letter was ſubſcribed by,

Cowper,	Devonſhire,
Godolphin,	Orford,
Sommers,	Halliſax,
Newcaſtle,	H. Boyle.

[r] The Dutch, as well as the Bank, were ſeverely reflected upon by the Tories, for intermeddling in an affair of this nature; and at the ſame time, they handed about an harſh anſwer, which they pretended the queen gave to Vryberg's memorial: "I am ſurpriſed a matter of this kind ſhould come from the States. It is the greateſt inſult that ever was offered to the crown of England. However, it ſhall not leſſen my eſteem for my allies, nor alter my reſolution in my own affairs." Thoſe, who framed this anſwer, had forgot that the queen had interpoſed at the court of Vienna in favour of the emperor's Proteſtant ſubjects, and that the parliament had deſired her to apply to the emperor, for ſending prince Eugene to command in Spain.

[s] Boyer and others ſay, the duke of Somerſet was ſent to demand the treaſurer's ſtaff.

Upon this it was reported, the queen had declared, ſhe deſigned to make no more alterations in the miniſtry, which immediately reſtored the public funds to their former value; but they ſoon began to fall again, and many foreigners withdrew their effects from England upon a ſtrong report, that not only the lord-treaſurer would be ſet aſide, but even the parliament diſſolved.

The queen's allies, and particularly the emperor and the ſtates, were very attentive to what paſſed in Great-Britain; and being apprehenſive, that the duke of Marlborough would either be removed, or ſo far diſguſted, as to lay down his command, which might bring a great prejudice to the common cauſe, count Gallas, the Imperial miniſter, and monſieur de Vryberg, the Dutch envoy, were directed, in a moſt reſpectful manner, to repreſent to the queen, what ill influence the changing of the miniſtry might have on affairs abroad. In anſwer to their memorials, count Gallas was told that he might aſſure the emperor, "whatever changes the queen deſigned to make, ſhe had reſolved to continue the duke of Marlborough in his employments; and deſired prince Eugene, and the other imperial generals and plenipotentiaries might act with him, with the ſame confidence as before." The anſwer which was given to Vryberg, was kept a ſecret; however, it was ſaid, the queen put a favourable conſtruction on the interpoſition of the ſtates, in favour of the miniſtry, looking upon it as the effect of their zeal for the common cauſe, and the confidence they repoſed in the duke of Marlborough's conduct. Theſe interpoſitions were repreſented by thoſe who had never been verſed in the negotiations of princes in an alliance, as a bold intruding into the queen's councils; though nothing is more common, than for princes to offer mutual advices[r].

The queen had no ſooner begun to change her miniſtry by diſplacing the earl of Sunderland, than the French were attentive how to turn it to their advantage. The earl's removal was quickly inſerted in the Paris Gazette, with the particular notice, that he was ſon-in-law to the duke of Marlborough. Their other news-papers were likewiſe filled with all the domeſtic feuds and conteſts of the parties in Great-Britain, which were related with an air of triumph, and helped very much to raiſe the ſpirits of the French.

On the 8th of Auguſt, the very day after the queen had expreſſed her deſire to the earl of Godolphin himſelf, that he would continue in her ſervice, ſhe diſmiſſed him; and her letter of order to him to break his ſtaff was ſent by no worthier a meſſenger than a man in a livery, to be left with his lordſhip's porter[s]. The queen indeed confeſſed to thoſe, who expoſtulated with her upon this occaſion, "That ſhe was ſorry for it, but could not help it." The next day it was declared that the queen had appointed earl Paulet, Mr. Robert Harley, Mr. Henry Paget, ſir Thomas Manſel, and Mr. Robert Benſon, commiſſioners of the treaſury. Though lord Pawlet was the firſt in form, Mr. Harley was the perſon with whom the ſecret was lodged; and it was viſible, he was the chief miniſter, being at the ſame time made chancellor and under treaſurer of the Exchequer, in the room of Mr. Smith, who was afterwards made a teller of the Exchequer. And now it appeared, that a total change of the miniſtry, and the diſſolution of the parliament, were reſolved on.

In the mean while Dr. Sacheverel, being preſented to a benefice in North-Wales, went down to take poſſeſſion of it; as he paſſed through the counties, both going and coming, he was received and followed by ſuch numbers, and entertained with ſuch magnificence, that our princes in their progreſſes have not been more run after than he was: Great fury and violence appeared on many occaſions, though care was taken to give his followers no ſort of provocation: he was looked on as the champion of the church; and he ſhewed as much inſolence on that occaſion, as his party did folly[t]. No notice was taken by the government, of all theſe tumultuous proceedings; they were rather encouraged than checked. All this was like a prelude to a greater ſcene, which was to be acted at court.

[t] The particulars of this progreſs more at large were as follows: He went from London about the middle of May to Oxford, with a numerous attendance, and was welcomed and magnificently entertained by the earl of Abingdon, Mr. Charles Bertie, fellow of All-Souls College, Mr. Rowney, one of the members of parliament for that city, the vice-chancellor, the heads of houſes, and moſt perſons of diſtinction in the univerſity. Here he continued the remainder of that month; and, on Thurſday the firſt of June, ſet out, and came that night to Banbury, where the mayor, recorder, and corporation, in their robes and formalities, with their mace before them, attended him at his inn, congratulated him upon his deliverance, making him a preſent of wine; and, in the evening, there were bonfires, ringing of bells, and all public expreſſions of joy. The next day, the doctor dined at the lord Willoughby's, and from thence went forward to Warwick, being met at a diſtance from the town by a body of horſe, who conducted him in. The mayor and aldermen, with a great number of the gentry and inhabitants of that place, paid their reſpects to him at his inn, preſented him with wine, and would have entertained him the day following; which he declined, and went that night to the lord Craven's, and continued ſome

The queen in September came to council, and called for a proclamation to diſſolve the parliament, which ſir Simon Harcourt (made attorney-general in the room of ſir James Montague who had quitted that poſt) had prepared. When it was read, the lord-chancellor Cowper offered to ſpeak; but the queen riſing up would admit of no debate, and ordered the writs for a new parliament to be got ready. About the ſame time ſhe diſmiſſed the lord Sommers, and, in his room, made the earl of Rocheſter lord-preſident of the council. She ſent to the duke of Devonſhire for the lord-ſteward's ſtaff, and gave it to the duke of Buckingham. Mr. Boyle was removed from the poſt of ſecretary of ſtate, and Mr. Henry St. John had the ſeals. The earl of Derby was diſmiſſed from being chancellor of the duchy of Lancaſter, and was ſucceeded by the lord Berkley. Upon all theſe removes, the lord chancellor came, on the 23d of September, and delivered up the great-ſeal. The queen did not expect this, and was ſurprized at it; and, not knowing how to diſpoſe of it, ſhe, with unuſual earneſtneſs, preſſed him to keep it one day longer. The day following, having conſidered the matter with her favourites Mrs. Maſham and Mr. Harley, ſhe received it very readily. At firſt ſhe committed it to the cuſtody of three lords-commiſſioners, ſir Thomas Trevor, chief juſtice of the Common-Pleas; Mr. Robert Tracy, judge of the ſame court; and Mr. Scroop, baron of the Exchequer in Scotland; but it was ſoon after given to ſir Simon Harcourt. The earl of Wharton delivered up his commiſſion of lord-lieutenant of Ireland, which was given to the duke of Ormond [u]. The earl of Orford, firſt-commiſſioner of the admiralty, withdrew from that board; but the other four commiſſioners, ſir John Leake, ſir George Byng, Mr. Dodington, and Mr. Methuen were continued; to whom were added, ſir William Drake and Mr. Aiſlaby. Mr. George Granville, a near relation of the earl of Bath, was appointed ſecretary at war, in the room of Mr. Robert Walpole; and Mr. Manley was made ſurveyor-general, in the room of Mr. Samuel Travers; and Mr. Arthur Moore was made one of the lords commiſſioners of trade and plantations. Mr. Robert Raymond, an eminent lawyer of Gray's-Inn, was appointed ſolicitor-general in the room of Mr. Eyre, who, on the 5th of May, had kiſſed the queen's hand, and been knighted, in order to be made one of the judges of the Queen's-Bench, in the room of Sir Henry Gould, deceaſed; and ſir Edward Northey was made attorney-general. Dr. Robinſon, dean of Windſor, who, of late, had grown into great confidence with Mr. Harley, was nominated to ſucceed Dr. Hall, deceaſed, in the biſhoprick of Briſtol; and Dr. Byſſe to ſucceed Dr. Bull deceaſed, in the ſee of St. David's. The duke of Hamilton was appointed lord lieutenant of the county palatine of Lancaſter; the earl of Portmore was made commander in chief of her majeſty's forces in Portugal in the room of the earl of Galway; the lord Windſor advanced to the poſt of lieutenant-general; and general Webb made governor of the Iſle of Wight.

So ſudden and ſo intire a change in the miniſtry, is ſcarce to be found in our hiſtory, eſpecially where men of great abilities had ſerved with ſuch zeal and ſucceſs, that the adminiſtration of all affairs, both at home and abroad, in their hands, was not only without exception, but had raiſed the admiration of all Europe. All this aroſe purely from the great credit of the new favourites, and the queen's perſonal diſtaſte to the old ones. The queen was much delighted with all theſe changes, and ſeemed to think ſhe was freed from the chains, which the old miniſtry held her in. She ſpoke of it to ſeveral perſons, as a captivity which ſhe had been long under. The duke of Somerſet had very much alienated the queen's mind from the old miniſtry; but he was ſo diſpleaſed with the diſſolution of the parliament, and the new model of the miniſtry, that, though he continued ſome time maſter of the horſe, he refuſed to ſit any more in council, and complained openly of the artifices which had been uſed to make him inſtrumental to other people's deſigns.

On the 28th of September the queen went to Hampton-court, having the ſame day ordered the ſeals to be put to a commiſſion for renewing the lieutenancy of the city of London; in which ſeveral Whigs, who were in the former, were left out, and Tories put in their places. This new commiſſion was chiefly deſigned, both to prevent ſir Gilbert Heathcote, an alderman near the chair, and governor of the bank (who had given offence to the court by his application to the queen in favour of the late miniſtry) from being choſen lord-mayor, and to ſtrengthen the intereſt of the high-church party in the election of parliament-men for the capital city, which generally has a great influence upon other elections. But that commiſſion was opened too late to have the intended effect; for, the election for a lord mayor coming on the 29th of September according to cuſtom, the majority appeared for ſir Gilbert Heathcote and ſir Robert Beachcroft; and though a poll was demanded, and great intereſt made by the Tory-party for ſir Richard Hoare, yet the two firſt had the majority of voices; and, being on the 5th of October, returned by the common-hall, the court of aldermen, on the 11th, choſe ſir Gilbert Heathcote lord-mayor for the year enſuing; but in this point he had but common juſtice done him, there having been an agreement made ſome years before between the aldermen of London, to chuſe him who was next the chair, to prevent animoſities and diſputes. On the 10th of October, the queen's commiſſion for a new lieutenancy was opened at Guild-hall, when ſir Samuel Garrard, then lord-mayor, Sir Francis Child, ſir John Parſons, ſir Robert Bedingfield, ſir William Withers, and ſir Richard Hoare, were choſen colonels of the ſix city regiments. About a fortnight after, the new lieutenancy of London preſented an addreſs to the queen, who took that opportunity to deſire them, "as they had great fortunes of their own, that they would uſe their endeavours to ſupport the public credit." It days in that county. On the 12th of June, he was entertained at dinner by Sir William Boughton, together with the lord Willoughby, lord Craven, and divers other gentlemen and clergymen, who came to expreſs their great joy and ſatisfaction to ſee the doctor. Some days after he continued his progreſs, and, on the 23d, went thro' Wrexham, in the way to his living at Salatin, being met within a mile of the town by moſt of the gentlemen in the county, and others, to the number of about two thouſand. He lay that night at the houſe of George Shakerley, eſq; and, next day, the chancellor of the dioceſe gave orders for his inſtitution and induction, which was performed ſome days after. The doctor having been invited to Shrewſbury, he went thither the 23d of July, being met at Momford-bridge, three miles from the town, by Corbet Kinaſton, eſq; Mr. Owen, Mr. Creſſet, Mr. Creſwell, Mr. Mitton, and all the neighbouring gentlemen and others, and was conducted to Shrewſbury by about five thouſand horſe. After he had been nobly entertained there, he went to Mr. Owen's at Condover, where he was alſo magnificently treated; and then proceeded to Bridgeworth, in which place he could not fail making a pompous entry, Mr. R. Creſwell, jun. a profeſſed jacobite, who deſigned to ſtand for member of parliament for that place, having ſent a circular letter to the clergy round about, and others who were well-wiſhers to the doctor's doctrine, deſiring them to accompany him into town, and favour him with their company at dinner. According to this invitation, moſt of the neighbouring clergy and gentlemen repaired to Bridgenorth on the 5th of July; ſo that, when doctor Sacheverel came near the town, he was met by Mr. Creſwell, at the head of about four thouſand horſe, and near three thouſand foot, moſt of them with white knots, edged with gold, and three leaves of gilt laurel in their hats; the hedges, two miles from the town, being dreſſed with flowers, and lined with people, and the two ſteeples adorned with fifty pounds worth of flags and colours. The doctor being likewiſe invited to Ludlow, he repaired thither the 7th of July, being met by great numbers of men on horſeback, and a vaſt multitude on foot, with drums beating, trumpets ſounding, and colours flying; and, being conducted to the apartment prepared for him, was moſt magnificently entertained. But this was the laſt ſtage of the doctor's triumph; for, expecting to be received at Worceſter with the ſame honours and reſpects, which had been paid him in other places, he ſet out from Ludlow, in order to repair thither, but met with ſome ſlights and affronts in ſome towns through which he had paſſed. His diſappointment and mortification were ſtill more remarkable at Worceſter, doctor Lloyd, biſhop of that ſee, having given expreſs orders to the clergy of his dioceſe againſt paying any reſpect to the doctor, which were punctually obeyed.

[u] The lord Wharton had held a parliament at Dublin before he reſigned, which he had opened the 19th of May with a ſpeech, recommending union among themſelves, and a zeal for the Proteſtant Intereſt and Proteſtant Succeſſion. But this did not hinder the enemies to both, from defacing the ſtatue of king William, on the 25th of June, which had been erected by the city of Dublin, after the battle of the Boyne. They twiſted the ſword that was in one hand, wreſted the truncheon out of the other, daubed the face with dirt, and offered it other indignities. The addreſs, on this occaſion, of the commons of Ireland, deſerves to be remembered; after taking notice of the lord Wharton's concern for their preſervation from the enemies of their happy eſtabliſhment, who envied their late glorious ſovereign the honour of a ſtatue, erected as a teſtimony how much was owing to their deliverer from Popery and ſlavery: They added, 'His memory muſt be ever dear to all men, except thoſe who deſire to bring our religion, lives and properties into the ſame dangers from which his courage and conduct ſo bravely and ſeaſonably reſcued us. And ſuch we unanimouſly declare all thoſe to be, who, on any pretence whatſoever, endeavoured to reflect on the juſtice of the late happy Revolution, the memory of God's great inſtrument in effecting it, or the neceſſary means made uſe of in bringing it about. Had their impotent rancour and malice fully accompliſhed their deſign, by entirely demoliſhing and deſtroying that monument of our gratitude; yet, are we perſuaded, his glorious name would always be diſtinguiſhed with honour, and continue dear to a people delivered, by him, from Popiſh ſuperſtition, and French ſlavery; and to whoſe reign we are indebted for thoſe ineſtimable laws, which exclude all Popiſh ſucceſſors, and ſettle the crown upon our moſt gracious queen, and the heirs of her body, being Proteſtants; and, for want of ſuch iſſue, on the moſt illuſtrious houſe of Hanover: So that if we have any true regard for her majeſty's title, for our moſt holy religion, or for our civil liberties, we cannot ſufficiently acknowledge your excellency's moſt generous care, to detect ſo baſe and barbarous a fact; nor omit any opportunity of expreſſing our deteſtation of thoſe, whoſe repeated indignities, offered to the memory of our great deliverer, are ſufficient indications of their being enemies to our happy conſtitution in church and ſtate, and of their affection to the Pretender.' The city of Dublin cauſed the ſtatue to be repaired, for which they had the thanks of the houſe of commons.

was expected, that this recommendation would have had a good effect, and engaged the Tory-party in the city, either to advance money to the government, or to uſe their utmoſt endeavours to ſupport the public funds. But neither of theſe happened; and ſo the Bank, Eaſt-India, annuities, and other ſtocks continued ſinking, which gave the miniſtry no ſmall uneaſineſs; the rather, becauſe ſome bills of exchange, drawn from Genoa for remittances into Spain, happened at this juncture to be proteſted. Mr. Harley, the new chancellor of the Exchequer, ſent his agents into the city, who found means to engage ſeveral rich merchants and bankers, particularly Mr. John Lambert, a French refugee, to ſupply the urgent neceſſities of the government.

By this time the elections for parliament-men were over in ſeveral places; and by the firſt returns it appeared, that, amongſt the new members, the number of the Whigs was near equal with that of the Tories; which, as was then given out, anſwered the expectation and deſires of the new managers. For having gained their chief aim, which was to remove the late lord-treaſurer and his friends, it was by many believed, that they deſigned to carry things even between both parties; and therefore wiſhed only for ſuch a majority of the high-church in the houſe of commons, as might countenance the new ſcheme; and whom, on the other hand, they might eaſily check by means of their own creatures, if an unſeaſonable zeal for the church ſhould prompt them to make any motions againſt the Toleration. If this was the real intention of the new miniſtry, or of Mr. Harley in particular, the chief author of the late changes; it ſoon appeared, that they were either miſtaken in their computation, or diſappointed in their wiſhes; and that the new members of the high-church party far out-numbered thoſe of the contrary ſide; which, beſides the influence of the court, was owing to ſeveral other cauſes.

For, in the firſt place, many of the Whig gentlemen, who either could not be induced to believe, that the laſt parliament would be diſſolved, till the blow was given; or who, in caſe of a diſſolution, thought themſelves ſecure of being re-choſen, had neglected making an intereſt; whilſt thoſe, who deſigned to oppoſe them, had early taken all the neceſſary meaſures to carry their point. Secondly, the ferment, raiſed by Dr. Sacheverel's trial, was now rather increaſed than abated, being induſtriouſly fomented and propagated throughout the kingdom, in order to influence elections; which it did effectually, and in a more viſible manner, in the cities and boroughs, through which that divine had made his triumphant progreſs in the ſummer. Thirdly, all the inferior clergy, a few excepted, thinking themſelves attacked through the ſides of Dr. Sacheverel, were more than ordinarily zealous and diligent in promoting the intereſt of ſuch, as they thought beſt affected to the church; not only without any regard to the neceſſary qualifications of perſonal merit or eſtate in the candidates, but in ſeveral inſtances, in breach of the common duties of gratitude, ſtrenuouſly oppoſing their very patrons and benefactors. Beſides a courſe, for ſome months, of very inflaming ſermons, they went about from houſe to houſe, preſſing their people to ſhew, on this great occaſion, their zeal for the church, and now or never to ſave it. They alſo told them, in what ill hands the queen had been kept, as in captivity; and that it was a charity, as well as their duty, to free her from the power, which the late miniſtry exerciſed over her. In the laſt place, there was a vaſt concourſe of rude multitudes brought together, who behaved themſelves in ſo boiſterous a manner, that it was not ſafe, and in many places not poſſible, for thoſe, who had a right to vote, to come and give their votes for a Whig. Open violence was uſed in ſeveral places. This was ſo general through the whole kingdom, all at the ſame time, that it was viſible, that the thing had been concerted for ſome time, and the proper methods and tools had been prepared for it. The influence of the mob was, in a particular manner, remarkable in the election for the city of Weſtminſter; where Mr. Medlicot and Mr. Croſs being ſet up by the high-church party, ſome of thoſe, who offered to give their voices for their competitors general Stanhope and ſir Henry Dutton Colt, were knocked down and wounded, which obliged many of their party to return home without polling; ſo the two firſt candidates had a vaſt majority. The Whigs expected, that the election of the city of London would balance that of Weſtminſter; and indeed, the firſt day of the poll, their candidates had a conſiderable advantage; but ſuch induſtry was uſed by the then lord-mayor and the aldermen of the high-church party, in bringing many citizens upon the livery, and engaging their votes, that, upon cloſing the books, Sir William Withers, ſir Richard Hoare, ſir George Newland, and Mr. John Caſs, all four of that party, having the majority of votes, were declared duly elected. After the poll was ended, there were extraordinary rejoicings throughout the city, by illuminations, bonfires, ringing of bells, &c. and the tumultuous mob were ſo exalted and enraged againſt thoſe, who ſeemed not to partake in the public joy, that they broke all the windows they ſaw unlighted, without diſtinction; ſo that many houſes of the church-party were damaged, as well as thoſe of the Whigs, and in particular that of Sir Richard Hoare, one of the four, for whoſe ſakes theſe rejoicings were made. Some days before, the mob was guilty of a ſtill greater inſtance of outrage; for, as ſir Gilbert Heathcote, one of the Whig candidates, and lord-mayor elect, was going out of Guild-hall, they not only inſulted him with reproachful language, but one of them ſpit in his face.

Though the Tories had boaſted, that none of the managers againſt Dr. Sacheverel would be re-choſen members of parliament; yet, notwithſtanding the utmoſt endeavours that were uſed to prevent it, Sir Joſeph Jekyll, Sir Peter King, Mr. Lechmere, and Mr. Walpole, were returned; as was alſo general Stanhope for Cockermouth, though he loſt his election at Weſtminſter: However, there were few Whigs returned, againſt whom petitions were not offered; there were in all about a hundred, and, by the firſt ſteps after the meeting of the parliament, the majority made it appear, that they intended to clear the houſe of all who were ſuſpected to be of that party. As for the elections in Scotland, the ſixteen peers returned were the dukes of Hamilton and Athol; the marquis of Annandale; the earls of Mareſchal, Eglington, Mar, Loudoun, Hume, Kinoule, Northeſke, Orkney, Roſeberry, Ilay; the lord viſcount Kelſythe; and the lords Balmerino and Blantyre. And the elections of the commons were much upon an equal foot between Whigs and Tories.

On the 30th of October, Sir Gilbert Heathcote, lord-mayor of London, was, according to cuſtom, ſworn at the Exchequer in Weſtminſter; but the pageantry, and ſome other parts of the uſual ſolemnity, were omitted, as he well knew he was not acceptable to the common people, ſome of whom were ſo bold as to inſult him in the cavalcade. On the 6th of November, the queen came from Hampton-court to St. James's Palace, where, the next day, ſhe kept the general thankſgiving, for the ſucceſſes of the laſt campaign, in her royal chapel.

Two days after, a remarkable advertiſement, ſigned Henry St. John, was publiſhed in the London Gazette, importing, "That, ſome evil-deſigning perſons having unſcrewed and taken away ſeveral iron bolts out of the great timbers of the weſt roof of the cathedral church of St. Paul, her majeſty, for the better diſcovery of the offenders, was pleaſed to promiſe her moſt gracious pardon, and a reward of fifty pounds, to any perſon concerned therein, who ſhould diſcover his accomplices." This advertiſement occaſioned the report of a plot to deſtroy the queen and the court, by the fall of the roof of St. Paul's, on the thankſgiving-day, when it was ſuppoſed her majeſty would have gone thither; which pretended ſcrew-plot (as it was afterwards called) many of the Tories and emiſſaries of the new miniſtry were ready enough to charge upon the Whigs. But upon enquiry it appeared, that the miſſing of the iron pins was owing to the neglect of ſome workmen, who thought the timbers ſufficiently faſtened without them.

The parliament being met on the 25th of November, the commons, by direction from the throne, proceeded to the choice of a ſpeaker, which, as it was generally expected, fell, without any oppoſition, on Mr. Bromley. He had, for many years paſt, been choſen member for the univerſity of Oxford; was ſure of all the votes of the church-party, of which he had been one of the moſt conſtant and reſolute leaders, particularly in the firſt parliaments of this reign, when he brought in, and ſtrenuouſly ſupported, the Occaſional Conformity Bill. Sir Thomas Hanmer, and Mr. Smith, formerly ſpeaker, and another member, were at firſt propoſed; but this was only to try the temper of the houſe; for, as ſoon as Mr. Bromley was named, the general voice was for him. The queen, being, on the 27th of November, come to the houſe of peers, made the following ſpeech to both houſes:

"My lords and gentlemen,

"I have, by calling this parliament, made appear the confidence I place in the duty and affections of my ſubjects; and I meet you here with the greateſt ſatisfaction, having no reaſon to doubt, but that I ſhall find ſuch returns, as will add new life to our friends, and intirely diſappoint the hopes of our enemies.

" To this end I ſhall recommend to you what is abſolutely neceſſary for our common ſafety.

" The carrying on the war in all its parts, but particularly in Spain, with the utmoſt vigour, is the likelieſt means, with God's bleſſing, to procure a ſafe and honourable peace for us and all our allies, whoſe ſupport and intereſt I have truly at heart.

" For this purpoſe I muſt aſk from you, gentlemen of the houſe of commons, the neceſſary ſupplies for the next year's ſervice: and let me put you in mind, that nothing will add ſo much to their efficacy, as unanimity and diſpatch.

" I cannot, without great concern, mention to you, that the navy, and other offices, are burthened with heavy debts, which ſo far affect the public ſervice, that I moſt earneſtly deſire you to find ſome way to anſwer thoſe demands, and to prevent the like for the time to come; the juſtice of parliament, in ſatisfying former engagements, being the certain way for preſerving and eſtabliſhing national credit.

" I am ſenſibly touched with what my people ſuffer by this long and expenſive war, to which, when it ſhall pleaſe God to put an end, the flouriſhing condition of my ſubjects ſhall be as much my care, as their ſafety is at preſent.

My lords and gentlemen,

" The eyes both of friends and enemies are upon you. The way to give ſpirit to the one, and to defeat the reſtleſs malice of the other, is to proceed in ſuch manner, as becomes a Britiſh Parliament.

" I ſhall, in the plaineſt words, tell you my intention; and I do this with the greateſt ſatisfaction, becauſe I depend upon their being agreeable to you.

" I am reſolved to ſupport and encourage the church of England, as by law eſtabliſhed:

" To preſerve the Britiſh conſtitution, according to the Union: and to maintain the Indulgence allowed by law to ſcrupulous conſciences.

" And, that all theſe may be tranſmitted to poſterity, I ſhall employ none but ſuch, as are heartily for the Proteſtant ſucceſſion in the houſe of Hanover, the intereſt of which family no perſon can be more truly concerned for than myſelf.

" Theſe are my reſolutions; and your concurrence with me in a ſteady purſuit of them, will beſt manifeſt your zeal for our religion, for the intereſt of our country, for your own ſafety, and for my honour."

The queen, in this ſpeech (the ſentiments whereof were ſuppoſed to come from Mr. Harley) took no notice of the ſucceſſes of the laſt campaign, as ſhe had always done in her former ſpeeches; and it was much obſerved, that, inſtead of promiſing to maintain the Toleration, ſhe had, in Sacheverel's language, ſaid, ſhe would maintain the Indulgence, granted by law, to ſcrupulous conſciences. The lords preſented an addreſs of an odd compoſition to the queen, which ſhewed, it was not drawn by thoſe who had penned their former addreſſes. Inſtead of promiſing, they would do all that was poſſible towards a vigorous proſecution of the war, in order to an honourable peace, they only promiſed to concur in all reaſonable meaſures to that end, which ſeemed to import a limitation, as if they had apprehended, that unreaſonable things might be aſked of them. The concluſion alſo was in a very cold ſtrain of rhetoric: for they ended with ſaying, 'They had no more to add.' The commons were more hearty in their addreſs, and, in the end of it, reflected on ſome late practices againſt the church and ſtate, in theſe words:

" Theſe are the ends (namely, proſecution of the war, ſafety of the church, indulgence to ſcrupulous conſciences, preſervation of the Union, adherence to the Proteſtant ſucceſſion) truly worthy your majeſty's purſuit; and we do, with all humility, repreſent to your majeſty, that the moſt effectual way to give ſpirit to your friends, and defeat the reſtleſs malice of your enemies, will be, by diſcountenancing all perſons of ſuch principles, and avoiding all meaſures of ſuch tendency, as may weaken your majeſty's title and government, the ſettlement of the crown in the illuſtrious houſe of Hanover, and advance the hopes of the Pretender; and all other principles and meaſures, that have lately threatened your royal crown and dignity, which, whenever they prevail, will prove fatal to our whole conſtitution, both in church and ſtate."

But this addreſs had but little or no effect in relation to the public funds; moſt of the Whigs and monied men, being ſtill uneaſy, whilſt the doctrine of 'Abſolute Paſſive Obedience and of Hereditary Right,' wholly inconſiſtent with the late Revolution and the Hanover ſucceſſion, were countenanced; not to mention their juſt apprehenſions, that the duke of Marlborough would be either laid aſide, or made ſo uneaſy, as to be obliged to reſign his command. This jealouſy was increaſed upon what happened on the 28th of November in the houſe of peers, where the earl of Scarborough having made a motion, that the thanks of the houſe ſhould be returned to the duke, ſome objections were raiſed againſt it by the duke of Argyle; and the duke of Marlborough's friends, being apprehenſive if the queſtion were put it would be carried in the negative, ſaid, it would be time enough to ſpeak to that matter when the duke was come home. The next day a complaint was made by the earl of Rocheſter againſt the lord-keeper Harcourt, for taking upon him to introduce the Scots lords to the queen, being himſelf no peer by patent. But, the late lord-chancellor Cowper maintaining he had a right to act as he had done, no further notice was taken of it. The commons readily granted the ſupplies for the next year's ſervice, and gave ſuch diſpatch to the land-tax bill, that it received the royal aſſent before the ſhort receſs at Chriſtmas.

About the beginning of December the queen appointed the earl of Peterborough to go to Vienna, to concert meaſures with the imperial court for the vigorous proſecution of the war, particularly in Spain, which, at this juncture, ſeemed to be the court's favourite project, though not generally approved. For many obſerved, that this was the very thing, which the French king had been aiming at in the late negociations, namely, to make a ſeparate peace, excluſive of Spain, in order to carry the ſtreſs of the war into that country, where, whatever engagement he entered into, he might underhand aſſiſt his grandſon, who, having the affections of the people, might proſecute the war with great advantage over the allies, whereby the French king would eaſe himſelf of the war in Flanders, which diſtreſſed him moſt, and threatened the very heart of his dominions. About the ſame time earl Rivers was ſent to the court of Hanover, from whence he was lately returned. It was alſo declared, that the queen had, on the 12th of December, named Mr. Richard Hill to be her envoy-extraordinary to the United Provinces, and to the council of ſtate appointed for the government of the Spaniſh Low-Countries, in the room of lieutenant-general Cadogan, who was recalled. The military men were not ſo ſurprized at this change, as when they heard, that the commiſſions of lieutenant-general Meredith, major-general Macartney, and brigadier Honeywood were ſuperſeded, upon an information laid before the queen, that theſe three gentlemen had, in their cups, drank " damnation and confuſion to the new miniſtry, and to thoſe, who had any hand in turning out of the old[x]." Some perſons, who, about this time, came over from Flanders, extenuated the crime of thoſe three gentlemen, averring, " they only drank a health to the duke of Marlborough, and confuſion to all his enemies;" which is uſual in all armies, out of reſpect to the commander in chief. But, whether this excuſe was well-grounded or not, the new miniſters thought it neceſſary to make an example, in order to keep within bounds the generals, and other officers of the army, ſome of whom, it was ſaid, dropped doubtful expreſſions of " ſtanding by their general." And this might adminiſter the greater cauſe of ſuſpicion at this juncture, becauſe the deſign of making a general for life was laid to the charge of the old miniſtry in a pamphlet, called " Faults on both ſides," written by Mr. Clements, and countenanced by ſome great men, and particularly the earl of Peterborough. Not many days after, the earl of Hertford, ſon to the duke of Somerſet, was made governor of Tinmouth-fort, in the room of general Meredith, who, about this time, had a further mortification put upon him, his place of gentleman of the horſe to the queen being given to Mr. Conyers Darcy, brother to the Earl of Holderneſs. On the 13th of December, the dukes of Beaufort and Hamilton were ſworn of her majeſty's privy-council; and, about the ſame time, Sir James Wiſhart, and Mr. George Clarke, were made commiſſioners of the admiralty, in the room of Mr. Methuen and Mr. Dodington; and Mr. Whitworth, who was envoy to the Czar of Muſcovy, was appointed ambaſſador extraordinary to the ſame court. The queen likewiſe appointed the Earl of Abingdon juſtice in Eyre, in the room of the earl of Wharton, and his counteſs one of the ladies of the Bed-chamber. Not many days after the queen knighted ſir Conſtantine Phipps, one of Dr. Sacheverel's counſel in his late trial, and made him lord-chancellor of Ireland.

[x] Meredith's regiment was given to the earl of Orrery; Macartney's to colonel Kane; and Honeywood's to colonel Clayton. Major-general Syburg had the lord Orrery's. The duke of Schomberg reſigned his regiment of horſe to his ſon the marquis of Harwich, who had ſerved two campaigns in Flanders as volunteer and aid de camp to the duke of Marlborough.

The duke of Marlborough, having embarked in Holland, arrived, the 28th of December, at London. Upon his entrance into the city about five in the evening, his coach was attended by a great number of people with links and flambeaux, who by their acclamations expreſſed their joy at his return. The duke thought it prudence, at this juncture, to avoid the leaſt ſhew of popularity, and therefore ordered his coach, inſtead of driving directly to St. James's, to go to Montague-Houſe, from whence, after having reſted an hour or two, he went out by a private door. Upon his arrival at St. James's, he immediately waited upon the queen, who diſcourſed with him about half an hour; after which he retired to his apartment.

The duke aſſiſted at a committee of the privy-council the next morning; and, afterwards, received the viſits of the earl of Rocheſter, preſident of the council, the earl Pawlet, firſt commiſſioner of the treaſury, the ſecretaries of ſtate, and other perſons in the miniſtry. It was, however, for many days a queſtion with the public, whether he had any interview with Mr. Harley, who had now the greateſt ſhare, both in the queen's confidence, and in the management of affairs. Thoſe, who pretended to know the ſecret of the court, ſeemed perſuaded, that the queen had reſolved to remove all coldneſs, that might be between them; and the event juſtified their conjecture.

The uncertainty, whether the duke of Marlborough would be continued in his command in Flanders, caſt in the mean time a freſh damp on the public credit. It was therefore the general wiſh and expectation of the moſt wealthy and ſubſtantial citizens, that, in order to remove that doubt, the duke ſhould receive the thanks, if not of both, at leaſt of either of the two houſes of parliament. But the duke's friends in the houſe of peers, having already failed in one motion for it, were unwilling to attempt it a ſecond time; eſpecially, as they found the majority of the houſe inclined to paſs that compliment on the earl of Peterborough. And, as for his friends in the houſe of commons, they found their number too ſmall to venture to attempt it at all. For this the duke had been prepared by the queen, who, upon his coming over, told him, he was not to expect the thanks of the two houſes as formerly. She added, that ſhe expected he ſhould live well with her miniſters, but did not think fit to ſay any thing of the reaſons ſhe had for making thoſe changes in the miniſtry [y]. However, the duke ſhewed no reſentments for all the ill uſage he met with; and, having been much preſſed by the States and the other allies to continue in the command of the army, he told the biſhop of Saliſbury, he reſolved, upon that account, to be patient, and to ſubmit to every thing, in order to the carrying on the war; and, finding the queen's prepoſſeſſion againſt his ducheſs was not to be overcome, he carried a ſurrender of all her places to the queen. She was groom of the ſtole, had the robes and the privy-purſe; in all which ſhe had ſerved with great œconomy and fidelity to the queen, and juſtice to thoſe who dealt with the crown. The ducheſs of Somerſet had the two firſt places, and Mrs. Maſham the laſt.

The queen's birth-day, Feb. 6. was this year ſolemnized with extraordinary magnificence; but it was obſerved, that the duke of Marlborough did not appear at the feſtival, having, with the queen's leave, ſet out four days before for Blenheim-houſe, with the marquis de Paſchal governor of Bruſſels, lately come from Flanders, and monſieur de Seiſſan, on whom the queen afterwards conferred a noble gratuity for his gallant, though unſucceſsful, attempt the laſt ſummer, againſt Port de Cette, in order to aſſiſt the Cevennois.

During the ſhort receſs of the parliament, the news came of the ill ſucceſs in Spain; and, this giving an handle to examine into that part of the conduct of the late miniſtry, the queen was adviſed to lay hold of it; and therefore, without ſtaying till ſhe heard from her own miniſters or her allies, as was uſual, ſhe laid the matter before the parliament, as the public news brought it from Paris, which was afterwards found to be falſe in many particulars. On the 2d of January, Mr. ſecretary St. John delivered to the commons a meſſage from the queen, acquainting them, "That there had been an action in Spain, very much to the diſadvantage of king Charles's affairs, which having fallen particularly on the Engliſh forces, the queen had immediately given directions for ſending and procuring troops to repair this loſs, not doubting but the parliament would approve thereof." The like meſſage was ſent to the lords [z]; and both houſes returned their thanks for it; the commons aſſuring her at the ſame time, "That they were perfectly ſatisfied in her great care; intirely depended upon her wiſdom; and would effectually ſupport her majeſty in her meaſures for retrieving the loſs in Spain." And the lords obſerving, "That, as this misfortune might have been occaſioned by ſome preceding miſmanagement, they would uſe their utmoſt endeavours to diſcover it, ſo as to prevent the like for the future." And they immediately entered into an inquiry concerning the affairs of Spain. They began it with an addreſs to the queen, to delay, for ſome days, the earl of Peterborough's journey to Vienna, that they might make uſe of ſuch lights and informations, as he was able to give them concerning thoſe affairs. This was readily granted, and the earl, in anſwer to five queſtions propoſed to him in a committee of the whole houſe, gave a long recital of the affairs of Spain, loading the earl of Galway with all the miſcarriages in that war [a]. And, in particular, he ſaid, that in a council of war in Valencia, in the middle of January 1706-7, the earl of Galway had preſſed the puſhing an offenſive war for that year; and that the lord Tyrawley and Stanhope had concurred with him in that: Whereas he himſelf was for lying on a defenſive war for that year in Spain: He ſaid, this reſolution was carried by thoſe three, againſt the king of Spain's own mind: and he imputed all the misfortunes that followed in Spain to this reſolution ſo taken. Stanhope had given an account of the debates in that council to the queen; and the earl of Sunderland, in anſwer to his letter, had wrote by the queen's order, that ſhe approved of their preſſing for an offenſive war; and they were ordered to perſiſt in that. The earl of Sunderland ſaid in that letter, that the queen took notice, that they three (meaning the earl of Galway, lord Tyrawley, and Stanhope) were the only perſons that were for acting offenſively: and that little regard was to be had to the earl of Peterborough's oppoſition. Upon the ſtrength of this letter, the earl of Peterborough affirmed, that the whole council of war was againſt an offenſive war: He laid the blame, not only of the battle of Almanza, and all that followed in Spain, upon thoſe reſolutions, but likewiſe the miſcarriage of the deſign on Toulon; for he told them of a great deſign, he had concerted with the duke of Savoy, and of the uſe that might have been made of ſome of the troops in Spain, if a defenſive war had been agreed to there. The earl of Galway and the lord Tyrawley were ſent for; and they were aſked an account of that council at Valencia. They ſaid, there were many councils held there about that time; and that both the Portugueze ambaſſador and general, and the envoy of the States, agreed with them in their opinions, for an offenſive war; and they named ſome Spaniards, that were of the ſame mind: They alſo ſaid, that all along, even to the battle of Almanza, in all their reſolutions, the majority of the council of war voted for every thing that was done, and that they were directed to perſiſt in their opinions, by letters wrote to them, in the queen's name, by the ſecretaries of ſtate: That as to the words in the earl of Sunderland's letter, that ſpoke of them, as the only perſons that were of that opinion; theſe were underſtood by them, as belonging only to the queen's ſubjects, and that they related more immediately to the earl of Peterborough, who oppoſed that reſolution, but not to the reſt of the council of war; for the majority of them was of their mind [b].

As the lord Galway ſaid, his memory might have failed him in ſome important particulars, he deſired that he might [y] The duke, inſtead of having the thanks of either houſe, had the mortification to ſee a ſcurrilous letter publiſhed, ſuppoſed to be ſent to the mayor of St. Alban's, and containing, what the author called, reaſons why a certain great general had not the thanks of either of the two houſes of parliament, &c.

[z] Biſhop Burnet ſays that, in her meſſage, the queen ſaid, ſhe hoped they would approve of the orders ſhe had given. This (ſays he) was a mean expreſſion from the ſovereign, not uſed in former meſſages, and ſeemed below the dignity of the crown. II. 558.

[a] This recital contained the facts and paſſages, publiſhed ſome years before by Dr. Freind (who attended the earl into Spain) in his account of the earl of Peterborough's conduct. When he gave it in writing, he called it the recapitulation of his anſwers to the five queſtions propoſed to him by the lords, of which the reader has ſeen great part in ſome former notes relative to this matter.

[b] The lord Sunderland's letter here referred to, was dated Feb. 14. 1706-7, in anſwer to Mr. Stanhope's of January 15, N. S. The ſubſtance of which was, 'That he was ſorry they three only (meaning the lords Galway and Tyrawley, and Mr. Stanhope) were of that opinion (for an offenſive war); that nothing but intereſt could incline others to the contrary; that the dividing the army would be the ruin of all: That the queen entirely approved what he (Mr. Stanhope) had done in the council of war, as he would ſee more at large in the incloſed from my lord-treaſurer: That this was ſo much the queen's opinion, that ſhe had written in the moſt preſſing terms to king Charles about it: That as for the earl of Peterborough's projects in Italy, the leſs attention Mr. Stanhope gave to them, the better. That he ſent him a letter for the earl Rivers, which he deſired Mr. Stanhope to deliver to him, if the earl took upon him the command of the army by the lord Galway's giving it up, which however he hoped he would not do. In which laſt caſe Mr. Stanhope was deſired to burn that letter: concluding, that the lord-treaſurer had ſettled the remittances of the army, &c.'

be allowed to give in writing what he had delivered by word of mouth; which being granted, he gave in two papers; the one related to his own conduct from his firſt ſetting out for Portugal, till the time he was recalled; the other was an anſwer to the recital given in writing alſo by the earl of Peterborough, with other papers [c].

After ſeveral debates (at which the queen was preſent) the houſe of lords was ſo diſpoſed, that the majority believed every thing ſaid by the earl of Peterborough, and it was carried, 'That he had given a very faithful, juſt, and honourable account of the councils of war in Valencia, and that the earl of Galway, lord Tyrawley, and general Stanhope, inſiſting in a conference held at Valencia, ſome time in January, 1706-7, in the preſence of the king of Spain; and the queen's name being uſed in maintenance of their opinions for an offenſive war, contrary to the king of Spain's opinion, and that of all the general officers and public miniſters, except the marquis das Minas; and the opinion of the earl of Galway, lord Tyrawley, and general Stanhope, being purſued in the operations of the following campaign, was the unhappy occaſion of the battle of Almanza, and one great cauſe of our misfortunes in Spain, and of the diſappointment of the duke of Savoy's expedition before Toulon, concerted with her majeſty.'

From this cenſure on the earl of Galway, the debate was carried to that, which was chiefly aimed at, to put a cenſure on the miniſtry here. So it was moved, that an addreſs ſhould be made to the queen, to free thoſe, who were under an oath of ſecrecy, from that tie, that a full account might be laid before the houſe of all their conſultations: the queen granted this readily, and came to the houſe, which was underſtood to be on deſign to favour that, which was aimed at. Upon this the duke of Marlborough, the earls of Godolphin and Sunderland, and the lord Cowper ſhewed, that, conſidering the force ſent over to Spain under the lord Rivers, they thought an offenſive war was adviſable; that the expence of that war was ſo great, and the proſpect was ſo promiſing, that they could not but think an offenſive war neceſſary; and that to adviſe a defenſive one, would have made them liable to a juſt cenſure, as deſigning to protract the war. The deſign on Toulon was no way intermixed with the affairs of Spain; the earl of Peterborough fancied he was in that ſecret, and had indeed propoſed the bringing over ſome troops from Spain on that deſign, and had offered a ſcheme to the duke of Savoy, in which that was mentioned, and had ſent that over to England. But though the duke of Savoy ſuffered that lord to amuſe himſelf with his own project, which he had concerted for the attempt on Toulon, that duke had declared he would not undertake it, if it was not managed with the utmoſt ſecrecy, which was ſacredly kept, and communicated only to thoſe, to whom it muſt be truſted for the execution of it. No troops from Spain were to be employed in that ſervice, nor did it miſcarry for want of men. Theſe lords further ſaid, they gave their opinions in council, according to the beſt of their judgment; their intentions were very ſincere for the ſervice of the queen, and to bring the war to a ſpeedy concluſion. However it was voted, after a warm debate, 'That it appeared by the lord Sunderland's letter, that the carrying on the war offenſively in Spain was approved and directed by the miniſters, notwithſtanding the deſign of attempting Toulon, which the miniſters, at that time, knew was concerted with the duke of Savoy; and therefore were juſtly to be blamed for contributing to all our misfortunes in Spain, and to the diſappointment of the expedition againſt Toulon. That the earl of Peterborough, during the time he had the honour of commanding the army in Spain, did perform many great and eminent ſervices; and, if the opinion he gave in the council of war at Valencia had been followed, it might very probably have prevented the misfortunes that had happened ſince in Spain.' The lords of the high-church party having, by the help of the Scots, who all voted on that ſide, carried theſe queſtions, the earl of Wharton moved, that ſuch lords, as were againſt them, might enter their proteſts, which was readily granted [d].

Here was a new and ſtrange precedent of cenſuring a reſolution taken in council; and of deſiring the queen to order all that had paſſed in council to be laid before the houſe: In all the hot debates in king Charles the firſt's reign, in which many reſolutions taken in council were juſtly cenſurable, yet the paſſing any cenſure on them was never attempted by men, who were no way partial in favour of the prerogative: But they underſtood well what our conſtitution was in that point: A reſolution in council is only the ſovereign's act, who, upon hearing his counſellors deliver their opinions, forms his own reſolution: A counſellor may indeed be liable to cenſure, for what he may ſay at that board; but the reſolution taken there has been hitherto treated with a ſilent reſpect; but, by this precedent, it will be hereafter ſubject to a parliamentary enquiry. The queen was ſo deſirous to have a cenſure fixed on her former miniſtry, that ſhe did not enough conſider the wound given to the prerogative, by the way in which it was done.

After theſe proceedings it was moved by the duke of Buckingham, that the thanks of the houſe ſhould be given to the earl of Peterborough, for his remarkable and eminent ſervices; which being ordered, the lord-keeper Harcourt addreſſed himſelf to the earl, in a ſpeech, wherein he obliquely reflected on the rewards that had been received by the duke of Marlborough:

"Such is your lordſhip's known generoſity and truly noble temper, that I aſſure myſelf, the preſent I am now offering to your lordſhip is the more acceptable, as it comes pure and unmixed, and is unattended with any other reward, which your lordſhip might juſtly think would be an allay to it."

The next morning the earl ſet out for Vienna, and the lords, not content with what had been done, entered, on the laſt day of January, into an enquiry about the force we had in Spain at the time of the battle of Almanza, and it was found not to exceed fourteen thouſand men, though the parliament had voted twenty-nine thouſand. This ſeemed to be a crying thing, and tragical declarations were made upon it. But, in truth, that vote had paſſed only in the January before the battle of Almanza, which was fought on the 14th of April following. Now it was not poſſible to levy and tranſport men in ſo ſhort a time. It was made appear, that all the money, given by the parliament for that ſervice, was applied to it, and that extraordinary diligence was uſed, both in forwarding the levies, and their tranſportation. They were ſent from Ireland, the paſſage from thence being ſafeſt and moſt ſpeedy. All this and a great deal more to the ſame purpoſe was ſaid, but it ſignified nothing [e]; for, though no examination had been made, but into that ſingle point of the numbers at Almanza, they came to a general vote, That the late miniſtry had been negligent, in the management of the war in Spain, to the great prejudice of the nation; and they then ordered all their proceedings and votes to be put in an addreſs, and laid before the queen: And though they had made no inquiry into the expence of that war, nor into the application of the money, given by the parliament for it, yet in their addreſs they mentioned the great profuſion of money in that ſervice. This they thought would touch the nation very ſenſibly; and they hoped the thing would be eaſily believed on their word. Proteſts were made againſt every vote in the whole progreſs of this matter: Some of theſe carried ſuch reflections on the votes of the houſe, that they were expunged.

[c] The reader has likewiſe before ſeen great part of the lord Galway's two papers.

[d] The proteſt to the firſt reſolution was as follows:

Diſſentient'

Becauſe that, concerning the army of the allies in Spain, was to receive ſo great an addition of troops by the ſupply ſent under the earl Rivers, the general deſire and expectation of the kingdom to have the war brought to a ſpeedy concluſion, and all other circumſtances of the war, as it then ſtood, we are of opinion, that an offenſive war was then fitteſt for thoſe in her majeſty's ſervice to adviſe; and we do not find reaſon, by any thing ariſing on the examinations and debates to be of another opinion, the occaſion of fighting the battle of Almanza depending, as we conceive, on cauſes ſubſequent to that advice; the ill ſucceſs of it, as we apprehend, being juſtly attributed to other manifeſt reaſons, and the real deſign on Toulon, as finally adjuſted with the duke of Savoy, not requiring, as appears to us, the aſſiſtance of any forces from Spain.

Devonſhire,	J. Ely,
Kent	W. Lincoln,
Lincoln,	Jo. Landaff,
Wharton,	Harvey,
Godolphin,	Rich. Peterborough,
Gilbert, Sarum,	J. Bangor,
Sommers,	Marlborough,
Jo. Litchfield and Coventry,	Dorcheſter,
S. Aſaph,	Oxford,
Dorſet,	Herbert,
Jon. Winton,	Mohun,
Sunderland,	Cowper,
Bolton,	Aſhburnham,
Bedford,	C. Norwich,
Leiceſter,	Bridgewater,
Stamford,	Derby,
Rockingham,	Carliſle,
Scarborough,	Berkeley.

[e] Biſhop Burnet too juſtly obſerves here, When reſolutions are taken up before-hand, the debating concerning them is only a piece of form uſed to come at the queſtion with ſome decency: And there was ſo little of that obſerved at this time, that the duke of Buckingham ſaid in plain words, that they had the majority, and would make uſe of it, as he had obſerved done by others, when they had it on their ſide.

Never (ſays a certain author) was any thing carried on in the houſe of lords ſo little to their honour as this was; ſome, who voted with the reſt, ſeemed aſhamed of it: They ſaid, ſomewhat was to be done to juſtify the queen's change of the miniſtry; and every thing elſewhere had been ſo well conducted, as to be above all cenſure: So, the misfortune of Almanza being a viſible thing, they reſolved to lay the load there. The management of the public treaſure was exact and unexceptionable; ſo that the ſingle misfortune of the whole war was to be magnified; ſome were more eaſily drawn to concur in theſe votes, becauſe, by the act of grace, all thoſe, who had been concerned in the adminiſtration, were covered from proſecution and puniſhment: ſo this was repreſented to ſome, as a compliment, that would be very acceptable to the queen, and by which no perſon could be hurt. They loaded ſingly the earl of Galway, with the loſs of the battle of Almanza, though it was reſolved on in a council of war, and he had behaved himſelf in it with all the bravery and conduct that could be expected from a great general, and had made a good retreat, and ſecured Catalonia with unexpreſſible diligence.

The earl of Galway was alſo cenſured for not inſiſting on the point of honour in the precedence to be given to the Engliſh troops, as ſoon as the Portugueſe army entered into Spain. The earl being indiſpoſed with the gout, the lords ſent him a queſtion in writing: 'Why, whilſt he commanded the Britiſh troops in Spain, he gave the right to the Portugueſe?' To this he anſwered, 'That, by the treaty with Portugal, the troops of that crown were to have the right in their own country, and that, in order to engage them to march to Madrid, he was obliged to allow them the ſame honour, for otherwiſe they would never have ſtirred out of Portugal'. It is certain, if he had made the leaſt ſtruggle about it, the Portugueſe, who were not eaſily prevailed on to enter into Spain, would have gladly enough laid hold of any occaſion, which ſuch a diſpute would have given them, and have turned back upon it: and ſo, by his inſiſting on ſuch a punctilio the whole deſign would have been loſt. We had likewiſe, in our treaty with them, yielded expreſsly the point of the flag in thoſe ſeas, for which alone, on other occaſions, we have engaged in wars; ſo he had no reaſon to conteſt a leſſer point. However, the lords thought fit to reſolve, by a majority of ſixty-ſix againſt forty-four, 'That the earl of Galway, in yielding the poſt of her majeſty's troops to the Portugueſe in Spain, acted contrary to the honour of the imperial crown of Great-Britain'. This was the concluſion of the inquiries made by the houſe of lords, a repreſentation of which was, in an addreſs, preſented to the queen on the 10th of February.

In the mean time, the commons were no leſs intent upon what ſeemed to be the principal buſineſs of this ſeſſion, to caſt an odium on the late miniſtry. To this end, on the 3d of January Mr. Harley informed the houſe, that, in the examinations relating to the navy, ſome very conſiderable abuſes were diſcovered in the Victualling; and that a member of the houſe was named therein. The commons, after theſe examinations were laid before them, voted, on the 15th of February, "That there had been many notorious embezzlements and ſcandalous abuſes in the management of her majeſty's brewhouſe, and in contracts for furniſhing beer, to the defrauding of the public, and injury of the ſeamen. That Thomas Ridge (member of the houſe) having contracted to furniſh five thouſand five hundred and thirteen tun of beer upon his own account, and two thouſand ſeven hundred and four tun of beer, in partnerſhip with Mr. Dixon, and having received bills for the whole, although he had delivered out but three thouſand two hundred and thirteen tun on the firſt, and one thouſand two hundred and ſixty-nine tuns on the latter contract, be expelled the houſe: and that an addreſs be preſented to her majeſty, to cauſe Mr. Ridge to be proſecuted for the ſame." However, this gentleman was not proſecuted, but continued to ſerve the navy as before; for, upon examination it appeared, that in fact the public ſuffered no wrong. The caſe ſtood thus: the ſervice of the fleet had of late lain for the moſt part in the Mediterranean, where the difference of climate rendered the beer ſent from hence uſeleſs; and the ſeamen, being not able to drink it there, required wine and water, which is ordinarily uſed on board the fleets in thoſe parts. But as the Victualling-office can, in their accounts, charge beer only, it was allowed to the ſeamen by the office to take money of the brewer, wherewith to buy wine in the ſtreights. Thus, though the beer was not delivered, and the ſeamen drank wine, yet the nation paid for no more than the allowance of beer. Many other brewers were complained of on the ſame account, but it was plain this was only a ſhew of zeal, and a ſeeming diſcovery of fraudulent practices, when in reality there was no ſuch thing, or at leaſt the abuſe was ſuch, that is was ſuffered to go on as avowedly as ever.

The money did not come into the treaſury ſo readily as formerly, neither upon the act of four ſhillings in the pound, nor on the duty laid on malt: ſo to raiſe a quick ſupply, there were two bills paſſed, for raiſing three millions and a half by two lotteries, the firſt of one million five hundred thouſand pounds; and the ſecond of two millions, to be paid back in thirty-two years; and for a fund, to anſwer this, duties were laid on hops, candles, leather, cards, and dice, and on the poſtage on letters. In one branch of this, the houſe of commons ſeemed to break in upon a rule, that had hitherto paſſed for a ſacred one. When the duty upon leather was firſt propoſed, it was rejected by a majority, and ſo, by their uſual orders, it was not to be offered again during that ſeſſion: but, after a little practice upon ſome members, the ſame duty was propoſed, with this variation, that ſkins and tanned hides ſhould be ſo charged; this was leather in another name. The lotteries were ſoon filled up; ſo, by this means, money came into the treaſury; and indeeed this method has never yet failed of raiſing a ſpeedy ſupply [f]. There was no more aſked, though, in the beginning of the ſeſſion, the houſe had voted a million more than theſe bills amounted to; which made ſome conclude, there was a ſecret negotiation and proſpect of peace.

The commons, finding the encouragement given to the Palatines was diſpleaſing to the people, reſolved to inquire into that matter. In order to this, a petition was procured from the inhabitants of St. Olave and other pariſhes, "Complaining of the great number of Palatines inhabiting in one houſe, whereby it was feared ſome contagious diſtemper might happen, and having not wherewithal to ſubſiſt themſelves, were likely to become chargeable to the pariſh." This petition was immediately referred to the conſideration of a committee, appointed for that purpoſe, with inſtructions to inquire, "Upon what invitation or encouragement the Palatines came over, and what monies were expended in bringing them into Great-Britain, and for maintaining them here, and by whom paid." As the deſign was now formed to load the late adminiſtration all that was poſſible, it was pretended, that, in the whole affair of the Palatines, there was a deſign againſt the church, and, to increaſe the numbers and ſtrength of the Diſſenters. The queen was addreſſed for the papers relating to the bringing over and ſubſiſting the Palatines; and at laſt the houſe agreed to the following reſolutions of their committee, "That the inviting and bringing over into this kingdom the poor Palatines, of all religions, at the public expence, was an extravagant and unreaſonable charge to the kingdom, and a ſcandalous miſapplication of the public money, tending to the increaſe and oppreſſion of the poor of this kingdom, and of dangerous conſequence to the conſtitution in church and ſtate. 2. That whoever adviſed the bringing over the poor Palatines into this kingdom, was an enemy to the queen and kingdom." And becauſe a letter written by the earl of Sunderland, in the queen's name, to the council of trade, was laid before them, by which they were ordered to conſider of the beſt methods of diſpoſing of the Palatines; it was moved to lay the load of that matter on him in ſome ſevere votes. But this was put off for that time, and afterwards, by ſeveral adjournments delayed, till at laſt it was let fall.

While the heat, raiſed by this inquiry, was kept up, the commons paſſed a bill to repeal the act for a general naturalization of all Proteſtants, which had paſſed two years before; pretending that it gave the encouragement to the Palatines to come over, though none of them had made uſe of that act, in order to their naturalization. This was ſent up to the lords; and the lord Guernſey, and ſome others, entertained them with tragical declamations on the ſubject; yet, upon the firſt reading of the bill, it was rejected, to the great joy of all the foreign Proteſtants. It is remarkable, if the bill was deſigned to prevent the French refugees from enjoying the benefit of the naturalization, it had in ſome meaſure a contrary effect: For whereas, ſince the paſſing of the act for a general naturalization, ſcarce fifteen hundred of them took the advantage of it; above two thouſand were naturalized after the motion for repealing it was made, till it was rejected by the lords. A bill, that was formerly often attempted, for diſabling members of the houſe of commons to hold places, had alſo the ſame fate.

[f] The ſcheme of the lottery was drawn by Mr. John Blount, ſcrivener of London, who was employed by the lords of the treaſury; which, being approved, was inſerted in the lottery-bill. When it was advertiſed on the 10th of March, that the payments would begin to be taken in at Mercers-hall on the thirteenth, it was found, that about two hundred and ſixty-ſix thouſand pounds had been ſubſcribed at the Bank of England, above the firſt payment of the whole ſum of one million and a half.

However, another bill for qualifying members, by having ſix hundred pounds a year for a knight of the ſhire, and three hundred pounds a year for a burgeſs, ſucceeded better: The deſign of this was to exclude courtiers, military men, and merchants, from ſitting in the houſe of commons, in hopes, that, this being ſettled, the land-intereſt would be the prevailing conſideration in all their conſultations. They did not extend theſe qualifications to Scotland; it being pretended, that, eſtates there being generally ſmall, it would not be eaſy to find men ſo qualified capable to ſerve. This was thought to ſtrike at an eſſential part of our conſtitution, touching the freedom of elections: And it had been, as often as it was attempted, oppoſed by the miniſtry, though it had a fair appearance of ſecuring liberty, when all was lodged with men of eſtates: Yet our gentry were become ſo ignorant, and ſo corrupt, that many apprehended the ill effects of this; and that the intereſt of trade, which indeed ſupports that of the land, would neither be underſtood nor regarded. But the new miniſters reſolved to be popular with thoſe who promoted it; ſo it paſſed, and was much magnified, as a main part of our ſecurity for the future.

Another bill paſſed, not much to the honour of thoſe who promoted it, for the importation of French wine. The intereſt of the nation lay againſt this ſo viſibly, that nothing but the luxury of thoſe, who loved that liquor, could have carried ſuch a motion through the two houſes. But, though the bill paſſed, it was like to have no effect; for it was provided, that the wine ſhould be imported in natural veſſels; and the king of France had forbid it to be exported in any veſſels but his own. It ſeems he reckoned, that our deſire of drinking his wine would carry us to take it on ſuch terms as he ſhould preſcribe.

In the houſe of commons there appeared a new combination of Tories of the higheſt form, who thought the court was yet in ſome management with the Whigs, and did not come up to their height, which they imputed to Mr. Harley; upon which account they began to form themſelves in oppoſition to him, and expreſſed their jealouſy of him on ſeveral occaſions, ſometimes publicly. But an odd accident, that had almoſt been fatal, proved happy to him. The marquis de Guiſcard, of whom a large account has been given, enjoyed his pay as colonel, till ſome time after the battle of Almanza; when that ceaſed, he ſolicited to have a ſettled penſion in the time of the late miniſtry; but his intimacy with ſome perſons, who had been removed from their employments, particularly Mr. St. John, with whom he entered into a ſtrict confidence and community of pleaſures, did not at all promote his affair. When Mr. St. John, by the great change at court, was advanced to the poſt of ſecretary of ſtate, the marquis expected to have found a great ſupport in him. But as all friendſhips, that are not grounded on virtue, are ever ſhort-lived, the ſecretary, who had ſome time before quarrelled with the marquis about a miſtreſs, or rather a child, which neither of them would own, was hardly prevailed with to ſpeak in his favour. However, upon his faint recommendation, the queen ordered him a penſion of five hundred pounds a year; but Mr. Harley, who never liked Guiſcard, not only reduced his penſion to four hundred pounds, but declined to have it put upon a fixed eſtabliſhment. The marquis endeavoured ſeveral times to apply to the queen for redreſs; but being denied acceſs, and highly diſguſted with the uſage he received from thoſe very perſons, whom he had looked upon as his intimate friends, he tried to make his peace with the court of France, and, in order to that, wrote to monſieur Moreau, a banker in Paris. His letter being directed to a perſon in Portugal, under the cover of the earl of Portmore, his lordſhip, ſuſpecting ſomething, opened one of the packets, and, finding in it a dangerous correſpondence, ſent it back to his lady, the counteſs of Dorcheſter, who delivered it to Mr. Harley; and by her means another packet, which Guiſcard would have tranſmitted to Portugal, was intercepted. It was pretended by ſome, that thoſe letters contained only looſe reflections on the weakneſs and mean capacity of the preſent miniſtry; but, whatever was the purport of them, the marquis was, on the 8th of March, apprehended in St. James's Park for high-treaſon, by virtue of a warrant from Mr. ſecretary St. John. He was ſo ſurprized and diſordered, that he deſired the meſſenger, who diſarmed him, to kill him: And, being brought to the cockpit in the height of deſpair, he took the reſolution to make his ruin fatal to thoſe who occaſioned it; and, ſeeing in the room where he was confined a penknife, which lay among pens in a ſtandiſh, he took it up unperceived by the meſſengers who watched him. A committee of council being ſummoned on this extraordinary occaſion, and the lord-keeper Harcourt, the earl of Rocheſter, the dukes of Buckingham, Newcaſtle, and Ormond, earl Pawlet, Mr. Harley, and the three ſecretaries of ſtate, the duke of Queenſberry, the lord Dartmouth, and Mr. St. John, being met, the marquis was brought before them to be examined. Mr. St. John aſked him ſeveral queſtions about his correſponding with France, to which he returned evaſive anſwers, with an aſſured countenance. But when Mr. St. John aſked him, Whether he knew Mr. Moreau, banker at Paris? producing at the ſame time, the intercepted letters, the marquis appeared very much ſurprized. Finding himſelf diſcovered, and deſpairing of a pardon, he reſolved to put his black deſign in execution. It was the general opinion, that his deſign was to make his firſt attempt upon Mr. St. John; which appears the more probable, becauſe, as ſoon as he thought himſelf in a manner convicted of the crime for which he was apprehended, he deſired to ſpeak with him in private; but Mr. Secretary told him, That was impracticable and unuſual: That he was before the committee of the council, as a criminal; and if he had any thing to offer, it muſt be ſaid to them all. The marquis perſiſting in his deſire to ſpeak only to Mr. St. John, they went to ring the bell, to call in the meſſengers to carry him away; which he obſerving, ſaid, 'That's hard; not one word'[g]. Being diſappointed in his deſign againſt Mr. St. John, who ſat out of his reach, he ſtepped towards the table, as if he intended to ſay ſomething to Mr. Harley; and, ſtooping down, ſaid, "Then have at thee"[h]; and ſtabbed him about the middle of the breaſt; but the penknife, lighting on the bone, broke about half an inch from the handle; which Guiſcard not perceiving, redoubled the blow, and with a great force ſtruck Mr. Harley not far from the firſt wound. When Mr. St. John ſaw Mr. Harley fall, he cried out. "The villain has killed Mr. Harley;" and drawing his ſword immediately, as did alſo the duke of Newcaſtle, and ſome others, they gave Guiſcard ſeveral wounds. But when they ſaw Mr. Harley get up, and heard earl Pawlet cry out, not to kill Guiſcard, they gave over making paſſes at him. Some of the privy-counſellors ſecured themſelves with chairs againſt the rage of the aſſaſſin, who ſeemed to threaten them all. Others ran out of the room to call for help; and the meſſengers and door-keepers having ruſhed in, and offering to lay hold on Guiſcard, he ſtruggled for a while, and overthrew ſome of his aſſailants; but, at laſt, Wilcox, one of the queen's meſſengers, a very ſtrong man, grappled with him, and gave him ſeveral bruiſes, particularly one in the back, which was afterwards judged to have occaſioned his death.

Mr. Harley's wound was preſently ſearched, and appeared to be a very ſlight one, yet he was long in the ſurgeon's hands. Some imputed this to an ill habit of body; others thought it was an artifice, to make it ſeem more dangerous than indeed it was. Guiſcard's wounds were deeper, and not eaſily managed; for at firſt he was ſullen, and ſeemed reſolved to die; yet after a day he ſubmitted himſelf to the ſurgeons; but did not complain of a wound in his back till it gangrened; and of that he died. It was not known what particulars were in his letters, nor was it known what he confeſſed.

This accident was of great uſe to Mr. Harley; for the party formed againſt him were aſhamed to puſh a man, who was thus aſſaſſinated by one, that was ſtudying to recommend himſelf to the court of France, and who was believed to have formed a deſign againſt the queen's perſon[i]; whoſe health was at this time much ſhaken, ſhe having had three fits of an ague, and the laſt a ſevere one; but the progreſs of the diſeaſe was ſtopped by the bark.

The day after Mr. Harley received his wound both houſes of Parliament agreed upon an addreſs to the queen, wherein they expreſſed their great concern for the moſt barbarous and villainous attempt made upon the perſon of Mr. Harley; adding, "That they had reaſon to believe, that his fidelity to her majeſty, and zeal for her ſervice, had drawn upon him the hatred of all the abettors of Popery and faction; and beſought her majeſty to take all poſſible care of her ſacred perſon; and, for that purpoſe, to give directions for cauſing Papiſts to be removed from the cities of London and Weſtminſter." The queen took this advice very kindly, promiſed to give the proper directions, according to the deſire of both

[g] Voilà qui eſt dur, pas un mot. [h] J'en veux donc à toi.

[i] For he had tried, by all the ways he could contrive, to be admitted to ſpeak with her in private, which he had attempted that very morning. Burnet, II. 566.

houſes, and recommended to them to make a law, to puniſh with death ſuch villainous attempts on the lives of magiſtrates in the lawful execution of their office, though the miſchiefs deſigned ſhould not take effect. Upon which an act was paſſed this ſeſſion, 'to make an attempt on the life of a privy-counſellor to be felony without benefit of the clergy.' On the other hand, a proclamation was publiſhed, 'ſtrictly to put in execution the laws againſt Papiſts.' And when Mr. Harley came firſt to the houſe of commons after his recovery, he was by their order congratulated upon it by Mr. Bromley, their ſpeaker, in a ſet flattering ſpeech, wherein he prayed, 'That the ſame Providence, that had wonderfully preſerved him from ſome unparalleled attempts, and had raiſed him up to be an inſtrument of great good at a very critical juncture, when it was much wanted, might continue ſtill to preſerve ſo invaluable a life, for the perfecting of what was ſo happily begun; that they might owe to his counſels, and to his conduct, the maintenance and firm eſtabliſhment of our conſtitution in church and ſtate.

In the beginning of May, died ſuddenly the earl of Rocheſter, the queen's uncle, and Mr. Harley, being rid of the only competitor in her favour, ſoon became prime-miniſter. Upon his recovery ſhe created him baron of Wigmore, and earl of Oxford and Mortimer, two of the moſt noble titles in the Engliſh heraldry. The Veres had been earls of Oxford many ages, and the title of Mortimer had been in the royal family. Preambles to patents of honour uſually carry in them a ſhort account of the dignity of the family, and of the ſervices of the perſon advanced: but his preamble was very pompous, and ſet him out in the moſt extravagant characters that flatterers could invent; in particular it ſaid, that he had redeemed the nation from robbery, had reſtored credit, and had rendered the public great ſervice in a courſe of many years: all this was ſet out in too fulſome rhetoric, and, being prepared by his own direction, pleaſed him ſo much, that, whereas all other patents had been only read in the houſe of lords, this was printed. He was alſo made lord-treaſurer [k], and he had the chief, if not the ſole direction of every thing. It ſoon appeared that his ſtrength lay principally in managing parties, and in engaging weak people, by rewards and promiſes, to depend upon him; but that he neither thoroughly underſtood the buſineſs of the treaſury, nor the conduct of foreign affairs. But he truſted to his intereſt in the queen, and her favourite Mrs. Maſham.

The Tories ſtill continued to purſue the memory of king William; they complained of the grants made by him, though theſe were far ſhort of thoſe that had been made by king Charles the IId; but that they might diſtinguiſh between thoſe, whom they inrended to favour, and others, againſt whom they were ſet, they brought in a bill, impowering ſome perſons to examine all the grants made by him, and to report both the value of them, and the conſiderations upon which they were made: This was the method, that ſucceeded with them before, with relation to Ireland; ſo the bringing in this bill was looked on, as a ſure ſtep, for carrying the reſumption of all the grants, that they had a mind to make void. When the bill was ſent up to the lords, the deſign appeared to be an unjuſt malice, both againſt the memory of king William, and againſt thoſe who had beſt ſerved him; and therefore, upon the firſt reading, the bill was rejected [l].

The commons turned their malice next againſt the earl of Godolphin. A committee, (of which Mr. Edward Harley auditor of the impreſt was chairman) having been appointed to enquire how far the ſeveral impreſt accomptants had paſſed their reſpective accounts; the commons found by their report, that the ſupplies given by parliament were not all returned, and the accounts of many millions were not yet paſſed in the Exchequer; therefore they paſſed a vote, 'That of the monies granted by parliament, and iſſued for the public ſervice to Chriſtmas 1710, there remains unaccounted for, the ſum of above thirty-five millions, for great part of which no account has ſo much as been laid before the auditors, and the reſt not proſecuted by the accomptants and finiſhed'.

This was a vaſt ſum; but, to make it up, ſome accounts in king Charles's time were thrown into the heap; the lord Ranelagh's accounts of the former reign were the greateſt part; and it appeared, that in no time accounts were ſo regularly brought up, as in the queen's reign. Mr. Bridges's accounts, of fourteen or fifteen millions, were the great item, of which, not above half a million was paſſed: but there were accounts of above eleven millions brought in, though not paſſed in form, through the great caution and exactneſs of the duke of Newcaſtle, at whoſe office they were to paſs; and he was very ſlow, and would allow nothing, without hearing counſel on every article. The truth is, the methods of paſſing accounts were ſo ſure, that they were very ſlow; and it was not poſſible, for the proper officers, to find time and leiſure to paſs the accounts that were already in their hands. Upon this, though the earl of Godolphin had managed the treaſury with an uncorruptedneſs, fidelity, and diligence, that were ſo unexceptionable, that it was not poſſible to fix any cenſure on his adminiſtration; yet, becauſe many accounts ſtood out, the commons paſſed ſeveral angry votes on that ſubject: But, however, ſince nothing had appeared in all the examination made by the committee, that reflected on him, or on any of the Whigs, they would not publiſh the report, though it was ordered to be printed; for by that it would have appeared, who had ſerved well, and who had ſerved ill [m].

[k] When, on the 1ſt of June, he came to take the oaths in the court of chancery, the lord-keeper Harcourt addreſſed himſelf to him in the following ſpeech, which ſurpaſſed even Mr. Bromley's:

"My lord of Oxford,

"The queen, who does every thing with the greateſt wiſdom, has given a proof of it in the honours ſhe has lately conferred on you, which are exactly ſuited to your deſerts and qualifications.

"My lord,

"The title, which you now bear, could not have been ſo juſtly placed on any other of her majeſty's ſubjects. Some of that ancient blood which fills your veins, is derived from the Veres; and you have ſhewed yourſelf as ready to ſacrifice it for the ſafety of your prince, and the good of your country, and as fearleſs of danger on the moſt trying occaſions, as ever any of that brave and loyal houſe were. Nor is that title leſs ſuited to you, as it carries in it a relation to one of the chief ſeats of learning; for even your enemies, my lord (if any ſuch there ſtill are) muſt own, that the love of letters, and the encouragement of thoſe, who excel in them, is one diſtinguiſhing part of your character.

"My lord, The high ſtation of lord-treaſurer of Great-Britain, to which her majeſty has called you, is the juſt reward of your eminent ſervices. You have been the great inſtrument of reſtoring the public credit, and relieving this nation from the heavy preſſure and ignominy of an immenſe debt, under which it languiſhed: and you are now intruſted with the power of ſecuring us from a relapſe into the ſame ill ſtate, out of which you have reſcued us. This great office, my lord, is every way worthy of you; particularly on the account of thoſe many difficulties, with which the faithful diſcharge of it muſt be unavoidably attended, and which require a genius like yours to maſter to them. The only difficulty, which even you, my lord, may find inſuperable, is how to deſerve better of the crown and kingdom after this advancement, than you did before it."

[l] The commiſſioners to examine the grants appointed by the commons, were, Mr. Hind-Cotton, Sir Simeon Stuart, Mr. Eversfield, Mr. Balteel, Mr. Hewetſon, Mr. Blackmore, and Mr. Wrightſon.—Pr. H. C. Vol. IV.

[m] Mr. Maynwaring, the other auditor of the impreſt, has given the true ſtate of theſe thirty-five millions, the chief articles of which are as follow:

				l.	s.	d.
The earl of Ranelagh's charge is	——	——		21,015,618	19	4
Diſcharge,	l.	s.	d.
By accounts actually paſt,	14,593,665	4	2
By accounts rendered or lying before the auditors, —	6,420,182	6	8	21,013,847	10	10
				Remains to be accounted for ——		1,771 8 6
The hon. James Brydges, eſq; his charge is	——			15,374,689	1	11
Diſcharge,
By accounts actually paſt, —	956,789	6	5
By accounts rendered or lying before the auditors,	8,097,492	8	7	9,054,281	15	00
By accounts delivered ſince Chriſtmas, 1710,		——		3,227,778	2	6
				Remains to be accounted for ——		3,092,629 4 5
Lord Falkland's charge is	——			3,094,723	7	11
Diſcharge,
By accounts actually paſt, ——	1,122,133	5	11
By accounts lying before the auditors,	1,465,368	5	3	2,587,501	11	2
				Remains to be accounted for ——		507,221 16 8

In the beginning of April, the dauphin of France and the emperor Joſeph both died of the ſmall-pox. When notice came of the emperor's death, the queen ſent, on the 20th of April, a meſſage to both houſes, importing, "That ſhe had come to a reſolution to ſupport the intereſt of the houſe of Auſtria, and to uſe her utmoſt endeavours to get the king of Spain made emperor: that the ſtates-general had concurred with her majeſty; and that ſhe had taken the moſt proper meaſures to engage all thoſe, who had a ſhare in this election, and were in the intereſt of the common cauſe, to join with her in bringing this great work to a good iſſue: and ſhe had an intire confidence in the affection and duty of her parliament, that, with their aſſiſtance, ſhe ſhould be enabled to make a happy concluſion of the war in a ſafe and honourable peace". This produced a joint addreſs from both houſes in almoſt the ſame language as the meſſage, both which are the more remarkable, as the meſſage gave ſome intimation of the project, which the new miniſtry formed upon the death of the emperor, and which they afterwards publicly avowed, to make a peace by yielding Spain and the Weſt Indies to king Philip; not only becauſe the regaining of them for king Charles was attended with inſuperable difficulties, but alſo becauſe, in their opinion, the ſame, if practicable, would deſtroy the balance of Europe, the ſettling of which was the chief aim of the Grand Alliance. And, both houſes of parliament having, in that addreſs, ſhewn a diſpoſition to approve any meaſures which her majeſty ſhould think proper to procure a peace, the miniſtry thought themſelves armed with ſufficient authority to purſue their ſcheme.

The laſt thing ſettled by the parliament, was the creating a new fund for a trade with Spain. The commons, on the 20th of January, had appointed a committee to examine the debts of the navy; and, about two months after, they reported, that theſe debts amounted to above five millions. This great debt upon the navy was occaſioned partly by the deficiency of the funds appointed for the ſervice at ſea, but chiefly by the neceſſity of applying ſuch ſupplies as were given, without appropriating clauſes, to the ſervice abroad, where it was impoſſible to carry it on by credit, without ready money; ſo it was judged neceſſary to let the debt of the navy run on upon credit; by which means it had riſen up to ſo many millions, and the diſcount on navy-bills was very high [n]. All this debt, with many others, were thrown into one ſtock, amounting in the whole to 9,471,325l. and a fund was formed for paying an intereſt or annuity of 6 per cent. till the principal ſhould be paid, which intereſt amounted to the annual ſum of 568,279l. 10s. For the raiſing of this ſum, all the duties upon wines, vinegar, and tobacco, India goods, wrought ſilks, whale-fins, &c. were, after the year 1716, continued for ever, and till then the parliament was to make an annual proviſion for the intereſt. With this fund was alſo granted the monopoly of a ſuppoſed trade to the South-ſea or coaſt of Peru in America; the ſeveral proprietors of the navy-bills, debentures, and other public ſecurities, being to be incorporated for that purpoſe. This grant may juſtly be called chimerical, ſince the projector knew he was entering upon a negotiation of peace, which, by the ceſſion of Spain and the Weſt-Indies, would for ever exclude the Engliſh from the privileges of trading to Peru and Mexico. Accordingly inſtead of ſuch trade, king Philip, upon the concluſion of the peace, gave the precarious licence to ſend a ſhip or two thither yearly, limiting them both as to tonnage and value of cargo. This ſcheme produced what is called the South-Sea Company [o].

The flatterers of the new miniſters made great uſe of this to magnify them, and to aſperſe the old miniſtry. But the earl of Godolphin's unblemiſhed integrity was ſuch, that no imputation of any ſort could be faſtened on him; and therefore, to keep up a clamour, they reflected on the expence he had run the nation into, upon the early ſucceſſes in 1706, which were very juſtly acknowledged, and cleared in the ſucceeding ſeſſion, as hath been related. But that affair was now revived, and it was ſaid to be an invaſion of the great right of the commons in giving ſupplies, to enter on deſigns, and to engage the nation in expences not provided for by parliament. This was aggravated with many tragical expreſſions as a ſubverſion of the conſtitution; and at the end of the ſeſſions an inflaming repreſentation about this and the thirty-five millions, of which the accounts were not yet paſſed, was preſented by the commons to the queen, wherein they tell her, 'That they had not only raiſed the neceſſary ſupplies, but diſcharged the heavy debts ſo long and ſo juſtly complained of, and traced the cauſes thereof; That in ſeveral years the ſervice had been enlarged beyond the bounds

Sir Thomas Littleton's charge is —— ——			18,382,750 1 5
Diſcharge,
By accounts actually paſt, or ready for declaration, ——	7,559,382 5 3
By accounts lying before the auditors, under the examination of the navy-board, and by money paid over to R. Walpole, eſq;	10,770,179 19 0		18,329,562 4 4
		Remains to be accounted for ——	53,187 17 1

In the ſame manner he ſtates the accounts of Atkinſon, Nutting, Maſon, Povey, Micklethwayte, and Savery; by which it appears, that, of the thirty-five millions, above thirty millions were accounted for, though not all paſſed, and that the total to be accounted for amounted only to 4,330,135l. which, as Mr. Maynwaring obſerves, was much ſhort of a year's ſupply. He ſays further on this ſubject, 'No accomptant is obliged, by the courſe of the Exchequer, to render his account under fifteen months, nor ſome under eighteen; yet this vote takes in all accounts to the firſt meeting of the committee; but there is no mention made from what period of time they did commence. To have been particular, in every reſpect, was too much for the compaſs of a vote; ſo that there are accounts from king Charles, king James, and king William's reigns, in the principal branches of the expence in all the revenue brought in, to make up and ſwell the general account; and this is, by many thouſands of people, without doors, imputed to the late miniſters.' He then expoſes the partiality of the houſe of commons, of which he was himſelf a member, in ordering ſo unjuſt a vote to be printed: Adding, 'And now if I may be allowed to ſuppoſe what I think I have fully proved, that many irregularities, and unavoidable delays, attend the paſſing of ſome accounts, which no care or induſtry can prevent. If it happen, that the nature of the ſervices, and the method of payment in ſome offices, being inconſiſtent with the courſe of the Exchequer, require privy-ſeals, and are the work of longer time than is limited for paſſing accounts; if it appears, that theſe irregularities, incident to accounts, are yet neceſſary for the accommodation of the ſervice, and not to be avoided without infinite prejudice to the management; and if it appears, that the ſecurity of the public does not entirely depend upon the actual paſſing of accounts, provided they have been daily rendered, all which he fully makes out, I hope people will begin to be ſatisfied, that the nation has not been cheated of thirty-five millions.'

[n] A full account of this matter was ſoon after publiſhed in 'A letter about the debts of the Navy', by which it appeared, that the public money had been managed with the utmoſt fidelity; and it was made evident, that, when there was not money enough to anſwer all the expence of the war, it was neceſſary to apply it to that which preſſed: ſo this debt was contracted by an inevitable neceſſity, and all reaſonable perſons were fully ſatisfied with this account of it. The author of the Letter thus ſhews the reaſonableneſs of including the Extra-Services in the accounts of the Navy (beſides which he makes the charge upon the late miniſters to amount only to a little above five thouſand pounds) 'I muſt (ſays he) make one obſervation more to you: That as the debts of the navy have annually increaſed, an annual account of it has been laid before the houſe of commons, who were conſtantly informed how far the proviſion, made for the preceding year, had fallen ſhort of anſwering the expence; but being ſenſible, that the more preſſing ſupplies were as much as could be well raiſed within the year, they ſtill thought it more adviſeable to leave the extraordinary charges as a growing debt, than to increaſe the public burden upon the people, by enlarging the uſual proviſions for the navy. And in the parliament before the laſt, a full account of the navy-debt being called for, the late miniſters were ſo far from being blamed upon this ſubject, that, after a full conſideration, and long debate about the cauſes and methods of contracting that debt, the houſe came to a reſolution in their favour, and went as far in approving their conduct and management, as any ſubſequent parliament has gone in cenſuring them: And, when the juſtice of two different parliaments comes to be the queſtion, I muſt not take upon me to determine between them, but will only make this ſhort remark: That, from ſuch time, at leaſt, as the ſenſe of the houſe was known upon this occaſion, the late miniſtry cannot be thought blameable for proceeding in their uſual method, when they were ſupported by authority and approbation of parliament'.

[o] The particulars of the debts and deficiencies, that were thus incorporated, were as follow:

	l.	s.	d.
The debt of the navy —— ——	5,130,539	5	5
The debt of the ordnance —— ——	154,324	15	8
For tranſport-ſervice —— ——	424,791	5	4
An army and tranſport-debenture, to Sept. 29, 1710	1,018,056	17	9
Deficient tallies and orders on 9 Will. 3, c. 13, and another act, 1 Ann, for laying duties on coals	12,025	1	0
Debts between Sept. 29, 1710, and Dec. 25, 1710, in the offices of the navy, victualling, and tranſport	378,859	5	8
On ſubſidies to the E. of Hanover and D. of Zell —	9,375	0	0
The intereſt of the ſaid debts as carry intereſt, from Dec. 25, 1710, to Dec. 25, 1711 — —	85,000	0	0
For money lent purſuant to an act, 8 Ann, c. 13, to raiſe money for the year 1710 ——	1,296,552	9	11
For intereſt due on the ſame, March 25, 1711 —	74,875	19	1
All theſe amount to —— ——	8,585,000	0	0
The intereſt of this ſum from March 25, 1711, to Dec. 25, 1711, at ſix per cent. ——	386,325	0	0
To be raiſed for the ſervice of the year 1711 ——	500,000	0	0
The whole ſtock —— ——	9,471,325	0	0

For payment of the intereſt of this ſtock at ſix per cent. the continuation of the general mortgage, from 1716, was granted to raiſe the annual ſum of five hundred and ſixty-eight thouſand, two hundred and ſeventy-nine pounds, ten ſhillings.

preſcribed by parliament: That the ſurpluſage of ſome funds had not been applied to anſwer the deficiency of others; but other uſes were found out, ſuch as were neither voted nor addreſſed for by parliament, which therefore we judge a miſapplication of public money. The debt of the navy has ariſen from a liberty, that has been taken of transferring money, iſſued for that ſervice, to other uſes, particularly for proviſions for the land-forces in Spain and Portugal. To this we muſt add, the many notorious embezzlements in your majeſty's brew-houſe; and that the commiſſioners for victualling have been guilty of great negligence; that the receivers of the land-tax were not obliged to make due and punctual payments.' Then they added, 'Thus far have we proceeded in diſcovering ſome of thoſe cauſes, which have brought ſo great a weight of debts upon the nation; and we might have made a much greater progreſs in our inquiries, if the accounts of the public money had been regularly paſſed; but, to our great ſurprize and concern, we find, "That they, who of late years have had the management of your majeſty's treaſury, and ought to have compelled the ſeveral accomptants duly to paſs their reſpective accounts, have been guilty of ſo notorious a breach of truſt, and of ſo high an injuſtice to the nation, that of the monies granted by parliament, and iſſued for the public ſervice to Chriſtmas 1710, there remains unaccounted for the ſum of thirty-five millions, three hundred and two thouſand, one hundred and ſeven pounds; for a great part of which no accounts have ſo much as been laid before the auditors: And for the reſt, though ſome accounts have been brought in, yet they have not been proſecuted by the accomptants and finiſhed." This has made it impracticable for us to arrive at ſo exact a knowledge of the ſtate of the nation, with regard to the public money, as we wiſhed, and might have expected; and your majeſty will pleaſe to conſider, in ſuch an immenſe ſum unaccounted for, how many embezzlements may be concealed, and how juſtly it is to be ſuſpected, that ſo ſcandalous a remiſſneſs has been allowed with no other deſign. We humbly beſeech your majeſty, that you will give immediate and effectual directions for the compelling the ſeveral impreſt accomptants ſpeedily to paſs their accounts; and, in the mean time, we humbly hope your majeſty will approve the reſolution of your commons, "That ſuch of the accomptants, who have neglected their duty in proſecuting their accounts, ought no longer to be intruſted with receiving the public money." From all theſe evil practices, and worſe deſigns of ſome perſons, who had, by falſe profeſſions of love to their country, inſinuated themſelves into your royal favour, irreparable miſchief had accrued to the public, had not your majeſty, in your great wiſdom, ſeaſonably diſcovered the fatal tendency of ſuch meaſures; and, out of your ſingular goodneſs to your people, removed from the adminiſtration of affairs, thoſe who had ſo ill anſwered the favourable opinion your majeſty had conceived of them, and in ſo many inſtances groſsly abuſed the great truſt repoſed in them. Your people could, with greater patience, have ſuffered the manifold injuries done to themſelves, by the frauds and depredations of ſuch evil miniſters, had not the ſame men proceeded to treat your ſacred perſon with undutifulneſs and diſregard; but as the intereſts of your majeſty and your people are inſeparable, and are, by your majeſty and your good ſubjects, inſeparably purſued, the wrong, which thoſe men had done to the public, drew upon them your royal diſpleaſure; and their irreverence towards your majeſty juſtly expoſed them to the indignation of your people.

This repreſentation was artfully ſpread through the nation, by which weaker minds were ſo poſſeſſed, that it was not eaſy to undeceive them, even by the fulleſt and cleareſt evidences; the nation ſeemed ſtill infatuated beyond the power of conviction.

On the 12th of June the queen came to the houſe of peers, and, having given the royal aſſent to ten public and ſeven private bills, made the following ſpeech to both houſes:

"My lords and gentlemen,

"It is with great pleaſure I tell you, at the end of this ſeſſion, that you have fully made good all the aſſurances you gave me at the beginning of it.

"This I look upon as a further pledge of my ſubjects' duty and affection, which is the firmeſt ſupport of my throne.

"I thank you gentlemen of the houſe of commons, in a particular manner for what you have done. You have complied with my deſire in granting a ſupply for building many new churches, and you have not only inabled me to carry on the war, but have made effectual proviſion for paying thoſe heavy debts, which were almoſt grown an inſupportable burthen to the public; and this at a time, when our enemies every where pleaſed themſelves with the hopes, that the ſupplies for the ſervice of the current year could not have been found. You have diſappointed them in all reſpects; and by the great ſums you have raiſed, the greateſt ever granted to any prince in one ſeſſion, you have reſtored the public credit, which I will take care to preſerve by a frugal management.

"The world muſt now be ſatisfied, that nothing can be too difficult for a parliament, filled with ſo much zeal for the true intereſt of the nation in church and ſtate.

"My lords and gentlemen,

"The ſatisfaction I take in the power, with which God has intruſted me, is to employ it for the protection and good of all my people, whoſe proſperity I have as much at heart, as ever any of my predeceſſors had.

"You ſee the happy effects of a mutual confidence between me and my ſubjects. I ſhall look upon any attempt to leſſen it, as a ſtep towards diſſolving my government.

"The temper you have ſhewn, will, I hope, convince thoſe, who have the misfortune to differ from our church, that their liberty is not in danger.

"It is needleſs for me to repeat the aſſurances of my earneſt concern for the ſucceſſion of the houſe of Hanover, and of my fixed reſolution to ſupport and encourage the church of England, as by law eſtabliſhed.

"You are now returning to your ſeveral countries; and I expect from you, that you will further recommend yourſelves to me, by ſtudying to promote the public peace and quiet."

At the cloſe of this ſpeech, lord-keeper Harcourt prorogued the parliament to the 10th of July. Thus ended this ſeſſion, and all conſidering perſons had a melancholy proſpect, when they ſaw what might be apprehended from the two ſeſſions, that were yet to come of the ſame parliament.

The convocation was opened the 25th of November, the ſame day in which the parliament met; and Dr. Atterbury, in preference to Dr. Kennet, was choſen prolocutor by a great majority. The queen ſent a letter to the archbiſhop, dated December 12, in which ſhe ſignified her hopes, that the conſultations of the clergy might be of uſe to repreſs the attempts of perſons of looſe and prophane principles, and prevent the like for the future: And promiſed ſhe would give them all fitting encouragement, to proceed in the diſpatch of ſuch buſineſs as properly belonged to them, and grant them ſuch powers as ſhould be thought requiſite for carrying on ſo good a work; confiding in them that her royal intentions would not be fruſtrated, by unreaſonable diſputes about unneceſſary forms and methods of proceeding. Soon after the queen ſent a licence by the lord Dartmouth, under the broad-ſeal, to ſit and do buſineſs in as ample a manner as was ever granted ſince the Reformation. By this licence, the queen impowered them to enter upon ſuch conſultations as the preſent ſtate of the church required, and particularly to conſider of ſuch matters as ſhe ſhould lay before them, limiting them to a quorum; that the archbiſhop, the biſhop of London, or the biſhop of Bath and Wells, ſhould be preſent, and agree to their reſolutions: With this licence, there was a letter directed to the archbiſhop, in which the convocation was ordered, to lay before the queen an account of the late exceſſive growth of infidelity and hereſy among us; and to conſider how to redreſs abuſes in excommunications; how rural deans might be made more effectual; how terriers might be made and preſerved more exactly; and how the abuſes in licences for marriage might be corrected.

In this whole matter, neither the archbiſhop nor any of the biſhops were ſo much as conſulted with; and ſome things in the licence were new: The archbiſhop was not named the preſident of the convocation, as was uſual in former licences; and, in theſe, the archbiſhop's preſence and conſent alone was made neceſſary, except in caſe of ſickneſs, and then the archbiſhop had named ſome biſhops to preſide, as his commiſſaries: And, in that caſe, the convocation was limited to his commiſſaries, which ſtill lodged the preſidentſhip and the negative with the archbiſhop: This was according to the primitive pattern, to limit the clergy of a province to do nothing, without the conſent of the metropolitan; but it was a thing new and unheard-of, to limit the convocation to any of their own body, who had no deputation from the archbiſhop. So a report of this being made, by a committee that was appointed to ſearch the records, it was laid before the queen: And ſhe ſent the biſhops a meſſage to let them know, that ſhe did not intend that thoſe, whom ſhe had named to be of the quorum, ſhould either preſide, or have a negative upon their deliberation, though the contrary was plainly insinuated in the licence. The archbishop was so ill of the gout, that after their first meetings he could come no more: So was also the bishop of London; upon which the bishop of Bath and Wells, seeing how invidiously he was distinguished from his brethren, in which he had not been consulted, pretended ill health, and the convocation was at a stand, till a new licence was sent them, in which the bishops of Winchester, Bristol, and St. David's, were added to be of the quorum. The two last were newly consecrated, and had been in no functions in the church before: So the queen not only passed over all the bishops made in king William's reign, but a great many of those named by herself, and set the two last in a distinction above all their brethren. All this was directed by Atterbury, who had the confidence of the chief minister; and, because the other bishops had maintained a good correspondence with the former ministry, it was thought fit to put marks of the queen's distrust upon them, that it might appear, with whom her royal favour and trust was lodged.

The convocation entered on the consideration of the matters referred to them by the queen: and a committee was appointed to draw a representation of the present state of the church, and of religion among us; but, after some heads were agreed on, Atterbury procured, that the drawing of this might be left to him: and he drew up a most virulent declamation, defaming all the administration from the time of the revolution: Into this he brought many impious principles and practices, that had been little heard of or known, but were now to be published, if this should be laid before the queen. The lower house agreed to his draught; but the bishops laid it aside, and ordered another representation to be drawn in more general and more modest terms. It was not settled, which of these draughts should be made use of, or whether any representation at all should be made to the queen: for it was known, that the design in asking one was only to have an aspersion cast, both on the former ministry and on the former reign. Several provisions were prepared, with relation to the other particulars in the queen's letter: but none of these were agreed to by both houses [p].

An incident happened, which diverted their thoughts to another matter. Mr. Whiston, the Mathematical Professor in Cambridge, a learned man, of a sober and exemplary life, but much addicted to search after paradoxes, endeavoured to revive the Arian heresy, though he pretended to differ from Arius in several particulars. He found his notions favoured by the apostolical constitutions; so he reckoned them a part, and the chief part of the canon of the Scriptures. For these tenets he was censured at Cambridge, and expelled the university: upon that he wrote a vindication of himself and his doctrine, and dedicated it to the Convocation, promising a larger work on these subjects. The uncontested way of proceeding in such a case was, that the bishop of the diocese, in which he lived, should cite him into his court, in order to his conviction or censure, from whose sentence an appeal lay to the archbishop, and from him to the crown: or the archbishop might proceed in the first instance in a court of audience. But there were no clear precedents of any proceedings in convocation, where the jurisdiction was contested, a reference made by the high-commission to the convocation, where the party submitted to do penance, being the only precedent that appeared in history, and even of this there was no record: so that, it not being thought a clear warrant for their proceeding, the bishops were at a stand. The act, that settled the course of appeals in king Henry the Eighth's time, made no mention of sentences in convocation; and yet, by the act in the first of queen Elizabeth, that defined what should be judged heresy, that judgment was declared to be in the crown: By all this (which the archbishop laid before the bishops in a letter that he wrote to them on this occasion) it seemed doubtful, whether the convocation could, in the first instance, proceed against a man for heresy: and their proceedings, if they were not warranted by law, might involve them in a præmunire. So the upper house, in an address, prayed the queen to ask the opinions of the judges, and such others as she thought fit concerning these doubts, that they might know how the law stood in this matter.

Eight of the judges, with the attorney and solicitor-general (Northey and Raymond) gave their opinion, that the convocation had a jurisdiction, and might proceed in such a case; but brought no express law or precedent to support their opinion. They only observed, that the law-books spoke of the Convocation, as having jurisdiction; and they did not see that it was ever taken from them: they were also of opinion, that an appeal lay from the sentence of convocation to the crown; but they reserved to themselves a power to change their mind, in case, upon an argument that might be made for a prohibition, they should see cause for it. Four of the judges were positively of a contrary opinion, and maintained it from the statutes made at the Reformation. The queen, having received these different opinions, sent them to the archbishop, to be laid before the two houses of convocation; and, without taking any notice of the diversity between them, she wrote that, there being now no doubt to be made of their jurisdiction, she did expect that they should proceed in the matter before them. In this it was visible, that they, who advised the queen to write that letter, considered more their own humour, than her honour. However, two doubts still remained, even supposing the convocation had a jurisdiction: the first was, Of whom the court was to be composed, whether only of the bishops, or what share the lower-house had in this judiciary authority: the other was, By what delegates, in case of an appeal, their sentence was to be examined: Were no bishops to be in the court of delegates? Or was the sentence of the archbishop and his twenty-one suffragan bishops, with the clergy of the province, to be judged by the archbishop of York and his three suffragan bishops? These difficulties appearing to be so great, the bishops resolved to begin with that, in which they had, by the queen's license, an undisputable authority; which was to examine and censure the book, and to see if his doctrine was not contrary to the Scriptures, and the first four General Councils, which is the measure set by law, to judge heresy. They drew out some propositions from his book, which seemed plainly to be the reviving of Arianism; and censured them as such. These they sent down to the lower-house, who, though they excepted to one proposition, yet censured the rest in the same manner. This the arhbishop (being still disabled by the gout) sent by one of the bishops to the queen for her assent, who promised to consider of it: But she did not send an answer till the convocation came to an end; neither at their next meeting the winter following, did any answer come from her, and therefore two bishops being sent to ask it, she could not tell what was become of the archbishop's paper; so a new extract of the censure was again sent to her; but she did not think fit to send any answer, and Whiston's affair remained undecided, though he published a large work in four volumes octavo, justifying his doctrine, and maintaining the canonicalness of the apostolical constitutions, preferring their authority not only to the Epistles, but even to the Gospels. But, in this last point, he has made no proselytes, though he has used his utmost efforts to support it.

The lower-house would not enter into the consideration of the representation, sent down to them by the bishops; so none was agreed on, to be presented to the queen; But both were printed, and severe reflections were made, in several tracts, on that which was drawn by the lower-house, or rather by Atterbury. The bishops went through all the matters, recommended to them by the queen; and drew up a scheme of regulations on them all: but neither were these agreed to, by the lower-house; for their spirits were so exasperated, that nothing sent by the bishops could be agreeable to them.

The parish of Greenwich having petitioned the house of commons for assistance in rebuilding their church, a committee was appointed to examine the petition, and an instruction was given them to consider what churches were wanting within the cities of London and Westminster. Upon this, the lower house of convocation sent a solemn message by their prolocutor to the commons, to thank them for this instance of their regard to the welfare of the Established Church, and to offer such lights, as they were able to afford in relation to the extreme want of churches in London and Westminster. The commons immediately resolved, That they would receive all such informations, as should be offered in this case, by the lower house of convocation; and would have a particular regard to such applications, as should at any time be made to them from the clergy in convocation assembled, according to the antient usage, together with the parliament. Pursuant to this resolution, quickened by a recommendation from the queen (who had been addressed by the convocation) they passed a bill for the building fifty new churches, and gave the duty of one shilling a chaldron upon coals, from September 29, 1716, to September 29, 1719, for raising the sum of three hundred and fifty thousand pounds for that purpose. This duty had been reserved for building St. Paul's, which was now finiſhed. This was the leaſt that could be expected from a houſe of commons, choſen, in great meaſure, by the zeal and influence of the clergy, eſpecially as it was apparent, that, in the ſuburbs of London, there were above two hundred thouſand people more than could poſſibly reſort to the churches already built. Soon after this, the ſeſſion of parliamentand convocation both came to an end.

[p] During these proceedings died Dr. Aldrich, dean of Christ-Church in Oxford. He was a polite and learned divine, and a warm stickler for the church and hereditary right. His zeal, in those respects, had made him descend so low, as to apply himself to the contriving of the hieroglyphical figures of the Oxford almanack, with allusions in favour of the Pretender.

The duke of Marlborough being continued in the command of the Britiſh forces in Flanders inclined many to hope, that a reconciliation was effected between him and the new miniſtry. But this was ſo far from being the caſe, that there was no longer any confidence between him and thoſe that managed affairs at court; and conſequently little was to be expected from the continuation of the war, when the chief conductor of it was in ſo uneaſy a ſituation[q]. However, to carry matters on the more ſmoothly, the queen wrote a kind letter to the ſtates about the duke, whoſe conduct ſhe declared herſelf to be intirely ſatisfied with; and aſſured them, that, according to their deſires, ſhe would order the duke forthwith to go over to Holland. Accordingly, on the 18th of February, he ſet out from St. James's, with a poſitive aſſurance, that the payment of the troops under his command would be as effectually taken care of by the new miniſters, as it had been by the old; and, imbarking at Harwich the next day, arrived at the Hague on the 4th of March, N. S. to the great ſatisfaction of the ſtates.

While all things were preparing on both ſides for the opening of the campaign, many conſultations were held on ſeveral weighty affairs, particularly in relation to the aſſembling a body of troops, to preſerve the neutrality of the empire, which was in imminent danger of being broke by the king of Sweden's refuſing to come into the meaſures already agreed on for that purpoſe. After ſeveral conferences it was reſolved, that her Britannic majeſty and the ſtates-general ſhould employ in that ſervice the eight Palatine battalions in their pay, and provide the other four, that would be ſtill wanting to compleat their quotas, where they might beſt be ſpared, without affecting the common cauſe.

There was, at this juncture, another affair of no ſmall conſequence in agitation at the Hague. For when the allies expected to hear, that the king of Pruſſia's troops were on their march into the field, that prince's miniſters declared, that, unleſs their maſter had full ſatisfaction given him, as to the arrears due to his forces, and the ſucceſſion of the late king William, as prince of Orange, his troops ſhould not march out of their winter-quarters. The allies were ſomewhat ſurprized at this unexpected declaration; but, the deputies of the ſtates having had ſeveral conferences with the Pruſſian miniſters, an agreement was concluded, containing in ſubſtance, "that the arrears ſhould be paid in four months time: That, notwithſtanding the houſe of Dieren had been adjudged, by ſentence of a court of judicature, to the houſe of Naſſau, the ſtates conſented, that his Pruſſian majeſty ſhould continue to make uſe of it: And that the council, who had adminiſtered the revenue of the ſucceſſion of Orange, ſince the death of the late king, ſhould be obliged ſpeedily to give an account of the ſame." As ſoon as the deputies had made this declaration, the king of Pruſſia approved of the agreement, and his troops began their march for the Netherlands.

The duke of Marlborough expected with great impatience the arrival of prince Eugene, who was for ſome time detained at Vienna by the coming of a Turkiſh aga, with a particular commiſſion from the Ottoman Port, to remove any jealouſy, that might be entertained at the Imperial court, from the warlike preparations, which the Turks were making at this time againſt Muſcovy and Poland. In the mean while the duke was daily in conference with the deputies of the ſtates, to concert the operations of the war; and, it being thought of the utmoſt importance to be in the field before the enemy, it was reſolved, to cauſe detachments from all the garriſons to canton along the Scarpe, and between that river and the canal of Doway, whereby a great body might in a few hours be formed, and ready to march; which, with great diligence and ſecrecy, was put in execution, under the direction of lieutenant-general Cadogan.

On the other hand, the French forces beginning about the middle of April to aſſemble near Cambray and Arras, the duke ſet out from the Hague, and arrived in three days at Tournay, near which place the troops were incamped in ſeveral bodies. At a council of war, it was reſolved, that theſe troops ſhould join, and form the army; which was done at Orchies, between Liſle and Doway. The next day the duke of Marlborough paſſed the Scarpe, and incamped between Doway and Bouchain, and found, that the enemy had aſſembled a numerous army behind the Sanſet, in a moſt advantageous poſt, which was judged inacceſſible. Nothing material happened till the 9th of May, when three thouſand French, detached from Valenciennes and Condé, attacked a convoy of forty-five boats, laden with hay and oats, which ſet out for Tournay under a guard of two battalions commanded by brigadier Chambrier. But, the garriſon of St. Amand advancing to the aſſiſtance of the guard, the enemy retired, having firſt ſet on fire twelve of the boats, with the loſs of about an hundred men killed and wounded; and the allies loſt about the ſame number.

The duke of Marlborough continued in his camp, where he expected the reſt of the troops, which were to form his army, and the arrival of prince Eugene. That prince was obliged to ſtay ſome days at Francfort, to concert with the elector of Mentz the neceſſary meaſures for the ſecurity of the empire, upon the unexpected death of the emperor Joſeph; after which he proceeded to the court of the elector Palatine, to regulate ſeveral matters with that prince, who, as one of the vicars of the empire, was to have the chief adminiſtration thereof during the interregnum. By this means prince Eugene did not join the grand army till the the 23d of May. The duke and prince were reſolved to continue in their camp as long as poſſible, in hopes that the ſcarcity of forage would oblige the enemy to decamp; for, after the ſeveral attempts, that were made at the poſt of Arleux, which was taken and retaken, there was no likelihood to force their lines.

In the mean time the French hoping, that the elector of Bavaria had many friends in the empire, who would declare for him; and believing, that the Germans, being deprived of their general in chief, would hearken to a neutrality, if that elector appeared in Germany at the head of a powerful army; reſolved to ſend him thither; and, to that end, reinforced their army on the Rhine from their garriſons on the Maeſe and Moſelle, and likewiſe from their army in the Netherlands. For Villars thought his lines ſo ſecure and impenetrable, that he boaſted, they were the 'Ne plus ultra' of the duke of Marlborough. Theſe lines began at Bouchain, no the Scheld, and were continued along the Sanſet and the Scarpe to Arras, and from thence along the Upper Scarpe and the river Ugy to the Canche, the opening between thoſe rivers being intrenched and fortified with all poſſible care by a large ditch, defended with redoubts and other works.

The preparations of the enemy alarming the empire, prince Eugene received poſitive orders from Vienna to march with the Imperial and Palatine troops to the Upper Rhine, for ſecuring Germany. Upon this the two armies decamped, the 14th of June, and repaſſed the Scarpe, prince Eugene taking his way towards Tournay, and the duke of Marlborough marching towards the plains of Lens, in ſight of the French, who did not offer to inſult his rear. The duke continued there till the 20th of July, when he advanced towards Aire, to make the enemy believe, that he deſigned to beſiege St. Omer, or attack their lines on that ſide. This obliged Villars to re-inforce the garriſon of that place, and to draw all his troops to defend his lines between the Scarpe and the Canche, which both armies believed the duke deſigned to attack, becauſe of the preparations he had made. The duke, upon a view of the enemy's lines, finding it would be too hazardous to endeavour to force them, reſolved upon a ſtratagem. To make the enemy believe, he really intended to attack them, he ordered twelve hundred men out, to make roads and bridges in the front, and ad-

[q] Dr. Hare, the duke of Marlborough's attendant-chaplain, then in Flanders, and who was in his ſecrets, deſcribes the duke's ſituation in the following manner:

'That little more harmony was to be expected between two rivals in power, than between a falling and a riſing favourite. Some perſons, ſays he, would ſtill pretend to put a good face upon the matter, and do not queſtion, from the duke of Marlborough's paſt ſucceſſes, that he will yet frighten our enemies into an honourable peace. But, I am afraid, he is not likely to do ſo much at this time, when the enemy are encouraged to take heart afreſh; the allies are full of jealouſies and fears, and himſelf extremely mortified. Things are not the ſame, any more than the uſage he meets with. When he is uneaſy in his thoughts, undetermined in the favour of his ſovereign, and vilely miſrepreſented to the people; when his want of intereſt at home makes it impoſſible for the allies to depend upon the hopes he gives them; when he is without authority in the army, where it is made criminal to eſpouſe his intereſt; and to fly in his face is the ſureſt means to advancement; when it is meritorious in his officers to cabal againſt him; and the moſt factious will be thought the moſt deſerving; with what heart can a man in theſe circumſtances ſerve? Or, what ſucceſs can be expected from him, when he is made to depend upon profeſſed enemies for his ſupport? It is little, I think, we can hope for even from him hereafter, though that little be more than any body elſe could do.'

vanced, with the whole army to Rebreuve, and from thence to Villars-Brulin, within two leagues of the lines. Here he ſet all his troops to work in making faſcines, and gave out, that he intended to attack the lines the next morning. Villars was ſo fully perſuaded of it, that he ſent orders to a ſtrong detachment, commanded by count d'Eſtain, which had been ſent upon a ſecret expedition, to halt at Perenne, and to the garriſons of Ypres and St. Omer, to join his army, which he drew together behind the lines. The duke, to amuſe the enemy more effectually, went, the 4th of Auguſt, N. S. by break of day, with ſeveral of the general officers and two thouſand horſe, to take a nearer view of the ſituation of the enemy's camp; but his real deſign, when he advanced from Coté, near Aire, was to endeavour to get within the enemy's lines, by attempting the paſſage of the Sanſet by Arleux, which he believed was unguarded, as indeed it happened to be. To this end he ordered Cadogan and Hompeſch to repair, with all expedition, to Doway, and aſſemble ſome troops that were left there on purpoſe, which, with a detachment of that and the neighbouring garriſons of Liſle and St. Amand, made a body of three and twenty battalions and ſeventeen ſquadrons. Their farther orders were to march directly with their troops to Arleux, and endeavour to paſs the Sanſet, while the duke himſelf would advance with the whole army to ſupport them. And, that nothing might retard this extraordinary march, brigadier Sutton was ſent beforehand with the artillery and pontoons to make bridges over the Scarpe near Vitry, and over the canal of Arleux, near Goulezin.

Theſe things were managed ſo privately, and the feint carried on ſo well, that the confederate generals themſelves thought of nothing but attacking the lines the next morning. Theſe amuſements had ſo good an effect upon Villars, that he kept his troops under arms night and day, and reinforced them with all the ſtrength he could poſſibly draw together, on that ſide, not leaving any number of troops in the poſts he had upon the Sanſet.

The confederate army, in the mean time, were expecting orders to march, which were not given till ſix in the evening. The march was to begin between eight and nine, as ſoon as it was dark enough to ſtrike their tents, without being ſeen by the enemy; but, whether the march was to be to the right or left, was not known. They were only told, that the ſeveral columns, which the army was to march in, ſhould find an officer at the head of each, at ſuch an hour, who ſhould lead them the way they were to take, when the time came. About nine the whole army, to their great ſurprize, were ordered to march by the left, in four columns, without beat of drum; and the duke himſelf, with the horſe of the left wing, led the van, and advanced with ſuch extraordinary expedition, that, the next morning by five, he paſſed the Scarpe at Vitry. Here he received advice, that Hompeſch had paſſed the Sanſet without oppoſition, and taken poſſeſſion of the paſſes on that river, and on the Scheld at Oiſy, the French having, ſome time before, withdrawn the detachments they had on that ſide. The duke, upon this, haſtened his march, leſt the enemy ſhould get there before him; and at the ſame time diſpatched orders to the grand army, to purſue their march with the utmoſt diligence. The duke, with his van-guard of fifty ſquadrons, having paſſed the Scarpe, haſtened towards Arleux and Bacà Bacheaul, where he arrived before eight of the clock, and the heads of the columns joined him there about ten, having marched above ten leagues without halting, a thing ſcarce to be paralleled in hiſtory.

Villars, though he had notice of this unexpected march of the confederate army about eleven at night, was ſo poſſeſſed with the belief that the deſign was to attack his lines near Aveſnes le Compte, that he waited till two the next morning for certain intelligence. Then he decamped with his whole army, and, putting himſelf at the head of the king's houſhold, marched all night with ſuch diligence, that he appeared with the head of his line about eleven o'clock, ſoon after the duke of Marlborough had joined count Hompeſch, and paſſed with twenty ſquadrons through the defile of Marquion. But, when he ſaw the duke was advancing with his horſe to attack him, he retreated to the main body of his army, which was, by that time, advanced to the high road between Arras and Cambray. Mean while the allies advanced with all poſſible diligence, and, having all paſſed, the army incamped upon the Scheld between Oiſy and Eſtrum.

Thus the confederate army entered the French lines, which they had ſo vainly boaſted to be impenetrable; the boldeſt attempt, that had been made during the whole war: And the honour of it was the greater to the duke of Marlborough, as his army was not only weakened by the detachment, which prince Eugene had carried to the Rhine, but by the calling over five thouſand of the beſt troops in his army for an expedition deſigned by ſea; ſo that the enemy were ſuperior to him in number. This raiſed his character beyond all that he had done formerly; the deſign was ſo well laid, and ſo happily executed, that, in all men's opinions it paſſed for a maſter-piece of military ſkill, the honour of it falling intirely on the duke of Marlborough, no other perſons having any ſhare, except in the execution.

The next day, Auguſt 6, whilſt the allies expected the enemy lying upon their arms, advice was brought to the duke of Marlborough, that they were in motion towards the Scheld, in order to paſs it at Crevecoeur, and incamp between Cambray and Bouchain, to prevent the ſiege of the latter. The duke detached forty ſquadrons, with orders to fall upon their rear; but they found it impracticable, by reaſon of the moraſs that was between them: and, a council of war being called, the field-deputies of the ſtates-general propoſed to purſue the enemy, and hazard a battle, ſince this ſurprize had put them in no ſmall diſorder. The duke of Marlborough was of a different opinion. He thought the attempt might be too hazardous: The army was much fatigued with ſo long a march, in which the cavalry had been eight and forty hours on horſeback, alighting only twice, about an hour each time, to feed their horſes. The French were freſh, having had a much nearer march within their lines, than the confederates round them; and the allies were not in a condition for action, till ſome time were allowed for refreſhment. Beſides, the duke foreſaw, in caſe of a misfortune, their being within the enemy's lines might be fatal.

The duke having diſapproved of the propoſal made by the deputies, it was expected he ſhould make another. Accordingly he propoſed the beſieging of Bouchain, which he thought would oblige the French to endeavour to raiſe the ſiege; and that might give occaſion to their engaging on more equal terms; or it would bring both a diſreputation and a diſcouragement on their army, if a place of ſuch importance ſhould be taken in their ſight. But both the Dutch deputies and the general officers thought the enterprize too bold, yet they ſubmitted to his judgment. It ſeemed impracticable to take a place ſituated in a moraſs well fortified, with a good garriſon in it, in ſight of a ſuperior army; for the French lay within a mile of them. There was alſo great danger from the excurſions, which the garriſons of Valenciennes and Condé might make, to cut off their proviſions, which were to come from Tournay. All about the duke endeavoured to divert him from ſo dangerous an undertaking, ſince a misfortune in his conduct would have furniſhed his enemies with the advantages they waited for. All this he was ſenſible of; but he had laid the ſcheme ſo well, that he reſolved to venture on it. But, before this reſolution was executed, the duke diſpatched brigadier Sutton to England with the news, that he had without the loſs of a man entered thoſe lines, which had coſt the enemy ſo much time and labour to fortify, and of the ſtrength of which they had ſo much boaſted. The field-deputies ſent alſo an account of that affair to the ſtates-general. The news was received in Holland with an univerſal joy, and no encomiums were too great for the conductor of the great deſign; but the ſatisfaction was not ſo general in England. When Sutton arrived at Whitehall, with an account of the duke of Marlborough's paſſing the French lines, it gave his friends indeed the greater joy, becauſe his enemies had given out, that nothing would be done this year in Flanders, becauſe, as they pretended, he was reſolved no affair ſhould ſucceed under the preſent adminiſtration, if he could help it. But, his enemies, being diſappointed, endeavoured to leſſen the glory of the action, pretending, he had only removed his army from a plentiful to a ſtarving camp. But this malicious ſuggeſtion was ſoon confuted, as well by the ſequel of his ſucceſs, as by the applauſe all Europe gave to his conduct; while Villars was openly reflected on, both in his own army and at Paris.

Purſuant to the reſolution taken in the council of war, the ſiege of Bouchain was undertaken, the difficulty of which may be judged from the ſituation of the place. Bouchain is a fortified town, ſtanding at the confluence of the Sanſet and the Salle into the Scheld. The Sanſet parts the upper town from the lower, forms an inundation between that and the Selle, and fills the ditches which ſurround the works between the upper and lower towns. The Selle divides the lower town in two parts, and, between the lower town and the Scheld, is a horn-work which covers two ſeparate baſtions, and which is cut in two by a ditch ſupplied by the Scheld. Notwithſtanding theſe, and ſeveral other difficulties, the place was inveſted the 10th of Auguſt, N. S. by thirty battalions, and twelve ſquadrons, commanded by general Fagel. Marſhal Villars tried to throw more men into the town by a narrow cauſeway (called the Cow-path) through the moraſs; but the duke of Marlborough took his meaſures ſo well, that he was guarded againſt every thing, and drove the French from that advantageous poſt. He ſaw what the event of this ſiege might be; and therefore beſtirred himſelf with unuſual application, and was more fatigued in the courſe of this ſiege, than he had been at any time during the whole war. The trenches were vigorouſly carried on, and by the batteries and bombs the town was ſoon laid in ruins. Villars did all he could to raiſe the ſiege, but to no purpoſe. When he ſaw that could not be done, he endeavoured to ſurpriſe Doway. To that end, he ſent a detachment of ten thouſand men under Albergotti (the late governor of Doway) and thought fit to be there himſelf in perſon. They marched the 7th of September in the evening; and, about one in the morning, they were diſcovered by a patrole of the confederate horſe, who ſent intelligence of it to count Hompeſch; ſo that orders were immediately given to the officers in the out-poſts to be upon their guard: But, in the mean time, the enemy advanced towards the gate of St. Eloy, where they deſigned to ſcale the wall; and ſeveral of their boats, filled with ſoldiers, paſſed over the inundation to favour the attempt, and came ſo near the works, that, being challenged by the centinels, they anſwered, "they were the governor's fiſhermen;" which the garriſon miſtruſting, and, at the ſame time, hearing ſome firing from the out-poſts, they fired likewiſe upon the boats: ſo that the enemy finding themſelves diſcovered, retired immediately. Thoſe in the inundation left their boats behind, and made what haſte they could to join their main body, which marched back, and repaſſed the Sanſet, with great precipitation, having loſt a conſiderable number of their men by deſertion.

Villars having failed in all his attempts to relieve Bouchain, the garriſon, after twenty days, from the opening of the trenches, capitulated, and could obtain no better terms, than to be made priſoners of war. The garriſon, conſiſting at firſt of ſix thouſand men, was reduced to leſs than three thouſand. The governor pretended, he was in a condition to have defended himſelf ſome days longer; but the ſoldiers, finding Villars did not attempt to relieve the place, obliged him to capitulate.

The ſucceſs of this memorable ſiege, ſo difficult in all its circumſtances, improved the bravery and reſolution of the confederate troops; ſo that they never expreſſed ſo much eagerneſs for coming to a fair engagement with the enemy. The duke's ſtratagem in paſſing the lines without the loſs of a man; the cutting off the communication of the enemy with Bouchain; the manner of the duke's inveſting the town with an inferior army; his caſting up lines, making regular forts, raiſing batteries, laying bridges over a river, making a moraſs paſſable, and providing for the ſecurity of his convoys, againſt a ſuperior army on the one ſide, and the numerous garriſons of Condé and Valenciennes on the other, were enterprizes that ſhewed the great military ſkill of the undertaker. As this was reckoned the moſt extraordinary thing in the whole hiſtory of the war, ſo the honour of it was acknowledged to belong entirely to the duke of Marlborough; as the blame of a miſcarriage in it muſt have fallen ſingly on him[r]. Villar's conduct on this occaſion was much cenſured, but by means of madam Maintenon (whoſe favourite Villars was) it was approved by the king of France.

Whilſt the works and breaches of Bouchain were repairing, the duke of Marlborough ſent the earl of Albemarle to the Hague, to regulate the operations for the remaining part of the campaign with the States; and, as he judged the enemy might be troubleſome in the winter to the conquered places near them without the reduction of Queſnoy, to obtain their concurrence for the ſiege of that place. But the States, conſidering how far the ſeaſon was ſpent, and the difficulties which muſt attend ſuch an enterprize in the ſight of the enemy's army, eſpecially in a country, where they had deſtroyed all the forage, they rejected the propoſal. They agreed however, that moſt of their troops ſhould be quartered in the frontier-towns, not only, that they might be ready to take the field early in the ſpring, but alſo to hinder the enemy from making any new lines during the winter, and oblige them at the ſame time, to continue their troops upon their frontiers, where they would find it very difficult to ſubſiſt them. The duke, who had been acquainted with the negotiations, that were carrying on in England, by monſieur Meſnager, from the French court, and the propoſals he had given in to the miniſtry from his maſter, could not but perceive, that the States had this alſo for an inducement, to make no more ſieges during the remainder of the campaign, in order to ſpare their troops till they ſaw what would be the reſult of the negotiations; though they did not think fit to inſert it among their other arguments for putting an end to it. The duke therefore ſet the forces at work to level the approaches, fill up the breaches, and put the town of Bouchain into a poſture of defence; which was not finiſhed till about three weeks after its ſurrender, through the badneſs of the weather, which very much incommoded both the French and the allies, who continued incamped to ſee each other drawn off to their winter quarters. As ſoon as Bouchain was put in a good poſture of defence, both the armies began to ſeparate, having already greatly ſuffered by the continual rains, and the ſcarcity of forage.

This was the laſt ſervice which the duke of Marlborough ever performed in the field. The allies were now in poſſeſſion of the Maeſe almoſt to the inlet of the Sambre, and the Scheld, beyond Tournay, and of the Lys, ſo far as it is navigable. And beſides the conqueſts of Bavaria, Cologne, and other countries in Germany, they had alſo reduced ſo much of Guelderland, as had formerly been left to Spain by the treaty of Munſter; and likewiſe Limburg, Brabant, Mechlin, Flanders; two thirds of Hainault, with their ſtrong holds, the conqueſt of which was thought almoſt impracticable. By the taking of Bouchain and the progreſs of the confederate army on the Scarpe and the Lys, they were become maſters of two rivers, which, by the means of the Deule, and its canal, had been ſerviceable to the French for many years in their continual invaſions of the Spaniſh Netherlands, of which they were now altogether deprived. All theſe important conqueſts the allies had made during the courſe of this war under the conduct of the duke of Marlborough, who having given the neceſſary orders for ſecuring the navigation of the Scarpe to Doway, and covering the workmen employed in fortifying ſeveral poſts on that river, and on the Scheld, left the army on the 27th of October, and, after ſome ſtay at the Hague, landed in England, on the 17th of November, O. S.

As the affair of Spain had been ſo much preſſed from the throne, and ſo much inſiſted on all the laſt ſeſſion of parliament, and as the commons had given 1,500,000l. for that ſervice, (a ſum far beyond all that had been granted in any preceding ſeſſion) it was expected matters would have been carried there in another manner than formerly. The duke of Argyle having been recalled from the ſervice in Flanders (where he had acted in conſtant oppoſition to the duke of Marlborough) was appointed to command the Engliſh forces in Spain, and great hopes were entertained, that, by his courage, activity, and conduct, the face of affairs there would be changed for the better: But all theſe hopes failed. After the ſurrender at Brihuega, there were, as hath been related, but three Engliſh regiments left, Lepel's dragoons, with Richards's and Du Bourgay's regiment of foot, and theſe had almoſt been deſtroyed at the battle of Villa Vicioſa. However, they were in great meaſure compleated again by the dragoons and foot that made their eſcape from their confinement. But there was no money to ſubſiſt them; and if the Catalans, in whoſe towns they were quartered, had not been ſo humane as they were, they muſt have been ſtarved. There had been no remittances from England in above ſix months, till the beginning of February, when the pay-maſter received bills for thirty-two thouſand pounds only, though the eſtabliſhment in Spain amounted yearly to one million one hundred thouſand pounds and upwards. As this ſmall ſum bore no proportion to what ſubſiſtance was due, ſo it did not ſuffice to give any relief to thoſe who were in want, and therefore they muſt have periſhed, had it not been for the good nature of the people of Catalonia.

During the winter, general Stanhope had been endeavouring to get an exchange of priſoners; but the court of Madrid was ſo averſe to it, and ſo unwilling the Engliſh ſhould obtain their liberty while the war continued, that, inſtead of agreeing to it, Stanhope was removed from the city of Valladolid to a poor fiſher-town in Aſturia, and afterwards to Pau, the capital of Bearn, in France, where he continued till all the priſoners on both ſides were releaſed.

Sir John Norris came with the fleet in the beginning of March from Port-Mahon to Barcelona, and a great council of war was held at the palace, in king Charles's preſence, about the ſituation of affairs, and the operations of the next campaign. Soon after, major-general Whetham arrived at Barcelona, and ſuperſeded Lepel in the command of the forces. He was followed by a few regiments of foot from Ireland, and two from Gibraltar, that were re-implaced by ſome that came from that kingdom.

[r] As Villars was lampooned in France, about his 'Ne plus ultra', and for ſuffering Bouchain to be taken in his ſight: So, on the contrary, the duke of Marlborough was libelled in England by ſome mercenary pens for his ſucceſſes. Bouchain was called a dove-houſe, to leſſen the glory of taking it, and the paſſage of the French lines was repreſented as a militia-company's croſſing a kennel.

The duke of Argyle was expected with great impatience, by whoſe preſence it was hoped all our wants, which were very great, would be ſupplied: For no money had been returned, except the inconſiderable ſum before-mentioned. Some bills indeed were drawn by a banker of London upon our Engliſh merchants, but theſe were proteſted. The duke of Argyle (who, in his way to Spain, came, the 4th of April, to the Hague, and went on his journey without viſiting the duke of Marlborough) ſtaid ſome time at Genoa, expecting the remittances he was promiſed before he left England, but none came, which made him very uneaſy. However, he came away with two men of war, and landed at Barcelona the 29th of May, and had his firſt audience of king Charles as ambaſſador and plenipotentiary the next day. The duke employed all his time in putting the Britiſh troops into the beſt condition he could; but ſtill no remittances came. The enemy had marched out of their quarters ſome time before, and were advancing towards the Urgel; ſo it was thought high time for our army to be in motion, to oppoſe their progreſs. As no money came, the duke was obliged to borrow ten thouſand pounds on his own credit, which was but of little ſervice.

Vendoſme's army was in ſo ill a condition, that Staremberg, if he had been ſupported, promiſed himſelf great advantages. He marched towards the enemy with the Spaniſh and the Germans, and the duke of Argyle with the Engliſh. The conſiderable paſs of Prato del Rey was the ſcene of action this campaign; it was regularly and warmly attacked by the duke of Vendoſme, and as vigorouſly defended by our generals. At laſt, the enemy was obliged to retire, and leave us in poſſeſſion of the paſs. The duke of Argyle was ſoon after ſeized with a violent fever, and obliged to return to Barcelona, where it was a long time before he was perfectly recovered. In the beginning of June, Sir John Jennings, with a fleet, arrived before Barcelona, and ſuperſeded Sir John Norris, who ſailed back to England.

The duke of Vendoſme ordered the caſtles of Venaſque, Arens, and Cardona to be inveſted, but without ſucceſs. The ſiege of Cardona was obſtinately perſiſted in. This caſtle ſtands upon a high hill near the mountains. The garriſon being ſoon reduced to great extremities, Staremberg ordered a convoy of proviſions to be got ready, and five hundred grenadiers, ſupported by ſome regiments, to ſee it ſafe into the caſtle. The command of the grenadiers fell upon colonel Edward Stanhope, who attacked part of a French brigade that was poſted in the way to the gate of the caſtle, and, having routed them, ſaw all the proviſions delivered into the place. After which, the colonel drew his grenadiers upon a riſing ground on the ſide of the caſtle, to refreſh them, and going too near the eminence, under which the enemy had retired, a ſoldier ſhot him through the body, of which wound he ſoon after died [s]. By the help of this convoy, the garriſon held out till the end of December, when Staremberg ſent ſome bodies to raiſe the ſiege, who ſucceeded ſo well in their attempt, that they killed two thouſand of the beſiegers, and forced their camp; ſo that they not only raiſed the ſiege, but made themſelves maſters of the enemy's artillery, ammunition, and baggage: and the duke of Vendoſme's army was ſo diminiſhed, that, if Staremberg had received the aſſiſtance which he expected from England, he would have penetrated far into Spain. But nothing was done, after all the zeal expreſſed by the parliament and miniſtry, for retrieving matters on that ſide. The duke of Argyle wrote over heavy complaints that he was not ſupported, by the failing of the remittances he had expected. Notwithſtanding theſe complaints, when he afterwards came over, he was very ſilent, and ſeemed in a good underſtanding with the miniſters.

The emperor's death, as it immediately opened to king Charles the ſucceſſion to the hereditary dominions, ſo a diſpoſition appeared unanimouſly, among all the electors, to chuſe him emperor. However, he ſtaid in Barcelona till September, and then leaving his queen there, to ſupport his affairs in Spain, he ſailed over to Italy. He ſtaid ſome weeks at Milan, where the duke of Savoy came to him; and it was ſaid, that all matters in debate were adjuſted between them. It was hoped, this campaign would have produced ſomething in thoſe parts advantageous to the common cauſe, upon the agreement made before the emperor Joſeph's death, who, a few days before he was taken ill, granted to the duke of Savoy the poſſeſſion of the fiefs in Montferrat. And Mr. St. John, when he moved in the houſe of commons for the ſubſidies to the duke of Savoy, ſaid, all our hopes of ſucceſs this year lay in that quarter, for in Flanders we could do nothing. The duke indeed took the field, forced his way into Savoy, and penetrated as far a the Rhine; but, upon what views it was not then known, he ſtopped his courſe, and, after a ſhort campaign, repaſſed the mountains.

The election of the emperor came on at Francfort, where ſome electors came in perſon, others ſent their deputies: ſome weeks were ſpent in preparing the capitulations; great applications were made to them, to receive deputies from the electors of Bavaria and Cologne; but they were rejected, for they were under the ban of the empire; nor were they pleaſed with the interpoſition of the Pope's nuncio, who gave them much trouble in that matter; but they perſiſted in refuſing to admit them. Francfort lay ſo near the frontier of the empire, that it was apprehended, the French might have made an attempt that way; for they drew ſome detachments from their army in Flanders, to increaſe their forces on the Rhine, as has been related. This it was that obliged the court of Vienna to ſend orders to prince Eugene to march with a detachment from Flanders towards the Rhine. He came in good time to ſecure the electors at Francfort; who being now ſafe, from the fear of any inſult, went on ſlowly in all that they thought fit to propoſe, previous to an election; and concluded unanimouſly to chuſe Charles, who was now declared emperor by the name of Charles the Sixth: He went from Milan to Inſpruck, and from thence to Francfort, where he was crowned with the uſual ſolemnity. Thus that matter was happily ended, and no action happened on the Rhine all this campaign.

The endeavours uſed to adjuſt the diſputes about the ſucceſſion of the late king William were rendered unſucceſsful by a fatal accident. An accommodation was attempted in the beginning of the ſpring, and the king of Pruſſia repairing to the Hague ſoon after, to preſs the concluſion of that affair, the prince of Naſſau-Frieſeland, the other party, was earneſtly deſired by him to come thither alſo. The prince complied, though not without ſome reluctance to leave the confederate army in the middle of the campaign. But, upon the 14th of June, N. S. being come to Moerdyke in his way to the Hague, and being obliged to ferry over the Ames, by reaſon of the fatigue of his journey and the rain, which fell in great abundance, he choſe to continue in his coach with Mr. Hilken, his maſter of horſe, and colonel of his guards. A ſudden tempeſtuous wind aroſe, with which, and the diſturbance of the water occaſioned by it, the horſes were ſo frighted, that they immediately leaped overboard, and dragged the coach into the Ames; ſo that the prince and his companion were ſoon drowned, notwithſtanding all the endeavours of one of his ſervants, who loſt his life in attempting to ſave his maſter's. The death of this prince, who was eminent for his bravery and great qualities, was univerſally lamented by the States and the inhabitants of the United Provinces, and, particularly by the army, who had been eye-witneſſes of his conduct and reſolution in the memorable ſieges of Liſle, Doway, and Mons, the battle of Oudenarde, and chiefly in that of Blaregnies.

The war between the Turks and the Czar came to a quick end. The Czar advanced with his army ſo far into Moldavia, that he was cut off from his proviſions. An engagement followed, in which both ſides pretended they had the advantage. It is certain, the Czar found he was reduced to great extremities, for he propoſed, in order to a peace, to ſurrender Azoph, with ſome other places, and demanded, that the king of Sweden might be ſent home to his own country. The grand vizier was glad to obtain ſo ſpeedy a concluſion of the war; and, notwithſtanding the great oppoſition made by the king of Sweden, he concluded a peace with the Muſcovites, not without ſuſpicion of his being corrupted by money. The king of Sweden, being highly offended at this, charged the grand vizier with neglecting the great advantages he had over the Czar, ſince he and his whole army were at mercy; and he prevailed ſo far at the Porte, that upon it the grand vizier was depoſed, and there was an appearance of a war ready to break out the next year; for the Czar delayed the rendering Azoph, and the other places agreed to be delivered up; pretending, that the king of Sweden was not ſent home, [s] The famous town of Manciſſa, to which he was carried before he expired, out of reſpect to his name, ſuffered his body to be interred in the hoſpital burying-ground, a favour allowed to no other Proteſtant officer during the ſeven years our author was in Spain. M. S according to agreement; yet, to prevent a new war, all the places were at length given up.

Towards the end of this year the Danes and Saxons broke in by concert upon Pomerania, reſolving to beſiege Stralſund; but every thing neceſſary for a ſiege came ſo ſlowly from Denmark, that no progreſs was made, though the troops lay near the place for ſome months; and in that time the Swedes landed a conſiderable body of men in the iſle of Rugen. At laſt the beſiegers, being in want of every thing, were forced to raiſe the ſiege, and to retire from that neighbourhood in the beginning of January. They ſate down next before Wiſmar; but that attempt likewiſe miſcarried, which rendered the conduct of the king of Denmark very contemptible, who thus obſtinately carried on a war, at a time, that the plague ſwept away a third part of the people of Copenhagen, with as little conduct as ſucceſs.

No action happened at ſea this year, for the French fitted out no fleet. All they did this ſummer was the ſending a ſquadron of fourteen or fifteen men of war under the command of Du Guay Trouin in America, where they already had another ſquadron, commanded by Du Caſſe. Du Guay's expedition was for ſome time kept ſecret; but at laſt it was known, that, having entered the bay of Rio de Janeiro in Braſil, he obliged the Portugueſe to run aſhore, and ſet on fire their men of war in that port; after which he made himſelf maſter of the town of St. Sebaſtian; and, having kept poſſeſſion of it two months, ſailed from thence the 13th of November, carrying away ſix hundred ten thouſand cruſadoes, beſides a great quantity of ſugar, and other rich plunder, which they valued at ſeven millions of livres, and pretended, that the whole loſs ſuſtained by the Portugueſe amounted to five and twenty millions. On the other hand, the French made this year ſome unſucceſsful attempts on the Leeward Iſlands; and, about the ſame time, commodore Littleton took a Spaniſh galleon, and another ſhip of twenty-ſix guns, richly laden, in the Weſt-Indies.

An expedition was deſigned by ſea for taking Quebec and Placentia in North America. This deſign was formed by colonel Nicholſon, who had taken poſſeſſion of Nova Scotia, put a garriſon into Port-Royal, and called it Annapolis. The four Indian chiefs, whom the colonel had brought over with him in the ſpring of the year 1710, had alſo promoted it by repreſenting the dangers our ſettlements on the continent of America were threatened with from that quarter. Indeed, the driving the French out of thoſe parts would have driven them alſo out of the Newfoundland trade entirely, and been a very great ſecurity to New-England and New-York. To execute this deſign, troops were ſent for from Flanders, and, with others in England, put on board tranſports under the command of brigadier Hill, brother to Mrs. Maſham, the new favourite, conſiſting of about five thouſand men[t]. A ſtrong ſquadron of men of war, under ſir Hovenden Walker was ordered to convoy the tranſport fleet[u]. They all ſailed from Plymouth the 4th of May, and arrived at Boſton in New-England the fourth of June. General Hill and admiral Walker going aſhore, a counſel of war was held, in which it was reſolved to land the troops, the proviſions which they expected to be furniſhed with at Boſton not being in any readineſs. The fleet upon their arrival here conſiſted of twelve men of war, forty tranſport-ſhips, and ſix ſtore-ſhips, with all manner of warlike ſtores, and a fine train of artillery, with forty horſes for the uſe of the ſame, commanded by colonel King, with proper officers. On the 20th of July, the Britiſh forces returned on board their reſpective ſhips, and were joined by two regiments of New-England and New-York, commanded by colonel Vetch and colonel Walton. On the 30th of July, the fleet ſailed for the river of Canada, and colonel Nicholſon ſet out from Boſton for New-York, from whence he proceeded to Albany, where the forces of New-York, Connecticut, and New-Jerſey, about one thouſand Palatines, and about one thouſand Indians of the five nations, under the Caſſaiques, who had been in England, rendezvouſed to the number of about four thouſand men, commanded by colonel Ingoldſby, colonel Schuyter, and colonel Whiting, who marched towards Canada the 28th of Auguſt. The fleet arrived at the mouth of the river Canada, on the 14th of the ſame month, and on the 18th (ſays ſir Hovenden Walker) the wind blowing freſh at north-weſt, we put into Gaipe-Bay, where we ſtaid till the 20th, being afraid of loſing company with the tranſports, that might be blown to the leeward; but, having got all of them together, we proceeded up part of the river of Canada, which is an hundred and thirty leagues long to Quebec, from the mouth of it. On the 21ſt it proved foggy, and continued ſo all night, and the day following, with little wind till the afternoon, when, in an extreme thick fog, it began to blow hard at eaſt and eaſt-ſouth-eaſt. We found ourſelves then in a dangerous circumſtance, having neither ſoundings, nor ſight of land, to ſteer any courſe, or any anchorage within ſixty leagues, and that not ſafe: So that the pilots on board this ſhip, being the beſt in the fleet, were of opinion, that the admiral ſhould make a ſignal to bring to; which he did with our heads to the ſouthward, judging, by that, we might eſcape danger, and be driven by the ſtream in the mid-channel: but quite contrary, as we were with the wind eaſterly, and our heads to the ſouthward, in two hours we found ourſelves upon the north-ſhore among rocks and iſlands, where the whole fleet had like to have been loſt. The men of war eſcaped, though with extreme hazard; but eight tranſports were caſt away, with about eight hundred men, officers, ſoldiers, and ſeamen; and, had not the admiral made the ſignal as he did, it is very likely, that our loſs would have been much greater. After this diſaſter, we continued thereabouts two or three days, ſeeing what men and other things we could get from the ſhore: After which it was determined by a conſultation of ſea officers, to return back to ſome bay or harbour, where the fleet might ſafely ride, till a further reſolution ſhould be taken. Accordingly, on the 14th of September, we arrived in the Spaniſh river Bay, and the general and admiral called a counſel of war of land and ſea-officers, who conſidering we had but ten weeks proviſion for the fleet and army, and that the navigation in theſe parts of the world being ſo bad and dangerous, that, at this time of the year, we could not depend upon a ſupply of proviſions from New-England, it was unanimouſly agreed to return home, without making further attempts elſewhere.

This account of the expedition to Canada was brought to England by colonel Clayton, who arrived not many days before ſir Hovenden Walker, who came to Portſmouth with the fleet, and the remainder of the tranſports, the 9th of October. Six days after, the Edgar of ſeventy guns was blown up, with above four hundred men, beſides a great many perſons who were come on board to ſee their friends.

The ill ſucceſs of this expedition was a great mortification to the new miniſtry, it being their firſt undertaking, ill projected, and worſe executed in every ſtep. It was the more liable to cenſure, becauſe, at the very time, that the old miniſtry were charged with entering on deſigns, which had not been laid before the parliament, and for which no ſupplies had been given, they projected this, even while a ſeſſion was yet going on, without communicating it to the parliament; whereas what the former miniſtry had done this way, was upon emergencies, and ſucceſſes after the end of the ſeſſion. Beſides, the parliament had juſt then declared it to be their ſenſe, That to enlarge the ſervice, or increaſe the charge beyond the bounds preſcribed, and the ſupplies granted, was illegal, and an invaſion of their rights. The new miniſtry did another thing to keep the deſign ſecret, which was to victual the fleet greatly ſhort of what was neceſſary, leaving them to take in a freſh ſupply in New-England, which they would not beforehand give directions for (though the event ſhewed it was very neceſſary) for fear that alſo ſhould occaſion a diſcovery. This, in ſome meaſure, preſerved the ſecrecy, but deſtroyed the deſign; for, though they had a very fortunate paſſage to New-England, much better than the fleet could ordinarily expect, yet they were ſo long detained there, that the proper ſeaſon, it was ſaid, was over, before any conſiderable quantity of proviſions could be procured; and the whole was ſo ſhort of what they wanted, that, when they failed in the deſign againſt Quebec, they were not able to ſucceed in the under-plot againſt Placentia, in which otherwiſe they apprehended no difficulty[w].

[t] The regiments of Kirk, Hill, Clayton, Wadniſs, Seymour, Deſannay, and a battalion of marines commanded by colonel Charles Churchill.

[u] The Edgar, Monmouth, Devonſhire, Humber, Swiftſure, Kingſton, Sunderland, Montague, and Dunkirk. Thoſe were to be reinforced by other ſhips in the Weſt-Indies.

[w] To all this may be added a groſs impoſition upon the public, in the fitting out of this expedition, which the lord treaſurer Harley himſelf owns, in his brief account of public affairs, laid before her majeſty in June 1714, where he obſerves as follows: 'On the 4th of June 1711, three days after the treaſurer was ſworn, he was ſurprized with a demand of twenty-eight thouſand thirty-ſix pounds and five ſhillings for arms and merchandize, ſaid to be ſent to Canada. When the treaſurer ſcrupled this, Mr. ſecretary St. John and Mr. Moore came to him with much paſſion upon this affair; and, about a fortnight after, the ſecretary of ſtate ſignified the queen's poſitive pleaſure to have that money paid; and, accordingly, her majeſty ſigned a warrant, June 21, and the treaſurer not being able then, with all his precaution, to diſcover further light, the money was paid July the 4th, 1711. Since the return from that expedition, the ſecret is diſcovered, and the treaſurer's ſuſpicion juſtified; for the public was cheated of above twenty thouſand pounds. There is reaſon to be more particular upon this head, becauſe it

The duke of Ormond held a ſeſſion of parliament this ſummer at Dublin, where he was received with great acclamations. It is obſervable, that, during the ſeſſion, the duke, chancellor Phipps, and the majority of the Peers, did, on all occaſions, viſibly favour and countenance the high-party, if not the friends to the Pretender, whilſt the commons ſtrenuouſly aſſerted the revolution-principles, and ſhewed their firm adherence to the Proteſtant ſucceſſion. Of this there were ſeveral inſtances, but none more remarkable than the diſpute between the two houſes, relating to the application of the commons in 1709, to the queen, for five thouſand pounds to build a library for Trinity-College[x]. After the ſeſſion was over, chancellor Phipps (who had been publicly thanked by the clergy, for his defence of the church at Dr. Sacheverel's trial, and for patronizing the clergy on all occaſions) and general Ingoldſby were appointed as lords-juſtices in the duke of Ormond's abſence, who returned to England the latter end of November.

Whilſt the commons of Ireland were ſtrenuouſly aſſerting the revolution-principles, the oppoſite ſpirit of Jacobitiſm diſcovered itſelf in Scotland, encouraged very probably by the late numerous addreſſes in England, aſſerting the ſole Hereditary Right. Upon this preſumption, the ducheſs of Gordon, a Roman-catholic, ſent about the latter end of June to Mr. Robert Bennet, dean of the faculty of advocates, a ſilver medal, with a head on the right ſide, and this legend, 'Cujus eſt *?' and on the reverſe the Britiſh Iſlands, with this motto, 'Reddite'. †' as a preſent to the Faculty. This medal was firſt left in the hands of one of their ſervants, the dean being cautious either to accept it, or place it in the repoſitory of rarities, before he had conſulted ſome of the members of the Faculty, to whom he ſhewed the medal, formally telling them, That her grace the ducheſs of Gordon ſent, as a preſent to them, the medal of king James the Eighth, whom they and the Engliſh called the Pretender; and he hoped, thanks were to be returned to her grace. Mr. Alexander Stevenſon anſwered, That the medal ſhould be returned to her grace, for the receiving it was throwing dirt on the face of the government. He was ſeconded by Mr. Robert Alexander of Black-Houſe, who ſaid, That the receiving of ſuch a medal was owning a right contrary to her majeſty's. Mr. Robert Frazer anſwered, 'That Oliver Cromwell's medal, who deſerved to be hanged, and the arms of the commonwealth of England, had been received; and why not this?' Upon this Mr. Duncan Forbes ſaid, 'It was time enough to receive the medal when the Pretender was hanged:' To whom adhered Mr. Joſeph Hume, of Ninchole; Mr. Hugh Dalrymple, ſon to the preſident; Mr. James Ferguſon, ſon to ſir John Ferguſon of Kirkennel; and ſir James Stuart of Goodtrees, the queen's ſolicitor. Then Mr. Dundaſs of Armiſton roſe up, and made the following ſpeech:

Dean of Faculty,

"Whatever theſe gentlemen may ſay of their loyalty, I think they affront the queen, whom they pretend to honour, in diſgracing her brother, who is not only a prince of the blood, but the firſt thereof; and, if blood can give any right, he is our undoubted ſovereign. I think too they call her majeſty's title in queſtion, which is not our buſineſs to determine. Medals are the documents of hiſtory, to which all hiſtorians refer; and therefore, though I ſhould give king William's ſtamp, with the devil at his right ear, I ſee not how it could be refuſed, ſeeing an hundred years hence it would prove, that ſuch a coin had been in England. But, Dean of Faculty, what needs further ſpeeches? None oppoſe the receiving the medal, and returning thanks to her grace, but a few 'pitiful ſcoundrel vermin, and muſhrooms,' not worthy our notice. Let us therefore proceed to name ſome of our number, to return our hearty thanks to the ducheſs of Gordon." The dean of the Faculty put it to the vote, and it was carried by a majority ſixty-three voices againſt twelve (there being ſeventy-five members preſent) that thanks ſhould be returned to her grace by Mr. Dundaſs, and Mr. Horne of Weſthall. Dundaſs aſking, 'In what terms he ſhould return thanks? The dean, in the name of the whole ſociety, anſwered, That they would approve whatſoever Mr. Dundaſs and Mr. Horne thought convenient. Three days after Dundaſs returned 'the moſt hearty thanks of the Faculty for all her favours, particularly in preſenting them with a medal of their ſovereign lord the king,; hoping, and being confident, that her grace would very ſoon have an opportunity to compliment the faculty with a ſecond medal, ſtruck upon the reſtoration of the king, and royal family; and the finiſhing Rebellion, uſurping Tyranny, and Whiggery'. It was obſerved on this occaſion, that the medal was not new; for the public had an account of its being diſperſed in the Netherlands about a year before; and it was then the general opinion, that it was ſtruck upon the hopes given by the Jacobites in England to their correſpondents in France, that the Britiſh nation was ready to declare for the Pretender; to which the diſtractions occaſioned by Dr. Sacheverel's ſermon, and trial, and the aſſerting the doctrines of hereditary right, and of abſolute paſſive obedience, entirely oppoſite both to the late Revolution, and Proteſtant ſucceſſion, gave ſome air of probability. Nor was this medal ſcarce, but rather common; and, as for its intrinſic value, it did not exceed half a crown; ſo that it could not be worth either a ducheſs's while to preſent it, or the

it is one of the things never to be forgiven the treaſurer; and lord-chancellor Harcourt told him more to that purpoſe, that no government was worth ſerving, that would not let them make thoſe advantages, and get ſuch jobbs. The treaſurer was forced to uſe all his ſkill and credit to keep the houſe of commons from examining this affair laſt parliament.

[x] This application was made by the commons, 'becauſe (as they ſaid) the college had cenſured Forbes for aſperſing the memory of king William, and for their ſteady adherence to the late revolution, and for the encouragement of good literature, and ſound revolution-principles.' The duke of Ormond, in his ſpeech, having taken notice that the queen had complied with this application, the lords, in their addreſs to the queen among other things, ſaid, 'your majeſty has alſo extended your royal favour to the college of Dublin, and at ſuch a juncture, as muſt teſtify to the world that what your majeſty beſtowed was not given to promote thoſe principles upon which it was at firſt applied for.' The commons incenſed at theſe words came to the following reſolutions: 'That the lords, in this addreſs, have highly infringed the rights, privileges, and liberties of the commons, miſrepreſented her majeſty's gracious condeſcenſion to their humble application, and have unjuſtly inſinuated (to the diſhonour of this houſe) that the principles, for encouragement of which the application was made, were ſuch, as her majeſty diſapproved. That to inſinuate, that the houſe of commons, in their reſolution, intended any other than the late happy Revolution brought about by king William III. of glorious memory, is falſe, ſcandalous, and malicious, highly and moſt unjuſtly reflecting on the loyalty, integrity, and honour of this houſe, and a great breach of the privileges thereof.' And in their addreſs to the queen on this occaſion, they inſerted the following paragraphs:

'Being therefore moſt ſenſibly touched at heart, that our principles and good intentions ſhould be thus injuriouſly repreſented, and out of a deep concern, leſt the addreſs of the lords ſhould have made any impreſſion on her majeſty, to the diſadvantage of her moſt dutiful commons, they took this opportunity to lay before her majeſty theſe their humble and ſincere aſſurances, that the principles, upon which they had applied to her majeſty for her bounty to the college of Dublin, in their addreſs of the firſt of June 1709, were ſuch, as they ſhould never be aſhamed to own, they being no other than thoſe, to which they owed the preſervation of their religion, lives, liberties, and properties, and more eſpecially, that ineſtimable bleſſing of her majeſty's happy reign over them. That the ſound revolution-principles, mentioned in their addreſs, neither had, nor can have, in the true conſtruction of the words, any other meaning, than what happened to the late happy Revolution; and that they had the utmoſt abhorrence and deteſtation of all principles, that tend to any other revolution, or to weaken her majeſty's parliamentary right.'

The commons, hearing the lords intended to vindicate their addreſs, voted, 'That whoever ſhall, by ſpeaking, writing, or printing, arraign or condemn the principles of our late happy Revolution in 1688, is an enemy to our moſt gracious queen, to our conſtitution in church and ſtate, to the Hanover ſucceſſion, and is a friend to the Pretender.' The next day, the lords agreed on an addreſs to the queen, wherein they complained of the high indignities offered to them by the commons, in theſe terms: 'How far the commons have made good their profeſſions to your majeſty of unanimity; how far they have purſued that temper recommended to them by your majeſty, we ſhall not determine: Yet, ſurely, had thoſe profeſſions been ſincere, they would not (without any conference demanded, or any opportunity given to us to explain ourſelves, if we had been miſtaken) have uſed us in a manner wholly unknown to former parliaments, and in language more indecent, more opprobrious, than was given by another houſe of commons, when they voted the houſe of lords uſeleſs. However, your majeſty might juſtly approve the conduct of the college of Dublin in the late Revolution, we did, and do ſtill humbly conceive, that your majeſty did not extend your bounty to them, to promote (in general) revolution-principles, principles, which, as explained by the pamphlets and libels publicly avowed by men of factious and ſeditious tempers, and particularly, by a ſermon preached on the 30th of January, dedicated to this very houſe of commons, without cenſure or animadverſion, do, in a great meaſure, maintain and juſtify the execrable murder of king Charles I. your royal grandfather of bleſſed memory, and on which may be founded any rebellion againſt your majeſty or your ſucceſſors. Nor have the commons, in our apprehenſion, vindicated themſelves or their vote, by ſaying, 'That the ſound revolution-principles, mentioned in their addreſs, neither had, nor can have, in the true conſtruction of the words, any other meaning than what related to the late happy Revolution. For, however they may take upon themſelves beſt to know their own meaning, yet we think it hard to deny us the right of judging, as well as they, of the true conſtruction of the words; and we do take the liberty to ſay, That, the commons having, in that vote, maintained the ſteady adherence of the provoſt and fellows of the college to the late Revolution, as one conſideration of their application for the five thouſand pounds ſince granted by your majeſty, the ſubſequent motive mentioned in that vote, viz. for the encouragement of ſound revolution-principles, cannot, in good reaſon or grammar, be referred to the late Revolution, ſince adherence to the late Revolution was a diſtinct motive of itſelf; and it is the known nature of principles, to be as well the rule and guide of future as of paſt actions.'

Moreover, the houſe of lords, at the ſolicitation of the biſhops, did, the ſame day, agree to a repreſentation and addreſs againſt the Diſſenters, wherein they ſuggeſted, 'That they had been enabled to propagate their ſchiſm, and undermine the church, by the miſapplying her majeſty's bounty to them of twelve hundred a year: And, therefore, they ſubmitted it to her, whether ſhe would put a ſtop to theſe growing evils, by withdrawing that bounty from them.' But the queen did not think fit to do ſo.

* 'Whoſe is it?' † 'Reſtore'.

faculty's to receive it, on the account of its being either new, or ſcarce, or valuable. And, if the advocates deſigned it only as a curioſity, they might have eaſily procured it, and placed it among their collection, without formality and noiſe. But the ducheſs's preſenting it, and ſome of the advocates receiving it with ſolemnity, and endeavouring to make it the act of the Faculty, by returning thanks to the ducheſs in the name of the whole ſociety, with ſo much oſtentation, was certainly a public and treaſonable affront to her majeſty, a tacit arraignment of her title, and a ſtriking at the ſettlement in the houſe of Hanover. Nor is it to be doubted, that the deſign of the Jacobites was to give reputation to their cauſe, by engaging ſo many gentlemen of the long-robe to eſpouſe it, as the readieſt way to bring the common people into their meaſures; for, as theſe are generally led by example, they would be apt to conclude, that there could be no danger in following the pattern ſet them by thoſe, who, of all men, ought beſt to underſtand the laws and conſtitution of their country. The timing of this tranſaction was likewiſe judged very remarkable; for it was ſoon after the aſſembly of the kirk of Scotland had publicly declared themſelves for the Proteſtant ſucceſſion in the houſe of Hanover; and their ſenſe being juſtly taken for that of the bulk of the Proteſtants in Scotland, whom they repreſent in an eccleſiaſtical capacity, it ſeemed, the Jacobite party there thought it neceſſary to balance them by the ſenſe of the miniſters of law and juſtice in that country. This happened alſo immediately after her majeſty had declared in her ſpeech at the cloſe of the laſt ſeſſion of parliament, "That it was needleſs for her to repeat the aſſurances of her earneſt concern for the ſucceſſion of the houſe of Hanover." From whence it may be concluded, that, the Jacobites being ſenſible of the injury this declaration had done their cauſe, they might think, that the only way to retrieve it was by procuring ſo many lawyers to declare for them. And, in the laſt place, this was done at a time, when the armies were in the field, and the Pretender reported to be gone from St. Germain's, in order to embark in ſome port of France on the ocean; which might raiſe a well-grounded ſuſpicion, that this was deſigned to favour a ſecond invaſion; the rather, becauſe Dundaſs, in his compliment to the ducheſs of Gordon, did not ſcruple to inſinuate 'a ſpeedy reſtoration of the king, and the royal family'.

Sir David Dalrymple, the lord advocate, gave an account of this proceeding to the duke of Queenſberry, who dying about this time, the information was laid before the queen by one of the other ſecretaries; and the caſe was ſo flagrant, that there was no avoiding to ſend the lord advocate orders to inquire into it. Upon which the Faculty thought fit to diſown Dundaſs, Horne, and the other advocate, in their addreſs concerning the medal, as done by a party at an occaſional meeting, and not by general conſent, declaring by a ſolemn act their affection to the queen and her government, and the Proteſtant ſucceſſion, and their deteſtation of all practices tending to give any encouragement to the Pretender.

It was for ſome time matter of doubt, whether the government would be ſatisfied with this act of the Faculty. But the court thought fit to make no further inquiry into that affair. This lenity imboldened Dundaſs to write a vindication more treaſonable, if poſſible, than their proceedings about the medal: But, before the publication, the printer carried the copy of it to the lord provoſt of Edinburgh, who communicated it to ſir James Stuart, and he took care that the queen and council ſhould be informed of it: Upon which the paper was intirely ſuppreſſed. And monſieur de Kreyenberg, reſident from the elector of Hanover, having, by expreſs orders, preſented a memorial, for the proſecution of Dundaſs and his aſſociates: The government thought proper to remove ſir David Dalrymple from his office of lord advocate, on pretence he had been too remiſs in proſecuting the Scots Medaliſts, and reinſtated ſir James Stuart in that poſt, on account of his zeal in ſuppreſſing of Dundaſs's vindication. Though this gave ſome ſatisfaction to the friends of the Proteſtant ſucceſſion; yet it is obſervable, that ſir David Dalrymple was ſo far from being an enemy to it, that, (as his particular acquaintance affirmed) he would have proſecuted the Medaliſts with greater ſeverity than any whatever, had he not received ſecret inſtructions from a great man at court not to ſtir in the affair [y].

All this while the miniſters in England uſed all poſſible means to ſtrengthen themſelves, and weaken their enemies, by advancing to honours and employments, ſuch perſons as they thought inclined to carry on their new meaſures. The lord Raby was created viſcount and earl of Strafford. He was the ſurviving head of the family of Wentworth-Woodhouſe in Yorkſhire, but by a diſpute between his father, and the late earl of Strafford, cut off from the eſtate. He was recalled from his long embaſſy in Pruſſia, and ſent ambaſſador to Holland. The lord Dartmouth was made viſcount Lewiſham, and earl of Dartmouth; the lord Ferrers, earl Ferrers; ſir Simon Harcourt, baron of Stanton-Harcourt; the earl of Orrery, baron Boyle of Marſton; the duke of Hamilton, duke of Brandon, but, a caveat being entered againſt that patent, a ſtop was put to it for the preſent.

The earl of Winchelſea was placed at the head of the board of trade; earl Pawlet was made ſteward of the houſhold, in the room of the duke of Buckingham, who was made preſident of the council upon the death of the earl of Rocheſter. Sir George Byng was declared admiral of the white. Alderman Caſs, was elected one of the ſheriffs of London, who in the time of the aſſaſſination-plot, harboured ſir John Freind, in his houſe, where he was apprehended. The lord Clermont, and his brother, captain Middleton, ſons to the earl of Middleton, who were taken aboard the Saliſbury, in the intended invaſion of Scotland, were admitted to bail after three years impriſonment.

In July the duke of Newcaſtle died, whoſe death is ſaid to be occaſioned by a fall from his horſe as he was hunting. He was the richeſt ſubject that had been in England for ſome ages, and had an eſtate of above forty thouſand pounds a year, which he was much ſet upon increaſing. The office of privy-ſeal being vacant by his death, it was reſolved, to give it to the earl of Jerſey. As this earl had ſome correſpondence in Paris and St. Germain's, the conduct of the private negotiation of peace was truſted to him, by the lord-treaſurer Harley, who therefore made him privy-ſeal, but the earl died ſuddenly the very day that office was given him. Upon his deceaſe it was conferred on Dr. Robinſon, biſhop of Briſtol, who was deſigned to be the plenipotentiary in the treaty that was now projecting, There having been a warm competition between the duke of Hamilton and the earl of Marr for the place of ſecretary of ſtate for North-Britain, vacant by the death of the duke of Queenſberry, it was thought fit to ſuppreſs that place.

In the mean time thoſe at the helm carried on the negotiation of peace, which they had clandeſtinely entered into with ſome agents of France, even before the old miniſters were removed. To this purpoſe Mr. St. John, and, as ſome affirmed, Mr. Harley himſelf, had ſeveral private meetings with the ſieur Gaultier, an obſcure French prieſt, who, for ſome time, was protected by count Gallas, the Imperial miniſter, and ſuffered to ſay maſs in his chapel, and who being afterwards employed in London by count Tallard, to receive and forward his letters between Paris and Nottingham, began to be taken notice of, and aſſumed the title of Abbot. It was the opinion of many, that, when the lord-treaſurer Harley formed the South-Sea project, he had verbal aſſurances given him, that France and Spain would grant to that company, either ſome ſettlement, or, at leaſt, a free trade in the Spaniſh Weſt-Indies, provided a peace was concluded, by which king Philip ſhould remain in poſſeſſion of the monarchy of Spain. Theſe aſſurances were ſufficient to engage the treaſurer, who ſaw the load, that the carrying on the war muſt bring upon him, and therefore he reſolved to ſtrike up a peace as ſoon as poſſible.

On the other hand, the emiſſaries of France gave out every where, that a ſecret negotiation of peace was on foot: And [y] Nor were the Jacobites leſs buſy in England; for, while theſe things paſſed in Scotland, they were very induſtrious in diſperſing clandeſtinely a printed paper, intitled, 'An oath to an Invader, and abjuring the Invaded, diſſected and examined'; containing eleven queries, levelled againſt the Revolution and the oath of Abjuration, now adminiſtered in Great-Britain, which was printed at the end of that paper. About that time, likewiſe, a news-paper took notice of a paragraph inſerted in a written poſtſcript to the Poſt-Boy, of the 5th of July 1711, ſent to Dick's coffee-houſe in Dublin, and (as may well be ſuppoſed) to many other places, which was as follows: We are informed, that Mr. White, alias Leſley, is gone to Swiſſerland, in order, if he can, to convert a certain young Gentleman, and bring him over from Popery to Proteſtantiſm. If he ſucceed, it is hoped, that there will be no experiment tried hereafter to run the hazard of making uſe of a Come-over: For thoſe ſort of gentlemen ought no more to be truſted, than a ſtaunch Whig ſhould, although he ſwears, that he ſhall be for the Church and Monarchy; except thoſe, who have been ſenſible of their errors, and, ſince their converſion, have merited the eſteem of all honeſt men." This paragraph was founded upon a report, that the Pretender was, about that time, preparing to go for Swiſſerland; but he only went to the French army in Dauphiné, and having ſtaid there a few days, and conferred with the duke of Berwick and the other generals, he took a journey through Provence, Languedoc, and Guienne, the three fineſt provinces in France, and ſo returned to his reſidence at St. Germain's.

the French court was not wanting to cheriſh and improve the eager diſpoſitions towards a peace, which they found in the new Britiſh miniſters. Accordingly Torcy tranſmitted into England ſome propoſitions, ſigned by himſelf, April 22d. N. S. with a remarkable preamble, importing, 'That, as it was not doubted but the (French) king was in a condition to maintain the war with glory, ſo it would not be eſteemed a ſign of weakneſs, that his majeſty broke the ſilence he had kept ſince the ſeparation of the conferences at Gertruydenberg; and that, before the opening of the campaign, he gave ſtill new proofs of the deſire, that he had always preſerved, to procure the re-eſtabliſhment of the repoſe of Europe. But that, after the experience he had made of the ſentiments of thoſe, who now governed the republic of Holland, and of their endeavours to render the negotiations fruitleſs, he was willing to addreſs to the Engliſh nation the propoſitions he thought fit to make to end the war; and that, with this view, the king offered to treat of peace on the baſis of the following conditions: 1. That the Engliſh ſhould have real ſecurities to exerciſe their commerce in Spain, to the Indies, and in the ports of the Mediterranean. 2. That a barrier ſhould be formed in the Low-Countries for the ſecurity of the republic of Holland, and to the good liking of the Dutch. 3. That reaſonable means ſhould be ſought out to ſatisfy the allies of England and Holland. 4. That as the good eſtate of the affairs of the king of Spain furniſhed new expedients to end the differences touching that monarchy, endeavours ſhould be uſed to ſurmount the difficulties raiſed on this occaſion. 5. That the conferences to treat of peace ſhould be immediately opened; and that the king's plenipotentiaries ſhould either treat with thoſe of England and Holland alone, or jointly with thoſe of their allies, at the choice of England. 6. And that his majeſty propoſed, the cities of Aix-la-Chapelle and Liege for the place of treaty, referring it to England to chuſe one of thoſe two cities'.

Theſe propoſitions Mr. Secretary St. John tranſmitted to the lord Raby, the queen's ambaſſador at the Hague, with orders to communicate them to the penſionary, and to aſſure that miniſter, 'that the queen was reſolved in making peace, as in making war, to act in perfect concert with the States; and deſired that the ſecret might be kept among as few as poſſible. He confeſſed, that the terms of the ſeveral propoſitions were very general; that there was an air of complaiſance ſhewn to England, and the contrary to Holland, which might be of ill conſequence, but could be of none, as long as the queen and States took care to underſtand each other, and to act with as little reſerve as became two powers ſo nearly allied in intereſt; and he deſired the penſionary to be aſſured, that this rule ſhould on the part of England be inviolably obſerved.'

In anſwer to theſe orders, the lord Raby acquainted Mr. St. John, That the penſionary had, with thoſe of the States, who had been formerly employed in the negotiations of peace, conſidered Torcy's propoſitions, and the obliging manner in which her majeſty was pleaſed to communicate them: that they thanked her majeſty for her confidence in them; and aſſured her, that their's was reciprocal, and that, as her majeſty had promiſed, ſhe would make no ſtep towards a peace, but in concert with them, they deſired ſhe might be aſſured of the ſame on their part, and that they would make no ſtep in that, or any other kind of negotiation, which regarded the mutual intereſt of both nations, but in communication and concert with her majeſty. That they urged the neceſſity of an intire confidence one with the other at this critical juncture; and declared themſelves weary of the war, which they endeavoured to conceal from the enemy, leſt he ſhould make his advantage by it; and that they were ready to join in any meaſures which her majeſty ſhould think proper, to obtain a good peace: but that they looked upon theſe propoſitions as yet in the ſame manner as the Secretary did, to be very dark and general, and deſigned to create jealouſies between her majeſty, that republic, and the allies: But they depended upon her majeſty's juſtice and prudence, to prevent any ſuch ill effect; and hoped ſhe would make the French explain more particularly the ſeveral points contained in them.' But, notwithſtanding theſe mutual aſſurances, there was not the leaſt communication to the ſtates of the negotiations which were carrying on for above five months together, betwixt England and France, till after the ſpecial preliminaries, and the ſeven general ones were ſigned and ſent to them. In the mean time the lord Raby, not being as yet let into the ſecret, freely declared in a letter, 'That he thought it adviſeable and neceſſary to go open with the ſtates in this matter of the propoſitions; and in another, acquainted the ſecretary, that all the letters from France agreed, that all the hopes the French had, was to ſow jealouſies among the allies.' And in a third repeats his advice, 'That we muſt act cautiouſly with the States, that they might have no reaſon to accuſe us for taking the leaſt meaſures without them.' But it was not long before Mr. St. John prepared him to have other ſentiments of the manner of carrying on this negotiation, and in a letter acquainted him, 'That it was her majeſty's pleaſure, he ſhould make all poſſible haſte to come over, ſince her ſervice might better diſpenſe with his abſence, at this point of time, than it would perhaps do at another; and ſince they muſt now expect to have very ſoon upon the tapis many intrigues, concerning which the queen thought it expedient, that he ſhould confer with the miniſters in England; her majeſty deſigned, upon his arrival, to give him the promotion in the peerage, which he had deſired.' The ſecretary then frankly told him, 'That Great-Britain had gone ſo much too far in weaving her intereſt into that of the continent, that it would prove no eaſy taſk to diſentangle our affairs, without tearing or rending.' The lord Raby took the hint and aſſured Mr. St. John, that he would venture any thing, and undertake any thing to ſerve the queen: That the ſecretary might venture boldly to truſt him with the real intentions, and be aſſured that he would not make further uſe of them, than according to his inſtructions. He told the ſecretary likewiſe, that if the thing was actually gone no further than it appeared, and France had not yet explained; and, he had a mind, that he ſhould come over for the queen's ſervice, he was ready to come in a yacht, frigate, packet-boat, or any way; and concluded, in ſhort, that the ſecretary might diſpoſe of him as he pleaſed, for all his deſire was to ſerve her majeſty to her ſatisfaction, and he ſhould never grudge any danger and pains.' This voluntary and frank declaration, he deſired in a particular manner, might, with his humble compliments, be communicated to the duke of Shrewſbury and Mr. Harley.

All tranſactions betwixt England and France during this time, except two or three papers, are intirely ſuppreſſed, which, in the earl of Strafford's inſtructions of October the 1ſt, 1711, are ſaid to have been carried on by papers ſent backward and forward, and much time ſpent therein. However, the Engliſh miniſters ſent over privately to France one of their agents, Mr. Prior; but though the ſubject and ſucceſs of his clandeſtine negotiations were for ſome time kept ſecret, yet his journey could not. For having firſt gone into Kent, and thence into Suffolk to give a viſit to his friend Sir Thomas Hanmer, and ſo into France; upon his return from thence, about the beginning of Auguſt in a ſmall veſſel, that ſet him aſhore at Deal, going under a borrowed name, and not producing his paſs, he was diſcovered, and ſtopped by the cuſtom-houſe officers, till he was releaſed by orders from above. This adventure being noiſed abroad, count Gallas, the Imperial miniſter, thought it his duty to expoſtulate about it with the earl of Oxford, who told him, 'That he had no reaſon to be alarmed, for the queen would never make a peace derogatory from her engagements with her allies.' On the other hand, in order to palliate the clandeſtine negotiation between Great-Britain and France, which was no longer a myſtery, and to feel the pulſe of the nation about a peace, the agents of the Britiſh miniſters publiſhed a pamphlet, intitled, 'A new Journey to Paris: together with ſome ſecret Tranſactions between the French King and an Engliſh Gentleman'[z]. This account, under the fictitious name of Mr. Du Baudrier, was ſuppoſed by ſome to be written by Daniel De Foe, and by others aſcribed to Jonathan Swift, who had for ſome years before attached himſelf to the Whig-party, but, being diſappointed in his hopes of preferment, and particularly of being chaplain to the earl of [z] The author of this piece acquaints his friend, 'That about two months before the French king, reſolving once more to give peace to Europe, offered the court of England, to ſend a miniſter as far as Boulogne, who ſhould be there met by ſome perſons from England, to treat the overtures of a peace. That upon notice, that this was agreed to, the king diſpatched a perſon, who went by the name of monſieur de la Baſtide, to Boulogne, where he took lodgings at one Mr. des Marais, a ſilk-merchant married to an Engliſh woman, who formerly waited on the ladies of the earls of Portland and Jerſey, when ambaſſadors there in the time of king William. That, on the 14th of July, N. S. a perſon, who was afterwards known to be Mr. Prior, coming directly to the door, and inquiring for monſieur de la Baſtide (the name and place having been before concerted) was immediately ſhewn to monſieur ——, where they were ſhut up for three hours without any refreſhment, though Mr. Prior had rode poſt from Calais that day, in a great deal of rain. That, the next morning, the author of this account, being recommended to Mr. Prior by monſieur des Marais, was admitted to wait on him in the capacity both of a ſecretary and a valet de chambre; after which, he learned further particulars of Mr. Prior's journey to Boulogne. That it was

Wharton, when he was made lord-lieutenant of Ireland, went over to the Tories upon the change of the miniſtry in 1710, and with Mr. Prior, Dr. Freind, Mr. Oldſworth, and ſome others, was employed in writing a weekly paper, called the Examiner, in defence of the new miniſtry. Mr. Prior was inſtructed to communicate to the court of France ſome private propoſitions dated July the 1ſt, importing in ſubſtance, 'That Great-Britain would make no peace, but what ſhould be to the ſatisfaction of all her allies, according to their agreements and treaties: That the trade of Holland ſhould be reſtored, and the Dutch have a barrier, as well as the emperor and duke of Savoy, for their ſecurity. That care ſhould be taken to keep the balance in Italy; and that the crowns of France and Spain ſhould never be united. In relation to Great-Britain, that our commerce ſhould be ſettled to the ſatisfaction of the Britiſh ſubjects: The government to be acknowledged in France, as now ſettled in Great-Britain: Dunkirk to be demoliſhed: The Aſſiento to be enjoyed by Great-Britain, after the peace, as the French had it at preſent: Newfoundland to be entirely given up to the Engliſh; but the trade of Hudſon's Bay to be continued in the hands of the French and Engliſh; and all things in America to remain in the ſtate they ſhould be found in at the concluſion of the peace. That all advantages of trade, granted to the French by the Spaniards ſhould be equally granted to the Britiſh ſubjects: And, in the laſt place, that the ſecret ſhould be inviolably kept, till allowed to be divulged by the mutual conſent of both parties concerned'. With theſe propoſitions Mr. Prior went to France in the beginning of July; had a power ſigned by the queen; was ordered to return immediately, if the French ſtarted any difficulties, and was particularly directed to ſee, if they had full powers from Spain. The French, not finding him ſufficiently impowered to treat, were cautious of diſcloſing their thoughts to him; for, upon his arrival in France, Torcy, in a letter to Mr. St. John, told him, 'That he ſaw with great pleaſure Mr. Prior return, after an interval of ſo many years: That he could have wiſhed, he had had greater liberty to employ thoſe talents, which he was perſuaded he would have made a good uſe of; but that he hoped monſieur Meſnager would ſupply what he could not do'. Accordingly, Meſnager, deputy of the council of commerce in France, accompanied by another gentleman (ſaid to be the abbé du Bois) attended Mr. Prior into England, and (being veſted with full powers to treat, conclude, and ſign with ſuch miniſters, as ſhould be authorized in due form, not by Britain only, but by any of the princes and eſtates then in war with France) he had frequent conferences with the queen's miniſters, particularly the lord-treaſurer, Mr. St. John, the duke of Shrewſbury, and the lord Dartmouth. At one of their meetings, which was held at Mr. Prior's houſe, by order of the lords of the committee of council, and unknown to the queen, then at Windſor, Meſnager delivered to theſe four Britiſh miniſters the French king's anſwer to the demands laſt ſent over by England; which, according to Mr. St. John's letter to the queen of the 20th of September, complied with every article, except the eighth, relating to North America. He added, 'They found, however, that they ſhould be able to compound this point in the manner, which her majeſty, ſome time before, reſolved to paſs it in, provided France gave her ſatisfaction upon the ſeventh article, as ſhe had now entirely done. That the propoſitions to be ſent to Holland, as the foundation of a general treaty, they had likewiſe received from him; and that, which was thought moſt liable to exception, had been very much mended. That, my lord-treaſurer having, however, propoſed ſome further alterations, in order to make the whole more palatable abroad, and monſieur Meſnager ſeemingly inclined to agree to them, the lords of the council were to conſider of them the next morning. That, this being the preſent ſituation of the treaty, all her ſervants were unanimouſly of opinion, that a warrant and full powers ſhould that night be tranſmitted to her majeſty, in order to paſs the great ſeal the next morning: and that Mr. Prior ſhould be added to thoſe impowered to ſign; becauſe he, having perſonally treated with monſieur de Torcy, was the beſt witneſs they could produce of the ſenſe, in which the general preliminary engagements were entered into. Beſides which, as he was the beſt verſed in matters of trade of all her majeſty's miniſters truſted in this ſecret, if ſhe thought fit to employ him in the future treaty of commerce, it would be of conſequence, that he had been a party concerned in that convention, which muſt be the rule of that treaty.' He concluded, "That the reſt of the plenipotentiaries were all thoſe, who had the honour to ſit in her majeſty's cabinet council;" namely, the earl of Oxford, the duke of Buckingham, the biſhop of Briſtol, the duke of Shrewſbury, earl Pawlet, the earl of Dartmouth, and Mr. Secretary St. John. But, though the warrant, antedated three days, was ſigned by the queen, directing the lord-keeper to affix the great-ſeal to an inſtrument thereto annexed, meaning the full powers; yet moſt of thoſe, who ſo readily concurred in treating with the miniſter of France, declined becoming parties, when the treaty was to be concluded; and ſo the ſpecial preliminaries between Great-Britain and France, ſigned by Meſnager, on the 27th of September, were accepted and ſigned only by the earl of Dartmouth and Mr. Secretary St. John, by virtue of a warrant directed to them two only, and ſigned by the

was reported, that, ſome time before the peace of Ryſwick, king William did diſpatch this very gentleman to Paris upon the ſame account for which he now came. That having received his inſtructions from the Engliſh court, under pretence of taking a ſhort journey of pleaſure, and viſiting Sir Thomas Hanmer in the county of Suffolk, he left his houſe on Sunday night, the 11th of July, N. S. taking none of his ſervants with him. That Mr. M—e, who had already prepared a bark on the coaſt of Dover, took Mr. Prior diſguiſed into his chariot. That they lay, on Monday night, the 12th of July, at the earl of Jerſey's houſe in Kent; arrived early the next day at Dover; drove directly to the ſhore; and Mr. Prior, having got aboard the veſſel, arrived at Calais about eleven at night; was entertained that night by the governor with great reſpect, and ſet out pretty late next morning for Boulogne, where, for four days, he had two long conferences every day with monſieur de la Baſtide, from ten to one at noon, and from ſix till nine in the evening. That, on the third morning, the writer of this account was ordered to attend early; obſerved Mr. Prior to have a pleaſant countenance; and was commanded to be ready at an hour's warning for a journey to England; but, upon the fourth evening, all this was changed. That, on the 18th, Mr. Prior ſet out with Mr. de la Baſtide, in the latter's chaiſe for Paris, where they arrived, on Tueſday the 20th, and Mr. de la Baſtide conducted Mr. Prior to a private lodging, in the rue St. Louis, prepared for his reception, where the author had orders to ſay, that the gentleman, to whom he belonged, was called monſieur Matthews; but afterwards, at Verſailles, he overheard, that his real name was Mr. Prior. That Mr. de la Baſtide would have had Mr. Matthews to have gone with him next morning to Verſailles, but could not prevail with him to comply. That Mr. de la Baſtide returned the ſame evening from Verſailles, and, after an hour's warm conference, went with Mr. Prior in a chariot and ſix horſes to Verſailles, where they arrived about eleven at night, and alighted at a vineyard adjoining to madam de Maintenon's gardens, whereof Mr. de la Baſtide had the key. That the clock ſtruck two before they came out; and then the coachman drove away to a ſmall houſe at the end of the town, where Mr. de la Baſtide left Mr. Prior with his attendant, who obſerved him to be very thoughtful. That, the next morning, Thurſday the 22d, about ten o'clock, Mr. de la Baſtide came; and the houſe being ſmall, and the writer's apartment divided from Mr. Prior's only by a thin wainſcot, he could eaſily hear what they ſaid, when they raiſed their voice. That, after ſome time, he could hear monſieur de la Baſtide ſay with warmth, "Bon Dieu, &c. good God! Were ever ſuch demands made of a great monarch, unleſs you were at the gates of the metropolis? For the love of God, monſieur Prior, relax ſomething, if your inſtructions will permit you, elſe I ſhall deſpair of any good ſucceſs in our negotiation. Is it not enough, that our king will abandon his grandſon, but he muſt lend his own arm to pull him out of the throne? Why did you not open yourſelf to me at Boulogne? Why are you more inexorable here at Verſailles? You have riſen in your demands, by ſeeing madam Maintenon's deſire for a peace. As able as you are to continue the war, conſider which is to be moſt preferred, the good of your country, or the particular advantage of your General; for he will be the only gainer among your ſubjects." That Mr. Prior ſpoke ſo ſoftly, he could not be well underſtood; but, upon parting, the writer heard him ſay "If you inſiſt ſtill on thoſe difficulties, my next audience will be that of leave." That, three hours after, Mr. de la Baſtide returned with a countenance more compoſed, and dined with Mr. Prior, who entertained him with much pleaſantry; and, among other things, ſaid, "that Monſieur, (meaning the king) if he were a private man, would be the moſt agreeable perſon in the world. Did you mind how obligingly he enquired, whether our famous chevalier Newton was ſtill living? He told me, my good friend, poor Deſpreaux, was dead ſince I was in France, and aſked me after queen Anne's health": Which confirmed the relator in his opinion, that Mr. Prior had an audience the night before of the king. That, about ten that evening, Mr. de la Baſtide came to take Mr. Prior to go to the ſame place they were at before, where they ſtaid about two hours. That, being returned, Mr. Prior appeared ſomewhat diſſatisfied; and, when he came into his chamber, he threw off his hat in ſome paſſion, folded his arms, and walked up and down the room for above an hour, extremely penſive. That, on Friday, the 23d, Mr. de la Baſtide ſtaid the afternoon with Mr. Prior, and, about eight o'clock, they went to the rendezvous; and, in an hour and a half's time, Mr. Prior, with Mr. de la Baſtide, another gentleman and a lady, came into the walk. That, as Mr. Prior was taking his leave of thoſe perſons, the lady ſaid, "Monſieur ſongez vous, &c. Conſider this night on what we have ſaid to you": And that the gentleman ſeconded her, ſaying, "Ouy, ouy, monſieur, ſongez vous en pour la derniere fois: Ay, ay, ſir, conſider for the laſt time". To which monſieur Matthews anſwered briſkly in going out, "Sire, tout ou rien; Sir, all or none, as I have had the honour to tell your majeſty before". That, on Saturday the 24th, Mr. de la Baſtide came to Mr. Prior with a ſmiling countenance, embraced him with much joy, and told him, "Courage, monſieur, no travelling to-day; madam Maintenon will have me once more conduct you to her". That, about ten o'clock at night, they went forth, and returned about one in the morning; and Mr. Prior having taken his leave of Mr. de la Baſtide, ſet out in a chaiſe for Calais, where he arrived on Wedneſday the 28th, in the evening; and, the next morning, the writer of this account took his leave of Mr. Prior, who thanked him in the civileſt manner, and very nobly made him a preſent of fifty piſtoles. And that the ſame day, July the 29th, N. S. Mr. Prior having put to ſea with a fair wind, it was ſuppoſed, in a few hours, he landed in England.

queen. And it is obſervable, that neither this, nor any one paper of powers and inſtructions, throughout this whole affair was counterſigned by any one miniſter, but the queen's name expoſed to cover all, in caſe this clandeſtine negotiation ſhould at laſt prove abortive, and be afterwards enquired into: And, the Engliſh miniſtry having every where extolled the great advantages that were granted to Great-Britain, France made a proper uſe of it, and declared, 'That thoſe articles were an eventual or conditional treaty only; and that the French king would not be obliged to make them good, but in caſe of the ſigning of a general peace.' In this ſenſe Meſnager ſigned them; and by this means the queen was brought into this dilemma, either to go on through all adventures in the meaſures of France, or they had it in their power, by divulging the ſecret, and expoſing ſuch a notorious breach of national faith, to make what advantage they thought fit among the allies; who, from this time, muſt think themſelves diſengaged from the queen, if they could find their own account in ſeparate meaſures. The ſame day, that the ſpecial preliminaries were thus accepted, another ſet of general preliminary articles on the part of France were ſigned by Meſnager; as was alſo a ſeparate article in favour of the duke of Savoy, 'whereby the French king promiſed to reſtore to that prince the territories, which belonged to him at the beginning of the preſent war; and to conſent, that there be alſo yielded to him ſuch other places in Italy, as ſhould be found agreeable to the ſenſe of the treaties between him and his allies'. From this a perfect confidence was eſtabliſhed between the two miniſters of England and France; and, in the letters written in the month of October, a mutual ſincerity was recommended and engaged for, and, that a perfect unanimity ſhould be maintained for accompliſhing the work. The earl of Strafford's inſtructions, in order to his immediate return into Holland, were now preparing, and dated October 1, O. S. and as an early proof of the confidence, which Mr. St. John repoſed in the French miniſter, he acquainted Torcy by his letter of October 2, O. S. that the earl of Strafford was going for Holland, and ſaid, your miniſter, (meaning Meſnager, who was then going back to France, and carried this letter) is fully informed in what the earl of Strafford is to propoſe to the ſtates. Such intelligence of the queen's counſels, which Mr. St. John confeſſed he had given to the miniſters of the queen's enemies, ſeems very extraordinary; eſpecially when it is conſidered, that the earl of Strafford was ſent over to preſs the opening the general conferences, with aſſurances of the greateſt friendſhip and concern for the intereſts of the ſtates on the part of the queen, and by her authority to procure from France juſt ſatisfaction for all her allies; and, in his inſtructions, was likewiſe directed to propoſe to the ſtates a new ſcheme for carrying on the war, and to acquaint them with ſuch reſolutions, as the queen had taken concerning it. In ſhort, every article in his inſtructions was a ſpecimen of the ſincerity with which the Engliſh miniſters intended to treat the allies. He was inſtructed, that it muſt be the moſt careful endeavour and fixed principle of all the confederates to hold faſt together; and this immediately after a ſeparate treaty had been ſigned by Great-Britain; and, if the miniſters of Holland ſhould expreſs any uneaſineſs at their apprehenſions of any ſuch private agreement, he was ordered by evaſive anſwers to avoid giving them ſatisfaction concerning it.

In the mean time Meſnager and his companion took their leave of the Britiſh miniſters, in order to return to France, extremely ſatisfied with their reception here, the queen having honoured Meſnager with a private converſation in her cloſet, and, at his requeſt, granted to Marſhal Tallard (who was ſuppoſed to have laid the foundation of this negotiation) the favour of going to France for four months upon his parole, which ended in his enlargement, without ranſom [a].

Five days after Meſnager's departure, the miniſters thought fit to communicate the preliminary articles, he had ſigned to count Gallas, the emperor's miniſter, who treated them with much ſcorn, and cauſed an Engliſh tranſlation of them to be publiſhed, on the 13th of October, in the Daily Courant, as follows:

Preliminary Articles on the part of France, for effecting a general peace.

The king being willing to contribute all that is in his power, to the re-eſtabliſhing of the general peace, his majeſty declares,

'I. That he will acknowledge the queen of Great-Britain in that quality, as alſo the ſucceſſion of that crown, according to the preſent ſettlement.

II. That he will freely, and bonâ fide, conſent to the taking all juſt and reaſonable meaſures, for hindering that the crowns of France and Spain may ever be united on the head of the ſame prince; his majeſty being perſuaded, that this exceſs of power would be contrary to the good and quiet of Europe.

III. The king's intention is, that all the parties engaged in the preſent war, without excepting any of them, may find their reaſonable ſatisfaction in the treaty of peace, which ſhall be made: That commerce may be re-eſtabliſhed and maintained for the future, to the advantage of Great-Britain, of Holland, and of the other nations, who have been accuſtomed to exerciſe commerce.

IV. As the king will likewiſe maintain exactly the obſervation of the peace, when it ſhall be concluded, and the object, the king propoſes to himſelf, being to ſecure the frontiers of his kingdom, without diſturbing in any manner whatever the neighbouring ſtates, he promiſes to agree, by the treaty which ſhall be made, that the Dutch ſhall be put in poſſeſſion of the fortified places, which ſhall be mentioned, in the Netherlands, to ſerve hereafter for a barrier; which may ſecure the quiet of the republic of Holland againſt any enterprize from the part of France.

V. The king conſents likewiſe, that a ſecure and convenient barrier ſhould be formed for the empire, and for the houſe of Auſtria.

VI. Notwithſtanding Dunkirk coſt the king very great ſums, as well to purchaſe it, as to fortify it; and that it is further neceſſary to be at very conſiderable expence for razing the works, his majeſty is willing however to engage to cauſe them to be demoliſhed, immediately after the concluſion of the peace, on condition, that, for the fortifications of that place, a proper equivalent, that may content him, be given him: And, as England cannot furniſh that equivalent, the diſcuſſion of it ſhall be referred to the conferences to be held for the negotiation of the peace.

VII. When the conferences for the negotiation of the peace ſhall be formed, all the pretenſions of the princes and ſtates, engaged in the preſent war, ſhall be therein diſcuſſed bonâ fide, and amicably: And nothing ſhall be omitted to regulate and terminate them, to the ſatisfaction of all the parties'.

Done at London,
Sept. 27, O. S. 1711. MESNAGER.

Soon after, count Gallas received a meſſage from Mr. ſecretary St. John in the queen's name, 'that he ſhould come no more to court, his behaviour of late not being agreeable to her majeſty, but, that whatever ſhould for the future be preſented to her from his imperial majeſty by the hands of another miniſter, ſhould be very well received'. He was further told, he might go away when he thought fit. This proceeding was ſevere and unuſual; for the common method, when a provocation was given by a public miniſter, was to complain of him to his maſter, and to deſire him to be recalled. It was not then known upon what this was grounded; that which was ſurmiſed was, that Gaultier betrayed him, and diſcovered his ſecret correſpondence, and the advertiſements he ſent the emperor, to give him ill impreſſions of our court; for which Gaultier was ſaid to be rewarded with an abbey in France [b].

[a] It was confidently reported, that Meſnager, by the encouragement he received from Mr. St. John, ſpoke to the queen in favour of the chevalier de St. George, whom he called her Brother; that her majeſty ſeemed not diſpleaſed with the diſcourſe; and that before he left England, he obtained, by means of Mrs. Maſham, a verbal promiſe, that private inſtructions ſhould be ſent to the Britiſh plenipotentiaries, not to inſiſt on the French king's giving up the entereſt of the chevalier entirely. Moreover, a letter from a good hand in Paris, dated November 19, N. S. imported, That upon Meſnager's return thither, he was very ſanguine, and affected publicly to affirm, that the peace was as good as concluded; and that, in particular, he laid great emphaſis on the advantages granted in favour of the prince of Wales; which to ſome people appeared very unlikely, eſpecially when they compared the weight of ſuch an affair with the abilities of monſieur Meſnager, who was never accounted a great genius. Boyer.

[b] It is hard to expreſs, how greatly the generality of people, and even ſome friends of the miniſtry, were ſurprized at the publication of theſe preliminaries, which they looked upon as captious, inſidious, and inſufficient to ground a treaty upon; whereas they had been made to expect ſuch glorious and advantageous terms for all the allies, that the peace would be laſting, ſafe, and honourable. Hereupon, to calm the minds of the people, an addition of ſix other preliminary articles were the ſame day made public in the Poſt-Boy, which were ſaid to be agreed to by France, though they were not yet ſigned, nor communicated to the miniſters of the allies.

Theſe were in ſubſtance:

1. That the kingdoms of Naples, Sicily, Sardinia, and the duchy of Milan, with the fortreſſes of Tuſcany, which belonged to the crown of Spain, and all Flanders, ſhould remain for ever to the houſe of Auſtria.

2. That

The ſeven preliminaries were no ſooner made public, than they were ſeverely animadverted upon in ſeveral pamphlets, and defended in others; and being communicated to the ſtates-general by the earl of Strafford. who arrived at the Hague on the 10th of October, extremely alarmed the ſtates, as not being a ſufficient foundation, upon which a negotiation might be hazarded; they dreaded the fatal conſequences of opening the general conferences, before the articles offered by France were explained, and eſpecially before they knew at all what they were to truſt to for their own barrier, and for their commerce. Theſe conſiderations made them, for ſome time, decline granting the paſſports to the French plenipotentiaries; and, in order to prevail with the queen to have ſome regard to her allies, and particularly in the two great articles of their barrier and commerce, they ſent over monſieur Buys, as envoy extraordinary, to intercede with her to alter her reſolutions: and they made the ſame repreſentations to the earl of Strafford, but all to no purpoſe. For as Mr. St. John declared, in his letter to that earl, of the 9th of October, "Certain it is, that her majeſty has ſo far determined upon her meaſures, thoſe will deceive themſelves, who may imagine by delay or other artifices to break them." And again, November the 2d, to the ſame earl, "The queen will not finally concert a plan for the proſecution of the war with the ſtates, until they join with her in agreeing to open the conferences of peace." And the earl acquaints Mr. St. John, November the 15th, "That he had now told them, her majeſty's order to him was to declare, that ſhe would look upon any delay as a refuſal to comply with her propoſitions." In theſe circumſtances the Dutch at laſt complied to grant the paſſports, and agreed to open the general conferences at the time fixed by the queen, January the 1ſt, 1711-12; and, purſuant to this reſolution of the ſtates, upon the preſſing inſtances of the queen, paſſports for the French plenipotentiaries were ſent to Buys, and delivered to Mr. St. John; and Utretcht was agreed upon to be the place for the general conferences; at which the biſhop of Briſtol lord privy-ſeal, and the earl of Strafford, were appointed plenipotentiaries, whoſe inſtructions were ſettled and ſigned on the 23d of December, 1711. By theſe inſtructions the plenipotentiaries were ordered, "That, if it ſhould be thought proper to begin by the diſpoſition of the Spaniſh monarchy, they were to inſiſt, that the ſecurity and reaſonable ſatisfaction the allies expected, and which his moſt chriſtian majeſty had promiſed, could not be obtained, if Spain and the Weſt-Indies be allotted to any branch of the houſe of Bourbon": So that hitherto the queen thought fit to declare in all public acts, that Spain and the Weſt-Indies ought by no means to be left in the poſſeſſion of the houſe of Bourbon, although in the ſpecial preliminaries, ſigned by the earl of Dartmouth and Mr. St. John, on the 27th of September preceding, the king of France did expreſsly promiſe to make good the 6th article for himſelf and for the king of Spain, purſuant to the powers, which were then in his hands.

Upon the receipt of the preliminaries ſigned by monſieur Meſnager, which count Gallas tranſmitted to the new emperor at Milan, his imperial majeſty wrote a circular letter to the electors, and other princes of the empire, exhorting them to perſiſt in the engagements of the grand alliance; and at the ſame time he wrote another letter to the ſtates to the ſame effect, but, with this additional deſire, "That they would join counſels with him to induce the queen of Great-Britain to reject thoſe propoſitions, and to continue the war; or, if a negotiation with the enemy could not be avoided, that it might be on condition, that the preceding preliminaries, propoſed moſt of them by the enemy himſelf, might remain fixed, and without alteration: And that ſhe would not truſt the immortal glory ſhe had gained, and the certain welfare of her people, to the infidelity of the French promiſes." Before this letter reached the Hague, count de Goes, the imperial plenipotentiary there, preſented a memorial to the ſtates, about the current report, "That the queen of Great-Britain had accepted the ſeven articles propoſed by France, judging them ſufficient for proceeding to a general congreſs of peace; and preſſed their high mightineſſes to conſent thereto, and to grant their paſſports for the ambaſſadors of France. Wherefore he thought it his duty to aſk of their high mightineſſes, Whether this report were true? And in caſe it was, to deſire them not to come to any reſolution, but in conjunction with his imperial majeſty, or his miniſters, conformable to the ſixth article of the grand alliance." The ſtates returned a civil anſwer both to this memorial, and to the emperor's repreſentations; but the letter, which the emperor wrote at the ſame time to the queen of Great-Britain, and which was delivered by monſieur Hoffman, did not meet with the like favourable return.

Many mercenary pens were ſet on work, to juſtify the proceedings of the new miniſtry, and to defame the allies, more particularly the Dutch: This was done with much art, but with no regard to truth, in a pamphlet intitled "The Conduct of the Allies, and of the late Miniſtry:" To which very full anſwers were written, detecting the thread of falſhood that ran through the work [c]. It was now ſaid, England was ſo exhauſted, that it was impoſſible to carry on the war: And, when king Charles was choſen emperor, it was alſo ſaid, he would be too great and too dangerous to all his neighbours, if Spain were joined to the emperor, and to the Hereditary dominions: It was alſo zealouſly, though moſt falſely, infuſed into the minds of the people, that our allies, moſt particularly the Dutch, had impoſed on us, and failed us on many occaſions. The Jacobites did, with the greater joy, entertain this proſpect of peace, becauſe the Dauphin had, in a viſit to St. Germains, congratulated that court upon it; which made them conclude, that it was to have a happy effect, with relation to the Pretender's affairs.

Our court denied this; and ſent the earl Rivers to Hanover, to aſſure the elector, that the queen would take eſpecial care, to have the ſucceſſion to the crown ſecured to his family, by the treaty that was to be opened: This made little impreſſion on that elector; for he ſaw clearly, that, if Spain and the Weſt-Indies were left to king Philip, the French would ſoon become the ſuperior power to all the reſt of Europe; that France would keep Spain in ſubjection, and, by the wealth they would fetch from the Indies, they would give law to all about them, and ſet what king they pleaſed on the throne of England. Earl Rivers ſtaid a few days there, and brought an anſwer from the elector in writing; yet the elector apprehended, not without reaſon, that it might be ſtifled; therefore his miniſter the baron de Bothmar, who came over with the duke of Marlborough on the 18th of November, was ordered to deliver to Mr. St. John a long memorial, repreſenting 'the neceſſity of preſerving a perfect union between the allies, while the peace ſhould be treating; of their giving each other a mutual guaranty upon what ſhould therein be concluded; as alſo the pernicious conſequences, if Spain and the Indies were left to the duke of Anjou [d]. This memorial, a few days after it was delivered, was publiſhed in the Daily Courant of December the 5th, and received with great applauſe by all the well-wiſhers

2. That king Philip ſhould have all Spain, with the iſlands of Majorca and Minorca, and the Weſt-Indies.

3. That, for the ſecurity of the Engliſh and Dutch trade at all times with Spain, king Philip will conſent, that the city of Cadiz ſhall be always garriſoned by the Engliſh, with full liberty to the South-Sea company, to eſtabliſh themſelves on the continent of that country, according to the act of parliament.

4. That the fortifications of Dunkirk ſhall be demoliſhed, and the harbour ruined.

5 That the Dutch may name commiſſioners, to treat with the French commiſſioners about regulating the neceſſary barriers.

6. That ſatisfaction and ſecurity ſhall be given to the reſt of the allies at the general congreſs.

With ſuch fictions, it was thought proper to amuſe the people.

[c] On the 23d of October, being the firſt day of the term, fourteen booksellers, printers, or publiſhers, who had been lately taken up and committed to the cuſtody of ſtate-meſſengers, by warrants from Mr. ſecretary St. John, for printing and publiſhing pamphlets, libels, and ballads, ſome of which were indeed ſevere invectives againſt the miniſtry, and others repreſented as ſuch, appeared at the bar of the court of Queen's-Bench, where Mr. Nicholas Lechmere, counſel for Mr. Darby and Mr. Hurt, two of the printers, pleaded with great zeal againſt the ſeverity of 'committing people, without telling them their crimes; urging, that at this rate the office of a ſecretary of ſtate would become a Spaniſh inquiſition'. But, at the requeſt of the attorney-general, all the ſaid perſons were continued on their recognizances till the laſt day of term.

Mr. Darby and Mr. Hurt were proſecuted on account of a tranſlation of a memorable paſſage in Tacitus about Cecilius Baſſus's deceiving the emperor Nero, with the promiſe of an immenſe but imaginary treaſure, which was inſerted in a paper called the Obſervator, and was deſigned as a reflection on the South-Sea project. Others were proſecuted on more criminal accounts viz. for publiſhing ſeditious ballads, called, 'A Welcome to the Medal, Credit reſtored, Mat's Peace, &c'. Notwithſtanding theſe proſecutions, the pens of both parties were ſtill buſy, the one in exploding, and the other in vindicating, the preſent negotiations of peace.

[d] It concludes thus: There is ground to hope, that, by remaining firmly united, the allies may ſoon oblige France (with the bleſſing of God) to agree to reaſonable conditions; the extreme indigence that crown is in, and the need ſhe has of peace, being very certain, and confirmed from all parts. The Almighty has bleſſed the arms of the queen and of her allies, with ſo many triumphs over their powerful enemy, to the end they may ſecure themſelves by a ſafe and advantageous peace, from all they have to fear from him; and it cannot be His pleaſure, that an enemy ſo exhauſted, and vanquiſhed, as he has been on all occaſions, ſhould at laſt carry his deſigns by this war, and get out of it by a peace glorious to him, to the ruin of the victorious allies, and to the deſtruction of the liberty of all Europe; in acquiring by this peace the power of giving a king to Spain, of impoſing one upon Great-Britain, and of making the validity of the election of the Head of the Empire depend on his approbation.

to the Proteſtant ſucceſſion, who highly commended the elector of Hanover for his ſeaſonable interpoſition in an affair, which ſo nearly concerned him. But, on the other hand, as it directly condemned the preſent ſcheme of peace, it gave no ſmall offence to the miniſtry, whoſe agents openly exclaimed againſt it, ſuggeſting, that it was very impolite in his electoral highneſs, at this juncture, to intermeddle in the affairs of Great-Britain, and ſeem to eſpouſe a party. Others pretended, that this memorial had more the air of an original in Engliſh, than of a tranſlation from the French; and ſo concluded, it was contrived in London by the leading men of the whig-party in concert with Baron Bothmar, who was perſuaded to preſent it: But this was altogether groundleſs, for the memorial was drawn up in form at Hanover, by monſieur Robethon, according to the elector's orders and directions. Nay, ſome were ſo bold, as in a printed 'letter from a ſuppoſed Whig gentleman in the country, to a friend in town,' to queſtion the genuineneſs of that memorial, and to laugh at it as a barefaced impoſture; with other ſcandalous reflections on his electoral highneſs, and his envoy. As for the Britiſh miniſters, they had no manner of regard to that repreſentation; nor would the queen perhaps ever have ſeen it, had it not been ſhewn to her in print by the duke of Somerſet, before it was laid before her by the ſecretary of ſtate; which could not be agreeable either to her or to Mr. St. John, who expoſtulated with the baron de Bothmar about publiſhing his memorial.

The parliament having been prorogued to the 27th of November, a counſel was held on the 26th at St. James's, whether it ſhould be further prorogued, or only adjourned for a few days; and it was at laſt carried for a prorogation till the 7th of December. It ſeems, the Dutch, before they gave their conſent to the opening of a congreſs, were deſirous to ſee firſt how the parliament was inclined, but the earl of Strafford perceiving their deſign, told them plainly, that till they agreed to treat, the ſeſſion would not be opened, ſo they complied: Another reaſon, for proroguing the parliament ſo late in the year, was the diſcovery of a coalition of ſome eminent peers of the high-church party, with thoſe of the contrary ſide, and of their having concerted a repreſentation to be laid before the queen againſt a peace on the foot of the propoſals made by France; which, it was thought, might be prevented, if not by other means, at leaſt by the coming up of the Scotch peers, not above three or four of whom were yet arrived in London [e].

In the mean time, pains were taken on many perſons who were ſuppoſed to be concerned in the intended repreſentation. The lord-treaſurer Harley endeavoured to engage the earl of Nottingham in the court-meaſures, againſt which he had openly declared. And the queen, at the ſame time, cloſeted the dukes of Grafton and St. Albans, the earls of Dorſet and Scarborough, the lords Sommers, Cowper, and particularly the duke of Marlborough, who, upon his coming over, ſpoke plainly to the queen againſt the ſteps that were already made: But he found her ſo poſſeſſed, that what he ſaid made no impreſſion; ſo he deſired to be excuſed from coming to council, ſince he muſt oppoſe the preſent proceedings. All the reſt likewiſe remained firm in their opinion, to the great diſappointment of the new miniſtry [f]. It was therefore propoſed at firſt in a council, on the 5th of December, to cauſe both houſes to adjourn for a few days, during which freſh endeavours might be uſed to defeat the deſign lately formed againſt the preſent ſcheme; but ſome members of the privy-council having repreſented the fears and jealouſies, which ſuch an adjournment, after ſo many prorogations, might create in the minds of the people; and on the other hand, the miniſtry, either hoping, with the aſſiſtance of their Scots friends, to have a majority in the houſe of lords, or, at leaſt, being ſecure of it in that of the commons, it was, after a long debate, finally reſolved, that the parliament ſhould ſit on the day, to which they were firſt prorogued. Accordingly, a committee of the council having met the 6th of December, to conſider of the queen's ſpeech, her majeſty went the next day in a ſedan to the houſe of peers, and ſpoke to both houſes to this effect:

My lords and gentlemen,

"I have called you together, as ſoon as the public affairs would permit; and I am glad I can now tell you, that, notwithſtanding the arts of thoſe, who delight in war, both place and time are appointed, for opening the treaty of a general peace.

"Our allies, eſpecially the ſtates-general, whoſe intereſt I look upon as inſeparable from my own, have, by their ready concurrence, expreſſed their entire confidence in me; and I have no reaſon to doubt, but that my own ſubjects are aſſured of my particular care of them.

"My chief concern is, that the Proteſtant religion, and the laws and liberties of theſe nations, may be continued to you, by ſecuring the ſucceſſion to the crown, as it is limited by parliament to the houſe of Hanover.

"I ſhall endeavour, that after a war, which has coſt ſo much blood and treaſure, you may find your intereſt in trade and commerce improved and enlarged by a peace, with all other advantages, which a tender and affectionate ſovereign can procure for a dutiful and loyal people.

"The princes and ſtates, which have been engaged with us in this war, being by treaties intitled to have their ſeveral intereſts ſecured at a peace, I will not only do my utmoſt to procure every one of them all reaſonable ſatisfaction, but I ſhall unite with them in the ſtricteſt engagements for continuing the alliance, in order to render the general peace ſecure and laſting.

"The beſt way to have this treaty effectual, will be to make early proviſion for the campaign. Therefore, I muſt aſk of you, gentlemen of the houſe of commons, the neceſſary ſupplies for the next year's war; and I do moſt earneſtly recommend to you, to make ſuch diſpatch therein, as may convince our enemies, that, if we cannot obtain a good peace, we are prepared to carry on the war with vigour.

"Whatever you give, will ſtill be in your power to apply; and I doubt not, but, in a little time after the opening of the treaty, we ſhall be able to judge of its event.

My lords and gentlemen,

"As I have had your chearful aſſiſtance for the carrying on this long and chargeable war, ſo I aſſure myſelf that no true Proteſtant, or good ſubject, will envy Britain or Me the glory and ſatisfaction of ending the ſame by a juſt and honourable peace for us and our allies.

"Such a peace will give new life to our foreign trade; and I ſhall do my utmoſt to improve that happy opportunity to encourage our home-manufactures, which will tend to the eaſing my ſubjects in that exceſſive charge they now lie under in maintaining the poor, and to correct and redreſs ſuch abuſes, as may have crept into any part of the adminiſtration during ſo long a war.

"I cannot conclude, without earneſtly recommending to you all unanimity; and that you will carefully avoid every thing which may give occaſion to the enemy to think us a people divided among ourſelves, and conſequently prevent our obtaining that good peace, of which we have ſuch reaſonable hopes, and ſo near a view.

[e] What happened, ſome days before, afforded yet more matter of diſcourſe and ſpeculation. Upon information, that the effigies of the devil, the pope, and the pretender, were to be carried in proceſſion, and (according to the cuſtom of the London mob) burnt on the 17th of November, the anniverſary of queen Elizabeth's inauguration, the earl of Dartmouth iſſued out his warrant, purſuant to which, on the 16th, at twelve at night, ſome of the queen's meſſengers, ſuſtained by a detachment of the foot-guards, ſeized thoſe three figures, with ſeveral others of cardinals, jeſuits, and friars, all finely dreſſed, and carried them from an empty houſe in Drury-lane, where they had been lodged, to the earl of Dartmouth's office in the Cock-pit. And the trained-bands of London and Weſtminſter were immediately aſſembled, and continued under arms three days together. At the ſame time endeavours were uſed to render obnoxious an illuſtrious ſociety of noblemen and gentlemen, called the Kit-Cat-Club, who, for many years, had diſtinguiſhed themſelves by their zeal for the Proteſtant ſucceſſion. For which purpoſe, the mercenary writer of the Poſt-Boy, of the 22d of November, was directed to charge them with "a conſpiracy to raiſe a mob to confront the beſt of queens, and her miniſtry, pull down the houſes of ſeveral honeſt, worthy, loyal, true Engliſh gentlemen, having had money diſtributed amongſt them ſome time before for that purpoſe by G. G. G. S. S. S. W. H. M. [i. e. Grafton, Godolphin, Dr. Garth, Somerſet, Sunderland, Sommers, Wharton, Hallifax, and Montague,] an inſatiable junto, cum multis aliis, who made the ſubſcription, and gave out, that her majeſty was very ill, if not dead, in order to have acted their treaſons with greater freedom". Whereas the lords and gentlemen, who were at the expence of theſe effigies, had no other deſign, than to have them carried in proceſſion, and afterwards burnt with the like ſolemnity, as was remarkably practiſed on the 17th of November, 1679, when the nation was juſtly alarmed with a popiſh plot, and a popiſh ſucceſſor.

Among others (ſays biſhop Burnet, vol. II. p. 582.) the queen ſpoke to myſelf; ſhe ſaid, ſhe hoped biſhops would not be againſt peace: I ſaid, a good peace was what we prayed daily for, but the preliminaries offered by France gave no hopes of ſuch an one; and the truſting to the king of France's faith, after all that paſſed, would ſeem a ſtrange thing. She ſaid, we were not to regard the preliminaries; we ſhould have a peace upon ſuch a bottom, that we ſhould not at all rely on the king of France's word; but we ought to ſuſpend our opinions, till ſhe acquainted us, with the whole matter. I aſked leave to ſpeak my mind plainly; which ſhe granted: I ſaid, any treaty, by which Spain and the Weſt-Indies were left to king Philip, muſt in a little while deliver up all Europe into the hands of France; and, if any ſuch peace ſhould be made, ſhe was betrayed, and we were all ruined; in leſs than three years time, ſhe would be murdered, and the fires would be again raiſed in Smithfield: I purſued this long, till I ſaw ſhe grew uneaſy: ſo I withdrew.

BRITISH
13 JY 60
MUSEUM

London Engrav'd for Harrison's Edition of Rapin.

G. Kneller Pinx.

Goldar Sculp.

Her Grace the Dutchess of Manchester

Pub.d as the Act directs 6th Jan.y 1736

" I pray God direct your conſultations to this end, that, being delivered from the hardſhips of war, you may become a happy and a flouriſhing people".

This ſpeech gave occaſion to many reflections. The arts of thoſe 'who delighted in war', ſeemed to be levelled at the duke of Marlborough, and the preliminaries concerted at the Hague; and her ſaying, that the 'allies expreſſed their entire confidence in her', amazed all thoſe, who knew, that neither the emperor, nor the empire, had agreed to the congreſs, but were oppoſing it with great vehemence; and that even the ſtates-general were far from being cordial or eaſy in the ſteps they had made.

As ſoon as the queen had ended her ſpeech, ſhe retired into a room, and, having taken off her robes, came back incognito to the houſe of peers, both to hear the debates, and, by her preſence, to moderate any heats that might ariſe; which however, was by ſome obſerved to be unuſual on the day the ſovereign opens a ſeſſion of parliament. The earl of Ferrers having made a motion for an addreſs of thanks to the queen for her ſpeech, the earl of Nottingham roſe up, and very copiouſly ſet forth 'the inſufficiency and captiouſneſs of the late preliminaries; made a lively repreſentation of the danger of treating upon ſo precarious a foundation; urged the expreſs engagements, which Great-Britain had entered into with the allies, to reſtore the entire monarchy of Spain to the houſe of Auſtria; and the neceſſity of carrying on the war with vigour, till thoſe engagements were made good': adding, that though he had a numerous family, he would readily contribute half his income towards it, rather than acquieſce in a peace, which he thought unſafe and diſhonourable to his country and all Europe'. He concluded with offering a clauſe to be inſerted in the addreſs of thanks, 'to repreſent to her majeſty, as the humble opinion and advice of the houſe, that no peace could be ſafe or honourable to Great-Britain or Europe, if Spain and the Weſt-Indies were allotted to any branch of the houſe of Bourbon'. The lord Guernſey, brother to the earl of Nottingham, ſaid, 'That ſuch a clauſe was foreign to an addreſs of thanks: that, in all probability, few of the members of the houſe were prepared to ſpeak to it; but that it might be debated at a more convenient time, when, according to cuſtom, the houſe ſhould take into conſideration the ſtate of the nation'. He was ſeconded by the lord North and Grey, and another peer; and the lord treaſurer added, 'That, according to the rules and orders of the houſe, this was not the proper time to debate ſuch a motion'. Upon this the earl of Wharton appealed to the houſe, whether there were any ſuch order? And, the duke of Buckingham, the moſt verſed in the knowledge of parliamentary proceedings, having over-ruled the treaſurer's objection, the earl of Wharton proceeded; ſpoke with great zeal againſt the Preliminary Articles offered by France; and inſiſted upon the neceſſity of inſerting in the addreſs the clauſe offered by the earl of Nottingham. He was ſupported by the earl of Sunderland, who anſwered the objection raiſed by ſome peers of the oppoſite ſide, namely, that they were not prepared to ſpeak to that motion: "What, my lords, ſaid he, is it poſſible, that any member of this illuſtrious houſe ſhould be unprepared to debate an affair, which, for theſe ten years paſt, has been the principal ſubject-matter of our conſultations? Do not we ſit in the ſame houſe? And, are we not the ſame peers, who have conſtantly been of opinion, and have often repreſented to her majeſty, that no ſafe and honourable peace can be made, unleſs Spain and the Weſt-Indies be recovered from the houſe of Bourbon? It is true, I ſee ſome new faces among us: but even that lord, who ſits on the woolpack [meaning the lord-treaſurer] may well remember, that, in the late reign, four lords were impeached for having made a Partition-Treaty". The earl of Angleſey, (who, with the duke of Ormond, was juſt come into the houſe, having that morning travelled above thirty miles in their return from Ireland) repreſented "the neceſſity of eaſing the nation of the burden of this expenſive war, and ſaid, they ought to leave it to her majeſty's wiſdom to conclude a peace, when ſhe thought it convenient for the good of her ſubjects: adding, "that we might have enjoyed that bleſſing ſoon after the battle of Ramillies, if the ſame had not been put off by ſome perſons, whoſe intereſt it was to prolong the war". The duke of Marlborough, who could not but perceive, that this ſuggeſtion was levelled againſt him, made a long and pathetic ſpeech, wherein, among other things, he ſaid, "He thought himſelf happy, in having an opportunity given him of vindicating himſelf on ſo material a point, which his enemies had ſo loudly, and ſo unjuſtly, laid to his charge, before a perſon [meaning the queen, and making a bow towards the place where her majeſty was] who knowing the integrity of his heart, and the uprightneſs of his conduct, would not fail doing him juſtice. That he referred himſelf to the queen, whether, whilſt he had the honour to ſerve her majeſty, as general and plenipotentiary, he had not conſtantly informed her, and her council, of all the propoſals of peace, that had been made; and, had not deſired inſtructions for his conduct on that ſubject? That he could declare with a ſafe conſcience, in the preſence of her majeſty, of that illuſtrious aſſembly, and of that Supreme Being, who is infinitely above all the powers upon earth, and before whom, according to the ordinary courſe of nature, he muſt ſoon appear, to give an account of his actions, that he ever was deſirous of a ſafe, honourable, and laſting peace; and that he was always very far from any deſign of prolonging the war for his own private advantage, as his enemies had moſt falſely inſinuated. That his advanced age, and the many fatigues he had undergone, made him earneſtly wiſh for retirement and repoſe, to think of eternity the remainder of his days; the rather, becauſe he had not the leaſt motive to deſire the continuance of the war, having been ſo generouſly rewarded, and had honours and riches heaped upon him, far beyond his deſert and expectation, both by her majeſty and her parliaments. That he thought himſelf bound to this public acknowledgement to her majeſty and his country, that he ſhould always be ready to ſerve them, if he could but crawl along, to obtain an honourable and laſting peace: but that at the ſame time, he muſt take the liberty to declare, that he could, by no means, give into the meaſures, that had lately been taken to enter into a negotiation of peace with France, upon the foot of the ſeven Preliminary Articles; for he was of the ſame opinion with the reſt of the allies, that the ſafety and liberties of Europe would be in imminent danger, if Spain and the Weſt-Indies were left to the houſe of Bourbon; which, with all humility, and as he thought himſelf in duty bound, he had declared to her majeſty, whom he had the honour to wait on, after his return from Holland: And, therefore, he was for inſerting in the addreſs the clauſe offered by the earl of Nottingham". This ſpeech, delivered with a moſt hearty concern, had the greater weight, as it was ſupported by the lord Cowper, the biſhop of Sarum, the lord Halliſax, and ſome other peers. On the other hand, the lord North and Grey and ſome other officious courtiers ſaid, that, ſince peace and war belonged, as prerogatives to the crown, it was not proper to offer any advice on thoſe matters, until it was aſked: But this was rejected with indignation, ſince it was a conſtant practice, in all ſeſſions of parliament, to offer advices; no prerogative could be above advice; this was the end ſpecified in the writ, by which a parliament was ſummoned; nor was the motion for a delay received. The eyes of all Europe were upon the preſent ſeſſion; and this was a poſt-night: ſo it was fit they ſhould come to a preſent reſolution, in a matter of ſuch importance. This debate (in which the dukes of Shrewſbury and Buckingham were obſerved to ſay little or nothing) having laſted till near ſeven in the evening, the queſtion was put, whether the earl of Nottingham's advice ſhould be part of the addreſs; and, the previous queſtion being firſt put, it was carried by the ſingle vote of that earl; but the main queſtion was carried by ſixty-two againſt fifty-four: ſo this point was gained, though by a ſmall majority.

It was expected, that the court-party would the next day have the majority, by means of the proxies which eight Scots peers had ſent to the duke of Hamilton and the earl of Mar. Wherefore, when the addreſs of the lords was reported to the houſe, by the committee appointed to prepare it, the court tried to get the whole matter to be conteſted over again, pretending, that the debate was not now, upon the matter debated the day before, but only whether they ſhould agree to the draught, prepared by the committee: But that part of it, which contained the advice, was conceived in the very words, in which the vote had paſſed; and it was a ſtanding-rule, that what was once voted, could never again be brought into queſtion, during that ſeſſion. This was ſo ſacred a rule, that many of thoſe, who voted with the court the day before, expreſſed their indignation againſt it, as ſubverting the very conſtitution of parliaments, if things might be thus voted and unvoted again, from day to day: Yet even upon this a diviſion was called for, but, the majority appearing ſo evidently againſt the motion, it was yielded, without counting the houſe. Three days after, the lords waited on the queen with their addreſs, which was as follows:

"We your majeſty's moſt dutiful and loyal ſubjects, the lords ſpiritual and temporal in parliament aſſembled, do, with hearts full of gratitude and loyalty to your ſacred majeſty, beg leave to return your majeſty our moſt humble and hearty thanks and acknowledgments for your majeſty's moſt tender and affectionate care for all your people, expreſſed in your majeſty's moſt gracious ſpeech from the throne, and for imparting to us your majeſty's deſires of ending this preſent war, by a peace advantageous to your ſubjects, and juſt and honourable for your majeſty and all your allies; as alſo for your majeſty's expreſſing ſo particular a regard for the intereſt of the ſtates-general, as inſeparable from your own; and that your majeſty is graciouſly pleaſed to aſſure us, it is your chief concern, that the Proteſtant religion, and the laws and liberties of theſe nations, may be continued to your people, by ſecuring the ſucceſſion to the crown, as it is limited by parliament to the houſe of Hanover; and that your majeſty is pleaſed to ſhew ſo juſt a reſolution to procure a ſatisfaction for all the allies, being by treaties intitled to have their ſeveral intereſts ſecured at a peace, and to unite with them in the ſtricteſt engagements, in order to render the peace ſecure and laſting. And we do beg leave to repreſent it to your majeſty, as the humble opinion and advice of this houſe, that no peace can be ſafe or honourable to Great-Britain or Europe, if Spain and the Weſt-Indies are to be allotted to any part of the houſe of Bourbon".

To which the queen returned this anſwer:

" My lords,

" I take the thanks you give me kindly. I ſhould be very ſorry any one could think I would not do my utmoſt to recover Spain and the Weſt-Indies from the houſe of Bourbon"[f].

The lords returned her thanks for this anſwer: for they underſtood, by 'the doing her utmoſt,' was meant the continuing the war. The court was much troubled to ſee the houſe of lords ſo backward, and both ſides ſtudied to fortify themſelves, by bringing up their friends or by getting their proxies.

The houſe of commons were more complaiſant than that of the lords, for a clauſe being offered to be inſerted in their addreſs of thanks, importing, " That the houſe did not doubt but care would be taken, that Spain and the Weſt-Indies ſhould not be left in the hands of any branch of the houſe of Bourbon, which might endanger the ſafety of her majeſty's perſon and government, the Proteſtant ſucceſſion in the houſe of Hanover, and the liberties of Europe"; after a long debate, this clauſe was rejected by a majority of two hundred and thirty-two voices againſt one hundred and ſix; and ſo the commons, in their addreſs, not only expreſſed their ſatisfaction in what her majeſty had been pleaſed to declare of the juſt and honourable peace, which ſhe had in view; 'but, at the ſame time, aſſured her, that they would uſe their utmoſt endeavours to diſappoint, as well the arts and deſigns of thoſe, who, for private views, might delight in war, as the hopes the enemies might have vainly entertained of receiving advantage from any diviſion among them'. The queen returned for anſwer, 'That this very dutiful addreſs was what ſhe expected from the zeal and loyalty of ſuch an houſe of commons: that ſhe returned them her hearty thanks for the confidence they had in her; and entirely relied upon their aſſurances: and that they might depend upon her affection and care for their intereſts'.

While things paſſed ſmoothly in the houſe of commons, the proceedings in the houſe of peers made a great noiſe, and kept the contending parties in ſuſpence. The duke of Hamilton, one of the ſixteen peers for Scotland, having been created a peer of Great-Britain, by the title of duke of Brandon, notwithſtanding a caveat entered againſt his patent, and now claiming a place in that quality in the houſe of peers, many lords, who apprehended no ſmall danger to the conſtitution, from the admitting into their houſe a greater number of Scots peers, than were agreed to by the act of Union, reſolved to oppoſe his claim. When that affair was brought into the houſe, it was eſpouſed by the court with great zeal, and the queen came to hear the debates. Lawyers were heard for the patent: It was ſaid, the queen's prerogative in conferring honours was clear. All the ſubjects of the united kingdom had likewiſe a capacity of receiving honour. The commons of Scotland had it unqueſtionably; and it ſeemed a ſtrange aſſertion, that the peers of that nation ſhould be the only perſons incapable of receiving honour. By the act of Union the peers of Scotland were, by virtue of that treaty, to have a repreſentation of ſixteen for their whole body: Theſe words, by virtue of that treaty, ſeemed to inſinuate, that, by creation or ſucceſſion, they might be made capable. And in the debate, that followed in the houſe, the Scots lords, who had been of the treaty of Union, affirmed, that theſe words were put in on that deſign. And, upon this, they appealed to the Engliſh lords. This was denied by none of them. It was alſo urged, that the houſe of lords had already judged the matter, when they not only received the duke of Queenſberry upon his being created duke of Dover, but had ſo far affirmed his being a peer of Great-Britain, that upon that account they had denied him the right of voting in the election of the ſixteen peers of Scotland. But, in oppoſition to all this, it was replied, that the prerogative could not operate, when it was barred by an act of parliament: The act of Union had made all the peers of Scotland peers of Great-Britain, as to all intents, except the voting in the houſe of lords, or ſitting in judgment on a peer: And, as to their voting, that was veſted in their repreſentatives, by whom they voted. The queen might give them what titles ſhe pleaſed; but this incapacity of voting, otherwiſe than by theſe ſixteen, being ſettled by law, the prerogative was by that limited as to them. They had indeed admitted the duke of Queenſberry to ſit among them as duke of Dover; but that matter was never brought into debate, and ſo was paſſed over in ſilence; and he was mentioned in their books, upon occaſion of his voting in the choice of the ſixteen peers of Scotland, in terms that were far from determining this; for it was there ſaid, that he, claiming to be duke of Dover, could not vote as a Scots peer. The Scots lords, in arguing for the patent, inſiſted with great vehemence, not without intimations of the diſmal effects, that might follow, if it ſhould go in the negative. The court exerted their whole ſtrength to ſupport the patent. This heightened the zeal of thoſe who oppoſed it; for they apprehended, that, conſidering the dignity and the antiquity of the Scots peers, and the poverty of the greater part of them, the court would always have recourſe to this, as a ſure expedient to have a conſtant majority in the houſe of lords. There was no limitation indeed on the prerogative, as to the creation of new peers; yet theſe were generally men of eſtates, who could not be kept in a conſtant dependence, as ſome of the Scots lords might be. The debate laſted till near eight o'clock in the evening, when the queſtion was put, Whether the twelve judges ſhould be conſulted with? which being carried in the negative by fourteen votes, proxies included, another queſtion was put, Whether Scots peers, created peers of Great-Britain ſince the Union, had a right to ſit in that houſe? which was alſo carried in the negative by a majority of fifty-ſeven voices againſt fifty-two[g].

[f] The ſame day the addreſs was preſented, ſeveral court lords entered their proteſts againſt it; 1. " Becauſe the nature of it was altered, there being no precedent for inſerting a clauſe of advice in an addreſs of thanks. 2. Becauſe they looked upon it as an invaſion of the royal prerogative, in ſo ſudden a manner to declare their opinion in a matter of ſuch importance to the crown, as the making of peace and war."

[g] On this occaſion was entered the following proteſt:

Diſſentient,

1. Becauſe, as we apprehend, by this reſolution, the prerogative of the crown in granting patents of honours, with all privileges depending thereon, to the peers of Great-Britain, who were peers of Scotland at the time of the Union, as well as the right of the duke of Brandon to ſit and vote in parliament, are taken away; and this prerogative of the crown, and right of the duke, depending upon the conſtruction of an act of parliament, though counſel, by order of the houſe, were heard at the bar, and all the judges were ordered to attend at the ſame time, yet the opinion of the judges was not permitted to be aſked touching the conſtruction of the ſaid act of parliament.

2. Becauſe the prerogative of the crown, as we conceive in granting patents of honour, with the privileges depending thereon, ought not, in the conſtruction of any act of parliament, to be taken away, unleſs there be plain and expreſs words to that purpoſe in the ſaid act: and we conceive, there are no ſuch plain and expreſs words for that purpoſe in the act of Union.

3. Becauſe by this reſolution all the peers of Great-Britain, who were peers of Scotland at the time of the Union, are ſuppoſed to be incapable of receiving of any patent of honour from the crown, by virtue whereof they may be intitled to the privileges of ſitting and voting in parliament, and ſitting on the trial of peers; which, we conceive, is repugnant to the fourth article of the Union, which declares the privileges and advantages, which do or may belong to the ſubjects of either kingdom, except where it is otherwiſe expreſsly agreed in thoſe articles, in which, we apprehend, there is no ſuch proviſion.

4. Becauſe the duke of Queenſberry, in all reſpects in the ſame caſe, as the duke of Hamilton, was introduced, ſat, and voted in this houſe, in matters of the higheſt importance, in two ſeveral parliaments, as duke of Dover, by virtue of a patent paſſed ſince the Union; and, in conſequence of ſuch ſitting and voting, his vote in the election of peers of Scotland was rejected; and, as a further conſequence thereof, the marquis of Lothian was removed from his ſeat in this houſe, which he had an undeniable title to, if the duke of Queenſberry's patent, as duke of Dover, had not given him a title to ſit and vote in this houſe.

5. Becauſe, by this reſolution, the peers of Scotland are reduced to a worſe condition in ſome reſpects, than the meaneſt or moſt criminal ſubjects.

6. Becauſe we conceive this reſolution may be conſtrued, to be a violation of the treaty between the two nations.

Winchelſea,	Paulet,
Ormond,	Harcourt,
Balmerino,	O. S. Hume,
Clarendon,	Mar,
Oxford and Mortimer,	Loudun,
Boyle,	Oſborne,
Kelſyth,	Roſeberry,
Rivers,	Ilay,
Blantyres,	Orkney.
Hundſdon,

The queen and the miniſters ſeemed to be much concerned at this, and the Scots were enraged at it. They met together, and ſigned a repreſentation to the queen, complaining of it as a breach of the Union, and a mark of diſgrace put on the whole peerage of Scotland, adding ſolemn promiſes of maintaining her prerogative, either in an united or ſeparate ſtate. This made the miniſters reſolve on another method to let the peers, and indeed the whole world ſee, that they would have that houſe kept in a conſtant dependence on the court, by creating ſuch a number of peers at once, as ſhould give them an unqueſtionable majority.

In the mean time an affair of no leſs importance was brought into the houſe of peers. The Occaſional Conformity Bill, having miſcarried three times, lay dormant for ſeven years, till it was at this time revived by the earl of Nottingham, who told thoſe, with whom he now joined, that he was but one man come over to them, unleſs he could carry a bill to that purpoſe: But, if they would give way to that, he hoped he ſhould be able to bring many to concur with them in other things. They yielded this the more eaſily, becauſe they knew, that the court had offered to the high men in the houſe of commons, to carry any bill, they ſhould deſire in that matter. The earl of Nottingham promiſed to draw it with all poſſible temper. It was thus prepared, that all perſons in places of profit and truſt, and all the common-council-men in corporations, who ſhould be at any meeting for divine worſhip (where there were above ten perſons more than the family) in which the common prayer was not uſed, or where the queen and princeſs Sophia were not prayed for, ſhould, upon conviction, forfeit their place of truſt, or profit, the witneſſes making oath within ten days, and the proſecution being within three months after the offence; and ſuch perſons were to continue incapable of any employment, till they ſhould depoſe, that for a whole year together they had been at no conventicle. The bill likewiſe enacted, that the Toleration ſhould remain inviolable in all time to come; and that, if any perſon ſhould be brought into trouble for not having obſerved the rules that were preſcribed by the act, that firſt granted the Toleration, all ſuch proſecution ſhould ceaſe, upon their taking the oath preſcribed by that act: and a teacher in any one county was by the bill qualified to ſerve in any licenſed meeting in any part of England; and, by another clauſe, all who were concerned in the practice of the law in Scotland, were required to take the abjuration in the month of June next. This bill was brought into the houſe of lords on the 15th of December, and, no oppoſition being made to it, they paſſed it in three days, and ſent it down to the commons, who read it immediately the firſt time, and gave it a ſecond reading the next day; and on the 20th of December, a petition being offered to the houſe in behalf of the Dutch and French Proteſtant churches, praying, they might be excepted from the reſtraints laid by this bill upon Engliſh diſſenting congregations: the petition was rejected. After which the commons in a committee of the whole houſe (which that morning was very thin) made ſeveral amendments to the bill, particularly the addition of a penalty on the offender of forty pounds, which was to be given to the informer. Theſe amendments being immediately reported and agreed to, the bill was ſent back to the peers, who the ſame day ſent down a meſſage to the commons, to acquaint them, they had agreed to theſe amendments [h]. Great reflections were made on the fate of this bill, which had formerly been ſo much conteſted, and was ſo often rejected by the lords, and now went through both houſes in ſo ſilent a manner, without the leaſt oppoſition. Some of the Diſſenters complained much, that they were thus forſaken by their friends, to whom they had truſted; and the court had agents among them, to inflame their reſentments, ſince they were ſacrificed by thoſe, on whom they depended. All the excuſe, that the Whigs made for their eaſineſs in this matter, was, that they gave way to it, to try how far the yielding it might go towards quieting the fears of thoſe, who ſeemed to think, that the church was ſtill in danger till that act paſſed, and thereby to engage theſe to concur with them in thoſe important matters, that might come before them [i].

On the 22d of December, the queen being indiſpoſed, the lord-keeper and the lord-preſident, and other lords, were commiſſioned to paſs the land-tax-bill for four ſhillings in the pound, which was ready for the royal aſſent, with the bill againſt occaſional conformity. After which, the commons adjourned to the 14th of January, which was a long receſs at ſo critical a time.

Before the lords adjourned, a motion was made by the duke of Devonſhire, for leave to bring in a bill, to give the electoral prince of Hanover, as duke of Cambridge, the precedence of all peers; which was granted, and ſo was likely to meet with no oppoſition. The earl of Nottingham moved next, that, before their receſs, they ſhould make an addreſs to the queen, deſiring, 'That her majeſty would be pleaſed to give inſtructions to her plenipotentiaries, to conſult with the miniſters of the allies in Holland, before the opening of the congreſs, that they might concert the neceſſary meaſures to preſerve a ſtrict union amongſt them all, the better to obtain the great end propoſed by her majeſty, for procuring to them all juſt and reaſonable ſatisfaction, and for rendering the peace more ſecure and laſting, which could only be effected by a general guaranty of the terms of the peace to all the allies, and of the Proteſtant ſucceſſion to theſe kingdoms, as ſettled by act of parliament'. All the oppoſition, which the court made to this, was to ſhew, that it was needleſs, ſince it was already ordered; and the lord-treaſurer ſaid, that the lords might, in order to their ſatisfaction, ſend to examine their inſtructions. To this it was anſwered, that the offering ſuch an addreſs would ſatisfy the plenipotentiaries, in executing their inſtructions. The court moved, that theſe words might be put into the addreſs, 'in caſe her majeſty had not already given ſuch orders'; which being agreed to, the addreſs was preſented on the 27th of December, and the lords adjourned no longer than to the 2d of January, which, as well as the addreſs, was no ſmall ſurprize to the queen and her miniſters.

During the receſs it was, that the duke of Marlborough was diſcharged from all his employments. In order to this, all the methods, that malice and envy could invent, were uſed to make him appear criminal. But the diſcoveries made by the commiſſioners for examining the public accounts were made the immediate cauſe of his diſgrace. Sir Solomon Medina, a jew, concerned in the contract for furniſhing bread to the army in Flanders, made a preſent yearly to the duke of Marlborough of between five and ſix thouſand pounds. The general of the ſtates, it ſeems, had the like preſent, as a perquiſite to ſupport his dignity, and to enable him to procure intelligence. The queen ordered ten thouſand pounds a year more to the duke of Marlborough for the ſame ſervice. King William had alſo agreed, that two and a half per cent. ſhould be deducted out of the pay of the foreign troops, which amounted to fifteen thouſand pounds. This the queen had by a warrant appointed the duke of Marlborough to receive, on the ſame account.

The duke having heard, while he was beyond ſea, that the commiſſioners had diſcovered the preſent made him by the jew, ſent them a letter on the 10th of November, N. S. from the Hague, wherein he owned the whole matter to be true, and added, he had applied theſe ſums to the procuring good intelligence, to which, next to the bleſſing of God on the bravery of the troops, their conſtant ſucceſſes were owing. This did not ſatisfy the commiſſioners; but, though no complaints were brought from the army of their not being conſtantly ſupplied with good bread, yet they ſaw here was matter to raiſe a clamour againſt the duke, which they chiefly aimed at. Accordingly the commiſſioners reported theſe things to the houſe of commons on the 21ſt of December, the day before their receſs (which report was referred to the 17th of January) and the next day, purſuant to an order of the houſe, Mr. Shippen, one of the commiſſioners, laid before them: Firſt, the depoſition of Sir Solomon de Medina, knight, proving great ſums of money taken by his grace John duke of Marlborough, Adam Cardonnel, eſquire, his grace's ſecretary, and others, on account of the contracts for ſupplying bread and bread-waggons to her majeſty's forces in the Low-

[h] The Diſſenters (ſays Boyer) being juſtly alarmed at this bill, did, the ſame morning, make application to the earl of Oxford, lord high-treaſurer, humbly beſeeching his lordſhip to uſe his powerful intereſt to prevent the paſſing of it: But though his lordſhip, with moſt of his family, had, for the greateſt part of his life, joined in communion with the Preſbyterians; yet, on this occaſion, he thought fit to ſacrifice his religious principles to his political views; and ſo the Diſſenters were left in the lurch.

[i] Dr. Calamy, in his Hiſtorical Additions, ſays, on this occaſion: Thus, after fifty years excluſion from the public churches, by the act of uniformity, during the one half of which they were expoſed to great rigours and ſeverities, though, during the other half, they have had more liberty, are the poor Diſſenters excluded the ſervice of the ſtate. So far are we from any hopes of a coalition, which has been ſo often talked of, that nothing will do but an entire ſubmiſſion. 'Conſciences truly ſcrupulous' may indeed ſtill have their liberty: But they, that would be capable of any places of profit and truſt, muſt quit the meetings after March 25, 1712; and they, that in all times and changes adhered to the true intereſt of their country, muſt be publicly branded. Perhaps, the time may come, when perſons may have other thoughts of this matter, than while in the heat of action.

Countries. Secondly, captain William Preſton's depoſition about forage in North-Britain. Upon this the duke of Marlborough's letter, which he had written in vindication of himſelf to the commiſſioners, was, by his order or contrivance, publiſhed in the Daily Courant of the 27th of December. This letter having made an impreſſion in his favour on the minds of many perſons, the report of the commiſſioners was, by way of anſwer, printed at large two days after[k], and the next day, the 30th of December, the queen declared in council, 'that, being informed, an information againſt the duke of Marlborough was laid before the houſe of commons, by the commiſſioners of the public accounts, ſhe thought fit to diſmiſs him from all his employments, that the matter might take an impartial examination.' This declaration was entered in the council-books, and the day following it was notified to the duke, by a letter under her own hand, 'that her intention was to reſume all the employments, ſhe had intruſted him with; complaining, at the ſame time, of the treatment ſhe had met with.' This appears from the duke's anſwer, which he ſent by the counteſs of Sunderland, one of his daughters:

Madam,

'I am very ſenſible of the honour your majeſty does me, in diſmiſſing me from your ſervice by a letter of your own hand; though I find by it, that my enemies have been able to prevail with your majeſty to do it in the manner, that is moſt injurious to me. And, if their malice and inveteracy againſt me had not been more powerful with them than the conſideration of your majeſty's honour and juſtice, they would not have influenced you to impute the occaſion of my diſmiſſion to a falſe and malicious inſinuation contrived by themſelves, and made public, when there was no opportunity for me to give in my anſwer; which, they muſt needs be

[k] The ſubſtance of the report, and the duke's letter, were as follow: 'That it appeared by the depoſition of ſir Solomon de Medina, the preſent contractor, and by the accounts of Antonio Alvarez Macharo, who had been contractor before him, that from the year 1702, to the year 1711, both included, the duke of Marlborough had received, upon account of the contracts for bread and bread-waggons, the ſum of ſix hundred and ſixty-four thouſand, eight hundred and fifty-one guilders, and eight ſtivers, which amounted to ſixty-three thouſand, three hundred and nine pounds, three ſhillings, and ſeven-pence. That, ſome time after this evidence was given, they received, by the hands of James Craggs, Eſq; a letter from the duke of Marlborough, deſiring the commiſſioners, That, when they made their report, they would lay ſome facts before the parliament in a true light. That they thought they could not better do him juſtice, than in his own words:

Gentlemen, Hague, Novemb. 10, 1711.

'Having been informed, upon my arrival here yeſterday, that ſir Solomon Medina, had acquainted you with my having received ſeveral ſums of money from him. That it may make the leſs impreſſion upon you, I would loſe no time in letting you know, that this is no more than what has always been allowed as a perquiſite to the general or commander in chief of the army in the Low Countries, both before the revolution and ſince; and I do aſſure you, at the ſame time, that whatever ſums I have received, on that account, have conſtantly been applied for the ſervice of the public, in keeping ſecret correſpondence, and getting intelligence of the enemies motions and deſigns; and it has fallen ſo ſhort, that I take leave to acquaint you with another article, that has been applied to the ſame uſe, and which ariſes from her majeſty's warrant, whereof the incloſed is a copy, though this does not properly relate to the public accounts, being a free-gift from the foreign troops. You will have obſerved, by the ſeveral eſtabliſhments, that, before the late king's death, when the parliament voted forty thouſand men for the quota of England in the Low-Countries, twenty-one thouſand ſix hundred and twelve were to be foreigners, and the reſt Engliſh; for the laſt they gave ten thouſand pounds a year for intelligence, and other contingencies, without account; but his majeſty being ſenſible, by the experience of the laſt war, that this ſum would not any way anſwer that ſervice, and being unwilling to apply for any more to the parliament, he was pleaſed to order, that the foreign troops ſhould contribute two and a half per cent. towards it; and, I being then his ambaſſador and commander in chief abroad, he directed me to propoſe it to them, with an aſſurance, that they ſhould have no other ſtoppage made from their pay: This they readily agreed to, and her majeſty was afterwards pleaſed to confirm it by her warrant, upon my acquainting her with the uſe it was intended for; and it has accordingly been applied from time to time for intelligence and ſecret ſervice, with ſuch ſucceſs, that, next to the bleſſing of God on the bravery of our troops, we may, in a great meaſure, attribute moſt of the advantages of the war in this country to the timely and good advices procured with the help of this money. And now, gentlemen, as I have laid the whole matter very fairly before you, and that I hope you will allow, I have ſerved my queen and country with that zeal and faithfulneſs which becomes an honeſt man, the favour, I am to intreat of you, is, that, when you make your report to the parliament, you will lay this part before them in its true light, ſo as that they may ſee this neceſſary and important part of the war has been provided for and carried on without any other expence to the public than the ten thouſand pounds a year; and I flatter myſelf, that, when the accounts of the army in Flanders come under your conſideration, you will be ſenſible the ſervice on this ſide has been carried on with all the œconomy and good huſbandry that was poſſible. I am,

Gentlemen,

Your moſt obedient, humble ſervant,

MARLBOROUGH.

Anne, R.

'Right truſty and right well-beloved couſin and counſellor, we greet you well. Whereas, purſuant to the direction you have received in that behalf, you have agreed with the perſons authorized to treat with you, for the taking into our ſervice a certain number of foreign troops, to act in conjunction with the forces of our allies, that there be reſerved two and a half per cent. out of all monies payable to, and for the ſaid troops, as well for their pay and entertainment, as on any other account, towards defraying ſuch extraordinary contingent expences relating to them, as cannot otherwiſe be provided for. Now, we do hereby approve and confirm all ſuch agreements as you have, or may hereafter make, for reſerving the ſaid two and a half per cent. accordingly; and do likewiſe hereby authorize and direct the pay-maſter general of our forces for the time being, or his deputy, to make the ſaid deduction of two and a half per cent. purſuant thereunto, out of all monies he ſhall be directed to iſſue, for the uſe of the foreign troops in our pay, and thereupon to pay over the ſame, from time to time, according to ſuch warrants, and in ſuch proportions as you ſhall direct, for which this ſhall be to you and to all others whom it may concern, a ſufficient warrant and direction.

Given at our court at St. James's, this ſixth day of July, 1702, and in the firſt year of our reign.

By her majeſty's command,

C. HEDGES.

To our right truſty and right well-beloved couſin and counſellor, John earl of Marlborough, our ambaſſador-extraordinary and plenipotentiary to the ſtates-general of the United Provinces, and captain-general of our land-forces.

That on this letter and warrant they obſerved, 'That ſo far as they had been capable of being informed, the great ſums, annually paid to the duke on account of the contracts for bread, could never be eſteemed legal or warrantable perquiſites: nor did they find, that any other Engliſh general in the Low-Countries, or elſewhere, ever claimed or received ſuch perquiſites: And, if any inſtance ſhould be produced, they apprehended it would be no juſtification of it, becauſe the public, or the troops, muſt neceſſarily ſuffer, in proportion to every ſuch perquiſite; and how agreeable this practice was to that œconomy, with which the ſervice in Flanders was ſaid to be carried on, remained yet to be explained. That the great caution and ſecrecy, with which this money was conſtantly received, gave reaſon to ſuſpect, that it was not thought a juſtifiable perquiſite; for Mr. Cardonnel, the duke's ſecretary, and auditor of the bread-account, had declared on oath, that he never knew or heard of any ſuch perquiſite, till the late rumour of ſir Solomon de Medina's evidence before the commiſſioners. That, by the contracts for bread and bread-waggons, the general appeared to be the ſole check on the contractors, he was to take care, that the terms of theſe contracts were duly performed; he was to judge of all deductions to be made from allowance to the contractors; and whether in ſuch circumſtance he could receive any gratuity or perquiſite from the contractors, without a breach of his truſt, they did not preſume to determine. That the general might with equal reaſon claim a perquiſite for every other contractor relating to the army, as for thoſe of the bread and bread-waggons; but his Grace being ſilent as to this, the commiſſioners ought to ſuppoſe he had not received any ſuch allowance'. As to the deduction of two and a half per cent. from the foreign troops, the commiſſioners obſerved: 'That the warrant for it had been kept dormant for nine years, and the deduction concealed ſo long from the knowledge of parliament; for which his Grace had not aſſigned ſufficient reaſons. That the calling it a Free Gift was inconſiſtent with the words of the warrant, which expreſs an agreement, and with that part of his Grace's letter, which took notice, that he, being ambaſſador and general, ſtipulated for this very ſtoppage by the late king's order. That therefore they were of opinion, that a deduction, ſo made, was public money, and ought to be accounted for in the ſame manner as other public money. That the ten thouſand pounds granted yearly for the contingencies of the army was at firſt intended by parliament for the ſervice of forty thouſand men, without diſtinction; and was ſo far from having always been thought exempt from account, as the duke had ſuggeſted, that in a privy-ſeal, dated March 5, 1706, there was a clauſe to releaſe and diſcharge the duke of Marlborough from a ſum of ſeven thouſand, four hundred and ninety-nine pounds, nineteen ſhillings and ten-pence, part of this money; which ſhewed, he would otherwiſe have been accountable for it. But that they no where met with any mention of this deduction of two and a half per cent. and therefore preſumed, the reaſon, why it had never been brought to an account, was, what his grace ſuggeſted, that he never conſidered it as public money. In the next place, the commiſſioners ſubmitted it to the houſe, whether, the warrant, produced to juſtify this deduction was legal, and duly counterſigned? Or, whether, admitting it to be ſo, either the ſtoppage, or the payment, had been regularly made? That the warrant directed, that it ſhould be ſtopped in the hands of the pay-maſter, or his deputy, and iſſued thence by the duke's order only. But this method did not appear, by the pay-maſter's accounts, to have been at all purſued; ſo far otherwiſe, that the payments to the foreign troops were always made complete, and their receipts always taken in full, without any notice of a deduction. That when any part of the ten thouſand pounds, contingent-money, was drawn out of the pay-maſter's hands, for any ſecret ſervice, the general's warrant, and his ſecretary's receipts, were the paymaſter's vouchers. But that Mr. Cardonnel, as he declared on oath, never gave any receipt for any part of that two and a half per cent. nor did Mr. Bridges, as he alſo declared on oath, ever ſee any warrant for that purpoſe, or know any thing, as pay-maſter-general, of this deduction. That, if Mr. Sweet, at Amſterdam, had taken upon himſelf to tranſact the diſpoſition of this two and a half per cent. with the duke of Marlborough, the commiſſioners were of opinion, that he ought to have tranſmitted conſtant accounts of it to Mr. Bridges, whoſe agent he only was; and not to have negotiated ſo large ſums of public money in ſo clandeſtine a manner. That, by the warrant, this deduction was reſerved for the defraying extraordinary contingent expences of the troops, from whom it was ſtopped: And, if the whole had been employed in ſecret correſpondence and intelligence, there muſt have been ſome neglect of the other ſervices, for which it was originally deſigned: And ſuch a diſpoſition, being in no ſort authorized by the warrant, was a miſapplication of it. Beſides, the commiſſioners apprehended, that the article for ſecret ſervice, to which this deduction was pretended to have been applied, was always included in the ten thouſand pounds above-mentioned, for the contingencies of the army; and, if ſo, the whole remained to be accounted for; which, on a computation made from the whole ſum of eleven millions, two hundred ninety-four thouſand, ſix hundred and fifty nine pounds, four ſhillings, and a penny half-penny, paid by Great-Britain, to, and for all the foreign forces, ſince the 23d day of December, 1701, amounted to two hundred eighty two thouſand three hundred ſixty-ſix pounds, nine ſhillings, and ſeven-pence. And on a computation made from the ſum of ſeven millions, one hundred and ſeven thouſand, eight hundred ſeventy-three pounds, eighteen ſhillings, and eleven pence half-penny, paid to, and for the foreign forces ſince the time aforeſaid (excluſive of Italy, Spain, and Portugal) amounted to one hundred, and ſeventy ſeven thouſand, ſix hundred ninety five pounds, ſeventeen ſhillings, and three farthings.

conſcious, would fully detect the falſehood and malice of their aſperſions, and not leave them that handle for bringing your majeſty to ſuch extremities againſt me.

But I am much more concerned at an expreſſion in your majeſty's letter, which ſeems to complain of the treatment you had met with. I know not how to underſtand that word, nor what conſtruction to make of it. I know I have always endeavoured to ſerve your majeſty faithfully and zealouſly through a great many undeſerved mortifications. But if your majeſty does intend by that expreſſion, to find fault with my not coming to the cabinet-council, I am very free to acknowledge, that my duty to your majeſty and my country would not give me leave to join in the counſel of a man, who, in my opinion, puts your majeſty upon all manner of extremities. And it is not my opinion only, but the opinion of all mankind, that the friendſhip of France muſt needs be deſtructive to your Majeſty, there being in that court a root of enmity irreconcileable to your majeſty's government, and the religion of theſe kingdoms. I wiſh your majeſty may never find the want of ſo faithful a ſervant, as I have always endeavoured to approve myſelf to you. I am, with the greateſt duty and ſubmiſſion,

Madam,
Your majeſty's moſt dutiful, and obedient ſubject,
MARLBOROUGH.

The removal of the duke of Marlborough was thought very extraordinary, after ſuch long and eminent ſervices; and was ſo little expected, that thoſe, who looked for precedents, could find none ſince the diſgrace of Beliſarius, in Juſtinian's time. The only thing pretended to excuſe it was, his being conſidered as the head of thoſe, who oppoſed the peace, on which the court ſeemed to ſet their hearts.

The duke of Somerſet continuing to oppoſe the ſchemes of the new miniſters, it was alſo reſolved, in a conſultation about the middle of December, to remove him. But the great friendſhip between the queen and his ducheſs (who was groom of the ſtole, and firſt lady of the bed-chamber) prevented that reſolution from being then put to practice[1]. The duke was not removed till the 26th of January, and though endeavours were uſed to the contrary, his ducheſs was by the queen continued in her places, which ſhe offered to reſign.

The duke of Marlborough's diſgrace was attended with other removes, and made way for ſeveral promotions. The duke of Ormond, with the firſt regiment of foot-guards, was appointed commander in chief of all the forces in Great-Britain, and ſoon after, upon the elector of Hanover's refuſal to command the queen's forces in Flanders, captain-general of all her forces at home and abroad. The earl Rivers was made maſter-general of the ordnance, and colonel of the royal regiment of horſe-guards. The duke of Beaufort was appointed captain of the band of penſioners, and brigadier Hill, lieutenant of the tower, in the room of lieutenant-general Cadogan. The counteſs of Sunderland and the lady Railton, two of the duke of Marlborough's daughters, reſigned their places of ladies of the bed-chamber.

The miniſters, finding the majority of the houſe of lords could not be brought to favour their deſigns, reſolved to make an experiment, which none of our princes had ventured on in former times. A reſolution was taken up very ſuddenly of making twelve peers all at once, which was accordingly done on the laſt day of December, by calling up by writ to the houſe of lords James lord Compton, eldeſt ſon to the earl of Northampton, and Charles lord Bruce, eldeſt ſon to the earl of Aileſbury; and creating by patent ten new peers of Great-Britain: George Hay, or lord Dupplin, of the kingdom of Scotland, the lord-treaſurer's ſon-in-law, baron Hay of Bedwarden in the county of Hereford; the lord viſcount Windſor, of Ireland, baron Montjoy of the Iſle of Wight, in the county of Southampton; Henry Paget, ſon to the lord Paget, baron Burton, of Burton in the county of Stafford; ſir Thomas Manſel, baron Manſel, of Margam in the county of Glamorgan; ſir Thomas Willoughby, baron Middleton, of Middleton in the county of Warwick; ſir Thomas Trevor, baron Trevor, of Bromham in the county of Bedford; George Granville, baron Landſdowne, of Bideford in the county of Devon; Samuel Maſham, baron Maſham, of Oates in the county of Eſſex; Thomas Foley, baron Foley, of Kidderminſter in the county of Worceſter; and Allen Bathurſt, baron Bathurſt, of Battelſden in the county of Bedford. Sir Miles Wharton had been offered a peerage, but he thought it looked like the ſerving a turn, and that, whereas peers uſed to be made for ſervices, which they had done, he ſhould be made for ſervices to be done by him; and therefore excuſed himſelf from accepting it: and the favourite's huſband, Mr. Maſham, was put in his room. And whereas formerly Jefferies had the vanity to be made a peer, while he was chief-juſtice, which had not been practiſed for ſome ages; yet the precedent ſet by him was followed, and Trevor, chief-juſtice of the common pleas, was now advanced to be a peer. This creation of peers was looked upon as an undoubted part of the prerogative; ſo that there was no ground in law to oppoſe the receiving the new lords into the houſe; nor was it poſſible to raiſe in the antient peers a ſenſe of the indignity, which was now put upon their houſe; ſince the court did by this openly declare, that they were to be kept in abſolute ſubmiſſion and obedience.

[1711-12.] On the ſecond of January the twelve new peers were introduced into the houſe of lords without any oppoſition; and, the court-party having by this reinforcement, and by the coming up of the Scots lords, got the majority, the houſe acquieſced in the queen's ſullen anſwer to their late addreſs, importing, 'That her majeſty thought her ſpeech to both houſes would have given ſatisfaction to every body; and, that ſhe had given inſtructions to her plenipotentiaries, according to the deſires of that addreſs'. This done, the lord-keeper delivered to the houſe a meſſage from the queen, 'That, having matters of great importance to communicate to both houſes of parliament, ſhe deſired the lords to adjourn immediately to the 14th, the ſame day,

[1] However, to ſhew their reſentment to the duke for oppoſing their meaſures, a pamphlet (ſaid to be penned by lord-keeper Harcourt, and called, 'Advice to the October Club') was publiſhed, wherein he and his ducheſs are both abuſed and inſulted. It is there ſaid, 'It would have been a maſter-piece of prudence, in this caſe, to have made a friend of an enemy: But, whether it were ever attempted, is now too late to enquire. All accommodation was rendered deſperate, by an unlucky proceeding ſome months ago at Windſor, which was a declaration of war too frank and generous, for that ſituation of affairs, and, I am told, was not approved by a certain great miniſter [the lord treaſurer]. It was obvious to ſuppoſe, that in a particular, where the honour and intereſt of a huſband [Duke and ducheſs of Somerſet.] were ſo cloſely united with thoſe of a wife, he might be ſure of her utmoſt endeavours for his protection, though ſhe never loved nor eſteemed him. The danger of loſing power, favour, profit, and a ſhelter from domeſtic tyranny, were ſtrong incitements to ſtir up a working brain, early practiſed in all the arts of intriguing'.

This pamphlet is lately reprinted in vol. VII. of Swift's Miſcellanies, to which is prefixed a preface, ſetting forth: 'That about the year, when her late majeſty, of bleſſed memory, thought proper to change her miniſtry, and brought in Mr. Harley, Mr. St. John, Sir Simon Harcourt, and ſome others, the firſt of theſe being made an earl, and lord-treaſurer, he was ſoon after blamed by his friends, for not making a general ſweep of all the Whigs, as the latter did of their adverſaries upon her majeſty's death, when they came into power. At that time a great number of parliament-men, amounting to above two hundred, grew ſo warm upon the ſlowneſs of the treaſurer in this part, that they formed themſelves into a body, under the name of the October Club, and had many meetings, to conſult upon ſome methods, that might ſpur on thoſe in power, ſo that they might make a quicker diſpatch, in removing all of the Whig leaven from the employments they ſtill poſſeſſed. To prevent the ill conſequences of this diſcontent among ſo many worthy members, the reſt of the miniſtry joined with the treaſurer, partly to pacify, and partly to divide thoſe, who were in greater haſte than moderate men thought convenient. It was well known, that the ſuppoſed author [Harcourt] met a conſiderable number of this club in a public houſe, where he convinced them very plainly of the treaſurer's ſincerity, with many of thoſe very reaſons, which are urged in the following diſcourſe, beſides ſome others, which were not ſo proper to appear at that time in print. The treaſurer alledged in his defence, that ſuch a treatment would not conſiſt with prudence, becauſe there were many employments to be beſtowed, which required ſkill and practice: That ſeveral gentlemen, who poſſeſſed them, had been long verſed, very loyal to her majeſty, had never been violent party-men, and were ready to fall into all honeſt meaſures for the ſervice of their queen and country. But however, as offices became vacant, he would humbly recommend to her majeſty ſuch gentlemen, whoſe principles, with regard both to church and ſtate, his friends would approve of, and he would be ready to accept their recommendations. Thus, the earl proceeded in procuring employments for thoſe, who deſerved them by their honeſty, and abilities to execute them. However, the gentlemen of this club ſtill continued uneaſy, that no quicker progreſs was made in removals, until thoſe, who were leaſt violent, began to ſoften a little, or, by dividing them, the whole affair dropped. During this difficulty, we have been aſſured, that the following diſcourſe was very ſeaſonably publiſhed with great ſucceſs, ſhewing the difficulties, that the earl of Oxford lay under, and his real deſire, that all perſons in employment ſhould be true loyal churchmen, zealous for her majeſty's honour and ſafety, as well as for the ſucceſſion in the houſe of Hanover, if the queen ſhould happen to die without iſſue'.

The principal members of the October Club, who met at the Bell-Tavern in Weſtminſter, were theſe:

John Aiſlaby,
Francis Anneſley,
William Bromley,
Robert Byerley,
Henry Campion,
Charles Cæſar,
Sir Robert Davers,
Charles Eversfield,
Ralph Freeman,
Sir Thomas Hanmer,
John Hungerford,
Sir Juſtinian Iſham,
George Lockhart,
Sir Roger Moſtyn,
Sir John Packington,
Francis Scobel,
William Shippen,
Sir Thomas Thorold,
John Trevanion,
Sir William Whitlocke,
Sir William Windham.

to which the commons had adjourned themſelves'. This occaſioned a very warm debate. It was ſaid, that the queen could not ſend a meſſage to any one houſe to adjourn, when the like meſſage was not ſent to both houſes: That the pleaſure of the prince in convening, diſſolving, proroguing, or ordering the adjournment of parliaments, was always directed to both houſes, but never to any one houſe, unleſs the ſame intimation was made at the ſame time to the other. That the conſequence of this, if allowed, might be the ordering one houſe to adjourn, while the other was left ſtill to ſit; and this might end in a total disjointing of the conſtitution. The reſolution however was carried for adjourning by the weight of the twelve new peers. It is true, the odds were thirteen; but that was, becauſe one of the peers, who had a proxy, without reflecting on it, went away when the proxies were called for [m].

The court having received no news of the opening the congreſs, councils were held on Saturday and Sunday the 12th and 13th of January, in which it was debated, Whether the parliament ſhould ſit, or be deſired further to adjourn themſelves? And, it being carried for the adjournment, a meſſage was on the 14th ſent to both houſes, importing, "That her majeſty fully determined to have been perſonally preſent in parliament that day; but, being prevented by a ſudden return of her gout, her majeſty, in hopes ſhe might, by the bleſſing of God, be able to ſpeak to both her houſes of parliament on Thurſday next, the 17th of this inſtant January, deſired them to adjourn to that day." Both houſes readily complied with this meſſage; but, before the ſame was delivered by Mr. St. John to the commons, they ordered their ſpeaker to iſſue out writs, for the electing nine members in the room of thoſe called up to the houſe of peers.

At this time prince Eugene of Savoy was ſent by the emperor to England, to try, if it was poſſible to engage our court to go on with the war, offering a new ſcheme, by which his imperial majeſty took a much larger ſhare of it on himſelf, than the late emperor would bear. The prince having reſolved to embark for England, notwithſtanding the endeavours uſed at the Hague to keep him on the other ſide of the water, he applied to the earl of Strafford, who wrote the following letter to captain Deſborough, commander of the Fubbs yacht:

SIR,

"Prince Eugene having deſired my orders to you to carry him over, you know, I do not pretend to command any of her majeſty's yachts without her ſpecial command. You know your orders, and how far they authorize you to carry over the prince. You know the reſpect and conſideration due to the prince, and his great merit; therefore, it is needleſs for me to tell you what reſpect and conſideration you ought to ſhew him. I can aſſure you, I have a particular reſpect and eſteem for him; and I ſhall always be glad to do the prince, all the ſervice that lies in my power." I am,

Your moſt humble ſervant,

STRAFFORD.

Though this letter rather implied a tacit prohibition than a poſitive order, yet, the captain being left to his own diſcretion, he thought it his duty, as he could not but eſteem it an honour, to carry over ſo great a man as prince Eugene, who, on the 8th of January, N. S. embarked at the Brill (with his nephew, the chevalier de Savoye, ſon to the count de Soiſſons, count de la Corſana, and count Cornelius of Naſſau) and on the 1ſt of January, O. S. arrived off Harwich, where being informed, that he could not eaſily get all the neceſſary carriages for his attendants, he was perſuaded to go up the Thames. The next day he received, on board the yacht, near the Buoy of the Nore, an account of the duke of Marlborough's being removed from all his employments, at which he was extremely concerned. Upon advice, that he was coming up by water, the government ſent down Mr. Drummond, a broken merchant or ſtock-jobber, a creature of the lord-treaſurer, and Mr. Brinſden, an oculiſt, a private agent to Mr. St. John, to attend, or rather to be ſpies, upon the prince. Brinſden being detained at Greenwich by an accidental ſprain of his foot, Drummond only waited on the prince with a barge, which carried him from Graveſend to Whitehall; from whence he went in an hackney-coach to Leiceſter-Houſe, which count Gallas, before his departure had prepared for his reception. Immediately upon his arrival, the prince cauſed it to be notified to the treaſurer, the ſecretaries of ſtate, and the foreign miniſters; and ſome of theſe waited upon him the ſame evening; as did the duke of Marlborough, to whom the prince ſhewed a diſtinguiſhed reſpect, and with whom he afterwards paſſed moſt of his time, notwithſtanding the caution, which Mr. Drummond had given him, either from himſelf, or from thoſe, who ſent him, 'That the leſs he ſaw the duke of Marlborough, the better': To which the prince anſwered, 'That, as the miniſtry might depend upon it, he would not cabal againſt them: ſo he hoped they did not expect, he ſhould forbear his uſual familiarity with his good friend the duke of Marlborough'. On the 6th of January the prince received a compliment from the treaſurer, which he inſtantly returned by the baron de Hohendorf. The ſame morning, after a viſit from Mr ſecretary St. John, count Maffei, monſieur Hoffman, and ſome other foreign miniſters, the duke of Montague, the earl of Hertford, the generals Lumley, Webb, Palmes, Harvey, and ſome other perſons of diſtinction, waited upon him. The ſame afternoon he ſent a gentleman with a compliment to the dukes of Buckingham and Ormond, earl Pawlet and ſome other officers of ſtate; and about ſeven o'clock in the evening went to St. James's-Houſe, where he was introduced by Mr. St. John, to a private audience of the queen, at which none were preſent but the treaſurer and Mr. ſecretary. After a ſhort compliment, which her majeſty anſwered very graciouſly, he delivered to her a letter from the emperor, which he deſired her to peruſe, becauſe it contained the ſubſtance of his errand. After reading the letter, the queen told the prince, 'That ſhe was ſorry the ſtate of her health did not permit her to ſpeak with his highneſs as often as otherwiſe ſhe ſhould be glad to do; but that ſhe had ordered thoſe two gentlemen (there preſent) to receive his propoſals, and confer with him as frequently as he ſhould think proper.' In the mean time people were variouſly affected by his coming to England at this critical juncture. All the Whigs, as well as ſome Tories, who began to be jealous, that a peace would be concluded upon diſhonourable terms, were very glad of his arrival, hoping, that, by the propoſals he was ſaid to bring from the emperor, he would prevail, if not to break off the preſent negotiation, at leaſt to engage Great-Britain to make early preparations to carry on the war, as the moſt effectual means to obtain a ſafe and honourable peace. Upon this conſideration, and the great fame of his actions, multitudes of people crowded to ſee him, and with loud acclamations attended him wherever he went. On the other hand, the friends of France, and of the Pretender, who were equally deſirous of a peace, upon any conditions, being apprehenſive, that he would blaſt their expectations, could not forbear ſhewing their diſcontent; and a rude rabble committed ſome diſorders in Leiceſter-Fields, the ſecond night after his arrival. A more flagrant inſtance of the malice of that party was ſeen on the 8th of January in the Poſt-Boy, where an advertiſement was inſerted, infamouſly reflecting on the counteſs of Soiſſons, the prince's mother; which ſcandalous affront the prince overlooked with his uſual magnanimity; and by his diſcreet carriage convinced all, that he was not come to meddle with inteſtine diviſions, but rather to endeavour to bring the leading men of both parties to ſuch a temper, as might conduce to remove any difficulties, that might obſtruct the carrying on the common cauſe. This endeared him to every body, and gained him more reſpect, than was ever ſhewn in England to any foreign prince, ſo that, for two whole months, the nobility and gentry of both parties vied with one another, who ſhould entertain him[n].

[m] This meſſage for adjourning ſeems only to have been ſent to try the ſtrength of both parties, Mr. ſecretary St. John having been heard to ſay in the court of requeſts, as ſoon as the debate was over, 'That, if thoſe twelve had not been enough, they would have given them [the Whigs] another dozen.' However, very ſtrong reflections were made, both in print and in moſt converſations, on that ſtep, many not ſcrupling to ſay, 'That, though the queen had an undoubted right to create as many peers as ſhe pleaſed, yet her miniſters might be called to an account for adviſing her to abuſe that right. That peace and war were alſo the prerogatives of the crown; and yet the engaging in a ruinous war, or making a treacherous peace, are things, which no miniſter ever did, and eſcaped uncenſured or unpuniſhed. That the creating twelve peers to ſerve a turn, was, in effect, making a houſe of peers a property to the court, and taking away a negative upon the crown; which would render our liberties precarious. That it could not be denied, that the new-made peers were men of noble fortunes; and that ſome of them had ſhewn a commendable zeal for the preſent eſtabliſhment; but who would ſecure us, that hereafter ſuch a number ſhould not be made of men of a quite different character? And, in ſhort, that this was a precedent, which might be made uſe of to inſlave the nation, and to introduce a Popiſh pretender, or the Popiſh religion. That if in the reign of ſuch a queen this abuſe of the prerogative was ſo much exclaimed againſt, how much greater would the cry have been, had it been in a ſuſpicious reign? Whereas now they have an unexceptionable inſtance to produce, to ſilence any clamour or noiſe. That it was impoſſible for men, who owed ſo much to her majeſty for her ſhare in the late revolution, to oppoſe a prerogative, that had never been diſputed, becauſe never uſed in that manner: But had any prince, who had merited leſs of his country, began ſuch a thing, it would, no doubt, have been oppoſed, and perhaps denied him'. But, after all, the ſevereſt reflection upon the twelve new peers was made by the earl of Wharton, who, the ſame day they were introduced, when the queſtion about adjourning was going to be put, aſked one of them, 'Whether they voted by their foreman?' Thereby comparing them to a petty jury. BOYER.

By this time, the parliament being met again, a meſſage from the queen was delivered tooth houſes. That to the commons was as follows:

'I. Her majeſty not having recovered ſtrength enough, ſince the return of the gout, to be preſent that day in perſon; and being unwilling that the public buſineſs ſhould receive any delay, thinks fit to communicate to them the ſubſtance of what ſhe intended to have ſpoke.

II. At the opening of this ſeſſion, her majeſty acquainted the parliament, that both time and place were appointed for the meeting of the plenipotentiaries of all the confederates, to treat with thoſe of the enemy concerning a general peace; and alſo expreſſed the care, which ſhe intended to take of all her allies, and the ſtrict union, in which ſhe propoſed to join with them, in order to obtain a good peace, and to guaranty and ſupport it, when obtained.

III. Her majeſty can now tell them, that her plenipotentiaries are arrived at Utrecht, and have begun, in purſuance of their inſtructions, to concert the moſt proper ways of procuring a juſt ſatisfaction to all in alliance with her, according to their ſeveral treaties, and particularly with relation to Spain and the Weſt-Indies.

IV. You may depend on her majeſty's communicating to her parliament the terms of peace, before the ſame ſhall be concluded.

V. The world will now ſee, how groundleſs thoſe reports are, which have been ſpread abroad by men of evil intentions, to ſerve the worſt deſigns, as if a ſeparate peace had been treated, for which there has not been the leaſt colour given.

VI. Her majeſty's miniſters have directions to propoſe, that a day may be fixed for the finiſhing, as was done for the commencement of this treaty; and, in the mean time, all the preparations are haſtening for an early campaign.

VII. The zeal, which this houſe has already expreſſed, was a ſure pledge, that they will proceed in giving the neceſſary diſpatch to the ſupplies.

VIII. Her majeſty finds it neceſſary to obſerve, how great licence is taken in publiſhing falſe and ſcandalous libels, ſuch as are a reproach to any government. This evil ſeems to be grown too ſtrong for the laws now in force; it is therefore recommended to you to find a remedy equal to the miſchief'.

The meſſage, the queen ſent to the houſe of lords, was exactly the ſame with that ſent to the commons; except only, that inſtead of the ſeventh paragraph, about the ſupply, her majeſty took notice of the affair relating to the Scotch peers, in the following words: 'There is one thing in which her majeſty's ſubjects of the north part of this kingdom are extremely concerned: The diſtinction ſuch of them who were peers of Scotland before the Union muſt lie under, if the prerogative of the crown is ſtrictly barred againſt them alone. This is a matter which ſenſibly affects her majeſty, and ſhe therefore lays it before this houſe, earneſtly deſiring their advice and concurrence in finding out the beſt method of ſettling this affair, to the ſatisfaction of the whole kingdom'.

The houſe of lords agreed to an addreſs, thanking her majeſty for communicating theſe things to them, and for the promiſes ſhe had made them, repeating the very words in which they were made. It was moved to add the words, 'conform to her alliance;' but it was ſaid, that the queen aſſured them of that, and therefore the repeating theſe words would ſeem to intimate a diſtruſt, ſo that was not carried. But, becauſe there ſeemed to be an ambiguity in the mention made of Spain and the Weſt-Indies, the houſe expreſſed in what ſenſe they underſtood them, by adding theſe words: 'Which are of ſo great concern to the ſafety and commerce of your majeſty's kingdoms'. The commons made an addreſs to the ſame purpoſe, in which they only named Spain and Weſt-Indies.

The duke of Devonſhire, purſuant to the motion he had made before the receſs, having prepared a bill for giving precedence to the duke of Cambridge, the lord-treaſurer was reſolved to prevent him, and offered January 17th a bill, giving precedence to the whole electoral family, as the children and nephews of the crown; and it was intimated, that bills relating to honours and precedence ought to come from the crown: The duke of Devonſhire would make no diſpute on this head; if the thing paſſed, he acquieſced in the manner of paſſing it, only he thought it lay within the authority of the houſe. On this occaſion, the court ſeemed, even to an affectation, to ſhew a particular zeal in promoting this bill; for it paſſed through both houſes in two days. Notwithſtanding this haſte, the court did not ſeem to deſign any ſuch bill, till it was propoſed by others, out of whoſe hands they thought fit to take it. The act was ſent over to Hanover, by Mr. Thomas Harley, in order to raiſe favourable thoughts there of the miniſtry. But that court ſaw through theſe thin diſguiſes, which were contradicted by the open countenance to thoſe who were no well-wiſhers to the Proteſtant ſucceſſion, and the diſcouragement to its beſt friends. The lords entered upon the conſideration of the paragraph in the queen's meſſage, relating to the peers of Scotland. The court propoſed that an expedient might be found that the peers of Scotland ſhould not ſit among them by election, but by deſcent, in caſe the reſt of the peers of that nation ſhould conſent to it. A debate followed concerning the articles of the Union, which of them were fundamental and not alterable; it was ſaid, that by the Union no private right could be taken away, but by the conſent of the perſons concerned; therefore no alteration could be made in the right of the peers of Scotland, unleſs they conſented to it. It was afterwards debated, whether an alteration might be made with this condition, in caſe they ſhould conſent to it; or whether the firſt riſe to any ſuch alteration ought not to be given, by a previous deſire. This was not ſo ſubject to an ill management; the court ſtudied to have a ſubſequent conſent received as ſufficient; but a previous deſire was inſiſted, as viſibly fairer and juſter.

[n] The perſons, who diſtinguiſhed themſelves by this generous emulation, were the dukes of Marlborough, Ormond, Buckingham, Montague, Schomberg, Devonſhire, Shrewſbury, Richmond, and Grafton; the earls Pawlet, Sunderland, Portland, Oxford, Rivers, Wharton, Berkley, Stair, and Orkney; the lords Lexington, Aſhburnham, Hallifax, and North and Grey; Sir Thomas Hanmer; the honourable Mr. Henry Boyle; Mr. ſecretary St. John; general Palmes; the foreign miniſters then in London; doctor Garth and doctor Radcliffe, two of the moſt eminent phyſicians. It was then currently reported, that, when the prince dined with the lord-treaſurer, the latter, among other compliments, told his highneſs, 'That he looked upon that day as the happieſt in the whole courſe of his life, ſince he had the honour to ſee in his houſe the greateſt captain of this age.' To which the prince replied, 'That, if he were, he was obliged to his lordſhip for it'; alluding to the earl's being the author of the duke of Marlborough's diſgrace, which rid him of a competitor in military glory. It was obſerved the prince was not entertained by the lord Dartmouth.

On the 14th of January, Sir Alexander Cairnes, bart. and Sir Theodore Janſen, two of the moſt eminent merchants of the city of London, who had contributed moſt to the loan made ſome years before to the emperor, upon the ſecurity of his revenues in Sileſia, for the uſe of the prince of Savoy, waited upon him with a compliment from that company. The prince gave them a very kind reception, and told them, 'He was very much obliged to them, ſince the raiſing of the ſiege of Turin, and the ſucceſſes that followed, were, under God, chiefly owing to the ſeaſonable ſupply he received from England'. Thoſe gentlemen anſwered, 'That, when they made that loan, they had not ſo much in view the improvement of their money, as the honour of being ſerviceable to the common cauſe, and of having an opportunity to ſhew their reſpect for a prince of ſo great a reputation; and as they accounted themſelves particularly obliged to his highneſs's integrity for the punctual payment of their intereſt and principal; ſo, if, in the courſe of this war, his highneſs ſhould have occaſion for any greater ſums, their company would readily advance them upon his highneſs's ſingle ſecurity'. They concluded with deſiring him to accept of a ſmall entertainment, which their company deſigned to give him in the city, and to fix a day, when it ſhould beſt ſuit with his conveniency; which he promiſed to do. The lord-mayor and court of aldermen, having notice of this invitation, and deſigning likewiſe to ſhew their reſpect to the prince, it was propoſed amongſt them, on the 15th of January, that, ſince moſt of their court were concerned in the Sileſian Company, they ought, for greater magnificence ſake, to make but one united entertainment. The motion was approved; but one of the court having ſuggeſted, 'That they would do well to know, how the queen would take ſuch an invitation to prince Eugene'; it was thought proper to ſend two aldermen to the earl of Dartmouth, to know the queen's pleaſure; but, there being, it ſeems, ſome want of formality in the meſſage, his lordſhip wrote the following letter to the lord-mayor:

My Lord, Whitehall, Jan. 15, 1711-12.

"Two of the court of aldermen having brought a verbal meſſage to be delivered to her majeſty, which was, that the lord-mayor, court of aldermen, and ſeveral citizens of the beſt rank, deſired to treat prince Eugene, and ordered them to attend me, to know the queen's pleaſure; and being aſked by the lords of the council, whether they had their meſſage in writing, anſwered, that they had no order or meſſage in writing, but that they came upon a minute taken at the court of aldermen, of which they had no copy: They were thereupon told, that the queen had commanded the lords to acquaint them, That her majeſty would return no anſwer to any meſſage, which is not brought to her with the ſame reſpect, as has always been paid by the city of London to her predeceſſors. To prevent any miſtake in repeating what was ſaid to them, I ſend your lordſhip this account; and am,

My lord,

Your lordſhip's moſt obedient and moſt humble ſervant, DARTMOUTH.

Upon the receipt of this letter, the court of aldermen did not think fit to make any further ſteps in that matter, to the great diſappointment and mortification of moſt of the citizens.

The Scotch lords, ſeeing no redreſs to their complaint, but that the peers adhered to their late judgment, ſeemed reſolved to come no more to ſit in the houſe of lords; but the court was ſenſible, that their ſtrength, in that houſe, conſiſted chiefly in them and the new peers; for which reaſon pains were taken, and ſecret forcible arguments were uſed to them, which proved ſo effectual, that after a few days abſence they came back, and continued, during the ſeſſion, to ſit in the houſe. They gave out, that an expedient would be found, that would be to the ſatisfaction of the peers of Scotland; but, nothing of that appearing, it was concluded, that the ſatisfaction was private and perſonal. The great arrear, into which all the regular payments, both of the houſhold and of ſalaries and penſions was left to run, made it to be generally believed, that the income for the civil liſt, though it exceeded the eſtabliſhment very much, was applied to other payments, which the miniſter durſt not own. And, though ſecret practice on members had been for a great while too common, yet it was believed, that it was at this time managed with an extraordinary profuſion.

The houſe of commons entered on the obſervations of the commiſſioners for taking the public accounts, which had been laid before them on the 21ſt of December; and they began with what related to Mr. Walpole, whom they reſolved to put out of the way of diſturbing them in the houſe. The charge againſt him was thus: Mr. Walpole, as ſecretary of war, had contracted with ſome perſons for forage to the horſe that lay in Scotland. He, finding the contractors made ſome gain by it, named a friend of his own to be joined with them, that he might have a ſhare of the gain: But the others were unwilling the ſecret of their management ſhould be known; ſo, inſtead of admitting him, offered him five hundred guineas for his ſhare, which he accepted, and the money was remitted. But the contractors, not knowing how to direct to him, addreſſed their bill to Mr. Walpole, who endorſed it, and the perſon concerned received the money; this was found out, and Walpole was charged with it as a bribe, that he had taken for his own uſe, for making the contract. Both the perſons that remitted the money, and he who received it, were examined, and affirmed, that Walpole was neither directly nor indirectly concerned in the matter; but the houſe inſiſted upon his having endorſed the bill, and not only voted this a corruption, but ſent him to the Tower, and expelled him the houſe. Not content with this, when Mr. Walpole was afterwards choſen again for Lynn Regis, the commons, upon a petition againſt his election, reſolved, 'That Robert Walpole, eſq; having been, this ſeſſion of parliament, committed a priſoner to the Tower of London, and expelled this houſe, for an high breach of truſt in the execution of his office, and notorious corruption, when ſecretary of war, was, and is incapable of being elected a member to ſerve in this preſent parliament [o].

The next attack was on the duke of Marlborough. On the 24th of January, his affair was debated. The money received from Sir Solomon Medina was ſaid to be a fraud, and the deduction out of the pay of the foreign troops was ſaid to be public money, and to be accounted for. The debate held long. It appeared, that, during the former war, king William had fifty thouſand pounds a year for contingencies; which were often reckoned to have coſt much more. The contingency was that ſervice, which could be brought to no certain head, and was chiefly for procuring intelligence. The duke of Marlborough had only ten thouſand pounds, for the contingencies; which, with all the other items joined together, amounted but to thirty thouſand pounds, a ſum much inferior to what had been formerly given; and yet, with this moderate expence, he had procured ſo good intelligence, that he was never ſurprized, and no party he ſent out was ever intercepted or cut off. By means of this intelligence, all his deſigns were ſo well concerted, that he ſucceeded in every one of them; and by many inſtances the exactneſs of his intelligence was fully demonſtrated. It was proved, both by witneſſes, and by formal atteſtations from Holland, that, ever ſince the year 1672, the Jews had made the like preſent to the general of the States army; and it was underſtood as a perquiſite belonging to that command. No bargain was made with the Jews for the Engliſh troops, that made by the States being applied to them; ſo that it appeared, that the making ſuch a preſent to the general was cuſtomary; but that was denied. So it was reſolved at laſt by two hundred and ſeventy voices againſt a hundred and ſixty-five, 'That the taking ſeveral ſums of money annually, by the duke of Marlborough, from the contractors for furniſhing the bread and bread-waggons for the army in the Low-Countries was unwarrantable and illegal'. After which, though the duke had the queen's warrant to receive it, they alſo voted, that the two and a half per cent. deducted out of the pay of the foreign troops was unwarrantable, and to be accounted for. Theſe reſolutions being laid before the queen, ſhe anſwered, 'I have a great regard for whatever is preſented to me by my commons, and will do my part to redreſs what you complain of'. To colour this cenſure, the commons voted 'that the two and a half per cent. which had, or ought to have been made from the pay for the foreign forces, be continued for the year 1712, and applied for the ſervice of the war.' And it is obſervable, that though ſome of the foreign princes who had troops in the queen's pay, did ſome time after order their miniſters in London to repreſent, 'that the two and a half per cent. was their own money, but they were willing to allow it as a free gift to the duke of Ormond, as they had done to the duke of Marlborough'; which repreſentation ſeemed to be a full juſtification of the latter: The queen however was prevailed upon to ſend an order to the attorney-general to proſecute the duke, for the fifteen thouſand pounds, which was deducted yearly out of the pay of the foreign troops, for the receiving whereof he had her own warrant.

The court eſpouſed theſe reſolutions of the commons with great zeal, and paid well for the great majority by which they were carried. Upon this, many virulent writers (whether ſet on to it, or officiouſly ſtudying to merit by it, did not appear) threw out, in many defamatory libels, a great deal of malice againſt the duke of Marlborough: They compared him to Catiline, to Craſſus, to Antony, and ſtudied to repreſent him as a robber of the nation, and as a public enemy. This gave indignation to all, who had a ſenſe of gratitude, or a regard to juſtice. In one of theſe ſcurrilous papers, penned on deſign to raiſe the rabble againſt him, a period began thus, 'He was perhaps once fortunate'. This paſſage being mentioned to prince Eugene, he pleaſantly ſaid, it was the greateſt commendation that could be given him, ſince he was always ſucceſsful: So this implied, that in one ſingle inſtance he might be fortunate, but that all his other ſucceſſes were owing to his conduct. It was anſwered, that ſingle inſtance muſt then be, his eſcaping out of the hands of the party, who took him as he was going down the Maeſe in a boat [p].

Secret enquiries were made, in order to the laying more load on the duke of Marlborough, and to ſee whether poſts in the army, or in the guards were ſold by him; but nothing could be found: He had ſuffered a practice to go on, that had been begun in the late king's time, of letting officers ſell their commiſſions; but he had never taken any part of the price to himſelf: Few thought that he had been ſo clear in that matter; for it was the only thing, in which now his enemies were confident, that ſome diſcoveries would have been made to his prejudice; ſo that the endeavours uſed, to ſearch into [o] This proceeding againſt him was examined in the poſtſcript to the ſecond edition of 'Mr. Walpole's caſe in a letter from a Tory-member of parliament to his friend in the country'. The author of this piece conſiders, 'Whether Mr. Walpole was, at the time of his election, incapable of being elected a a member to ſerve in parliament; and, if he was capable, how far a ſecond expulſion was juſt and reaſonable': And then ſhews, that ſuch an incapacity cannot ariſe either from the tenour and words of the writ, nor from Mr. Walpole's being a priſoner in the Tower, nor from his having been expelled the houſe. And, upon the whole, he declares, that if Mr. Walpole 'was to be tried by the law of the land, or by the law and uſage of parliament, or by any known rules of reaſon and juſtice, there was no foundation to declare, that he was incapable of being elected a member to ſerve in the preſent parliament; And that it will be thought an hardſhip of the firſt impreſſion, that for a ſlight offence, proved by no direct evidence, vindicated by poſitive evidence upon oath, a gentleman ſhould be cenſured in the ſtrongeſt terms, impriſoned, and expelled the houſe, and afterwards expelled again'.

[p] Among the libels againſt the duke was publiſhed, by either Prior or Swift, 'A fable of the Widow and her Cat', the laſt ſtanza of which is as follows:

IX. So flagrant is thy inſolence,
So vile thy breach of truſt is,
That longer with thee to diſpenſe,
Were want of power, or want of ſenſe:
Here, Towzer,——Do him juſtice.

It is no wonder the duke of Marlborough was thus uſed, ſince the earl of Nottingham himſelf did not eſcape for oppoſing the negotiations of peace. It was not only ſaid, that he did ſo, becauſe he was refuſed the privy-ſeal, but the following advertiſement was inſerted in the Poſt-Boy, of December 6, viz. 'Whereas a very tall, thin, ſwarthy complexioned man, between ſixty and ſeventy years of age, wearing a brown coat, with little ſleeves, and long pockets, has lately withdrawn himſelf from his friends, being ſeduced by wicked perſons to follow ill courſes: Theſe are to give notice, That whoever ſhall diſcover him, ſhall have ten ſhillings reward; or, if he will voluntarily return, he ſhall be kindly received by his friends, who will not reproach him for paſt follies, provided he give good aſſurances, that, for the future, he will firmly adhere to the Church of England, in which he was ſo carefully educated by his honeſt parents'. There were alſo lampoons, and other libels, both in verſe and proſe, publiſhed againſt the ſame peer.

thoſe matters, producing nothing, raiſed the reputation of his incorrupt adminiſtration, more than all his well-wiſhers could have expected.

In this whole tranſaction was ſeen a new ſcene of ingratitude acted in a moſt imprudent manner; when the man, to whom the nation owed more than it had ever done in any age to any ſubject, or perhaps to any perſon whatever, was, for ſome months, purſued with ſo much malice. He bore all with ſilence and patience, appearing always calm and chearful: And, though he prepared a full vindication of himſelf, yet he delayed publiſhing it, till the nation ſhould return to its ſenſes, and be capable of examining thoſe matters in a more impartial manner.

Another affair of a more public nature was now taken into conſideration by the commons, namely, the Barrier-Treaty with the States. Both houſes had, in the year 1709, agreed, in an addreſs to the queen, that the Proteſtant ſucceſſion might be ſecured by a guaranty in the treaty of peace; and this was ſettled at the Hague to be one of the preliminaries. But, when an end was put to the conferences at Gertruydenberg, the lord Townſhend was ordered to ſet on a treaty with the ſtates to that effect. They entertained it very readily; but at the ſame time propoſed, that England ſhould enter into a guaranty with them, to maintain their barrier, which conſiſted of ſome places, which they were to garriſon, the ſovereignty of which was ſtill in the crown of Spain; and of other places, which had not belonged to that crown at the death of king Charles the ſecond, but had been taken in the progreſs of the war; for, by their agreements with Great-Britain, they bore the charge of the ſieges, and ſo the places taken were to belong to them. Theſe were chiefly Liſle, Tournay, Menin, and Doway, and were to be kept ſtill by them. But as for thoſe places, which, from the time of the treaty of the Pyrenees belonged to the Spaniards, they had been ſo ill looked after by the Spaniſh governors of Flanders, who were more intent upon enriching themſelves, and keeping a magnificent court at Bruſſels, than on preſerving the country, that neither were the fortifications kept in due repair, nor the magazines furniſhed, nor the ſoldiers paid; ſo that, whenever the war broke out, the French made themſelves very eaſily maſters of places ſo ill kept. The ſtates had therefore propoſed, during this war, that the ſovereignty of thoſe places ſhould continue ſtill to belong to the crown of Spain; but they ſhould keep garriſons in the ſtrongeſt and the moſt expoſed, in particular thoſe, that lay on the Lys and the Scheld; and, for maintaining this, they aſked a hundred thouſand pounds a year from thoſe provinces; by which they would be kept better and cheaper than ever they had been, while they were in the hands of the Spaniards. They aſked likewiſe a free paſſage for all the ſtores, that they ſhould ſend to thoſe places. This ſeemed to be ſo reaſonable, that, ſince the intereſt of England as well as the ſtates, required, that this frontier ſhould be carefully maintained, the miniſtry were ready to hearken to it. It was objected, that, in caſe of a war between England and the States, the trade of thoſe provinces would be wholly in the hands of the Dutch: But this had been ſettled in the great truce, which, by the mediation of France and England, was made in 1609, between the Spaniards and the States. There was a proviſional order therein made for the freedom of trade in thoſe provinces; and that was turned into a perpetual one by the peace of Munſter. King Charles of Spain had agreed to the main of the barrier; ſome places on the Scheld were not neceſſary for a frontier, but the ſtates inſiſted on them, as neceſſary to maintain a communication with the frontier. The king of Pruſſia excepted likewiſe to ſome places in the Spaniſh Guelder. The lord Townſhend thought, that theſe were ſuch inconſiderable objections, that, though his inſtructions did not come up to every particular, yet he ſigned the treaty, known by the name of the Barrier-Treaty, on the 29th of October 1709; by which the ſtates bound themſelves to maintain the queen's title to her dominions and the Proteſtant ſucceſſion with their whole force; and England was reciprocally obliged to aſſiſt them in maintaining this barrier.

The mercenary writers, who were hired to defend the peace then projected with France, attacked this treaty with great virulence[q], and by arguments, that gave juſt ſuſpicions of black deſigns. They ſaid, it was a diſgrace to this nation, to engage any other ſtate to ſecure the ſucceſſion among us, which perhaps we might ſee cauſe to alter; whereas by this treaty the ſtates had an authority given them to interpoſe in our counſels. It was alſo ſaid, that, if the ſtates were put into poſſeſſion of all thoſe ſtrong towns, they might ſhut us out from any ſhare of trade in them, and might erect our manufactures in provinces very capable of them. But it was anſwered, that this could not be done, as long as this treaty continued in force, unleſs the ſovereign of the country ſhould join with them againſt us. Some objected to the ſettlement made at Munſter, as a tranſaction, when we were in ſuch confuſion at home, that we had no miniſter there; but that treaty had only rendered the truce and the proviſional ſettlement made before, by the mediation of England, perpetual; and we had ſince acquieſced in that ſettlement for above ſixty years. By examining into the particulars of the treaty, it appeared that, in ſome inconſiderable matters, the lord Townſhend had gone beyond the letter of his inſtructions, in which he had ſo fully ſatisfied the late miniſtry, that though, upon his firſt ſigning it, ſome exceptions had been taken, yet theſe were paſſed over, and the treaty was ratified in form.

But the new miniſtry had other views: They deſigned to ſet the queen at liberty from her engagements by theſe alliances, and to diſengage her from treaties. The houſe of commons went now very haſtily into ſeveral reſolutions that were very injurious to the ſtates. They pretended the ſtates had been deficient in their quotas for ſea-ſervice, ſome years two thirds, and generally more than half their quota. That the forces ſupplied by the ſtates for the ſervice of Spain from 1705, to 1708, were no more than twelve thouſand two hundred men, and they had ſince ſent thither no forces at all. That the ſtates, during the courſe of the war, had furniſhed leſs than their proportion in Flanders, twenty thouſand eight hundred and thirty-ſeven men. That the queen had paid in ſubſidies more than her proportion three millions one hundred and fifty-five crowns. Then they fell on the Barrier-treaty. They gave out that the old miniſtry deſigned to bring over an army from Holland, whenever they ſhould, for other ends, pretend that the Proteſtant ſucceſſion was in danger; whereas it was urged, that there was no need of any foreign aſſiſtance to maintain it. In the debate, it was inſiſted on, that it could be maintained ſafely no other way: It was not to be doubted but the king of France would aſſiſt the Pretender. England was not inclined to keep up a ſtanding army in time of peace to reſiſt him; ſo that we could not be ſo ſafe any other way, as by having the ſtates engaged to ſend over their army, if it ſhould be neceſſary. But reaſon is a feeble thing to bear down reſolutions already taken, ſo the commons voted, I. 'That in the treaty between her majeſty and the ſtates-general, for ſecuring the ſucceſſion to the crown of Great-Britain, and for ſettling a Barrier for the ſtates-general againſt France, under colour of ſecuring the Proteſtant-ſucceſſion, and providing a ſufficient barrier to the ſtates-general againſt France, there were ſeveral articles deſtructive to the trade and intereſt of Great-Britain, and therefore highly diſhonourable to her majeſty. II. That the lord viſcount Townſhend had not any orders or authority for negotiating or concluding ſeveral articles in that treaty. III. That the lord viſcount Townſhend, who negotiated and ſigned, and all thoſe, who adviſed the ratifying of that treaty, were enemies to the queen and kingdom'.

[q] Dr. Swift in particular publiſhed a piece intitled, 'Some remarks on the Barrier-treaty between her majeſty and the States-general, to which are added, the ſaid Barrier-treaty, with two ſeparate articles; part of the counter-project; the ſentiments of prince Eugene and count Zinzendorf upon the ſaid treaty; and a repreſentation of the Engliſh merchants at Bruges'. He attacked likewiſe the ſame treaty in his 'Conduct of the allies and of the late miniſtry'; but his remarks upon it were confuted in the ſecond part of 'Dr. Hare's allies and the late miniſtry defended againſt France, and the preſent friends of France'. On the ſame ſide was alſo publiſhed a piece in octavo, called, 'The Dutch Barrier ours: Or the intereſt of England and Holland inſeparable'. But the moſt conſiderable treatiſe upon this ſubject was publiſhed at London, in 1712, in octavo, under the title of 'The Barrier-treaty vindicated', which is ſuppoſed to have been written by the lord Townſhend, Mr. Stephen Poyntz, Dr. Samuel Clarke, and Dr. Hare. This piece begins with repreſenting the fatal conſequences of ſubmitting to a Popiſh prince, and the neceſſity of ſecuring the Proteſtant ſucceſſion: That the Proteſtant ſucceſſion, under the circumſtances of it at that time, could no otherwiſe be effectually ſecured, than by a foreign aſſiſtance; ſince the French king's promiſe, of not ſupporting the Pretender, could not be depended upon, and ſince England alone was not ſufficient to defend herſelf againſt France. That no alliance was ſo uſeful, in order to ſecure the Proteſtant ſucceſſion, as that of the ſtates-general, whether we conſider their ſituation, ſtrength, religion, or intereſt, and the nature of their trade compared with our own. That, with regard to the barrier, it is in itſelf, and apart from all other conſiderations, the true intereſt of England, that there ſhould be a good and ſufficient barrier againſt France on the ſide of the Netherlands: That no barrier could be ſufficient, that was not at leaſt equal to that ſtipulated in the Barrier-treaty: That the barrier inſiſted on, in the preliminaries of 1709, was not ſufficient for the defence of the Low-Countries, becauſe it conſiſted but of one ſingle line or chain of towns; whereas what might be further claimed, by virtue of the Barrier-treaty, was far from being more than neceſſary for that end: That the defence of the barrier ought to be committed to the ſtates, ſince it could not be preſerved by treaties with France, nor by defenſive alliances againſt her, nor by the houſe of Auſtria; nor by troops lent for the defence of the barrier, nor by England, but only by the ſtates. That, for the defence of the barrier in the hands of the ſtates, it was neceſſary they ſhould have a ſafe and free communication with it, and reaſonable, that the country of the barrier ſhould contribute towards the charge of maintaining it. That the Dutch had a right to a ſufficient barrier, and to have themſelves the defence of it, was acknowledged by the allies previous to the Barrier-treaty: That the ſtates having a barrier purſuant to the preſent treaty, was far from expoſing Great-Britain to any danger from them: That their barrier was granted them under ſuch regulations and reſtrictions, that they could not attempt any thing to the prejudice of the trade of Great-Britain, without a direct violation of the treaty, and an open rupture with our nation: That they were to have only the military command in the barrier towns, without any power of impoſing duties, prohibiting trade, or making any orders relating to commerce: That they were bound by the treaty to aſſiſt her majeſty, in caſe any others ſhould attempt to put our trade on a worſe foot than that of the nations the moſt favoured: That, even in caſe of a rupture with us, the ſtates could not obſtruct our trade in the Netherlands, without breaking at the ſame time with the emperor alſo: That if the fear of obſtructing our trade was an objection againſt truſting the ſtrong towns in the Netherlands in the hands of the ſtates, it was a ſtrong objection againſt truſting them in any other hands whatſoever. That, when the barrier was once put into the hands of the ſtates, it would be more their intereſt than ever to avoid breaking with England. That, ſuppoſing the ſtates ſhould be ſo imprudent, as to break with England, their barrier would be ſo far from making them more rich or formidable, that it would rather exhauſt and weaken them, with reſpect to England: becauſe the whole revenue of the Spaniſh Netherlands had never been ſufficient, ſince the Pyrenean treaty, to keep them in a tolerable poſture of defence; and therefore much leſs can that portion, aſſigned the ſtates by the treaty, be ſufficient. That with regard to the great objection, founded on the fifteenth article of the treaty, that it was highly prejudicial to the commerce of Great-Britain, to ſubmit our trade in the Spaniſh dominions to an equality with that of Holland and other nations; this is confuted by theſe conſiderations: That the trade of England and Holland to the Spaniſh dominions had always ſtood upon an equal foot, not only by virtue of their reſpective treaties with the crown of Spain, but likewiſe in fact; and that the crown of England had been ſo far from not ſubmitting to the advantages granted the Dutch by the treaty of Munſter, that it actually firſt procured them for the ſtates, and by a particular expreſs treaty, became guarantee for the performance: And that her majeſty was laid under no engagement by the fifteenth article of the Barrier-treaty, but what ſhe was previouſly obliged to by the grand alliance, as appears from the eighth article of that alliance. In the obſervations on the treaty and counter project, it is ſhewn, that there was not one variation of any moment throughout the whole treaty, but what was either purſuant to former treaties, or neceſſary to the rendering the barrier complete and effectual; and, on that account, as much for the intereſt of England, as of Holland itſelf.

Theſe votes were carried by a great majority, and were looked on as ſtrange preludes to a peace. When the ſtates heard what exceptions were taken to the Barrier-treaty, they wrote a very reſpectful letter to the queen, ſetting forth their juſt claim to, and the neceſſity of, the barrier for the ſecurity of England as well as Holland; concluding, 'That if there were ſome articles, which, without affecting the eſſentials of the treaty, might be thought to want explanation, her majeſty ſhould find them willing and ready to treat thereupon, and with all the facility and condeſcenſion that could be required of them, whatever ſhould not be of the laſt importance for the ſecurity and preſervation of their State. Intreating, withal, her majeſty to continue towards them that very precious friendſhip and good-will, with which ſhe had hitherto honoured them'. How much ſoever diſintereſted people might be affected with this letter, it made no impreſſion on the miniſtry, and the managers of the houſe of commons got all their votes to be digeſted into a well-compoſed inflaming repreſentation, which was laid before the queen; by it all the allies, but moſt particularly the ſtates, were charged with having failed in many particulars, contrary to their engagements: They alſo laid before the queen the votes they had made, with relation to the Barrier-treaty; and that they might name a great ſum, that would make a deep impreſſion on the nation (which was ready to receive all things implicitly from them) they ſaid England had been, during the war, overcharged nineteen millions, beyond what they ought to have paid; all which was caſt on the old miniſtry.

The ſtates, reſenting theſe proceedings, drew up a large memorial, in which every particular in the repreſentation was examined and fully anſwered. The two firſt heads of this memorial, which related to the ſervice at ſea and in Flanders, were printed here, and publiſhed in Engliſh in the Daily Courant, of April 7, containing a full anſwer to all that was charged on them, as to thoſe matters; to the ample conviction of all who examined the particulars. The houſe of commons ſaw the effect this was like to have; and therefore they voted the pretended (as they called it) memorial, to be a falſe, ſcandalous, and malicious libel, reflecting upon the reſolutions of the houſe, and that the printing of it was a breach of privilege. And, to ſtop the printing of the other heads, Mr. Samuel Buckley, the writer and printer of the Daily Courant, was taken into cuſtody. This was a confutation, to which no reply could be made; yet it ſeemed to be a confeſſion that their repreſentation could not be juſtified, when the anſwer to it was ſo carefully ſtifled. It was then generally reported, that the chief handle for this cenſure was a ſuppoſition that the memorial was not genuine; which appeared ſoon after to be entirely groundleſs, for the memorial had not only been printed at the Hague, but delivered by their envoy Van Borſelen to the queen, by whoſe order Mr. St. John wrote a ſhort anſwer[r].

The houſe of commons proceeded next to the repeal of the naturalization act, which had paſſed the laſt parliament in favour of the Proteſtant foreigners. A bill for the repeal of this act had been thrown out by the lords the laſt year, but it now paſſed both houſes, and received the royal aſſent.

Thoſe, who were ſuſpected of having bad deſigns, applied themſelves with great induſtry to drive on ſuch bills as they hoped would give the Preſbyterians in Scotland ſuch alarms, as might diſpoſe them to remonſtrate that the Union was broken.

To this end ſeveral bills were brought into the houſe of commons: They began with propoſing one for a toleration for the epiſcopal clergy to uſe the liturgy of the church of England. This ſeemed ſo reaſonable that no oppoſition was made to it: However the kirk of Scotland being alarmed at the deſign of ſetting up the church of England's liturgy and worſhip in North Britain; and upon the firſt notice, that a bill for that purpoſe was brought into the houſe of commons, the commiſſioners of the general aſſembly drew up a large repreſentation to the queen, ſetting forth, 'That the ſixth act of parliament in 1707, for ſecuring the Proteſtant religion and Preſbyterian government, (whereby all other acts in favour of the ſame are ratified and approved) is declared to be an eſſential and fundamental condition of the treaty of Union, without any alteration thereof, or derogation thereto, in any ſort, for ever, even beyond the reach of parliament. That they could not but expreſs their ſurprize and deep affliction, to hear of a bill offered for ſuch a large and almoſt boundleſs toleration, not only threatening the overthrow of their church, but giving a large licence almoſt to all errors and blaſphemies, and throwing up all good diſcipline, to the diſhonour of God, and the ſcandal and ruin of the true Chriſtian religion, and the infallible diſturbance of the quiet, and to the confuſion of that church and nation: And therefore with all humility, but with the greateſt earneſtneſs, they did beſeech, nay obteſt her majeſty, by the ſame mercy of God, that reſtored that church, and raiſed her majeſty to the throne, to interpoſe for the relief of that church, and the maintenance of the preſent eſtabliſhment, againſt ſuch a manifeſt and ruining incroachment, in ſuch manner, as in her royal wiſdom and juſtice ſhe ſhould think needful'. Notwithſtanding this repreſentation (which was preſented to the queen by Mr. Carſtairs, principal of the college of Edi-

[r] The anſwer was as follows:

'The queen having maturely conſidered the memorials of the 3d of April, which were preſented to her majeſty by the ſieur Van Borſelen, envoy-extraordinary from the lords the ſtates-general, and the reſolution of the ſaid ſtates of the 22d of the ſame month, which was communicated to her majeſty by the earl of Strafford, her ambaſſador-extraordinary, and plenipotentiary in Holland, has ordered me to give this anſwer in few words: That her majeſty is ſurprized to find, that far from giving the deſerved praiſes to the efforts, which her majeſty has made in Spain, and Portugal, two theatres of the war, that have been abandoned by the ſtates for ſo many years, the ſaid efforts, are looked upon only as quotas, which the queen was obliged to furniſh according to the rule of proportion, which has not the leaſt foundation. Her majeſty agrees, that, according to the principles laid down in the reſolution abovementioned, Great-Britain will never contribute enough, nor the United-Provinces too little.

There it is advanced as a maxim, that the power of each of the allies is the only rule and meaſure of the efforts they are to make; and, after this, the ſtates ſet up for judges, as well of the power of her majeſty's kingdom, as of that of their own ſtate. It is not difficult to perceive how far this ſort of logic would carry us: But her majeſty, far from being obliged by this memorial mentioned in the reſolution of the 22d of April to change her ſentiments, thinks fit to renew the declarations, which the earl of Strafford made by her order, and in her name. Theſe are not points, which the queen propoſes as a ſubject of negotiation, but a communication to her allies of the reſolution ſhe has taken, and of the rule laid down, that they may thereupon concert their meaſures.

The houſe of commons, which is compoſed of members ſent from each county of the kingdom, and who are competent judges of what burden the people are able to bear, have only granted ſubſidies for the current year, according to the proportions, and under the conditions, which have been imparted to the ſtates-general.

Her majeſty has declared to the houſe, that ſhe thought theſe conditions reaſonable, and has given her orders according to the plan, in which, by conſequence, there is not the leaſt alteration to be expected.

The queen looks upon an union betwixt herſelf and the ſtates to be the ſtrongeſt ſupport of the common cauſe; and for that reaſon has done all that ſhe could to traverſe the deſigns of thoſe factious ſpirits, which tended to break that union. The propoſals, which have been made, by her majeſty's plenipotentiaries to the miniſters of the ſtates-general, do uncontrovertibly manifeſt the queen's ſincere deſire to entertain a good correſpondence and ſtrict union with the ſtates. Theſe are all the ſteps, which her majeſty could take for that end. Her majeſty flatters herſelf, that they will have the effect, which ſhe ought to expect from them: and that they will diſſipate all thoſe vain fears and ill grounded jealouſies, which have been diſperſed with ſo much induſtry throughout the ſeven provinces. But, however that be, her majeſty will have this comfort, that ſhe has neglected nothing of what was in her power to contribute towards the ſatisfaction of the ſtates-general, without abandoning the intereſt of her own kingdoms'.

Done at Whitehall,
May 18, 1712.

H. St. John.

burgh) the act went on, and a clauſe was put in it, that occaſioned great complaints; the magiſtrates, who by the laws were obliged to execute the ſentences of the judicatories of their kirk, were by this act required, to execute none of them. It was reaſonable to require them to execute no ſentences, that might be paſſed on any, for doing what was tolerated by this act; but the carrying this to a general clauſe took away the civil ſanction, which in moſt places is looked on as the chief, if not the only, ſtrength of church power. Thoſe, who were to be thus tolerated, were required, by a day limited in the act, to take the oath of abjuration: it was well known, that few, if any of them, would take that oath; ſo, to cover them from it, a clauſe was put in this act, requiring all the Preſbyterian miniſters to take it; ſince it ſeemed reaſonable, that thoſe of the legal eſtabliſhment ſhould be required to take that, which was now to be impoſed on thoſe, who were only to be tolerated. It was well underſtood, that there were words in the oath of abjuration, to which the Preſbyterians excepted. In the act of ſucceſſion, one of the conditions, on which the ſucceſſor was to be received, was, his being of the communion of the church of England; and, by the oath of abjuration, the ſucceſſion was ſworn to, as limited by that act: The word, Limitation, imported only the entail of the crown; but it was ſuggeſted, that the particle, As, related to all the conditions in that act. This was ſpread among ſo many of that perſuaſion, that it was believed a great party among them would refuſe to take it: So a ſmall alteration was made by the houſe of lords of theſe words, 'As was limited', into words of the ſame ſenſe, 'Which was limited; but thoſe, who intended to excuſe the Epiſcopal party, who they knew were in the Pretender's intereſts, from taking the oath, were for keeping in thoſe words, which the Preſbyterians ſcrupled. The commons accordingly diſagreed to the amendment made by the lords; and, they receding from it, the bill paſſed, as it had been ſent up by the commons[s]. By this act the Epiſcopal clergy, provided they have been ordained by a Proteſtant biſhop, and taken the oaths of allegiance and abjuration, are permitted to uſe in their meetings the liturgy of the church of England without moleſtation. By the ſame act the miniſters of the eſtabliſhed church of Scotland are alſo obliged to take the oaths.

Another act paſſed for diſcontinuing the courts of judicature, during ſome days in Chriſtmas, though the obſerving of holidays was contrary to the principles of the Preſbyterians[t]. But this was intended only to exaſperate them.

Some time after the Toleration-act, a bill was brought in for the reſtoring of patronages. It was eſtabliſhed by the Preſbyterians from the time of the reformation, as a principle, that pariſhes had, from warrants in Scripture, a right to chuſe their miniſters: And therefore they had always looked on the right of patronage as an invaſion of their principles, and had aboliſhed it by law as a grievance. This right having been reſtored with Epiſcopacy in 1661, continued till 1690, when Preſbyterian church-government was again eſtabliſhed, and the right of patronage taken away. But it was now reſolved that it ſhould be reſtored. It was urged in oppoſition to it, that ſince, by the act of Union, Preſbytery, with all its rights and privileges, was unalterably ſecured, and ſince their kirk-ſeſſion was a branch of their conſtitution, the taking from them the right of chuſing their miniſters was contrary to that act: Yet the bill paſſed through both houſes, a ſmall oppoſition being only made in either. By theſe ſteps the Preſbyterians were alarmed, when they ſaw the ſucceſs of every motion that was made, on deſign to weaken and undermine their eſtabliſhment.

The ſelf-denying bill for limiting the number of officers ſitting in the houſe of commons was brought in, and, as was uſual, it eaſily paſſed there: The ſcandal of corruption was now higher than ever; for it was believed men were not only bribed for a whole ſeſſion, but had new bribes for particular votes. The twelve new peers, being brought into the houſe of lords, had irritated ſo many there, that, for two days, by all the judgments that could be made of the houſe, the bill was likely to have paſſed that houſe: But, upon ſome prevailing arguments, ſecretly and dextrouſly applied to ſome lords, an alteration was made in it, by which it was loſt: For whereas the bill, as it ſtood, was to take place after the determination of the preſent parliament, this was altered, ſo as that it ſhould take place after the demiſe of the queen; ſo it was no more thought on.

Prince Eugene ſtill continued in England, and was treated very civilly by the queen, though not with that diſtinction that was due to his high merit: Nor did he gain any ground with the miniſtry.

He had preſented a memorial to the queen (which he publiſhed in February) containing an account of the emperor's conduct in the war; concluding, with a propoſal in relation to the war in Spain. Some days paſſed before any notice was taken of this memorial, but, at laſt, Mr. St. John acquainted the commons, 'That he had received her majeſty's command to communicate to that houſe a propoſition made to her majeſty by prince Eugene of Savoy, in the name of the emperor, for the ſupport of the war in Spain; viz. 'His imperial majeſty judges, that forty thouſand men will be ſufficient for this ſervice; and that the whole expence of the war in Spain may amount to four millions of crowns; towards which his imperial majeſty offers to make up the troops, which he has in that country, to thirty thouſand men, and to take one million of crowns upon himſelf'. It was obſerved, that no member ſaid any thing to this meſſage; which made the prince very uneaſy about the ſucceſs of a negotiation, which had detained him ſo long from other important affairs on the continent. On the other hand, the courſe of the public entertainments, to which he was daily invited, was by this time interrupted by the death of his nephew, the chevalier de Savoye, who, being taken ill of the ſmall-pox the 20th of February, died four days after, in the 21ſt year of his age; and his corpſe was depoſited, without any funeral pomp, in the vault belonging to the dukes of Ormond, in Weſtminſter-Abbey.

Prince Eugene having delayed his departure as long as poſſible, in hopes of ſucceeding in his negotiation, had his audience of leave the 13th of March. He embarked the 17th, and, two days after, arrived at the Hague in the Peregrine yacht. Biſhop Burnet, whilſt the prince was in England, was admitted ſeveral times to much diſcourſe with him, and, from what appeared to him, the prince had a moſt unaffected modeſty, and ſcarcely bore the acknowledgments that all the world paid him: He deſcended to an eaſy quality with thoſe with whom he converſed, and ſeemed to aſſume nothing to himſelf, while he reaſoned with others.

During prince Eugene's ſtay in England, upon occaſion of ſome frolics and diſorders committed in the night-time, either by town-rakes, or drunken ſoldiers, a report was induſtriouſly ſpread, 'That there were great numbers of diſaffected perſons, who, under the name of Mohocks or Hawkubites, had combined together to diſturb the public peace; and who, in an inhuman manner, without any provocation, aſſaulted and wounded thoſe, whom they met with in the ſtreets, ſlitting or flatting people's noſes; gagging or diſtending their mouths with iron inſtruments, and committing many other extravagant cruelties.' At the ſame time printed liſts were handed about of many perſons, ſaid to have been taken up and committed to ſeveral priſons, upon account of theſe barbarities, amongſt whom ſome men of figure and titles were inſinuated to be; which gained ſo ſtrong a belief, and ſtruck ſuch a terror among the vulgar, that, as ſoon as night drew on, many were deterred from going about on their lawful occaſions. Hereupon the matter being laid before the queen, her majeſty, by the advice of her privy-council, iſſued a proclamation, 'for the ſuppreſſing of riots, and the diſcovery of ſuch as had been guilty of the late barbarities within the cities of London and Weſtminſter, and parts adjacent; charging and commanding, that the offenders be proſecuted with the utmoſt ſeverity and rigour of the law, and promiſing a reward of one hundred pounds for the diſcovery and apprehending of any perſon, who, ſince the firſt day of February laſt, had, without any provocation, wounded, ſtabbed, or maimed, or who ſhould, before the firſt day of May, wound, ſtab, or maim, any of her majeſty's ſubjects'. Though this proclamation at firſt confirmed the belief of the barbarities and riots, for the ſuppreſſing of which it was intended; yet the conſequence of it ſhewed, upon what ſlight grounds that belief had been entertained. For when people, under ſecurity of this proclamation, came to enquire calmly and coolly into the matter, it was found, that no other diſorders had happened of late, but ſuch as are uſual, and almoſt unavoidable in populous cities. But it was remarkable, that Brinſden, the oculiſt, and other agents of the men in power, were ſhrewdly ſuſpected of having raiſed and improved the report of this pretended combination of Mohocks and Hawkubites, in order to throw the odium of it upon the Whigs, whom, by all poſſible means, they endeavoured to render obnoxious to the people. However, to colour theſe proceedings, two common pick-pockets were tried, found guilty, and ſeverely fined for form ſake. And the lord Hinchinbrooke, then a youth, and an officer of the army, who, at the deſire, and in company of a conſtable, went out one night in queſt of the pretended Mohocks, were afterwards likewiſe arraigned and tried, as diſturbers of the public peace: But, their innocence manifeſtly appearing, the notion of Mohocks and Hawkubites was univerſally exploded.

[s] When the commons read this bill the third time, Sir David Dalrymple ſaid, 'Since I ſee the houſe is reſolved to make no alterations in the body of the bill, I acquieſce, and only deſire, the title of it may be this: A bill for eſtabliſhing Jacobitiſm and Immorality.' Pr. H. C. Vol. IV.

[t] The title of this act is, 'An act for diſcharging the Yule Vacance'.

The French refugees having preſented a petition to the queen for her interpoſition at the treaty of Utrecht in favour of their brethren under perſecution in France, and for the reſtitution of their eſtates in that kingdom, of which they had been ſo unjuſtly deprived; the earl of Dartmouth wrote a letter to monſieur Du Bourdieu and Graverole, two French Proteſtant miniſters, agents for the reſt; aſſuring them, that the biſhop of Briſtol and the earl of Strafford were already under the ſtricteſt orders to ſupport the intereſt of the French refugees at the negotiations of peace. Accordingly, the queen appointed Armand de Bourbon, marquis de Miremont, nephew to the earl of Feverſham, to go to Utrecht, and, in her majeſty's name, to take particular care of the intereſt of the French refugees. Notwithſtanding all this, they ſoon found that their intereſts were either but faintly ſupported by Great-Britain, or the court of France ſhewed no regard to the queen's interceſſion.

The ſupplies demanded were given by the commons, in all about ſix millions. There were two lotteries of one million eighteen hundred thouſand pounds each, for which a fund was created to pay both principal and intereſt in thirty-two years. Among the duties for raiſing this ſum, was a ſtamp-duty at two-pence a ſheet on news-papers and pamphlets. A motion was made for a clauſe to be put into one of the lottery bills, for appointing commiſſioners to examine the value and conſideration of all the grants made ſince the revolution. The miniſters apprehending the difficulty of carrying a money-bill, with a tack to it, through the houſe of lords, becauſe of their former reſolution againſt ſuch a practice, and the treaſurer promiſing ſome leading men, that he would uſe his intereſt to procure the paſſing a grant-bill, ſingle, in the houſe of peers, they prevailed to have it ſeparated from the money-bill, and, when paſſed, it was ſent up to the lords. Thoſe, who continued to pay a reſpect to the memory of king William, thought it was a very unbecoming return to him, who had delivered the nation from ſlavery and popery, to caſt ſo particular an indignity on his grants. The bill made all its ſteps through the houſe of lords, to the laſt, with a ſmall majority of one or two. On the third reading of the bill, a warm debate aroſe, in which the duke of Argyle ſaid, 'That, if for the eaſe of the public it was found proper to reſume the grants of the crown, he would readily give his vote for it, provided they would go ſo far back as the reſtoration of king Charles the Second. But he could never agree to limit the bill to grants of king William, becauſe ſuch an act would be injurious to the memory of the deliverer of Great-Britain, and all Europe; which ought to be had in reverence by all honeſt men'. The earl of Wharton, the lord Cowper, and lord Hallifax ſpoke, with great force and eloquence, againſt the partial diſtinction between grants ſince the revolution, and thoſe before it; adding, that ſuch a diſtinction gave too much credit to a miniſtry, who by the paſſing of the bill would have the means in their hands, to ruin and oppreſs thoſe, who had not the good luck to pleaſe them. The earl of Nottingham, who had been abſent the firſt two days, ſpoke on this occaſion, and ſaid, 'He always thought thoſe grants were too large, and very unſeaſonably made, but he thought there ought to be an equal way of proceeding in that matter; they ought either to reſume them all, or to bring all concerned in them to an equal compoſition: he therefore could not approve of this bill, which, by a very clear conſequence, would put it in the power of a fellow-ſubject, to reſume or to cover grants, at his pleaſure; and ſo it would put the perſons, concerned in the grants, into too great a dependance on him.' To this the lord-treaſurer anſwered, 'That no one had reaſon to be alarmed at the bill, ſince the intent of it was only to examine the value of the grants made by king William, and upon what conſiderations they were given; but that, as it was preſumed, thoſe, who enjoyed them, had rendered very ſignal ſervice to their country, ſo it was not to be doubted, but the parliament would confirm the ſame'. The earl of Wharton replied, 'That it was alſo to be preſumed, that thoſe, who enjoyed the grants of king Charles the Second and king James the Second might have likewiſe done important ſervice to the nation: Wherefore it would be very proper to look into the motives of all thoſe grants, in order to confirm them to thoſe who had deſerved them'. The earl of Oxford ſaid, 'That he had been informed, that the commons had no deſign abſolutely to reſume the grants of king William, but only to make the poſſeſſors pay the value of four or five years rent, for which they ſhould have the grants confirmed to them for ever': To which the earl of Wharton again replied, 'That he would not call in queſtion what a lord of ſuch probity and ſincerity had advanced; but that the reſumption of all the grants of Ireland ſufficiently ſhewed, that the commons had not been content with a part'. Several other ſpeeches, that were made on both ſides, prolonged the debate till between ſix and ſeven in the evening, when the queſtion being put, that the bill do paſs, it appeared upon the gathering of the votes, that there were ſeventy-eight voices on each ſide, fifty-three preſent, and twenty-five proxies for the affirmative; and fifty-two preſent, and twenty-ſix proxies for the negative; ſo the votes being equal, by the rule of the houſe, the negative carried it, to the great diſappointment of the enemies of the revolution. It was obſerved, that the loſs of this bill was in a great meaſure owing to the vigilance of the late duke of Portland. He being informed, that the lord Colepepper had ſent his proxy to the earl of Sunderland, who, by reaſon of his indiſpoſition, could not produce it, immediately diſpatched an expreſs to the lord Colepepper, and he ſent his proxy to another lord time enough to create part of the negative. On the other hand, many were of opinion, that, had not the duke of Buckingham and the earl of Strafford abſented themſelves from the houſe, the bill had certainly paſſed.

The queen three days after came to the houſe of peers, and gave the royal aſſent to the money-bills and others. As the earl of Strafford was now in London, it was expected, the queen would have laid before the parliament a ſtate of the negotiations of peace which had been carried on at the Hague. But, ſome points not being yet ſettled between the Britiſh and French Courts, ſhe did not think fit to make a ſpeech to both houſes. However, the ſpeaker, at preſenting the lottery-bill, ſaid in his compliment to the queen, 'Your faithful commons are in hopes, that what they have ſo chearfully given, for your majeſty's occaſions, will enable your majeſty to put an end to the preſent war by a ſafe and honourable peace'. There being no account come of any peace, as ſoon as the commons were returned to their houſe, Mr. Benſon, chancellor of the exchequer, afterwards lord Bingley, moved, that the call of the houſe (which had been ſeveral times put off) might be adjourned to the 4th of June, when he did not doubt, but the queen would lay before them the reſult of the preſent negotiations. Mr. Hampden complained, ſaying, 'Notwithſtanding all the promiſes given from time to time to the commons, we have an unactive and lazy campaign, and a trifling negotiation of peace; ſo that we are amuſed by our miniſters at home, and tricked by our enemies abroad'. Mr. ſecretary St. John had too great a ſhare in the management of affairs not to reſent theſe inſinuations; and ſaid with ſome emotion, 'That they highly reflected on her majeſty, and her miniſters. But though ſome members had been ſent to the Tower for leſs offences, and that he, who ſpoke laſt, might be fond of that honour; yet he hoped the houſe would be of another opinion'. Sir Richard Onſlow replied, 'That to ſuppoſe her majeſty, or her miniſters, to have any influence on the deliberations of that houſe, was injurious to her majeſty, and a violation of the privileges of that houſe'. In which he was ſeconded by Mr. Lechmere. But the debate went no further, in conſideration, as the friends of the prevailing party ſuggeſted, that, the ſeſſion drawing to an end, the commitment of a member at that time would rather be a pride than a mortification to him. And ſo, according to the motion of the chancellor of the exchequer, the call of the houſe was put off till the 4th of June.

A great change happened in the affairs of France, at the very time their plenipotentiaries were negotiating at Utrecht. The dauphin, the only ſon of the king of France, who died, in the 50th year of his age, of the ſmall-pox, on the 14th of April, N. S. 1711, left behind him three ſons, the duke of Burgundy, the king of Spain, and the duke of Berry. On the 12th of February 1711-12, N. S. the dauphineſs, Mary Adelaida of Savoy, died at Verſailles in the 26th year of her age, having been taken ſuddenly ill of a ſurfeit, as it was given out, three days before: And the dauphin himſelf, Lewis, late duke of Burgundy, ſurvived his ſpouſe but ſix days, dying at Marly on the 18th of the ſame month, in the 30th year of his age: And, in a few days after him, his eldeſt ſon, who was five years old, died likewiſe; and his ſecond ſon, then but two years old, was thought to be in a dying condition. Theſe deaths, coming ſo quick one after another, ſtruck the French court. The king himſelf was for ſome days ill, but he ſoon recovered. Such repeated ſtrokes were looked upon with amazement. Poiſon was ſuſpected, as is uſual upon all ſuch occaſions; and the duke of Orleans was generally charged with it. He was believed to have dealt much in chemiſtry, and was an ambitious prince. While he was in Spain at the head of king Philip's army, he formed a project to ſet him aſide; and to make himſelf king of Spain, in which, as the lord Townſhend told biſhop Burnet, he went ſo far, that he tried to engage Mr. Stanhope, to preſs the queen and the ſtates-general to aſſiſt him, promiſing to break with France, and to marry king Charles's dowager [u]. This being diſcovered, he was upon that called out of Spain; and it was thought, that the only thing, that ſaved him, was the king's kindneſs to his natural daughter, whom he had married. The king not only paſſed it over, but ſoon after obliged the duke of Berry to marry his daughter; ſuch care had the old king taken to corrupt the blood of France, with the mixture of his ſpurious iſſue. King Philip was not at all pleaſed with the alliance; but wrote to his elder brother, expoſtulating with him for not oppoſing the marriage more vigorouſly; with which he profeſſed himſelf ſo diſpleaſed, that he could not be brought to congratulate upon it. This letter was ſent from Madrid to Paris, but was intercepted, and ſent to Barcelona, and from thence to the Hague.

The duke of Burgundy, when he became dauphin upon his father's death, had been let into the underſtanding the ſecrets of government; and, as was given out, he had on many occaſions expreſſed a deep ſenſe of the miſeries of the people, with great ſentiments of juſtice. He had likewiſe, in ſome diſputes, which cardinal de Noailles had with the Jeſuits, eſpouſed his intereſts, and protected him. It was likewiſe believed, that he retained a great affection to the archbiſhop of Cambray, whoſe fable of Telemachus carried in it the nobleſt maxims poſſible for the conduct of a wiſe and good prince, and ſet forth that ſtation in ſhining characters, but which were the reverſe of Lewis the XIVth's whole life and reign. Theſe things gave the French a juſt ſenſe of the loſs they had in his death; and the apprehenſions of a minority, after ſuch a reign, ſtruck them with great conſternation. Theſe deaths, in ſo critical a time, ſeemed to portend, that all the vaſt ſchemes, which the French king had formed with ſo much perfidy and bloodſhed, was in a fair way to be ſoon blaſted. But his affairs were ſoon retrieved by the enſuing peace, to the negotiations of which it is now time to turn.

The place appointed for the congreſs was the city of Utrecht; and the day named for opening it, was the firſt of January 1711-12, O. S. The firſt miniſter that appeared at the place of treaty was doctor Robinſon, lord privy-ſeal, one of the Britiſh plenipotentiaries, who came there the 15th of January; and, two days after, arrived the other Britiſh plenipotentiary, the earl of Strafford. On the 18th came alſo two of the Dutch plenipotentiaries [w], who were followed the next morning by the three French plenipotentiaries, the marſhal d'Uxelles, the abbot de Polignac, and monſieur Meſnager [x]. The emperor and the empire ſent their miniſters very late and unwillingly; but they ſubmitted to the neceſſity of their affairs. Yet, upon this condition (poſitively given them by the earl of Strafford, and confirmed to prince Eugene by the Britiſh court) that the ſeven preliminaries offered by France, and ſigned by Meſnager, ſhould be only bare propoſals, and ſhould not be admitted as the baſis of the treaty. To ſave the loſs of time in ſettling the ceremonial, it was alſo agreed, that the plenipotentiaries ſhould aſſume no character of dignity, till all matters were adjuſted, and made ready for ſigning. At the ſame time, it was likewiſe agreed, that the general conferences ſhould begin on Friday the 29th of January, N. S. and ſhould afterwards be held on Wedneſdays and Saturdays at ten in the morning.

Theſe things being ſettled, the firſt conference was opened on the day appointed, by eight miniſters of the allies, namely, the two Britiſh, four of the States-general, two of the duke of Savoy's, and the three plenipotentiaries of France. The lord privy-ſeal, (who appeared in a black velvet-gown, adorned with gold loops, with a long train borne up by two pages in aſh-coloured coats, laced with ſilver orris, and waiſtcoats of green velvet) addreſſed himſelf to the miniſters of France in the following ſpeech:

Gentlemen,

"We are this day met together, in the name of God, to lay the foundation of a general peace between the high allies and the king your maſter. We bring ſincere intentions, and alſo poſitive orders from our principals, to concur in every thing on their part, which may tend to the furtherance and happy concluſion of ſo beneficial and Chriſtian-like a work.

On the other hand, we are in hopes, gentlemen, that you are of the ſame mind, and that your inſtructions are ſo full, as to enable you to anſwer, without loſs of time, the expectation of the high allies, in explaining yourſelves clearly and roundly upon the points, which are to be ſettled in theſe conferences: And that you will do it in ſo plain and particular a manner, that all and every of the confederate princes and ſtates may find a juſt and reaſonable ſatisfaction upon their reſpective pretenſions." The marſhal d'Uxelles, firſt plenipotentiary of France, anſwered, "That it could not be doubted, but his moſt chriſtian majeſty had a ſincere and ardent deſire to give peace to Europe;" adding, "That with this view his majeſty had furniſhed his plenipotentiaries with ample inſtructions, and a full power to come to the concluſion of ſo beneficial a work, which was ſo earneſtly deſired by all Europe." The earl of Strafford took occaſion to declare, that the queen had received the general propoſitions as a foundation for a negotiation of peace; but that they were binding to France only, and not to the allies; to which the French miniſters readily aſſented. But it is to be obſerved through the whole proceeding, that this is meant of the propoſitions ſigned by Meſnager only, the congreſs not having the leaſt notice or cognizance of what was ſigned, both on the part of France and England too; which had been hitherto concealed, and, upon all occaſions, publicly diſowned. The plenipotentiaries of the ſtates and duke of Savoy made likewiſe ſpeeches ſuitable to the occaſion; after which, the aſſembly broke up. The next day, the miniſters of the allies agreed to meet at the town-houſe twice a week during the congreſs, in order to preſerve union amongſt them, and to take the neceſſary meaſures for promoting the intereſt of the reſpective princes and ſtates they repreſented. At one of theſe meetings, becauſe the French miniſters had in their ſpeeches promiſed to deliver in writing the intentions of their court, it was reſolved to deliver to them, in the next conference, a declaration, "That the miniſters of the high allies, already there, expected, according to the offers of the miniſters of France, the plan or ſcheme they had promiſed; and would not fail to return an anſwer thereto, for what concerned the particular intereſt of their principals; and as to the miniſters of ſuch of the allies, who were ſtill abſent, they had reaſon to believe, that they would forthwith repair thither, to concur with them in their anſwer."

This paper being delivered to the French miniſters in the ſecond conference on the 3d of February, they promiſed to give in their offers for a general peace; but declared they wiſhed that all the miniſters of the allies were preſent that they might, at the ſame time, receive a counter-project or anſwer from all the members of the grand alliance. Accordingly little was done at the third conference; but at the fourth, Feb. 10. N. S. the imperial miniſters being arrived, a warm diſpute aroſe between them and the French plenipotentiaries. 'The marſhal d'Uxelles ſaid, the king, his maſter, had moſt ſincere intentions to end this war to the ſatisfaction of the allies; That, in order to that, they ought to deal roundly and fairly. That he hoped a good ſucceſs of this negotiation, ſince the ambaſſadors of the houſe of Auſtria had at laſt reſolved to come to the congreſs;' and thereupon he deſired

[u] This is the project hinted at by the author of the manuſcript account of the campaigns in Spain which was made to lord Galway, who ſent Mr. Stanhope to the duke of Orleans to hear his offers. But the author of the duke of Orleans's Life gives a different account of the duke's project. He ſays, Lewis XIV. being obliged by the ſucceſſes of the allies to promiſe to abandon his grandſon Philip king of Spain, the Spaniards offered to place the duke of Orleans upon the throne in his room, to which he conſented. But, this conſent of his being afterwards miſrepreſented to the king of France, as a ſcheme to have uſurped the Spaniſh crown from king Philip, the duke was for ſome time in diſgrace at the court of France.—La vie de Philippe d'Orleans, vol. II. p. 93.

[w] The plenipotentiaries named by the States, were, monſieur Ranawick, for the province of Guelderland; monſieurs Buys and Vanderduſſen, for that of Holland; monſieur de Moermont, for Zealand; monſieur de Renſwoude, for Utrecht; monſieur de Gollinga, for Friezland; the count de Rechteren, for Over-Yſſel; and the count de Tu and Kniphuyſen, for Groningen.

[x] As France had named three plenipotentiaries, and monſieur Meſnager in particular, to take care of commercial affairs; the court of Great-Britain had a mind to add Mr. Prior to their two miniſters at Utrecht, for the ſame purpoſe; but the earl of Strafford, having abſolutely refuſed to be joined in commiſſion with a perſon of ſo mean extraction, and threatening to lay down his employment, the buſineſs of trade was committed to the lord privy-ſeal; who, not being verſed in thoſe matters, was obliged to direct himſelf by the lights he received from Mr. Arthur Moore.

the miniſters of the allies to deliver the propoſals they had to make. Count Zinzendorf anſwered, 'That the emperor, his maſter, had no leſs ſincere intentions to contribute all that lay in his power towards ſo deſirable a bleſſing, as a general peace: But that it ſeemed Monſieur d'Uxelles, inſtead of dealing roundly and fairly, began, on the contrary, with a fetch, ſince he could not be a ſtranger to the demands of the Allies, nor have forgot where the conferences at Gertruydenberg broke off: That there was nothing more for them to do now, than to find out ways and means to remove the difficulties, that had obſtructed that negotiation: And, ſince the king, their maſter, had deſired this congreſs of the allies, they had reaſon to expect, that he had given his miniſters neceſſary inſtructions for that end.' By this he inſinuated, that the allies inſiſted on the firſt preliminaries ſigned at the Hague in the year 1709. Count Zinzendorf likewiſe took notice of this expreſſion, 'The ambaſſadors of the houſe of Auſtria, as derogatory to his imperial majeſty'. The abbot de Polignac replied, "That they ought to talk no more of the affair of Gertruydenberg, ſince the king had fixed a time for the allies to accept his propoſal; which they not having done, he was under no engagement." This occaſioned a high debate; and d'Uxelles having, in relation to the affairs of Spain, ſaid, "That they ought to wait the arrival of the ambaſſador of that crown"; count Zinzendorf replied, "He was preſent, and himſelf was the perſon". The marſhal returned, "That he acknowledged none but king Philip's"; which inflamed the diſpute; and the marſhal having likewiſe advanced, in relation to a point in debate, "That the queen of England had engaged her promiſe"; the lord privy-ſeal ſaid, "There was no ſuch thing in his inſtructions". At laſt, the French miniſters conſented to deliver their propoſals in writing, which they did February 11, in a very high ſtrain.

They promiſed, that at the ſigning of the treaty they would own the queen and the ſucceſſion to the crown, as ſhe ſhould direct; Spain and the Weſt-Indies were to remain with king Philip; the dominions in Italy, with the iſlands, except Sicily were to go to the emperor, and the Spaniſh Netherlands to the elector of Bavaria: The trade was to be regulated, as it was before the war; ſome places in Canada were to be reſtored to England, with the freedom of fiſhery in Newfoundland; but Placentia was to remain with the French: Dunkirk was offered to be demoliſhed; but Liſle and Tournay were to be given for it: The ſtates were to have their demands for the barrier; and the frontier between France, the Empire, and Italy, was to be the ſame, that it was before the war; by which Landau, Feneſtrella, and Exiles were to be reſtored to France[y]. Theſe demands (which were called a ſpecific explanation of the offers of France for a general peace, to the ſatisfaction of all the allies) were as extravagant as any the French king could have made, in the moſt proſperous ſtate of his affairs. They filled the allies with indignation, and heightened the jealouſy they had of a ſecret underſtanding, between the courts of England and France. This indignation had ſuch an effect, that the earl of Strafford, in his letter of the 16th of February 1711-12, ſays, "The French miniſters were mortified at the general diſcontent theſe offers gave; and ſeemed to wiſh, they had put in Tournay for the Dutch; and St. Venant to be demoliſhed, to have ſoftened the matter at its firſt coming out". Nor were the Britiſh plenipotentiaries without their uneaſineſs. They had done all they could, as the earl of Strafford ſays in his letter of the 12th of February, to perſuade the French to be as ample in the explication as they could, "ſeeing that is what will have a great effect, and ſtrike the minds of unthinking people, and make ſome work for reflection for the faction". The Britiſh plenipotentaries complained, that they were under great difficulties on all hands, for both Buys and Meſnager thought they came ſhort of what had been told them in England; and, the allies then forming their reſpective demands in concert with each other, they wanted further orders. Theſe plenipotentiaries, were likewiſe at a great loſs how to behave about Spain, both in regard to the particular advantages, that were to be aſked on the behalf of Great-Britain, and the general diſpoſition of it. But Mr. Secretary St. John ſoon ſent them words of comfort, in a letter of the 16th of February, that Mr. Harley, ſecretary of the treaſury, would ſet out in a few days, who is fully inſtructed in all the queen's views and deſires: "That it were to be wiſhed this gentleman could have been ſooner ſent; but the hurry, ſays he, which we have been in for ſome time, is inexpreſſible, and he was too uſeful to be ſpared, till the houſe of commons were perfectly ſecured to the queen's intereſt, and to the meaſures of peace. I think I may ſay, they are abſolutely ſo now. The Secretary confeſſed the French plan to be too ſcanty; and obſerved, that they muſt let the French miniſters know, that the whole turned upon their manner of proceeding, her majeſty having gone further than could have been expected from her in promoting the peace".

The ſpecific explanation raiſed no leſs indignation among true Engliſhmen, than among the allies; more particularly the putting off the owning the queen, till the treaty came to be ſigned: The lord-treaſurer, to ſoften this, ſaid, he ſaw a letter, in which the king of France acknowledged her Queen: this was a confeſſion that there was a private correſpondence between them; yet the doing it by a letter was no legal act. In excuſe of this it was ſaid, that the late king was not

[y] Theſe propoſals at large were as follow:

A ſpecific explanation of the offers of France for a general peace, to the ſatisfaction of all-parties concerned in the preſent war.

"The king will acknowledge, at the ſigning of the peace, the queen of Great-Britain in that quality; as alſo the ſucceſſion of that crown, according to the preſent ſettlement, and in the manner her Britannic majeſty ſhall pleaſe.

"His majeſty will cauſe all the fortifications of Dunkirk to be demoliſhed immediately after the peace, provided an eqnivalent be given him to his ſatisfaction.

"The iſland of St. Chriſtopher, Hudſon's-Bay, and ſtreight of that name, ſhall be yielded up intire to Great-Britain; and Acadia, with Port-Royal, and the Fort, ſhall be reſtored intire to his majeſty. As to the iſland of Newfoundland, the king offers to yield up that alſo to Great-Britain, reſerving only to himſelf the fort of Placentia, and the right of catching and drying fiſh, as before the war. It ſhall be agreed to make a treaty of commerce before or after the peace, as England ſhall chuſe, the conditions of which ſhall be made as equal between the two nations, as they can poſſibly.

"The king will conſent at the ſigning of the peace, that the Spaniſh Netherlands, which are made over and given to the elector of Bavaria by the king of Spain, ſhall ſerve for a barrier to the United-Netherlands; and, to augment it, he will join thereto Furnes, and the Furnes-Ambaught, or diſtrict, Knock, Ypres, and the caſtellany of Menin with its verge. In exchange, his majeſty demands to form the barrier of France, Aire, St. Venant, Bethune, Doway, and their dependencies. If the ſtates-general are deſirous to keep garriſons in the fortified places of the barrier ſo formed of the dominions transferred to his electoral highneſs, and of what France adds thereto of its own; his majeſty conſents, that they ſhall put their troops into them in as great number as they pleaſe: And beſides, that they ſhall be maintained at the expence of the country.

"In conſideration of this ceſſion, and of this conſent, the king on his ſide demands, as an equivalent for the demoliſhing of Dunkirk, the towns and citadels of Liſle, and Tournay, with their caſtellanies, and dependencies.

"The barrier thus regulated between France and the ſtates-general, the king will grant for augmenting the commerce of their ſubjects what is ſtipulated by the treaty of Ryſwick, and the advantageous Tariff of 1664, with an exception only of ſix ſorts of merchandize, which ſhall be agreed on, and which ſhall remain charged with the ſame duties, that are paid at this time; as alſo the exemption of 50 ſols per ton on the Dutch ſhipping, that came into France, from the United Provinces, and foreign countries.

"As to the commerce of Spain, and the Indies, the king will engage, not only to the States-general, but likewiſe to her Britannic majeſty, and to all other potentates, by virtue of the power he has in this particular, that the ſaid commerce ſhall be allowed exactly, and carried on in the very ſame manner as it was under the reign, and till the death of Charles II. and will promiſe, that the French ſhall ſubmit, as all the other nations, to the antient laws and regulations made by the kings, his Catholic majeſty's predeceſſors, with reſpect to the commerce and navigation of the Spaniſh Indies.

"His majeſty further conſents, that all the potentates of Europe may enter into the guaranty of this promiſe. His majeſty promiſes, that the king his grandſon ſhall renounce, for the ſake of the peace, all pretenſions to the kingdom of Naples, and Sardinia, as well as to the duchy of Milan; in whoſe name he will conſent, that the part of that duchy, which is made over to the duke of Savoy, ſhall remain to his royal highneſs; provided, that in conſideration of this ceſſion, the houſe of Auſtria do in like manner deſiſt from all pretenſions to the other parts of the monarchy of Spain, from whence that houſe ſhall withdraw their troops immediately after the peace.

"The frontiers on both ſides upon the Rhine ſhall be ſettled in the ſame condition, as they were before the preſent war.

"In conſideration of all the terms above ſpecified, the king demands, that the electors of Cologne and Bavaria ſhall be re-eſtabliſhed in the full and entire poſſeſſion of their dominions, dignities, prerogatives, goods moveable and immoveable, which they enjoyed before the preſent war: and reciprocally his majeſty will recognize in Germany, and in Pruſſia, all the titles, which he has not yet acknowledged.

"The king will reſtore the duke of Savoy what he has taken from him during this war; as in like manner his royal highneſs ſhall reſtore to him what he has taken from France; ſo that the limits on both ſhall be the ſame they were before the declaration of war.

"All things as to Portugal ſhall be re-eſtabliſhed, and remain on the ſame foot in Europe, that they were before the preſent war, as well with regard to France as to Spain: and as to the dominions, which that crown has in America, if there be any differences to ſettle, endeavours ſhall be uſed to agree them amicably.

"The king will conſent freely, and bona fide, to take in concert with the allies all the moſt juſt meaſures for hindering the crowns of France and Spain from being ever united on the ſame head; that is to ſay, that one and the ſame prince ſhall never be at once king of both.

"All preceding treaties, that is, thoſe of Munſter, and others, that have been made ſince, ſhall be repeated and confirmed, to remain in their force and virtue, excepting only ſuch articles, from which the treaty of peace, now to be made, ſhall derogate or alter ſomething".

Signed, UXELLES.

It may be obſerved, that the king of France here makes, as well as in the ſpecial preliminaries, his firſt offers in the name, and by virtue of powers from his grandſon as king of Spain. But how the Britiſh plenipotentiaries could reconcile this to their inſtructions, and how their behaviour upon it was to be juſtified, is not very clear.

owned by the French, till the treaty of Ryſwick came to be ſigned: but there was a mediator in that treaty, with whom our plenipotentiaries only negotiated; whereas there was no mediator at Utrecht: ſo that the queen was now, without any interpoſition, treating with a prince, who did not own her right to the crown. The propoſitions made by the French were treated with the greateſt ſcorn, nor did the miniſters pretend to ſay any thing in excuſe for them. The Lord Halifax made a motion in the houſe of peers, for preſenting an addreſs to the queen, about the ſpecific offers of France, which his lordſhip called, 'triflling, arrogant, and injurious to her majeſty and her allies.' He was ſeconded by ſeveral peers, of both parties, who ſaid in ſubſtance, 'That thoſe propoſitions ought to be rejected with the utmoſt ſcorn and indignation; that it plainly appeared, France had no other deſign in view, than to amuſe the allies; and, in particular, that it was derogatory to her majeſty's honour, to enter into any negotiation with that crown, before her majeſty's juſt title was acknowledged'. Some endeavours were uſed to adjourn the debate at leaſt till the next day, by ſuggeſting, 'That the offers that were handed about, having yet no other authority, than their being inſerted in the Holland Gazettes, might not be genuine; and therefore the lords ought not to take any notice of them, till ſuch time as the queen had communicated them to the houſe'. But this, and other arguments, were over-ruled; and an addreſs was made to the queen, expreſſing a juſt indignation at ſuch a proceeding, promiſing her all aſſiſtance in their power, in carrying on the war, till ſhe could obtain a ſafe and honourable peace [z].

While this paſſed in England, the propoſitions of France, which were quickly diſperſed in print in all the United Provinces, were received with the utmoſt indignation by people of all ranks, the multitude not forbearing to vent the ſevereſt reproaches againſt thoſe, from whom they ſuppoſed the French court had received encouragement. Theſe offers, however, had this good effect, that thoſe among the Dutch, who before were moſt eager for a peace, particularly the regency of Utrecht, reſolved to ſpend their laſt penny to carry on the war.

Copies of the ſpecific explanation being ſent by all the miniſters of the allies to their reſpective principals, the earl of Strafford, at the next general conference, told the miniſters of France, purſuant to what had been agreed at a meeting of the other miniſters, "That they found it neceſſary to take time till the 5th of March, N. S. to give in the ſpecific demands of the parties engaged in the war". To which the French miniſters readily agreed. In the mean time, the miniſters of the allies communicated to each other their reſpective demands, agreed upon the manner in which they were to deliver them in, and, at a meeting on the 3d of March, reſolved, that a clauſe of mutual guarantee, importing, 'that a juſt and reaſonable ſatisfaction ſhould be given to all the allies, according to treaties, engagements, and other conventions, ſhould be inſerted among their demands.

The miniſters of the Proteſtant allies were ſeveral times in conference together, to concert ſuch meaſures as might be proper to be taken, during the courſe of this congreſs, for the ſecurity of their religion, and particularly an abolition of a clauſe in the fourth article of the treaty of Ryſwick, prejudicial to the ſame: As likewiſe the making ſome proviſion, in their negotiations with the miniſters of France, for the relief of the Proteſtants of that kingdom. But, though theſe particulars were mentioned in the demands of the Proteſtant allies, yet they were afterwards but faintly inſiſted on; and it was obſerved, that in this negotiation, as in moſt former treaties, the Proteſtants ſhewed not an equal zeal for their religious concerns, as they did for their temporal intereſts.

On the 4th of March, the miniſters of the allies met again, and count Zindendorf again inſiſted, That the reſtitution of the whole Spaniſh monarchy ſhould be expreſsly mentioned. The Dutch declared, They were reſolved to make good all their treaties, made on occaſion of this war, as well thoſe that related to Spain and the Indies, as thoſe made with Portugal; but the Britiſh were the only miniſters, that did not make any mention of Spain and the Indies, contenting themſelves with a general declaration concerning the juſt and reaſonable ſatisfaction for the queen's allies, in conformity to her alliances. However, it is obſervable, that a few days after, upon the earneſt inſtances of the imperial miniſters, the Britiſh and Dutch plenipotentiaries made a declaration (which was regiſtered in the Protocol, kept by monſieur Buys) importing, That by the clauſe of mutual guarantee or claim, agreed to on the 3d, and inſerted in their reſpective demands, 'they underſtood the reſtitution of Spain and the Indies to the Houſe of Auſtria'.

At the general conference held the next day, the miniſters of the allies delivered in writing, their ſpecific demands which ran as high as the French explanation, another way. The emperor aſked the whole Spaniſh monarchy; England aſked the reſtoring Newfoundland, and the demoliſhing of Dunkirk; the States aſked their whole barrier; and every ally aſked ſatisfaction to all the other allies, as well as to himſelf: England and the States declared, that they demanded Spain, and the Weſt-Indies, for the emperor; ſo the high pattern ſet by the French, in their demands, was to the full imitated by the allies. The French plenipotentiaries declared they could not give in ſpecific anſwers to ſo many demands of the allies, till they had received new inſtructions from Paris and Madrid, and therefore deſired till the 30th of March, N. S. to deliver them in, to which no objection was made [a].

When the 30th of March came, ſuch of the miniſters of the allies, as were not in the ſecret, were full of expectation, that the French plenipotentiaries would give in a ſpecific anſwer to their demands; but they were not a little ſurpriſed, when, inſtead of offering an anſwer in writing, marſhal d'Uxelles propoſed to enter into verbal conferences on the demands made on both ſides. This indeed had been practiſed in treaties where mediators interpoſed, but that was not done till the main points were ſecretly agreed to. The miniſters of the allies rejected this propoſal, and demanded, 'ſpecific anſwers in writing'. Upon Polignac's ſaying, they would not anſwer in writing, their inſtructions being only to treat verbally, one of the Dutch miniſters propoſed to break up the congreſs: but he was ſoon taken down by the Britiſh miniſters, who could not agree with the Dutch in that particular; but ſaid, on the contrary, they would enter into a negotiation by way of dictating, as was done at the Hague, in the conference with the deputies of the ſtates. However, the next day, at a meeting among themſelves, they unanimouſly agreed upon a declaration, wherein they inſiſted, 'That an anſwer be delivered them in writing'. But at the next general conference the French miniſters ſtill refuſed to comply with this declaration, which was delivered to them by monſieur Buys.

This refuſal of the French raiſed a very great heat in the aſſembly; and ſome miniſters gave it as their opinion, that ſuch trifling was a ſufficient ground to diſſolve the congreſs; for the French plenipotentiaries refuſing to anſwer in the method all the miniſters of the allies had agreed on, it would be fruitleſs, as well as diſhonourable, for the latter to remain at Utrecht. However, the Britiſh miniſters were of opinion, that the negotiations might be managed on the foot propoſed by France; but when they obſerved, that the tide ran too ſtrong againſt them, and that the generality were of contrary ſentiments, they concurred with the reſt, and declared, that they had poſitive inſtructions to conform themſelves to the general opinion of the miniſters of the congreſs. According to this reſolution, Mr. Buys delivered a ſecond declaration in the name of all the allies, wherein they perſiſted to demand an anſwer in writing to their ſpecific demands. In anſwer to this, the French miniſters declared, "That, as they had poſitive inſtructions not to engage themſelves in a negotiation

[z] The addreſs was as follows:

Moſt gracious ſovereign,

"We your majeſty's moſt dutiful and loyal ſubjects, the lords ſpiritual and temporal, in parliament aſſembled, beg leave humbly to repreſent to your majeſty the juſt indignation of this houſe, at the diſhonourable treatment of your majeſty by France, in having propoſed to acknowledge your majeſty's title to theſe realms, no ſooner, than when the peace ſhall be ſigned. And we cannot forbear expreſſing our utmoſt reſentment at the terms of peace offered to your majeſty, and your allies, by the plenipotentiaries of France: And we do, with the greateſt zeal and affection, aſſure your majeſty, that this houſe will ſtand by, and aſſiſt your majeſty with our lives and fortunes, in carrying on this war, in conjunction with your allies, till a ſafe and honourable peace can be obtained for your majeſty and your allies".

The queen's anſwer was to this effect:

My lords,

"I return you my hearty thanks for the zeal you expreſs for my honour, and for the aſſurance you give of ſupporting me. Pr. H. L.

[a] The French miniſters and their partiſans exclaimed againſt the demands of the allies as Unreaſonable and Exorbitant; but they excepted in a particular manner againſt the pretenſions of the allies, in favour of the French Proteſtants. The abbot de Polignac, who had a cardinal's hat in view, and therefore could not fail on all occaſions to ſhew his zeal for the Romiſh church, appeared the moſt obſtinate on that article; and diſcourſing one day with Vanderduſſen, one of the Dutch plenipotentiaries, about the demand, "That the French Proteſtants in the gallies, or detained in priſon, ſhould be ſet at liberty", aſked him, Whether the ſtates would ſet at liberty the people detained in their Spin-houſe, and Raſp-houſe, if the French king ſhould demand it"? Vanderduſſen, juſtly reſenting that odious compariſon, told him, "That if the French court would own the people detained in thoſe houſes for their brethren, as the ſtates owned for ſuch the Proteſtants in the gallies, whom they interceded for, he did not queſtion, but their high-mightineſſes would ſet at liberty thoſe malefactors". The French abbot, being confounded with this anſwer, turned off the diſcourſe to other matters.

in writing, they could not do it without new orders from the king their maſter; to which end they would immediately diſpatch a courier, to acquaint him with this laſt reſolution of the allies". Some of the miniſters of the allies replied, " That they had reaſon to have expected, that they had not wanted ſuch inſtructions; but, however, they were willing a longer time might be taken, if it were deſigned with purpoſe to anſwer effectually". The French miniſters replied, " That they could promiſe no more than to follow the inſtructions they ſhould receive, ſince they did not expect the allies would have dealt with them in ſo tyrannical a manner" : adding, " That they pleaded for no more than was practiſed at the treaties of Munſter, Nimeguen, and Ryſwick". But their aſſertion was proved to be wrong with reſpect to theſe treaties, where every thing was not altogether tranſacted by word of mouth, without writing. Beſides, it was urged, that there were mediators at thoſe treaties, whereas there was none at Utrecht, which made this an irregular ſort of a congreſs. The marſhal d'Uxelles anſwered, " That they had no reaſon to deliver any thing in writing, ſince the confederates made a bad uſe of the laſt, to inflame the people againſt them". To which one of the imperial miniſters replied, " That the French had no more to do, but to give in juſt and reaſonable propoſals in writing; and then it would inflame the people againſt the allies, if they refuſed to accept them". One of the Dutch miniſters having been ſo plain, as to tell the marſhal d'Uxelles, that the French court would be deceived, if they expected a peace by tampering with ſome of the allies, in order to divide them from the reſt; the marſhal warmly replied, " That not only the preſent king of France, but even the whole royal family would enter into a vow to be revenged upon the Dutch, if they obſtructed the peace". To which one of the confederate miniſters anſwered, " That ſuch menacing diſcourſes would only ſerve to keep the Dutch on their guard, and arm them againſt all future revenge, by inducing them to lay hold on this opportunity to cruſh that power which now threatened them". When theſe heats were over, the French miniſters promiſed again to write to the king, their maſter, in order to know his pleaſure on the ſubject in hand, in which the miniſters of the allies were obliged to acquieſce. But it was agreed, that, unleſs ſome extraordinary occaſion required it, no general conference ſhould be held on the 9th of April. On the 13th, another general conference was held, in which nothing material was done; and the French miniſters, whoſe only buſineſs, it ſeems, was to gain time, propoſed, that the next general conference, which was to be held the 16th, might be put off, as had been done before, unleſs the allies had ſomething particular to offer. This propoſal not being agreed to, the general conference was held, as uſual, on the 16th, and the miniſters of the allies enquiring again of thoſe of France, whether they were ready to give ſpecific anſwers in writing, the French plenipotentiaries ſtill excuſed themſelves, on pretence of their not being yet fully inſtructed from the king, their maſter, on that ſubject. The truth is, they knew very well, that their buſineſs was not to be done at Utrecht, but by a negotiation carried on directly between London and Verſailles. And it appears from the Report of the Committee of Secrecy, that the refuſal of the French to give no anſwer in writing was no ſurprize to the Britiſh miniſters, whom they had before-hand adviſed with. The earl of Strafford, in his letter to Mr. Secretary St. John, of the 25th of March, expreſſed himſelf thus: I cannot help ſaying, I believe the French have taken the wiſeſt part not to anſwer in writing, though moſt of the miniſters of the allies will be ſurprized, expecting they ſhould". And he ſaid further; " I believe it is beſt they ſhould firſt begin in the open congreſs to reaſon upon ſome of the allies demands, which will occaſion ſo much difficulty, that the miniſters of the allies will propoſe debating ſeparately, which had better come from them than any elſe". And, when his lordſhip ſent an account, that a reſolution was taken at the Hague, upon the French miniſter's continuing obſtinate, Mr. St. John, in his letter of April 5, expreſſed himſelf in this manner: " That he hoped the reſolution, taken at the Hague to carry things to an extremity, was the laſt convulſive pang of an expiring faction". And yet this reſolution was no more than to inſiſt on a demand, in which all the allies were unanimous, and in which the Britiſh plenipotentiaries had themſelves concurred. But what made the French thus perſiſt in the reſolution of giving no anſwer in writing, is accounted for in the earl of Strafford's letter of the 27th of March, wherein he ſays, That the penſionary was extremely deſirous, that the French would anſwer in writing, which, it was his lordſhip's opinion they would evade, till they ſaw what ſucceſs the abbé Gaultier had at London. And, in his letter of the 30th, he ſaid, " The French will avoid giving their anſwer in writing, till they ſee all agreed betwixt their court and ours". And to ſhew, that the French were very well ſatisfied with the method, which their buſineſs was in, the plenipotentiaries, in their letter of April 15, ſay, " They do not find the French are much convinced of the neceſſity of diſpatch; and when any thing is let fall of breaking off the conferences, they ſeem to take it with a great air of indifference, well knowing their buſineſs was not to be done at Utrecht, but by a negotiation carried on directly between London and Verſailles". About the beginning of April, Mr. Thomas Harley and the abbé Gaultier arrived at Utrecht. For whoſe uſe and ſervice Mr. Harley had been ſo well employed at home, as has been already obſerved, and was now ſent abroad, cannot be a doubt, ſince Mr. Secretary St. John thought it neceſſary to give monſieur de Torcy an immediate account of his ſucceſsful endeavours at home, and the buſineſs he was ſent abroad to manage. In his letter of March the 4th, he tells monſieur de Torcy, " That he had deferred writing of late, till he might write with certainty; till the neceſſary diſpoſitions were made among our people at home; and till the queen had taken the only reſolution, which could bring us, in a ſhort time, to a good and ſolid peace. I have now the ſatisfaction to tell you, that this reſolution is taken; and that Mr. Harley will carry with him this night or tomorrow morning the final inſtructions of the queen to her plenipotentiaries. I refer myſelf to monſieur Gaultier, to explain to you more at large the ſubject of this gentleman's commiſſion, and what the queen hopes his moſt chriſtian majeſty will do to co-operate with her". Theſe inſtructions of Mr. Harley do not appear; but it ſeems, the ſubject of them was not proper to be committed to writing; for which reaſon, as in almoſt all matters relating to the Pretender, it is referred to monſieur Gaultier to explain them. But what was meant by 'the neceſſary diſpoſitions made among our people here at home', is pretty well explained by monſieur de Torcy, in a memorial dated the 28th of March, 1712, in anſwer to what was brought by monſieur Gaultier, wherein he commends the prudent conduct of the court of Great-Britain, in managing the houſe of commons, and in particular their wiſe conduct in making known to the houſe of commons, that the nation was abuſed by its allies; and ſays, " The king of France aſſures himſelf, that thoſe, who now manage with ſo much capacity the affairs of the queen of Great-Britain, know how to curb the paſſion of the turbulent party in the other houſe". A few days after Mr. Harley's and the abbé Gaultier's arrival at Utrecht, the French plenipotentiaries communicated to the lord privy-ſeal, and the earl of Strafford, a plan for a general peace, to which they had added, by way of marginal notes, in a diſtinct column, what they were told would be abſolutely neceſſary in order to a general peace. But this was intruſted to them under the higheſt obligation of ſecrecy, to diſcover nothing of it to the reſt of the allies. The Britiſh plenipotentiaries accepted this plan as a mark of the great confidence, which France had in them, and readily engaged, that the allies ſhould not be permitted to know a word of it; and under the ſame caution ſent it to Mr. Secretary St. John. But there was no room to doubt, but this plan, that was tranſmitted to England as a great diſcovery, was concerted here, and ſent by Mr. Harley to Utrecht, and by Gaultier to France.

Mr. Secretary St. John, being much concerned at the behaviour of the allies, and the Dutch in particular, thought it proper to make one attempt more, as he called it, to gain them; and therefore ordered the plenipotentiaries, in a letter of the 12th of April, to acquaint them, " That her majeſty would conſent to their having Dendermond and Ghent, and, at the ſame time, depart from her pretenſions to Oſtend; and was willing, that the trade to Spain and the Spaniſh Indies be ſettled upon the ſame foot, as it ſubſiſted at the death of the late king of Spain, in all reſpects, except the Aſſiento: and their lordſhips were ordered to tell them in very plain terms, that her majeſty's meaſures would be taken according to the return they ſhould make to the queen on this occaſion." But, at the ſame time, no communication at all was made to the ſtates of the general plan of peace laſt delivered by the abbé Gaultier, as there never had been of any other, although, in this laſt, the intereſts of all the allies were ſettled and determined between Great-Britain and France. And, to ſhew how candidly the queen's good friends and allies, the Dutch, as her majeſty was pleaſed to ſtile them, were dealt with, the 15 per cent. upon all the goods and manufactures of Great-Britain, which was offered at firſt as one of the chief bribes to England to come into this deſtructive peace, monſieur Meſnager had now explained away, and confined to ſuch goods, as were carried, not to Spain, but to the Spaniſh Weſt-Indies only; and our miniſters finding that France would not make this effectual, Mr. Harley was ordered to let it drop. But to ſee the uſe, that was to be made of this inſincerity of the French; at the ſame time, that Mr. Secretary St. John acquainted the Britiſh plenipotentiaries with her majeſty's conſent to give this up, he told them, in his letter of April 5, "But you will take care to do this in ſuch a manner, as not only to get ſomething for it another way, but alſo to render this conceſſion of the queen's a means of bringing the Dutch to reaſon, and to a compliance with her majeſty's meaſures." The lord privy-ſeal, on the 29th of April, acquainted Mr. Secretary St. John, that the negotiation was at a ſtand, till the French miniſters were ready to return one anſwer or another. And, on the 10th of May, the Britiſh plenipotentiaries ſay, "The French tell us, they cannot think of giving in their anſwer to the allies, till they hear from England the ſucceſs of monſieur Gaultier; and you may believe we wait for it with no leſs impatience than they do."

The Secretary, on the 3d of May, acquainted their excellencies: "I hope in a few days my diſpatches will become more material, and, that we ſhall be able either to ſatisfy our friends at Utrecht, or not have reaſon to be much concerned at their uneaſineſs." This ended in lord Strafford's being ſent for into England; and the following orders were ſent, on the 16th of May, to the lord privy-ſeal for his farther conduct: "You are to ſtop all inſtances for procuring the tariff of 1664, to the Dutch: you are to decline abſolutely to confer any further with them upon any matter, till you receive the queen's plan from hence; and that you will not, I hope, be long in expectation of: and her majeſty finds ſo ill a return made by the ſtates to her condeſcenſion towards them, that ſhe likewiſe orders your lordſhip to take the firſt ſolemn opportunity of declaring to the Dutch miniſters, that all her offers for adjuſting our differences were founded upon this expreſs condition, that they came immediately into the queen's meaſures, and acted openly and ſincerely with her; and that ſhe looks upon herſelf, from their conduct, now to be under no obligation whatſoever to them."

The ſummary then of this whole proceeding at Utrecht, in one ſhort view, appears to be this: a conference for general conferences was neceſſary to be opened, that the allies might in appearance, agreeable to the grand alliance, have the opportunity of treating and adjuſting their ſeveral pretenſions. The Britiſh miniſters were by their inſtructions to act in concert with the allies, but they really acted in concert with the French plenipotentiaries. The allies giving in their ſpecific demands, was not to be avoided; but the French were to gain as much time as they poſſibly could, by unneceſſary delays, and at laſt inſiſt upon ſuch a method of anſwering theſe demands, as they knew the allies could not comply with. In the mean time the negotiations were carrying on directly between England and France; or rather all the conditions dictated and preſcribed by France, whilſt the allies were amuſed with a diſpute about the method of anſwering, from which France would not, and they could not poſſibly, depart; in which England agreed with the reſt of the allies. All particulars, that concerned even the intereſt of the allies, were tranſacted betwixt the miniſters of England and France, under the higheſt obligations of ſecrecy. The Dutch were preſſed to come into the queen's meaſures, without being acquainted what the queen's meaſures were. And, becauſe they would not conſent to they knew not what, as ſoon as it was reſolved to ſend orders to the duke of Ormond not to engage in either ſiege or battle, and the great projects were ready to be executed on the other ſide of the water, the queen declared ſhe looked upon herſelf now, from their conduct, to be under no obligation whatſoever to the States-general: and thus the alliance betwixt Great-Britain and her principal ally was declared to be diſſolved and cancelled, before any thing was finally agreed and concluded betwixt Great-Britain and France, or the former had any ſecurity for its own trade or commerce, or any other advantages that were to accrue to it.

During the congreſs at Utrecht, the preparations for the campaign were carried on by the Emperor and the States with all poſſible vigour: prince Eugene, after having ſtaid (as hath been related) three months in England in a fruitleſs negotiation, was ſent back with general and ambiguous promiſes. The ſtates gave him the ſupreme command of their army, and aſſured him, that, in the execution of the project that was concerted among them, he ſhould be put under no reſtraint by their deputies or generals, and that no ceſſation of arms ſhould be ordered, till all was ſettled by a general peace. The duke of Ormond followed him in April, well ſatisfied both with his inſtructions and his appointments; for he had the ſame allowances, that had been lately voted criminal in the duke of Marlborough.

At this time the Pretender was taken ill of the ſmall-pox: he recovered of them; but his ſiſter, who was taken with the ſame diſeaſe, died of it: ſhe was, by all that knew her, admired as a moſt extraordinary perſon in all reſpects; inſomuch, that a very great character was ſpread of her, by thoſe who talked but indifferently of the Pretender himſelf: thus he loſt a great ſtrength, which ſhe procured to him, from all who ſaw or converſed with her.

Before we proceed to the operations of the campaign, it will be proper to give an account of the convocation, which was held with this ſeſſion of parliament.

There was a doubt ſuggeſted, whether the queen's licence did ſtill ſubſiſt, after a prorogation by a royal writ: the attorney-general gave his opinion, that it was ſtill in force; upon which, the biſhops went on with the reſolution, in which the former ſeſſion had ended, and ſent back to the lower-houſe a paper, which had been ſent to them from that houſe in the former ſeſſion, with ſuch amendments, as they thought proper: but then Atterbury ſtarted a new notion, That as, in a ſeſſion of parliament, a prorogation put an end to all matters not finiſhed, ſo that they were to begin all a-new; the ſame rule was to be applied to convocations, in purſuance of his favourite notion, that the proceedings in parliament were likewiſe to be obſerved amongſt them. The biſhops did not agree to this; for, upon ſearching their books, they found a courſe of precedents to the contrary: and the ſchedule, by which the archbiſhop prorogued them, when the royal writ was ſent him, did, in expreſs words, continue all things, in the ſtate in which they were then, to their next meeting. Yet this did not ſatisfy Atterbury and his party; ſo the lower-houſe ordered him to lay the matter before the attorney-general for his opinion; he did that very partially, for he did not ſhew him the paper ſent down by the biſhops; he only gave him a very defective abſtract of it: whereupon the attorney-general gave him ſuch an anſwer as he deſired, by which it was very plain, that he was not rightly informed about it. The biſhops reſolved to adhere to the method of former convocations, and not to begin matters afreſh, that had been formerly near finiſhed. By this means they were at a full ſtop, ſo that they could not determine thoſe points, which had been recommended to them by the queen: but they entered upon new ones. As an act had paſſed for building fifty new churches, an office was prepared for conſecrating churches and church-yards.

The cenſure that paſſed on Whiſton, in the former ſeſſion, was (as hath been ſaid) laid before the queen for her approbation. But, at the opening of this ſeſſion, in December, the biſhops finding no return was come from the throne, ſent two of their number to receive her majeſty's pleaſure in that matter. The archbiſhop was ſo ill of the gout, that he came not to the convocation all the winter. The queen had put the cenſure into the hands of ſome of her miniſters, but could not remember to whom ſhe gave it: ſo a new extract was ſent to her, and ſhe ſaid, ſhe would ſend her pleaſure upon it very ſpeedily: but none came this ſeſſion. So all further proceedings were ſtopped, ſince the queen did not confirm what was done.

There appeared at this time an inclination, in many of the clergy, to a nearer approach towards the church of Rome; Hickes, an ill-tempered man, who was now at the head of the Jacobite party, had in ſeveral books promoted a notion, that there was a proper ſacrifice made in the euchariſt, and had on many occaſions ſtudied to leſſen our averſion to Popery: the ſupremacy of the crown in eccleſiaſtical matters, and the method, in which the reformation was carried, was openly condemned; one Brett had preached a ſermon, in ſeveral of the pulpits of London, which he afterwards printed; in which he preſſed the neceſſity of prieſtly abſolution, in a ſtrain beyond what was pretended to even in the church of Rome: he ſaid no repentance could ſerve without it, and affirmed, that the prieſt was veſted, with the ſame power of pardoning, that our Saviour himſelf had. A motion was made in the lower-houſe of convocation, to cenſure this; but it was ſo ill ſupported, that it was let fall. Another conceit was taken up, of the invalidity of lay-baptiſm, on which ſeveral books had been written; nor was the diſpute a trifling one, ſince, by this notion, the teachers among the Diſſenters paſſing for Lay-men, this went to the re-baptizing them and their congregations [h].

[h] Dodwell gave the riſe to this conceit; he was a very learned man, and led a ſtrict life; he ſeemed to hunt after paradoxes in all his writings, and broached not a few; he thought none could be ſaved, but thoſe who, by the ſacraments, had a federal right to it; and that theſe were the ſeals of the covenant r

The biſhops thought it neceſſary to put a ſtop to this new and extravagant doctrine; ſo a declaration was agreed to, firſt againſt the irregularity of all baptiſm by perſons, who were not in holy orders; but that yet, according to the practice of the primitive church, and the conſtant uſage of the church of England, no baptiſm (in or with water, in the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghoſt) ought to be reiterated. The archbiſhop of York at firſt agreed to this; ſo it was reſolved to publiſh it in the name of all the biſhops of England; but he was prevailed on to change his mind; and refuſed to ſign it, pretending that this would encourage irregular baptiſm: So the archbiſhop of Canterbury, with moſt of the biſhops of his province, reſolved to offer it to the convocation. It was agreed to in the upper houſe, the biſhop of Rocheſter only diſſenting: But, when it was ſent to the lower-houſe, they would not ſo much as take it into conſideration, but laid it aſide; thinking that it would encourage thoſe, who ſtruck at the dignity of the prieſthood. This was all that paſſed in convocation.

On the 26th of April, the earl of Strafford went from Utrecht to the Hague, and, in ſeveral conferences he had with the penſionary and other miniſters, earneſtly preſſed the ſtates to come into the queen's meaſures. This, together with the ſecret methods, that were uſed to hinder the ſtates of Brabant from ſupplying the imperial troops, that were marching into the Netherlands, with bread and forage, did not a little increaſe the jealouſies of the ſtates, who two days after thought fit to ſend a ſolemn deputation to the earl of Strafford, to know what the queen's meaſures were? The earl not having yet orders to explain himſelf, and being under an engagement of ſecrecy with the French plenipotentiaries, made no ſcruple to declare, in conformity to a late letter from the queen to the ſtates, "That her majeſty's intentions were, that her troops ſhould act with the ſame vigour againſt France, as if there was no negotiation on foot". This declaration the earl repeated the ſame evening in another long conference with prince Eugene of Savoy, count Zinzendorf, the States deputies, and the council of ſtate; and on the 21ſt of April returned to Utrecht. Several other miniſters, who went to the Hague, to confer with prince Eugene, returned alſo to the place of congreſs, in order to aſſiſt at the general conference, which was held there the 23d of the ſame month. The miniſters of the allies having again inquired of thoſe of France, whether they were yet ready to give their anſwer in writing; and being anſwered in the negative; it was propoſed and agreed to, that the general meetings ſhould for ſome time be ſuſpended, till the French plenipotentiaries ſhould give notice, that they were prepared. In the mean time the confederate miniſters held ſome intermediate conferences among themſelves, and made frequent journies from Utrecht to the Hague, and from the Hague to Utrecht; not without a well-grounded jealouſy of the intimacy and cloſe correſpondence, which appeared to be between the miniſters of France and thoſe of Great-Britain; the effects of which were ſoon after manifeſted to the amazement of all Chriſtendom.

About the middle of April the confederate forces began to march into the field, and prince Eugene of Savoy, ſet out from the Hague on the 22d of that month, in order to put himſelf at the head of the army. The duke of Ormond, being appointed to command the queen's forces in Flanders, received his inſtructions on the 7th of April, whereby he was ordered "to repair with all poſſible diligence to the Hague, and to acquaint the penſionary, that he had received her majeſty's orders to ſee him, before he went to put himſelf at the head of her majeſty's troops, and to expreſs to him her reſolution of puſhing the war with all poſſible vigour, until the enemy ſhould agree to ſuch terms of peace, as might be ſafe and honourable for herſelf and her allies; to aſſure him, that he was prepared to live in a perfect and good correſpondence with all the generals of the allies, and particularly with thoſe of the ſtates; and to deſire the penſionary to inform him, what plan had been agreed upon for the operations of the campaign: And as ſoon as he arrived at the frontier, to meet with prince Eugene, and ſuch others of the generals, as ſhould be in the ſecret, and with them to concert the proper meaſures for entering upon action". The duke left London on the 9th of April, and in three days arrived at the Hague, where having viſited the penſionary, he gave him, according to his inſtructions, all the aſſurances of carrying on the war with vigour, and acting in confidence with all the allies, and more eſpecially the Dutch: which were received with the greateſt profeſſions of duty and reſpect to her majeſty. He had alſo a conference with the council of ſtate, who told him, "That there was no particular reſolution taken as to the operations of the campaign, but they left it to their generals, who, with their deputies, were to act in concert with the generals of the allies: And that they had given orders to their generals to live in a good correſpondence with his grace." The preſident of the week made many excuſes for their having given the command of their army to prince Eugene; but however he ſaid, "That, as to the point of command, his grace and the prince were now upon an equal foot". About this time the duke received a letter from Mr. Cadogan, who had been ſome time before left out of the eſtabliſhment of lieutenant-generals, deſiring his intereſt for being employed under him this campaign. The duke readily complied with his requeſt, and ſoon obtained the queen's leave for his ſerving in that poſt. The duke reſolving to take the field as ſoon as poſſible, left the Hague, and arrived at Ghent the 3d of May; and after a ſtay there of two or three days, and ſecuring the government of the citadel in Engliſh hands, went on to Tournay, where he met prince Eugene, and the deputies of the ſtates. All the Engliſh forces, for ſome weeks, had been in the field, and lay cantoned along the road between this city and Liſle. And the reaſon for drawing them out of their quarters ſo early was, that there had been a project formed to take poſt at Oiſy, on the Senſette, which would have ſecured the march over the Scheld, and might have given the allies an opportunity of ſeizing Cambray. Lieutenant-general Cadogan did not in the leaſt queſtion the ſucceſs of it. But, the Dutch making many difficulties and delays in this affair, Villars had prevented the deſign, and taken poſſeſſion of Oiſy, and of all the paſſes on the Senſette.

On the 17th of May, prince Eugene and monſieur Vegelin came to the duke of Ormond, and it was agreed between them to paſs the Scheld near Bouchain, in order to encamp at Aveſne le Sec, and ſee whether the confederates could attack the enemy without great diſadvantage; or, ſhould the enemy be too ſtrongly poſted, it was propoſed to inveſt Queſnoy, which, being a little place, could not hold out above three weeks at moſt after the opening of the trenches: In order to theſe motions, the proportion of the two armies to be commanded by the prince and duke being ſettled[c], the neceſſary directions were given for aſſembling all the troops, paſſing the Scarpe, and forming the armies on the 21ſt between Doway and Marchiennes, where prince Eugene and the duke of Ormond deſigned to join their reſpective forces, and there concert ſuch further meaſures, as might be requiſite for carrying on the ſervice of the campaign.

The duke had, ſome days before, received two expreſſes from Mr. Secretary St. John, who in his letter of the 16th of April, told his grace, "That he found, by very certain intelligences from Holland, that the Dutch miniſters were not without their fears of their new general: That they began venant: ſo that he left all, who died without the ſacraments, to the uncovenanted mercies of God; and to this he added, that none had a right to give the ſacraments, but thoſe who were commiſſioned to it; and theſe were the apoſtles, and after them biſhops and prieſts ordained by them: it followed upon this, that ſacraments adminiſtered by others were of no value. He purſued theſe notions ſo far, that he aſſerted that the ſouls of men were naturally mortal, but that the immortalizing virtue was conveyed by baptiſm, given by perſons epiſcopally ordained. And yet, after all this, which carried the epiſcopal function ſo high, he did not lay the original of that government, on any inſtruction or warrant in the Scripture: but thought it was ſet up, in the beginning of the ſecond century, after the apoſtles were all dead. He wrote very doubtfully of the time, in which the canon of the New Teſtament was ſettled; he thought it was not before the ſecond century, and that an extraordinary inſpiration was continued in the churches to that very time, to which he aſcribed the original of epiſcopacy. This ſtrange and precarious ſyſtem was in great credit among us; and the neceſſity of the ſacrament, and the invalidity of eccleſiaſtical functions, when performed by perſons, who were not epiſcopally ordained, were entertained by many with great applauſe: this made the Diſſenters paſs for no Chriſtians, and put all thoughts of reconciling them to us far out of view: and ſeveral little books were ſpread about the nation, to prove the neceſſity of re-baptizing them, and that they were in a ſtate of damnation till that was done; but few were, by theſe arguments, prevailed upon to be re-baptized: this ſtruck even at the baptiſm by midwives in the church of Rome; which was practiſed and connived at here in England, till it was objected in the conference, held at Hampton-court, ſoon after king James the Firſt's acceſſion to the crown, and baptiſm was not till then limited to perſons in orders: nothing of this kind was ſo much as mentioned in the year 1660, when a great part of the nation had been baptized by Diſſenters; but it was now promoted with much heat. BURNET, vol. II. 604.

[c] The duke had under him the following troops, conſiſting of thoſe in the queen's pay, and of thoſe paid jointly by her majeſty and the ſtates, together with a regiment of Huſſars: Engliſh, 22 battalions and 19 ſquadrons; Danes, 9 battalions and 21 ſquadrons; Pruſſians, 10 battalions and 36 ſquadrons; Saxons, 7 battalions and 12 ſquadrons: Hanoverians, 14 battalions and 29 ſquadrons; Holſtein, 2 battalions and 8 ſquadrons; Wolfenbuttle, 2 battalions; Walloons, 4 ſquadrons; Anſpach, 2 battalions and 4 ſquadrons; Naſſau Dillenburg, 1 battalion; Ottinghen, 1 battalion; and Huſſars, 5 ſquadrons: In all 70 battalions, and 138 ſquadrons.

to conſider he was a Papiſt, and a German, at leaſt in intereſt: That the emperor, his maſter, had nothing to loſe on the ſide of the Netherlands: That a battle won might give ground for inſiſting on higher terms than the houſe of Auſtria was now likely to obtain: That a battle loſt might ſtill contribute to prolong the war; and that, in either caſe, the expence of blood would fall to the ſhare of the queen and ſtates: That he was of opinion, that theſe reflections had occaſioned private direction to their generals, to uſe more caution than the prince would perhaps approve: And that his grace might ſee, that this meaſure was not very conſiſtent with the compliment of an unlimited command, made to that prince by Mr. Lathmer, in the name of the States." And, on the 25th of April, O. S. (which was before it was known, that France had agreed ſo much as to propoſe to the king of Spain the alternative of the two monarchies, which was not till the 18th of May) Mr. Secretary St. John began to give the duke of Ormond ſome diſtant hint of the ſcene, which was afterwards to be opened, and told him, " That the queen inclined to be of opinion, that all the troops, whether ſubjects or foreigners, belonging to her, ſhould be immediately under his grace's command. That there might have been formerly reaſons for uſing a different method; but there ſeemed at preſent to be ſome of a very ſtrong nature for taking this; and perhaps theſe might every day grow ſtill ſtronger. That there could be no need for him to enter into the grounds, which they had, in this conjuncture, to be jealous of prince Eugene's conduct: His grace would ſee and know them all better than they could be repeated; but that on this occaſion the queen directed him to inform his grace, that ſhe thought, he was to be more cautious, for ſome time, of engaging in any action, unleſs in the caſe of a very apparent and conſiderable advantage, becauſe he would daily be ſtrengthened by the arrival of the imperial troops: And it was but juſt, theſe ſhould have their part, if any thing of that kind was to happen. That the great article of preventing the union of the two monarchies, was not yet entirely ſettled; the expedients were hard of digeſtion to the French ſtomachs; but, if this was got over, he did not ſee any formidable difficulty in the way." The duke returned an anſwer to theſe diſpatches, wherein he gave an account, what the Dutch had done in regard to the point of command: " That he was entirely of the Secretary's opinion, that a battle, either loſt or won, would at this time make very great alterations in the treaties now on foot. But that the Secretary might remember, that in his Inſtructions he was ordered to act in conjunction with the allies, 'in proſecuting the war with vigour;' ſo that, ſhould there happen a fair opportunity to attack the enemy, he could not decline it, if propoſed by the prince and ſtates: But he hoped to hear from him by a meſſenger, before the armies were formed, which would be on the 21ſt". The duke added, in a ſecond letter of May the 20th, " That, if there were a good opportunity to attack the enemy, and get into France, by the way of Champagne, he was ſure, the prince and ſtates would preſs it, unleſs they heard from England, that the peace was near being concluded: That he wiſhed it very heartily; but, if it were delayed, he hoped, he ſhould have the good fortune to force the French to comply with the queen's demands".

The armies having marched on the day appointed, the duke took his quarters at Marchiennes, where, in concert with prince Eugene, and the foreign generals, he reſolved to go nearer the enemy; and it was agreed, that the two armies ſhould paſs the Scheld, and encamp, the right of prince Eugene's at Neufville, and the left of the duke of Ormond's at Solemes, where they had the river Selle in their rear. But, on the 24th of May, in the evening an expreſs came from Mr. Secretary St. John, with a letter dated May 10, O. S. to acquaint the duke, " That, ſince her majeſty had reaſon to believe, that ſhe ſhould come to an agreement upon the great article of preventing the Union of the two monarchies, as ſoon as a courier ſent from Verſailles to Madrid could return, it was her majeſty's 'poſitive command, that he ſhould avoid engaging in any ſiege, or hazarding a battle,' till he received further orders from England". The Secretary acquainted the duke likewiſe, " That the queen would have him diſguiſe the receipt of this order; and that ſhe thought he could not want pretences for conducting himſelf ſo, as to anſwer her ends, without owning that, which might at preſent have an ill effect, if it was publickly known. That ſhe could not think with patience of ſacrificing men, when there was a fair proſpect of obtaining her purpoſe another way; nor would ſhe ſuffer herſelf to be expoſed to the reproach of having retarded, by the events of the campaign, a negotiation, which might have been as good as concluded in a few days". He added, " That this order was communicated at the ſame time to the court of France; ſo that, if the marſhal de Villars ſhould take any private notice of it, the duke was to anſwer accordingly".

On the 25th of May, N. S. the duke wrote two letters to Mr. Secretary St. John, a private and a public letter. In the firſt, which was his private letter, and all written with his own hand, he " acknowledged the receipt of the Secretary's orders, not to engage in ſiege or battle; to which he promiſed an exact obedience, and to keep ſecret his having received any ſuch command; and that he would endeavour to hinder its being ſuſpected. But that prince Eugene and the States having propoſed to attack the enemy; or, if that be found too hazardous, to beſiege Queſnoy, he feared it would be very difficult for him to diſguiſe the true reaſon of oppoſing all propoſals, that ſhould be made for undertaking any thing, having no excuſe for delays, all the troops expected and the heavy cannon, being to be there on Saturday. And that, if he could have found forage there, he would have made ſome pretence to delay the march, though the diſpoſitions of it were made before he received this letter". But, on the ſame day, the duke wrote another public letter to the Secretary, after he had received the letter of the 10th, wherein he took no notice of his orders, not to engage in ſiege or battle, but ſpoke of his having reviewed the Engliſh troops, and found them in ſo good a condition, as muſt convince all the allies, how groundleſs the complaints were, that had been made of our backwardneſs, " of which he ſaid, I believe you will now hear no more". And he added, " If we find an opportunity to bring the enemy to a battle, we ſhall not decline it". On the 28th of May, N. S. the duke in his letter to the Secretary ſaid, " Yeſterday prince Eugene, and the States-deputies deſired, that I would conſent to ſend the quarter-maſters to view the French camp; which I could not refuſe, without giving them ſome ſuſpicion of what I am ordered to diſguiſe; but I was ſure, that nothing of action could happen, the enemy being behind the Scheld. The detachment, that went with them, were forty ſquadrons, and all the grenadiers of my army to ſupport them, and make good their retreat, ſhould the enemy have endeavoured for to have attacked them. They went as far (I mean the horſe) as Catelet, where the right of the enemy's army lies, and are come back without ſeeing any of the French on our ſide the Scheld. The diſtance between the head of the Somme, and that of the Scheld, is not above a league and a half, which is a plain, and the enemy have not yet offered to throw up any retrenchment. May be to-morrow they will begin to work, ſince they have ſeen our troops reconnoitring that way." Prince Eugene and the deputies being to dine with the duke the next day, he was under apprehenſions, that they would preſs him to undertake ſomething immediately, which it would be very hard to conceal the true reaſon of his refuſing, having no reaſonable excuſe for it. In this letter he gave an account of a letter, which he had received from the marſhal Villars, and the anſwer which he had written to the marſhal. For May the 25th, N. S. the marſhal acquainted the duke, " That he had the king's orders, and the queen's conſent, to write to him, as ſoon as he received the courier; and, whatever glory was to be acquired againſt a general, whoſe valour was ſo well known among them, he deſired him to be aſſured, that he never received more agreeable news, than that they were to be no longer enemies: And that it was the king's particular injunction to him to keep this matter with an inviolable ſecrecy". The duke, according to the intimation given him by Mr. St. John, anſwered, " That he had received orders on that ſubject from the queen, and ſhould be ſure to conform himſelf punctually to them: But the keeping the ſecret enjoined would very much depend on the meaſures the marſhal himſelf ſhould take. The duke, on his part, let him know, that the march, he ſhould be obliged to make, was chiefly for the ſubſiſtence of the troops; and that the marſhal need not be in any apprehenſions on that account; at leaſt, the duke would anſwer for the army, which he had the honour to command". It is impoſſible to account for this tranſaction, unleſs the duke had orders, not only not to act againſt France, but to give the French general intelligence of all that was deſigned in the confederate army. The report being made by the quarter-maſters-general, who went with the detachment to view the French camp, and they all agreeing, that the ground was as advantageous as could be, their ſituation being ſuch, as gave an opportunity of falling upon their flank and rear, it was propoſed to the duke to march without delay to the enemy, and to attack them. What the duke did upon this occaſion appears from his letter of May the 29th, N. S. to Mr. St. John; "You may eaſily imagine, ſays he, the difficulty that I was under to excuſe the delaying a matter, which, according to the informations I had from the quarter-maſters-general, and ſeveral other general officers, that went out with the detachment, ſeemed to be ſo practicable. The beſt excuſe I could make was lord Strafford's ſudden voyage to England, which gave me reaſon to believe there muſt be ſomething of conſequence tranſacting, which a delay of four or five days would bring to light: And therefore I deſired they would defer this undertaking, or any other, till I ſhould receive freſh letters from England, ſince ſo ſhort a delay could not be of any ill conſequence". Upon which both prince Eugene, and the States deputies, told the duke plainly, "That his anſwer was agreeable to the ſuſpicions they had for ſome time entertained, particularly ſince the expreſs of the 24th, which they knew had brought him letters from England". And they were the more confirmed in theſe ſuſpicions, becauſe marſhal Villars, "who had on all occaſions ſhewn himſelf very vigilant, did not ſend out a man to obſerve their motions, nor take any other precautions to ſecure his camp, where it lay ſo much expoſed; and he could not be ignorant, how ſtrong a detachment had been abroad on that ſide." The duke could not divert the propoſal, which had been made to fall upon the French army, by offering to undertake a ſiege; ſince Queſnoy, the place to be attacked, was within leſs than three leagues of the army, and all things neceſſary for a ſiege were already at Marchiennes; ſo that the conſequence of this offer would have been the immediate inveſting of that place, which was as contrary to the queen's laſt orders, as a battle. Prince Eugene, and the deputies ſeemed extremely diſſatisfied with the duke's anſwer, and ſaid, They were obliged to give an account of what had paſſed, and of the delays made by the duke, to their maſters, by expreſs." In this poſture things continued for ſome days, when, on the 4th of June, N. S. two of the deputies made a viſit to the duke; and, in the evening, ſent him a long memorial, containing the ſubſtance of their diſcourſe with him. In this they told the duke, "That, by order of their maſters, they repreſented to him, with how great a degree of ſurprize the ſtates had received the news of his declaring, he would undertake nothing, till he had letters from England, and of his refuſing to aſſiſt either in a ſiege or a battle. That it ſeemed to them incomprehenſible and unaccountable, why the allies ſhould loſe ſuch an apparent opportunity they had, as well in regard to the goodneſs and number of their troops, as the ſituation of the armies, to gain ſome great advantage over the enemy, which, if once neglected, might for ever be irretrievable. That they could by no means conceive his orders were ſo ſtrict, as to tie up his hands, when ſo fair an occaſion of annoying the enemy preſented itſelf: and that, in their opinion, ſuch orders ought to be underſtood in the beſt ſenſe, ſo as enjoin the declining any attempt for ſome little time, provided no great prejudice might redound by that means to the common cauſe; but in no wiſe to juſtify the ſitting ſtill with their arms acroſs, in ſuch a ſituation, where inaction would cut off all hopes of their being able to attempt any thing for the future; ſince, if the army continued inactive for any time, the forage would be conſumed, and the operations for the reſt of the campaign would be rendered not only difficult, but impracticable. Beſides, the enemy would have time to intrench and fortify their camp, as much as they pleaſed. That the ſtates had ordered them to inforce theſe arguments with others, and particularly with this, That the army, his grace commanded, conſiſted not only of her majeſty's national troops, but, for the moſt part, of ſuch, as were in the joint pay of her majeſty and the ſtates, the command of which indeed belonged to his grace, as general in chief; but, as thoſe troops were engaged by both powers jointly, to make war, and act againſt the enemy, they could not be exempted from that ſervice by his grace alone, without the knowledge and conſent of the ſtates; at leaſt, without contradicting the treaties and ends, by and for which they were engaged. That not only the treaty of the grand alliance, but others made between her majeſty and the ſtates, obliged her majeſty to puſh on the war with vigour; but the declaration his grace made, that he could not act till further orders, at a time, when, by his grace's own approbation, they had marched juſt within ſight of the enemy, and when there was ſo fair a proſpect of ſucceſs, if ſomething were attempted, could not, they thought, be reconciled either with thoſe treaties, or the repeated aſſurances, which her majeſty had given them by letters, by my lord Strafford, and by his grace, lately at the Hague. Therefore, they deſired his grace, if he had any regard to thoſe treaties and aſſurances, which ought to be kept ſacred, to puſh on the war with vigour, offenſively againſt the enemy; but that, if his grace perſiſted in his reſolution of not acting offenſively, they deſired to know, whether he would conſent, that the troops under him might be employed to cover a ſiege, which they would undertake; and whether he would give a promiſe to attack the enemy, if they came to diſturb them. That, in caſe his grace refuſed, they did in the moſt ſolemn manner, and in the ſtrongeſt terms, proteſt againſt the irreparable damage, which ſuch a conduct would occaſion to the confederacy. That, in order the better to guide themſelves, they demanded to know preciſely, what his orders were; how far they reached; and what dependance the ſtates might have on her majeſty's troops for the future: And laſtly, they required, on their part, that his grace would not hinder the troops in the joint pay from acting agreeably to the reaſon of war, and their ſolemn treaties and engagements. The concluſion of the memorial was, that the ſtates had ordered this repreſentation to be made in writing to his grace, that all the world and poſterity might ſee, that they have been ſo far from being guilty of the great injury, which the common cauſe receives from the preſent inaction, that they have done all in their power to prevent it; and that others are to anſwer for all the unhappy conſequences of it". To the ſubſtance of this memorial, expreſſed before by the deputies in their diſcourſe with the duke, he could only anſwer, 'that, before he entered upon action, he ſhould be glad to receive letters from England, which he expected every moment'. And this was all the ſatisfaction he was then at liberty to give to their demands, bound up, as he was, by his laſt inſtructions. The duke immediately diſpatched a meſſenger to England, with an account of what had paſſed, hoping, That, before they came to any extremities, he ſhould have his final orders, and recommending it as a matter of the greateſt importance, both to the public and himſelf, that he ſhould know her majeſty's pleaſure as ſoon as might be.

In the mean time, prince Eugene and the ſtates deputies preſſed the duke continually for a poſitive anſwer, repreſenting, at the ſame time, the goodneſs and ſuperiority of the confederate troops, which could not be contradicted; and concluding, 'that the duke muſt have orders not to do any thing, though he would not own them; ſince they knew, he could not otherwiſe anſwer for his inaction'. In debating this matter, one of the deputies took, as the duke thought, too much liberty in cenſuring the proceedings of England; which he was deſired to forbear, as being no way agreeable to that good underſtanding, which was ſo neceſſary to be kept up between the queen and the ſtates. While the duke was under this uneaſineſs, on the 7th of June, N. S. a letter came from Mr. St. John, dated the 17th of May, O. S. which expreſſed "the impatience her majeſty was in to hear, whether the orders, ſent on the 10th of May, came ſafely and early to his hands, and the aſſurance ſhe had of his punctual obedience to her commands in ſo nice and important a conjuncture". The duke returned an anſwer the next day, repreſenting, "That things were now come to great extremity: that he could not avoid ſeeing every day freſh marks of the ill blood and diſſatisfaction cauſed among the allies, by the meaſures he was obliged to obſerve: that many of them did not ſcruple to ſay, 'We were betraying them'; and this ferment ſeemed rather likely to increaſe, than diminiſh; and, conſidering the circumſtances we were in, it was hard to ſay, what might be the conſequences of it: that let the peace, which he was in daily expectation to hear of, be never ſo advantageous, he was apprehenſive, that, if the allies ſhould pretend to diſlike it, he could not depend upon any troops, but thoſe compoſed of her majeſty's own ſubjects. And what confirmed him in this opinion was, that he was well informed, that if the elector of Hanover did not approve of the peace, his troops would have orders to ſerve with the Dutch, and would likewiſe be augmented by all that prince could ſpare from other parts; and he was not without ſuſpicion, that endeavours were likewiſe uſing to gain the Danes". The cloſe of his letter was in theſe words: "By this and my former you may gueſs, how uneaſy a ſituation I am in; and, if there be no proſpect of action, I do not ſee of what uſe I am here; and, if it ſuit with her majeſty's ſervice, I ſhould be glad, I might have leave to return to England. But in this, and all other matters, I ſhall readily ſubmit to her majeſty's pleaſure. I am impatient to hear from you what I am to depend upon."

Prince Eugene and the deputies having reſolved to beſiege Queſnoy [d], the town was inveſted on the 8th of June, by a detachment from the two armies, conſiſting of thirty battalions, and as many ſquadrons, under the command of general Fagel. The duke, though he had no part in carrying on the ſiege, yet could not refuſe furniſhing ſeven battalions and nine ſquadrons of the troops in the joint pay of England and the States, but avoided ſending any of thoſe, which were in the queen's whole pay.

On the 10th, a letter came from marſhal Villars, wherein he let the duke know, "He had received ſeveral advices, that Queſnoy was inveſted; and that part of the troops in his grace's army was employed in that ſervice: that, by order of his maſter, he deſires to know of him, if any troops under his command have a ſhare in undertaking or forming that ſiege; for he could not think, prince Eugene would venture to attempt it with thoſe forces alone which he commands. He therefore begs his grace would explain this matter to him, that he may know how to act, and take his meaſures, according as prince Eugene perſeveres in, or deſiſts from, this enterprize. He adds, that a courier went from Paris the morning before, with the anſwer of Spain to the queen, which, it was ſuppoſed, would be ſatisfactory". The duke's anſwer was, That, as the marſhal obſerved himſelf, of what conſequence it was to keep this affair ſecret, he would leave him to judge, whether he could have done it better, than by the conduct he had obſerved. That it was true, that for the ſiege of Queſnoy, which it was not in his power to prevent, he had furniſhed ſome troops, which were paid in part by the ſtates, but not one ſingle man ſolely in the queen's pay. That he thought, ſince the "trenches were not opened, the ſiege would have no effect to break the meaſures concerted between their ſovereigns, before they could receive their final inſtructions". He concludes, "He was ſurprized, upon the duke of Wirtemberg's informing him, that the marſhal had ſaid to one of that duke's trumpets, that the Engliſh would do the French no hurt, nor the French them: that himſelf had ſuch orders, and did not doubt, but the duke of Ormond had the ſame". The marſhal, in another letter the next day, denied, "That he had ever ſeen or heard of any trumpet from the duke of Wirtemberg: that this was a mere invention of thoſe, who had a mind to give a reputation to the Dutch gazettes, in which it had been affirmed, that his grace had ſhewed prince Eugene his orders, not to engage in any attempt. He deſires to be informed by his grace, whether the army under his command would oppoſe any attempt, which the king's forces would certainly make upon prince Eugene's, if he continued the ſiege: And adds, that the king, while he ſees prince Eugene undertaking a ſiege, and knows the army under his grace ought not to act, directly or indirectly, againſt his, would be very much diſpleaſed with him, if he ſhould continue unactive."

By this time the Dutch plenipotentiaries at Utrecht having, by order of the ſtates, expoſtulated with the biſhop of Briſtol, about the duke of Ormond's refuſing to aſſiſt the confederates in any undertaking againſt the enemy: the biſhop anſwered, "that he knew nothing of the matter, and would repreſent it to the queen": But, at the ſame time, he took occaſion to let them know, "That, two days before, he had received an expreſs, with a letter from her majeſty, in which ſhe complained, that, notwithſtanding all the advances ſhe had made from time to time to the ſtates, in order to engage them to enter with her upon a plan of peace, their high mightineſſes had not anſwered her as they ought, and as her majeſty hoped they would. That therefore they ought not to be ſurprized, if her majeſty did now think herſelf at liberty to enter into ſeparate meaſures, in order to obtain a peace for her own conveniency". Upon this the plenipotentiaries of the ſtates repreſented to the biſhop, "That ſuch a ſtep would be contrary to all the alliances and treaties betwixt their high mightineſſes and the queen: that they thought they had merited otherwiſe by the deference, which, on all occaſions, they had ſhewn to her majeſty; and that they knew nothing of the advances, which the biſhop ſaid her majeſty had made towards the ſtates, on the ſubject of a plan of peace". The biſhop replied, "That he muſt not forget to tell them, his inſtructions did further bear, that, conſidering the conduct of the ſtates towards her majeſty, ſhe thought herſelf diſengaged from all alliances and engagements with their high mightineſſes". The biſhop did not, in expreſs words, name the Barrier-treaty; but he did not except it: ſo they reckoned it was included in the general words he had uſed.

The lord biſhop's anſwer and declaration, being, by expreſs, brought to the Hague the night between the 2d and 3d of June, was, the next morning, communicated to the miniſters of the allies; ſeveral conferences were held, and private meaſures concerted between the ſtates, the elector of Hanover, the landgrave of Heſſe-Caſſel, and ſome other princes of the empire, for the ſubſiſting and maintaining the foreign troops in the pay of Great-Britain; ſo that the confederate army ſhould ſuffer no other diminution, than by the troops of Great-Britain, which did not amount to above twelve thouſand men. In the mean time, the States-general wrote a long letter to the queen, which, on the 5th of June, they ſent, by an expreſs to their envoy in London, with orders to deliver it into her own hands. And count Zinzendorf, who had likewiſe received an account of what had paſſed in the army, went from Utrecht to the Hague, on the 1ſt of June, N.S. and diſpatched the next day three expreſſes, one to the emperor, another to prince Eugene, and the third to the Imperial miniſter in London. And the baron de Hohendorf, adjutant-general to prince Eugene, who came over with a commiſſion from Vienna, to ſolicit the payment of the ſubſidy voted by the houſe of commons for the war in Spain, being on his departure for London, count Zinzendorf gave him likewiſe freſh inſtructions about the preſent juncture of affairs.

The Britiſh court having, on the 25th of May, O.S. received an expreſs from Holland, the queen did not come, as uſual, to St. James's chapel, but held a council at Kenſington. Two days after the baron de Hohendorf arrived in London, and in the afternoon was in conference with the lord-treaſurer, who gave him fair hopes. The ſame afternoon Van Borſelen, envoy from the ſtates, was alſo in conference with the treaſurer on the ſubject of what he had repreſented the evening before in a private audience [e]; upon which orders were ſent to the duke of Ormond to concur with the general of the allies in a ſiege. In the mean time the news of what had happened in the army being ſpread abroad, and having occaſioned a general ſurprize, the lord Hallifax acquainted the houſe of peers, "That he had matters of great importance to lay before them"; and deſired, that the members might be ſummoned to attend the ſervice of the houſe the next day. The peers being in a full houſe on the 28th of May, the lord Hallifax made a ſpeech, wherein he firſt took notice of the ſtrange declaration made in the army by the duke of Ormond; then ſhewed the ill conſequences of ſuch a proceeding, and the neceſſity of carrying on the war with vigour; and concluded with a motion for an addreſs, "humbly to deſire her majeſty to lay before the houſe the orders ſhe had ſent to the general, and to order him to act offenſively in concert with the allies". When he had done ſpeaking, ſome objections were raiſed as to the matter of fact; but, though the lord Hallifax did not want proofs, having, among others, a copy of prince Eugene's letter, yet he did not think proper to produce it; and ſome other Whig lords contented themſelves with preſſing thoſe in the miniſtry to acquaint the houſe, Whether any orders of reſtraint had been ſent to the duke of Ormond? The treaſurer, who was moſt concerned in this affair, anſwered, "That they, who had the honour to ſerve the queen, could not reveal the orders ſhe gave to her general without a particular direction from her majeſty; and that, in his opinion thoſe orders were not fit to be divulged. That, however, he would adventure to ſay, that, if the duke of Ormond had refuſed to act offenſively, he did not doubt, but he had followed his inſtructions: and it was prudence not to hazard a battle upon the point of concluding a good peace, eſpecially conſidering they had to deal with an enemy ſo apt to break his word". The earl of Wharton ſaid, "He was extremely glad to find that noble lord ſo candid, as to acknowledge the inſincerity of France: But that, in his opinion, this was a ſtrong reaſon for keeping no meaſures with ſuch an enemy, but rather for puſhing him with the utmoſt vigour, till he was reduced to the neceſſity of dealing honeſtly". The treaſurer replied, "Though the duke of Ormond might have refuſed to hazard a general action, yet he could be poſitive, he would not decline joining with the allies in a ſiege, orders having been ſent him for that purpoſe". The duke of Marlborough ſaid, "He did not know how to reconcile the orders, not to hazard a battle, and to join in a ſiege, to the rules of war; ſince it was impoſſible to make a ſiege, without either hazarding a battle, in caſe the enemy attempted to relieve the place, or ſhamefully raiſing the ſiege". The duke of Argyle, on the other hand, excuſed the orders given to the duke of Ormond, and, among other things, ſaid, " That, in his opinion, ſince the time of Julius Cæſar, there had not been a greater captain than prince Eugene of Savoy: but that, nevertheleſs, conſidering the different intereſts of the houſe of Auſtria and of Great-Britain, it might not conſiſt with prudence to truſt him with the management of the war, becauſe a battle, won or loſt, might entirely break off a negotiation of peace, which, in all probability, was near being concluded. That, according to his knowledge, nothing was more uncertain than the iſſue of a battle, where victory was ſtill wavering, and ſo often changed ſides, that they, who, after five or ſix ſucceſsful charges, thought themſelves ſure of gaining the day, had at laſt been routed and put to flight. Adding, that two years before, the confederates might have taken Arras or Cambray, inſtead of amuſing themſelves with the inſignificant conqueſt of Aire, Bethune, and St. Venant". The earl of Nottingham declared on the other ſide, " That he could not comprehend why orders had been given to our general not to fight, unleſs certain perſons were apprehenſive of weakening the French, ſo far as to diſable them to aſſiſt them in bringing about deſigns, which they durſt not yet own". The duke of Devonſhire ſaid on the ſame ſide, " That, by the proximity of blood, he was more concerned for the duke of Ormond's reputation than any other; and therefore he could not forbear declaring, he was ſurprized to ſee any one dare to make a nobleman of the firſt rank, and of ſo diſtinguiſhed a character, the inſtrument of ſuch a proceeding". The earl Pawlet anſwered, " That no body could doubt of the duke of Ormond's courage and bravery; but that he was not like a certain general, who led troops to the ſlaughter, to cauſe a great number of officers to be knocked on the head in a battle, or againſt ſtone-walls, in order to fill his pockets, by diſpoſing of their commiſſions". This reflection, ſo viſibly levelled at the duke of Marlborough, could not but very ſenſibly affect him; but he reſtrained his reſentment for a while, and remained ſilent [f]. On the other hand, the lord Cowper made a long ſpeech, wherein he complained of their being kept ſo long in the dark about the progreſs of a negotiation of peace; and, ſome other Whig lords having preſſed the earl of Strafford to give the houſe an account of it, he excuſed himſelf, as not having the queen's orders for it. But the treaſurer aſſured them, " That, in a few days, her majeſty, according to her promiſe, would lay before her parliament the conditions, on which a peace might be made, which he doubted not would give entire ſatisfaction to every member of that houſe, and to all true Engliſhmen". Some lords having declared their apprehenſions of a 'ſeparate peace'; the treaſurer aſſured them, " that nothing of that nature was ever intended; and that ſuch a peace would be ſo baſe, ſo knaviſh, and ſo villainous a thing, that every one, who ſerved the queen, knew they muſt anſwer it with their heads to the nation; but that it would appear to be a ſafe and a glorious peace, much more to the honour and intereſt of the nation, than the preliminaries that were agreed to three years before. He alſo affirmed, that the allies knew of it, and were ſatisfied with it". The lord Hallifax, obſerving the diſpoſition of the houſe, would have dropped his motion, without dividing; but the court-party, being ſure of a majority, inſiſted to have the queſtion for adjourning the debate, which being carried in the affirmative by ſixty-eight voices againſt forty, twenty-five of the latter entered their proteſts againſt the orders given to the duke of Ormond [g]. This point being gained, the earl of Strafford ſuggeſted, " That, before the houſe entered upon the negotiation of Utrecht, they would do well to examine into thoſe of the Hague and Gertruydenberg; upon which he would communicate to them two obſervations he had made during his reſidence in Holland: Firſt, that, at the Hague, the French miniſters conferred only with the penſionary, who, having made his report to the ſtates-general, communicated no more of it to the miniſters of the Allies, than what was judged proper to let them know; ſo that the Dutch were abſolute maſters of the ſecret of that negotiation, as they were afterwards of that of Gertruydenberg [h]. Secondly, that the States-general had conſented to give Naples and Sicily to king Philip; which ſhewed, even at that time, that the recovery of the whole monarchy of Spain was looked upon as impracticable". He ſaid, he had his information from one of the two, who had been employed in thoſe conferences; by which it was plain, that he meant Buys. He concluded with a motion for addreſſing her majeſty, " That ſhe would be pleaſed to cauſe the papers relating to the negotiations of the Hague and Gertruydenberg to be laid before the houſe"; which was carried without dividing. But nothing followed upon this; for it was ſaid to be deſigned only to amuſe the houſe.

[d] Queſnoy, a ſmall, but ſtrong town of the Low-Countries, in the earldom of Hainault, and territory of Valenciennes, ſubject to the French. It ſtands ſeven miles ſouth-eaſt of Valenciennes, eighteen ſouth-weſt of Mons, and eighteen almoſt north-eaſt of Cambray.

[e] The treaſurer, among other things, ſaid to him, when he complained of the biſhop of Briſtol's declarations, "The biſhop was certainly in a very bad humour, when he talked at that rate."——BURNET, vol. II. 608.

The ſame day the lords were on this debate, there was another on the ſame ſubject in the houſe of commons, where [f] As ſoon as the houſe was up, the lord Mohun went to the earl Pawlet, and told him, that the duke of Marlborough deſired to have an eclairciſſement with his lordſhip, about ſome expreſſions he had uſed in that day's debate; and therefore deſired him to go and take the air in the country. The earl, who readily underſtood the meaning of ſuch an eclairciſſement, aſked my lord Mohun, Whether he brought him a challenge? To which he anſwered, That his meſſage wanted no explanation, and that he would accompany the duke of Marlborough. The earl Pawlet being returned home, with ſome emotion, and having given his lady a hint of what had paſſed, the earl of Dartmouth, ſecretary of ſtate, was ſoon acquainted with it; and went immediately to the duke of Marlborough, and deſired him not to ſtir abroad. At the ſame time, his lordſhip cauſed two centinels to be placed at the earl Pawlet's houſe; and, having informed the queen of the whole affair, her majeſty ſent him back to the duke of Marlborough, to deſire him, that this might go no further. His grace gave his word of honour, that he would comply with her majeſty's commands: But, though this quarrel ended without bloodſhed, yet many began to apprehend the conſequences of the heats and animoſities of the two parties, which daily increaſed. The duke of Marlborough was afterwards ſeverely cenſured, 'for ſetting the example of party duels': But, on the other hand, the tongues of moſt people were very free with the duke of Ormond: And, to this purpoſe, we may take notice, that an alehouſe-keeper in Weſtminſter, having, either for a jeſt-ſake, or out of mere ſimplicity, ſet up for his ſign his grace's head, with this inſcription, 'the General of Peace', the government ordered the ſame to be taken down.

[g] They were to this purpoſe: 1. That their lordſhips conceived ſuch an order, as was propoſed in the queſtion, to be abſolutely neceſſary, becauſe they were convinced, that the duke of Ormond lay under ſome order of reſtraint from acting offenſively, not only from the accounts, which were public both here and in Holland, of his declaring it, to prince Eugene, and to the deputies of the ſtates at their laſt conſultations, when both prince Eugene and thoſe deputies earneſtly preſſed him to join in attacking the French army, which was then known to be much inferior to that of the allies, both in the number and condition of their troops; but alſo, for that nothing of this whole matter was denied by thoſe lords, who had the means of knowing theſe facts, as undoubtedly would have been without ſcruple, had not the facts been true; ſince no ſcruple was made of acquainting the houſe with a ſubſequent order very lately ſent to the duke of Ormond, allowing him to join in a ſiege: Which was a further evidence, that he had before ſome order of reſtraint; for otherwiſe this laſt order would be unneceſſary and abſurd; it being a general, and a conſtant, and a ſtanding inſtruction to every commander in chief by land or ſea, to do his utmoſt endeavour to annoy the enemy. And it is manifeſt by this laſt order, that, even in the opinion of the miniſters, it was expedient to take off this reſtraint in ſome degree; and the leaving the duke of Ormond ſtill under a reſtraint from giving battle to the French, ſeemed moſt unaccountable and inconſiſtent with the liberty indulged to him, of joining in a ſiege, and rendering it altogether uſeleſs. For no place, when taken, could be of ſuch advantage to the allies as Cambray, which opens a free paſſage for our army into the heart of France; and it was impoſſible to beſiege that place, without diſlodging the French from their encampments; and this alſo was impoſſible, if the French would keep their ground. Other attempts ſeemed to be of little uſe, but might ſerve to give the French time, which they did not want ſkill to improve.

2. That they conceived it would be derogatory to her majeſty's honour, to public faith, and that juſtice which was due to her allies; and that it was a ſort of impoſing upon our allies a ceſſation of arms, without their conſent, and in the moſt prejudicial manner, becauſe they were not ſo much as acquainted with it, and ſo might have been led into great difficulties: Beſides, that it fruſtrates all eſſential advantages againſt the common enemy, which might be of fatal conſequence to this nation and all Europe.

3. Becauſe it was acknowledged, that a general peace was not concluded, as indeed it was very unlikely it ſhould, there having been no anſwers in writing given by the French to the ſpecific demands of the allies, though the ſame were delivered to the French three months ago. And it was further declared, 'That there was no ſeparate peace; nay, that ſuch a peace would be fooliſh, knaviſh, and villainous'. and therefore, while we were in war, and having no ſecurity of a peace, their lordſhips conceived, that ſuch an order of reſtraint was a plain neglect of all thoſe happy opportunities, which Providence might, and lately did, put into our hands, of ſubduing our enemy, and forcing him to a juſt and honourable peace. And ſurely it was imprudent and dangerous to rely on the promiſes of France, which were ſo far from being any ſecurity, that even a peace would not be ſafe in their opinion, unleſs it be ſuch, as gave ſo full ſatisfaction to the allies, that they ſhould be willing to join with us in a mutual guaranty of it.

That her majeſty having with great wiſdom declared to this parliament, 'That the beſt means of obtaining a good peace was to make early preparations for war, and a vigorous proſecution of it': and ſince the parliament had, with great duty and deference to her majeſty, and a juſt zeal for the intereſt of their country, and of Europe, given very great ſupplies for that purpoſe; their lordſhips conceived, that ſuch an order of reſtraint, being very different from that declaration of her majeſty, muſt be the effect of very ill advice; by which the parliament's good intentions would be defeated, and all thoſe heavy loads of taxes, which they have for ſo good purpoſes chearfully given, rendered fruitleſs and unneceſſary, and might, in concluſion, after having thus trifled away our wealth and time, bring us into a neceſſity of accepting ſuch a peace, as it ſhould pleaſe an inſolent and domineering enemy to give us.

This proteſt was publiſhed likewiſe abroad in French and other languages; and the peers who ſigned it, were the dukes of Devonſhire, Marlborough, Rutland, Bolton, Mountague, and Somerſet; the marquis of Dorcheſter; the earls of Wharton, Derby, Nottingham, Bridgewater, Godolphin, Carliſle, Orford, and Scarborough; the lord viſcount Townſhend; the lord biſhops of Oxford, Sarum, Bangor, and St. Aſaph; and the lords Rockingham, Cowper, Haverſham, Mohun, and Hallifax.

[h] The lord Townſhend had informed the houſe, that thoſe who treated with the French at Gertruydenberg did, at their return, give an account of their negotiation to the miniſters of the allies, in the penſioner's preſence, before they reported it to the ſtates themſelves: but, upon this, the earl of Strafford ſaid, they had been firſt ſecretly with the penſioner, who directed them both what to ſay, and what to ſuppreſs.—BURNET, vol. II. 607.

Mr. Pulteney moved, " That an addreſs be preſented to her majeſty, to acquaint her, that her faithful commons were juſtly alarmed at the intelligences received from abroad, that her general in Flanders had declined to act offenſively againſt France, in concurrence with her allies. And being under the deepeſt concern for the dangerous conſequences, which muſt ariſe from thence to the common cauſe, they beſought her majeſty, that ſpeedy inſtructions might be given to her general, to proſecute the war with the utmoſt vigour, in conjunction with her allies, as the beſt means to obtain a ſafe and honourable peace for her majeſty, and all of them, and to quiet the minds of the people, who could not but be extremely apprehenſive of the fatal conſequence of ſuch a diviſion". Upon this motion Mr. St. John gave the commons much the ſame aſſurances the treaſurer had given the lords; and in anſwer to what was ſuggeſted by a member, " That the preſent negotiation had been carried on in a clandeſtine and treacherous manner", he ſaid, " He hoped, it would not be accounted treachery to act for the good and advantage of Great-Britain: That he gloried in the ſmall ſhare he had in this negotiation; and, whatever cenſure he might undergo for it, the bare ſatisfaction of acting in that view would be a ſufficient recompence and comfort to him all his life-time". After ſome other ſpeeches on both ſides, Mr. Pulteney's motion was rejected by a majority of two hundred and three voices againſt ſeventy-three; and it was reſolved, " That the commons had an entire confidence in her majeſty's promiſe to communicate to her parliament the terms of the peace, before the ſame ſhould be concluded; and that they would ſupport her againſt all ſuch perſons, either at home or abroad, who ſhould endeavour to obſtruct it". This reſolution having been laid before the queen by the whole houſe, her majeſty thanked the commons moſt heartily for it, as being dutiful to her, honeſt to their country, and very ſeaſonable at this time, when ſo many artifices were uſed to obſtruct a good peace, or to force one diſadvantageous to Britain". On the ſecond of June they alſo reſolved, in imitation of the lords, to addreſs the queen, " for an account of the negotiations and tranſactions at the Hague and Gertruydenberg, and who were then employed as her majeſty's plenipotentiaries".

While the diſputes, that had been raiſed at Utrecht, were induſtriouſly kept on foot, the negotiations were carrying on directly between England and France; and the two great points upon the anvil were the renunciation of the Spaniſh monarchy, and the ceſſation of arms.

The firſt mention, made of the renunciation in order to be treated of, is found in a memorial dated March 28, 1712, intitled, 'The anſwer to the memorial brought by Mr. Gaultier the 23d of March 1711-12'. This memorial, which was received in France the 23d of March, was ſuppreſſed, but the contents of it may in great meaſure be collected from the anſwer that was given to it. As the general propoſal, that the crowns of France and Spain ſhould never be united, aroſe firſt from England, and was made an article in the private propoſitions ſent over by Mr. Prior; ſo the expedient for preventing that union, namely, a renunciation, was alſo firſt propoſed by England[h]. In the anſwer to Gaultier's memorial, Torcy declares, in the ſtrongeſt terms, " That the renunciation deſired would be null and invalid by the fundamental laws of France, according to which the neareſt prince to the crown is of neceſſity the heir thereto. It is an inheritance, that he receives neither from the king his predeceſſor, nor from the people, but from the benefit of the law; ſo that, when one king dies, the other ſucceeds him forthwith, without aſking the conſent of any perſon whatſoever. He ſucceeds not as heir, but as the maſter of the kingdom, the ſeigniory whereof belongs unto him, not by choice, but by right of birth only. He is not beholden for his crown either to the will of his predeceſſor, or to any edict, nor to any decree, nor to the liberality of any perſon, but to the law. This law is looked upon as the work of him, who hath eſtabliſhed all monarchies; and we are perſuaded in France, that God only can aboliſh it. No renunciation therefore can deſtroy it; and, if the king of Spain ſhould renounce for the ſake of peace, and in obedience to the king his grandfather, they would deceive themſelves, who received it as a ſufficient expedient to prevent the miſchief we propoſe to avoid." He then gives an account of the diſpoſition made of the ſucceſſion to the crown of Spain by king Philip, and regiſtered in the councils of Spain; which diſpoſition he propoſed might be confirmed by the preſent treaty of peace, and ratified by the cortes or ſtates of the kingdom of Spain. Mr. St. John in his anſwer rejected this propoſal, and not at all convinced by what Torcy had ſo ſtrongly urged, concerning the nullity of the renunciation, inſiſted ſtill upon it. " We are ready (ſays he) to believe you are perſuaded in France, that God alone can aboliſh that law, upon which your right of ſucceſſion is founded; but you will give us leave to be perſuaded in Great-Britain, that a prince may depart from his right by a voluntary ceſſion; and that he, in favour of whom that renunciation is made, may be juſtly ſupported in his pretenſions by the powers, that become guarantees of the treaty. In ſhort, ſir, the queen commands me to tell you, that this article is of ſo great conſequence, as well for herſelf as the reſt of Europe, for this preſent age as for poſterity, that ſhe will never agree to continue the negotiations of peace, unleſs the expedient ſhe has propoſed be accepted, or ſome other equally ſolid." Torcy, in his anſwer to this letter, begins to think it not impoſſible to find an expedient, to ſettle this grand affair; and propoſes, that, when the king of Spain ſhall become either immediate ſucceſſor, or preſumptive heir to the crown of France, he ſhall then declare the choice he intends to make; either to maintain his right to the crown of France, or to keep that of Spain: that king Philip ſhall become party to the treaty, wherein the ſucceſſion to the two crowns ſhall be likewiſe ſettled; and that all the powers of Europe ſhall enter into an engagement with France to maintain it. Mr. St. John reaſons againſt this propoſal, and inſiſts, that no expedient can effectually ſecure Europe from the dangers, wherewith it is threatened by the union of the two monarchies, unleſs the prince, who is at preſent in poſſeſſion of Spain, makes his choice at this very inſtant; and, upon a ſuppoſition, that the crown of Spain would be his choice, that this declaration ſhould be made during the congreſs at Utrecht. Torcy, ſeeming always to comply with what was deſired, agrees, that the Catholic king muſt calm the uneaſineſs of Europe, in declaring, from the preſent time, what part he will take, if ever the ſucceſſion of France is open in his favour. That the inconveniencies ariſing from hence muſt ſubmit to the public good. " Thus, ſir, (ſays Torcy to Mr. St. John) the king approving your propoſition, diſpatches a courier to Spain, and writes to the king his grandſon, to let him know the neceſſity of reſolving on the choice he ſhall make, and to declare it, to the end it may be inſerted in the treaty of the general peace, and be made a condition of it, whereof all Europe ſhall be guarantee". And he promiſes to uſe all poſſible means, even force, if it were neceſſary, to make the king of Spain agree to it. He hopes this propoſition will, in a great meaſure, remove all difficulties; and, as they muſt expect new obſtructions from thoſe, who would willingly break the conferences, he believes the beſt way to diſappoint their deſigns would be, for the queen of Great-Britain to propoſe immediately a ſuſpenſion of arms; for they grounded their hopes upon the events of a campaign. Mr. St. John, in his anſwer to this letter, treats this propoſal as liable to all the objections of the former, and argues thus upon it; " Although the king of Spain ſhould at this inſtant declare his choice, What greater ſecurity will Europe have, if the execution of that choice be deferred to another time? In offering, that he ſhall be obliged to declare his choice at this preſent time, you agree, that neither the ſtipulations of a treaty, nor the guarantee of the powers engaged in the preſent war, would be ſufficient to ſecure that the choice ſhall be made. How then can we conclude, that they will be ſufficient to ſecure, that, when the caſe ſhall happen, he ſhall quit one crown to accept of the other, according to the choice, which he ſhall now make? The queen has often declared, that it will be impoſſible for her to be content with any expedient, which ſhall not be very ſolid, upon an article of ſo great an importance as the union of the two monarchies. This would be to loſe the fruit of all the blood, which the allies had ſpilt in the courſe of this war. This would be to betray the common cauſe of Europe, and to expoſe both the preſent age and poſterity to greater dangers, than it is poſſible to imagine". In ſhort, he inſiſts, that they muſt take care, that the time ſhall never be, when the ſame prince ſhall have the crown of Spain upon his head, [h] It is obſerved here, in the report of the Committee of Secrecy in 1715, 'The ſenſe of France and Spain upon that important article was not known, nor ſo much as aſked, although in every ſtep France had given plain indications, that the crown of Spain was to remain to king Philip. And it is ſurprizing, that the Britiſh miniſtry had gone ſuch lengths in promoting the meaſures of France, without taking the leaſt precaution, or having any ſatisfaction concerning the monarchy of Spain, wherein the intereſt of Great-Britain was, by their own confeſſion, more immediately concerned, than in all their other articles of the peace.

and the ſucceſſion to the crown of France open to him. He at laſt propoſes, " That, if the king of Spain prefers the expectation of the crown of France to the preſent poſſeſſion of Spain, in ſuch caſe he ſhall withdraw forthwith with his family out of Spain, the poſſeſſion of which, and the Indies, ſhall be given to the duke of Savoy: That king Philip ſhould have the kingdom of Sicily and the hereditary dominions of the duke of Savoy, together with the Montferrat and Mantua, all which dominions he ſhould remain poſſeſſed of, though he became king of France, excepting Sicily, which, in that caſe, ſhould return to the houſe of Auſtria".

Monſieur de Torcy, ſtill ſeeming to comply with the meaſures of England, ſhews the great hardſhip, which the king of Spain muſt undergo, in ſacrificing his own and the intereſt of his family for the eſtabliſhing a general peace. However, the king of France would ſend to him, to know his mind upon the two alternatives. In the mean time, the king of France promiſes, that the treaty of peace ſhall be made, upon the foundation of one of theſe two propoſitions; either that the king of Spain ſhall renounce his right to the crown of France, and keep Spain and the Indies; or, if he prefers his expectation upon France, he ſhall quit Spain and the Indies to the duke of Savoy, in exchange for the preſent dominions of the duke of Savoy, &c. as propoſed by Mr. St. John. He hopes, by this promiſe of the king of France, all uncertainties are removed; and ſubmits to the queen's wiſdom, to conſider what method will be moſt conducive to the general good. " It will (ſays he) be very unhappy, if any event, during the campaign, ſhall fall out to diſturb the good diſpoſitions, that are ſeen at preſent, for eſtabliſhing the public repoſe."

This correſpondence between the two Secretaries, for preventing the union of the two kingdoms, carried on from about the middle of March to the 18th of May 1712, ended at laſt, juſt as it began; and king Philip choſe to make the Renunciation. Torcy giving the Britiſh miniſters ſuch early notice, and telling them ſo very plainly, that what they aſked was utterly inſufficient, and would be for ever deemed, by the unalterable laws of France, null and void, is very remarkable. His dexterity in managing that part of the negotiation, in ſeeming always to comply, and deſirous to come as near as poſſible to the propoſals made from hence, and ſubmitting at laſt, ſince Great-Britain would have it ſo, to the Renunciation ſo peremptorily inſiſted on, is no leſs obſervable. But it is unaccountable, how the Engliſh miniſtry, when they were expreſsly told, thoſe would deceive themſelves, who ſhould accept of a renunciation, as a ſufficient expedient to prevent the union of the two monarchies; when they laid it down as a principle never to be departed from, that the union of the two monarchies would be the greateſt miſchief, that could poſſibly happen to all Europe, and to Great-Britain in particular; ſhould ſtill perſevere in relying upon this expedient of a Renunciation. But, no care was taken to render effectual the two only expedients, that were ever propoſed for adding any degree of real ſecurity to the renunciation; which were, to have it ſolemnly accepted by the ſtates of France; and to have it confirmed by a general guaranty of all the powers of Europe engaged in the preſent war. The firſt was aſked indeed; but, upon the refuſal of France, was entirely given up by the Britiſh miniſtry. The ſecond, by their method of negotiating, and their treatment of the allies, was from that very time rendered impracticable, as the French could not but foreſee. It muſt be remembered, that a few days after this anſwer of monſieur de Torcy was received, Mr. St. John ſent orders to the Britiſh plenipotentiaries to declare to the States-general, that the queen was now under no farther obligations whatſoever to them, who, with the reſt of the allies, were to be guarantees of this treaty. To this may be added a paſſage, in a letter from the plenipotentiaries to Mr. St. John, acquainting him, that in ſome diſcourſe with the marſhal d'Uxelles, upon occaſion of the death of the dauphin, they deſired to know of him, what thoſe meaſures are, which France offers to take, in order to prevent the union of the two kingdoms; and whether they were to conſiſt in real or verbal ſecurities; upon which the French miniſter pretended to know of no other but verbal. They then ſuggeſted to Mr. St. John, that an obligation upon king Philip to renounce the regency as well as the crown of France, for himſelf and his poſterity, would amount to ſome degree of real ſecurity. But no endeavours were uſed to obtain this, nor any mention made of it, as far as appears.

Torcy's letter of the 18th of May, N. S. was received by Mr. St. John the 9th of May, O. S. and the promiſe of the king of France to oblige his grandſon to accept the alternative of the two kingdoms, had ſo good and ſudden an effect, that the day following, without waiting the return of the courier from Madrid, to know whether king Philip did conſent or not to the propoſal, orders were ſent, on the 10th of May, to the duke of Ormond, by Mr. St. John, to avoid engaging in any ſiege, or hazarding a battle till further order. And the ſame day, that theſe orders were ſent with directions to diſguiſe them, which was to conceal them from the confederates, they were communicated to the queen's enemies. ' Abbot Gaultier will give you an account (ſays Mr. St. John to Torcy) of the orders I have juſt now diſpatched to the duke of Ormond. What Mr. St. John himſelf thought of the importance of this order, is to be learned from his letter to Mr. Prior, September 19, 1712: ' The moment I read the queen a letter from monſieur de Torcy, by which it appeared, that the king of France would oblige his grandſon to accept of the alternative of quitting one of the two monarchies, her orders were diſpatched to the duke to engage in neither ſiege nor battle; and ſhe prevented the French from even making the demand. I will not ſay, that this order ſaved their army from being beat; but I think, in my conſcience, that it did'.

On the 24th of May, 1712, Mr. St. John writes again to Torcy, that, although they had yet received no anſwer from Madrid concerning the renunciation, but being preſſed in time, and finding it neceſſary for the queen to make the communication ſhe had promiſed, to the parliament, of the terms on which a peace might be made, he acquaints him with the ſteps, which the queen was reſolved to take, provided the moſt chriſtian king would render them practicable for her. And, in a memorial of the ſame date, he ſpecifies the conditions, upon which the queen conſents to make ſuch important ſteps and deciſive declarations to her parliament: ' Firſt, That ſhe had ſettled with France the intereſt of Great-Britain. Secondly, That ſhe looks upon the intereſts of the other powers engaged with her in the war, as eaſy to be adjuſted, ſince the king offers to the greateſt part of them very near what they have demanded, and to all a juſt and reaſonable ſatisfaction. Thirdly, That ſhe will ſet about accommodating the affairs of her allies; and, that to prevent all the obſtructions, which the events of the campaign might occaſion to the negotiations of peace, ſhe agreed with the king to a ſuſpenſion of arms'. The conditions ſpecified in the memorial were demands relating to North-America, to commerce, and the ſuſpenſion of arms. In the article concerning commerce it is ſaid, ' That ſeveral points relating to trade requiring a longer diſcuſſion than the preſent criſis would admit; and the queen being much more intent upon ſecuring the general peace, than any particular advantages, demands at preſent only the two following conditions: Firſt, that commiſſaries ſhould be named on both ſides to meet at London, there to examine and ſettle the duties and impoſitions to be paid reſpectively in each kingdom. Secondly, That no privileges or advantages relating to commerce with France, ſhall be yielded to any foreign nation, which ſhall not at the ſame time be granted to the ſubjects of her Britannic majeſty; as likewiſe no privilege or advantage, in relation to the trade of Great-Britain, ſhall be yielded to any foreign nation, which ſhall not at the ſame time be granted to the ſubjects of France'. As to the ſuſpenſion of arms, ' her majeſty will conſent, it ſhall be made for two months, provided, firſt, that within the ſaid term the king of Spain ſhall either make the renunciation demanded, or ſhall yield Spain to the duke of Savoy, upon the conditions mentioned in Mr. St. John's letter. Secondly, That the French garriſon ſhall evacuate Dunkirk, and the queen's troops be admitted the ſame day that the ſuſpenſion of arms ſhall commence. Thirdly, That, in caſe the States-general ſhall at the ſame time conſent to the ſuſpenſion of arms, it ſeems reaſonable they ſhould have the liberty of putting a garriſon into Cambray'. It may be remarked upon theſe conditions, that although it was daily inſtilled into the minds of the people, that the great advantages in trade and commerce ſecured to Great-Britain were the chief inducements to the miniſtry to engage in theſe meaſures with France, it is here declared, that they were more intent upon the general peace, than any particular advantages. And whereas it was laid down as a principle, from which the queen would never depart, that the intereſts of Great-Britain ſhould in the firſt place be adjuſted, and the great advantages, ſtipulated for theſe nations before the concluſion of the peace, were to juſtify the peace, and all the ſteps, that were taken to procure it; it is now evident, that no mention was made of our trade in Spain; and, as for our commerce in general, the ſettling of that was poſtponed, and all points in diſpute betwixt Great-Britain and France were to be referred to commiſſaries; which propoſition was not demanded, but voluntarily offered by Mr. St. John. On the 8th of June, 1712, N. S. Torcy ſent an account, 'That the king of Spain, of the two propoſitions, had choſen to keep Spain and the Indies, and to renounce for himſelf and his deſcendants the right to the crown of France. That, this principal obſtacle to the peace being removed, the king of France expected, that the queen would now clear on her ſide the reſt of the difficulties, which might obſtruct this great work, by making ſuch declarations, as had been promiſed upon the return of the courier from Madrid, and were neceſſary for this end. That the king thought the firſt and moſt urgent was to ſettle a ſuſpenſion of arms, either general, or at leaſt between the two armies in the Low-Countries, which may continue till the concluſion of the peace'. On the 10th of June, N. S. Torcy acknowledges the receipt of Mr. St. John's letter of the 24th of May, O. S. together with the memorial; and ſends another memorial in anſwer to it, containing the king of France's anſwer to theſe laſt demands of the queen. He takes notice, 'That the letters from the army mention a deſign to inveſt Queſnoy, in order to beſiege it; but, that the king could not think, that the queen approved of ſuch an undertaking, much leſs that her troops ſhould be employed to render it ſucceſsful. He concludes, that, if the ſuſpenſion be not immediately made, we may find ourſelves indiſpenſably drawn into ſome great event, which he hopes the Secretary's prudence and care will prevent', And although in the anſwer to the queen's demands nothing material, that was aſked for our trade in North-America, was granted, the evacuating of Dunkirk, and admitting an Engliſh garriſon was not agreed to, and the receiving a Dutch garriſon into Cambray, was abſolutely refuſed, which were propoſed as conditions of the ſuſpenſion of arms; Torcy hopes, 'That this return to the queen's demands will occaſion no new trouble; but as the beginning and whole courſe of this negotiation was carried on upon a mutual confidence, of which they had ſeen the good effects; it is neceſſary to baniſh all diſtruſt, and the queen to repoſe an entire confidence in his majeſty, without inſiſting on demands, which may ſerve only to create jealouſies'.

On the 6th of June, O. S. Mr. St. John owns the receipt of Torcy's two letters of the 8th and 10th of June, N. S. and ſays, though the king of France had not anſwered the queen's demands according to expectation, which were the conditions, on which the queen was to make ſuch peremptory and deciſive declarations; yet the queen would not defer going that day to parliament, and making all the declarations, that were neceſſary to render the nation unanimouſly inclined to the peace. That ſhe had not indeed mentioned to the parliament the ſuſpenſion of arms, but had commanded him to acquaint monſieur de Torcy with the reſolutions ſhe had taken in relation to it; and inſiſting upon the renunciation as the capital point of the negotiation; and for which her majeſty would rather depart from almoſt all the points, that had been agreed upon, than leave that to any uncertainty. Upon this foundation the queen hopes, that the moſt chriſtian king will not find any thing offenſive in the demands, which ſhe found herſelf obliged to renew, being conditions for a ſuſpenſion of arms between the two armies in the Netherlands, which, if the king conſents to (ſays Mr. St. John to Torcy) 'You have only to ſign and ſend to the duke of Ormond, who, at the ſame time that he takes poſſeſſion of Dunkirk, will declare to the allies, that he has orders to act no further againſt France. He acquaints him, Lord Strafford is going back to Utrecht; the inſtructions he is to carry will, according to your deſire, put the queen's plenipotentiaries in a condition to keep no longer thoſe meaſures, to which they have been hitherto obliged to ſubmit, but from henceforth they may openly join with France, and give law to thoſe, who will not ſubmit to juſt and reaſonable conditions; and promiſes, when lord Strafford is gone, he will diſpatch another courier to inform him of the orders he carries'. The articles for a ſuſpenſion were ſigned by Mr. St. John, June 6, O. S. and the next day Mr. St. John writes a private letter to Torcy, expreſſing the utmoſt confidence in the good faith of the moſt chriſtian king; thinks it neceſſary to haſten the peace; tells him, it will frighten the Dutch, to be told the queen will act no longer againſt France; and that, if they do not haſten to make their agreement, they will have a burden upon their backs which they are not able to bear. On the ſame day, Mr. St. John ſends to the duke of Ormond copies of theſe two laſt letters, and of the memorial ſent to Torcy. 'They have been, ſays he, prepared by the queen's order, in anſwer to the laſt expreſs, which came from France: And you will perceive by them, my lord, that the queen inſiſts on the execution of the article relating to Spain, and on the delivery of Dunkirk, as points, without which ſhe will not declare for a ceſſation of arms in the Netherlands: But, if theſe conditions are accepted, and ſent ſigned by the marquis de Torcy to your grace, and Dunkirk put into your poſſeſſion, you are publicly to own, that you can act no longer againſt the French. If they are not conſented to, you are entirely free from reſtraint, and at liberty to take all reaſonable meaſures, that are in your power for annoying the enemy. It is probable marſhal Villars may receive the orders, which will be ſent him from Verſailles, within a day after this letter will come to your hands. Your grace will therefore loſe no time in acquainting him, that you are in expectation of hearing from his court that, which muſt determine your proceedings; and that, according to the king's reſolution, you are either to look upon yourſelves on both ſides as freed from any reſtrictive orders, and in full liberty of acting againſt each other; or that you are openly to declare for a ceſſation'. This order was in itſelf of a very extraordinary nature, though conditional; and the Britiſh miniſtry ſeemed in very great haſte to give all up into the hands of France, when the queen's general, at the head of a confederate army in the field, at that time covering a ſiege, which the allies were engaged in, ſhould be ordered to govern himſelf according to ſuch ſignifications, as ſhould come from the court of France, and thoſe tranſmitted to him by the general commanding the enemy's army, whoſe duty it was by force or ſtratagem to raiſe the ſiege, or gain any advantage he could over the allies.

On the 22d of June, N. S. an anſwer to the propoſals laſt ſent over was tranſmitted to Mr. St. John, ſigned by Torcy, with two alterations; one no leſs material, than whereas it was demanded, that the renunciation ſhould be ratified in the moſt ſolemn manner by the ſtates of France, which had been mentioned before as one of the chief ſecurities to make it as effectual as any thing could, it is here ſubſtituted, that it ſhall be regiſtered in the ſeveral parliaments: And to the article of Dunkirk is added, 'That all the king's officers, both land and ſea-officers, ſhall have liberty to ſtay at Dunkirk, and to execute their ſeveral offices'. And on the ſame day Torcy writes two letters, the one a public letter, explaining at large the alterations; the other a private letter to prevail with him to conſent to theſe alterations; of which private correſpondence carried on between the two ſecretaries there are ſeveral inſtances.

Upon the foundation of theſe preliminaries, though not then fully ſettled, the queen, on Friday the 6th of June, came to the houſe of peers with the uſual ſolemnity, and made the following ſpeech to both houſes:

My lords and gentlemen,

'THE making peace and war is the undoubted prerogative of the crown; yet, ſuch is the juſt confidence I place in you, that at the opening of this ſeſſion I acquainted you, that a negotiation for a general peace was begun; and afterwards, by meſſages, I promiſed to communicate to you the terms of peace, before the ſame ſhould be concluded.

'In purſuance of that promiſe, I now come to let you know upon what terms a general peace may be made.

'I need not mention the difficulties, which ariſe from the very nature of this affair; and it is but too apparent, that theſe difficulties have been increaſed by other obſtructions artfully contrived to hinder this great and good work.

'Nothing however has moved me from ſteadily purſuing, in the firſt place, the true intereſt of my own kingdoms; and I have not omitted any thing, which might procure to our allies what is due to them by treaties, and what is neceſſary for their ſecurity.

'The aſſuring of the Proteſtant Succeſſion as by law eſtabliſhed in the houſe of Hanover to theſe kingdoms, being what I have neareſt at heart, particular care is taken, not only to have that acknowledged in the ſtrongeſt terms, but to have an additional ſecurity by the removal of That Perſon out of the dominions of France, who has pretended to diſturb this ſettlement.

'The apprehenſion, that Spain and the Weſt-Indies might be united to France, was the chief inducement to begin this war; and the effectual preventing of ſuch an union was the principle I laid down at the commencement of this treaty.

'Former examples, and the late negotiations, ſufficiently ſhew how difficult it is to find means to accompliſh this work. I would not content myſelf with ſuch as are ſpeculative, or depend on treaties only. I inſiſted on what is ſolid, and to have at hand the power of executing what ſhould be agreed.

'I can therefore now tell you, that France is at laſt brought to offer, that the duke of Anjou ſhall, for himſelf and his deſcendants, renounce for ever all claim to the crown of France. And, that this important article may be expoſed to no hazard, the performance is to accompany the promiſe.

'At the ſame time the ſucceſſion to the crown of France is to be declared, after the death of the preſent dauphin and his ſons, to be in the duke of Berry and his ſons, in the duke of Orleans and his ſons, and ſo on to the reſt of the houſe of Bourbon. As to Spain and the Indies, the ſucceſſion to thoſe dominions, after the duke of Anjou and his children, is to deſcend to ſuch prince, as ſhall be agreed upon at the treaty, for ever excluding the reſt of the houſe of Bourbon.

'For confirming the renunciations and ſettlements before mentioned, it is further offered, that they ſhall be ratified in the moſt ſtrong and ſolemn manner, both in France and Spain; and that thoſe kingdoms, as well as all the other powers engaged in the preſent war, ſhall be guarantees to the ſame.

'The nature of this propoſal is ſuch, that it executes itſelf. The intereſt of Spain is to ſupport it; and in France the perſons, to whom that ſucceſſion is to belong, will be ready and powerful enough to vindicate their own right.

'France and Spain are now more effectually divided than ever. And thus, by the bleſſing of God, will a real balance of power be fixed in Europe, and remain liable to as few accidents, as human affairs can be exempted from.

'A treaty of commerce between theſe kingdoms and France has been entered upon; but the exceſſive duties laid on ſome goods, and the prohibitions of others, make it impoſſible to finiſh this work ſo ſoon as were to be deſired. Care is however taken to eſtabliſh a method of ſettling this matter; and in the mean time proviſion is made, that the ſame privileges and advantages, as ſhall be granted to any other nation by France, ſhall be granted in like manner to us.

'The diviſion of the iſland of St. Chriſtopher between us and the French having been the cauſe of great inconvenience and damage to my ſubjects, I have demanded to have an abſolute ceſſion made to me of that whole iſland; and France agrees to this demand.

"Our intereſt is ſo deeply concerned in the trade of North America, that I have uſed my utmoſt endeavours to adjuſt that article in the moſt beneficial manner. France conſents to reſtore to us the whole Bay and Straits of Hudſon; to deliver up the iſland of Newfoundland, with Placentia; and to make an abſolute ceſſion of Annapolis with the reſt of Nova Scotia or Acadia.

"The ſafety of our home-trade will be better provided for by the demolition of Dunkirk.

"Our Mediterranean trade, and the Britiſh intereſt and influence in thoſe parts, will be ſecured by the poſſeſſion of Gibraltar, and Port-Mahon, with the whole iſland of Minorca, which are offered to remain in my hands.

"The trade of Spain, and to the Weſt-Indies, may in general be ſettled as it was in the time of the late king of Spain, Charles II. and a particular proviſion be made, that all advantages, rights, or privileges, which have been granted, or which may hereafter be granted, by Spain to any other nation, ſhall be in like manner granted to the ſubjects of Great-Britain.

'But the part, which we have borne in the proſecution of this war, intitling us to ſome diſtinction in the terms of peace, I have inſiſted and obtained, that the aſſiento or contract for furniſhing the Spaniſh Weſt-Indies with negroes, ſhall be made with us for the term of thirty years, in the ſame manner, as it has been enjoyed by the French for theſe ten years paſt.

'I have not taken upon me to determine the intereſts of our confederates. Theſe muſt be adjuſted in the congreſs at Utrecht, where my beſt endeavours ſhall be employed, as they have hitherto been, to procure to every one of them all juſt and reaſonable ſatisfaction. In the mean time, I think it proper to acquaint you, that France offers to make the Rhine the barrier of the empire; to yield Briſac, the fort of Kehl, and Landau; and to raze all fortreſſes, both on the other ſide of the Rhine, and in that river.

'As to the Proteſtant intereſt in Germany, there will be, on the part of France, no objection to the reſettling thereof, on the foot of the treaty of Weſtphalia.

'The Spaniſh Low Countries may go to his imperial majeſty: The kingdoms of Naples and Sardinia, the duchy of Milan, and the places belonging to Spain on the coaſt of Tuſcany, may likewiſe be yielded by the treaty of peace to the emperor.

'As to the kingdom of Sicily, though there remains no diſpute concerning the ceſſion of it by the duke of Anjou, yet the diſpoſition thereof is not yet determined.

'The intereſts of the ſtates-general with reſpect to commerce are agreed to, as they have been demanded by their own miniſters, with the exception only of ſome very few ſpecies of merchandize, and the entire barrier, as demanded by the ſtates in 1709 from France, except two or three places at moſt.

'As to theſe exceptions, ſeveral expedients are propoſed; and I make no doubt, but this barrier may be ſo ſettled, as to render that Republic perfectly ſecure againſt any enterprize on the part of France, which is the foundation of all my engagements upon this head with the States.

'The demands of Portugal depending on the diſpoſition of Spain, and that article having been long in diſpute, it has not yet been poſſible to make any conſiderable progreſs therein; but my plenipotentiaries will now have an opportunity to aſſiſt that king in his pretenſions.

'Thoſe of the king of Pruſſia are ſuch, as, I hope, will admit of little difficulty on the part of France; and my endeavours ſhall not be wanting to procure all I am able to ſo good an ally.

'The difference between the barrier demanded for the duke of Savoy in 1709, and the offers now made by France, is very inconſiderable. But, that prince having ſo ſignally diſtinguiſhed himſelf in the ſervice of the common cauſe, I am endeavouring to procure for him ſtill further advantages.

'France has conſented, that the elector Palatine ſhall continue his preſent rank among the electors, and remain in poſſeſſion of the Upper Palatinate.

'The electoral dignity is likewiſe acknowledged in the houſe of Hanover, according to the articles inſerted, at that prince's deſire, in my demands.

'And, as to the reſt of the allies, I make no doubt of being able to ſecure their ſeveral intereſts.

My lords and gentlemen,

'I have now communicated to you, not only the terms of peace, which may by the future treaty be obtained for my own ſubjects, but likewiſe the propoſals of France for ſatiſfying our allies.

'The former are ſuch, as I have reaſon to expect to make my people ſome amends for that great and unequal burden, which they have lain under through the whole courſe of this war; and I am willing to hope, that none of our confederates, and eſpecially thoſe, to whom ſo great acceſſions of dominion and power are to accrue by this peace, will envy Great-Britain her ſhare in the glory and advantage of it.

'The latter are not yet ſo perfectly adjuſted as a little more time might have rendered them; but, the ſeaſon of the year making it neceſſary to put an end to this ſeſſion, I reſolved no longer to defer communicating theſe matters to you.

'I can make no doubt but you are all fully perſuaded, that nothing will be neglected on my part, in the progreſs of this negotiation, to bring the peace to an happy and ſpeedy iſſue; and I depend on your entire confidence in me, and your chearful concurrence with me'.

This ſpeech occaſioned a general ſurprize, ſo that the public funds, which, upon the expectation of better conditions of peace, had that morning riſen four or five per cent. fell immediately to their former value. It was now eaſy to diſcern, what reaſons induced ſome perſons to keep ſecret the reſult of the negotiation between Great-Britain and France; for, if ſuch a plan had been communicated to the parliament, before a majority had been ſecured in both houſes, and the minds of the people prepared by a long train of artful and plauſible inſinuations, it would, in all probability, have been exploded with indignation. But by the dexterity of the prime managers things were brought to ſuch a paſs, that though in the houſe of commons, one or two members propoſed the taking the important matters, mentioned in her majeſty's ſpeech, into conſideration, they were preſently ſilenced by a general cry for an addreſs of thanks. It was unanimouſly reſolved, 'That an addreſs be made to her majeſty, acknowledging her great condeſcenſion in communicating the terms, upon which a general peace might be made; expreſſing the ſatisfaction of this houſe in what ſhe had already done, and their entire confidence in her ſteady purſuing the true intereſts of her kingdoms, and in her endeavours to procure for all her allies what is due to them by treaties, and neceſſary for their ſecurity; and humbly to deſire, that ſhe would be pleaſed to proceed in the preſent negotiation for the obtaining a ſpeedy peace'. A committee was appointed immediately to draw up that addreſs, which Mr. Freeman, their chairman, ſoon after reported, and which, with ſome amendments, being agreed to, was preſented by the whole houſe to the queen, who returned the following anſwer:

'I have the ſafety and intereſt of all my people ſo much at heart, that I cannot but take a great deal of pleaſure in this your dutiful and prudent addreſs; and I thank you moſt kindly for it.

'I have ſtudied your welfare, and by this you will find the good effects of that confidence, which you place in me, and which ought always to remain between ſo affectionate a prince, and ſuch faithful ſubjects'.

Things went not ſo ſmoothly in the houſe of peers. As ſoon as the queen was withdrawn, a motion being made for an addreſs of thanks, the earl of Wharton ſaid, 'They had all the reaſon in the world to do it, eſpecially for that part of her majeſty's ſpeech, wherein ſhe was pleaſed to declare, 'That the aſſuring the Proteſtant Succeſſion in the houſe of Hanover to theſe kingdoms, was what ſhe had neareſt at heart. But that, her majeſty's ſpeech containing many other particulars of the greateſt conſequence, he was of opinion, the houſe would do well to take it into ſerious conſideration the next day'; which was readily agreed to. Accordingly, on the 7th of June, the earl of Wharton propoſed, that the letter from the ſtates-general to the queen, inſerted in the ſupplement to the Amſterdam French Gazette, which arrived that very morning, might be read. But this was oppoſed, it being ſuggeſted, that the houſe ought not to take notice of a writing, that carried no authority with it. After this, the lords took the queen's ſpeech into conſideration, which occaſioned a warm debate. Among the reſt, the duke of Marlborough repreſented, 'That the meaſures purſued in England, for a year paſt, were directly contrary to her majeſty's engagements with the allies, ſullied the triumphs and glories of her reign, and would render the Engliſh name odious to all other nations'. The earl of Strafford ſaid, 'That ſome of the allies [meaning the Dutch] would not ſhew ſuch backwardneſs to a peace, as they had hitherto done, but for a member of that illuſtrious aſſembly [meaning the duke of Marlborough,] who maintained a ſecret correſpondence with, and endeavoured to perſuade them to carry on the war; feeding them with hopes, that they ſhould be ſupported by a ſtrong party here'. The lord Cowper anſwered this ſpeech; and, becauſe the earl of Strafford had not expreſſed himſelf with all the purity of the Engliſh tongue, he took occaſion to ſay, 'That noble lord had been ſo long abroad, that he had almoſt forgot, not only the language, but the conſtitution of his own country. That, according to our laws, it could never be ſuggeſted as a crime in the meaneſt ſubject, much leſs in any member of that auguſt aſſembly, to hold correſpondence with our allies; ſuch allies eſpecially, whoſe intereſt her majeſty had declared to be inſeparable from her own, in her ſpeech at the opening of this ſeſſion; whereas it would be a hard matter to juſtify and reconcile, either with our laws, or the laws of honour and juſtice, the conduct of ſome perſons, in treating clandeſtinely with the common enemy, without the participation of the allies'. The lords took afterwards into conſideration, the advantages offered by France to Great-Britain, particularly in ſettling 'the trade to Spain, and to the Weſt-Indies, as it was in the time of the late king of Spain, Charles II'. To this purpoſe the Earl of Godolphin ſaid, 'That he did not pretend to any great knowledge in trade; but, that during the time he had the honour to be in the adminiſtration of affairs, he had obſerved, and he could eaſily make it out by the books of the Cuſtom-Houſe, that the ſingle trade to Portugal brought to England, in times of war, double the wealth of the trade to Spain, in times of peace: So that, whatever might be ſuggeſted, to caſt a miſt before the eyes of the people, it was to be preſumed, that the trade to Spain, would ſtill yield leſs for the future, becauſe the French had made themſelves abſolute maſters of it'. After ſome other ſpeeches a motion was made, 'That an addreſs be preſented to her majeſty, to return her the thanks of this houſe for her moſt gracious ſpeech, and for her extraordinary condeſcenſion in communicating to her parliament the terms, upon which a general peace might be made: And to expreſs the entire ſatisfaction of that houſe in her great care for ſecuring the Proteſtant Succeſſion in the houſe of Hanover; and for her ſteady purſuing the true intereſt of her own kingdoms; and for endeavouring to procure to her allies what was due to them by treaties; and to aſſure her, that this houſe did entirely rely on her wiſdom to finiſh this great and good work'. Some exceptions were made to the words 'entirely rely'; and the houſe was moved, as the houſe of commons had likewiſe been upon the ſame occaſion, that theſe words might be added, 'And in order to that, that her majeſty would take ſuch meaſures in concert with her allies, as might induce them to join with her majeſty in a mutual guaranty'. This occaſioned a debate, in which the lord treaſurer and earl Pawlet ſpoke againſt that addition, and the earl of Nottingham and the lord Cowper for it. It was urged in oppoſition to this clauſe, that it would ſubject the queen and the whole treaty to the pleaſure of the allies, who might prove backward and intractable: And, ſince England had borne the greateſt ſhare of the burthen of the war, it was reaſonable, that the queen ſhould be the arbiter of the peace. On the other hand it was ſaid, that, if the allies did not enter into a guaranty, we muſt depend on the faith of the French, and be at their mercy, and ſo have nothing to truſt to but the promiſes of a court noted, in a courſe of years, for a train of perfidy. But many had formed an obſtinate reſolution to get out of the war on any terms; and therefore nothing, that ſeemed to obſtruct the arriving ſpeedily at that end, was heard with patience, and no regard was had to the faith of treaties. The queſtion being at laſt put, Whether the clauſe ſhould be added? it was reſolved in the negative by eighty-one voices againſt thirty-ſix. On the 10th of June the lords preſented their addreſs to the queen, who told them, 'That the ſatisfaction, they had expreſſed in what ſhe had laid before them, would contribute very much to remove the difficulties which had ariſen in the courſe of this negotiation; and that the confidence they placed in her would enable her better to finiſh this great work, for the advantage of her own people, and the ſafety and intereſt of her allies.' Several lords entered a proteſt againſt the rejecting the guaranty clauſe, and ſigned their reaſons for it, which were ſoon after publiſhed in print[i]. But this gave ſo

[i] The proteſt was in theſe terms:

We think it neceſſary to have the ſecurity propoſed of a general guaranty; and the rather, becauſe we conceive the terms of peace, that are offered, have proceeded from a ſeparate negotiation, carried on by the miniſters with France, without any communication thereof with the principal allies, particularly the States-General, as they ſay in their letter to her majeſty, (whoſe intereſt, her majeſty was pleaſed to declare to this parliament, 'ſhe looked upon as inſeparable from her own') and we conceive this negotiation to be contrary to thoſe orders, which her majeſty declared to this houſe, in anſwer to their addreſs, that ſhe had given to her plenipotentiaries at Utrecht, 'to concert with thoſe of her allies'; and the reſolution expreſſed in her meſſage of January the 17th, of a ſtrict union, in which 'ſhe propoſed to join with them, in order to obtain a good peace, and to guaranty and ſupport the ſame,' as ſhe had before declared in her ſpeech at the opening of the ſeſſion, 'that ſhe would unite with them in the ſtricteſt engagements for continuing the alliance, in order to render the general peace ſecure and laſting; and contrary to the eighth article of the grand alliance, which expreſsly obliges, all the allies not to treat, unleſs jointly, and with the common advice of the other parties.

And we conceive, that the refuſal of theſe words, propoſed to be added, may be looked upon by the allies, as if this houſe approved this method of tranſacting with France, which may ſeem to them to tend to a ſeparate peace, of which her majeſty has declared her diſlike, and which was acknowledged in this houſe to be fooliſh and knaviſh, and would be of pernicious conſequence to this kingdom, by preventing that guaranty of peace by the allies, which is ſo abſolutely neceſſary for their mutual ſecurity, and leave us expoſed to the power of France, there being little reaſon to expect their future help, after ſuch a groſs breach of truſt.

And we further conceive, that ſuch a ſeparate proceeding may create in the allies ſo great a diſtruſt, as may tempt them to take the like meaſures, and ſo give the French opportunity to break that union, which has hitherto been ſo uſeful to us, and formidable to them; any appearance whereof muſt encourage France, either to delay the concluſion of a peace, or to impoſe upon the allies in the further progreſs of the treaty.

A perfect union among the allies ſeems to us to be more neceſſary in the preſent caſe, becauſe the foundation, upon which all the offers of France, relating to Great-Britain as well as to the allies, are built, viz. 'A renunciation of the duke of Anjou to that kingdom,' is in our opinion, ſo fallacious, that no reaſonable man, much leſs whole nations, can ever look upon it as any ſecurity. Experience may ſufficiently convince us, how little we ought to rely upon the renunciation of the houſe of Bourbon: and though the preſent duke of Anjou ſhould happen to think himſelf bound by his own act, which his grandfather did not; yet will his deſcendants be at liberty to ſay, 'That no act of his could deprive them of their birth-right'; and eſpecially when it is ſuch a right, as, in the opinion of all Frenchmen, ought inviolably to be maintained by the fundamental conſtitution of the kingdom of France. And we humbly think it unſafe to depend upon this principal part of the treaty's executing itſelf, by ſuppoſing it will be the intereſt of France to ſupport it, ſince, on the contrary, it is manifeſt by the French endeavours, ever ſince the Pyrenean treaty, to unite the monarchies of France and Spain, they look upon that union to be their greateſt intereſt, and the moſt effectual means of eſtabliſhing the univerſal monarchy in the Houſe of Bourbon.

great offence to the majority of the peers, that, on the 13th of June, the queſtion being put, 'Whether the proteſt be expunged out of the books of the houſe'? It was carried in the affirmative by a majority of ſixty-ſix voices againſt thirty-one preſent, and of ninety voices againſt ſixty-four, proxies included. The next day, upon a complaint made to the houſe of lords, that both this proteſt, and the former concerning the orders produced by the duke of Ormond, were in print, a committee was appointed to enquire who were the printers and publiſhers of the ſame; but, this committee not having been able to make any diſcovery in that matter, the lords applied themſelves by addreſs to the queen for that purpoſe. But neither an order of the queen in council, nor a hundred pounds reward, had any effect.

The commons were no leſs offended than the lords at ſeveral papers publiſhed about this time, particularly biſhop Fleetwood's preface to four ſermons which he had formerly preached, and now reprinted [k]. The biſhop concludes this preface with ſaying, 'Never did ſeven ſuch years together paſs over the head of any Engliſh monarch, nor cover it with ſo much honour. The crown and ſceptre ſeemed to be the queen's leaſt ornaments. Thoſe other princes wore in common with her; and her great perſonal virtues were the ſame before and ſince. But ſuch was the fame of her adminiſtration of affairs at home; ſuch was the reputation of her wiſdom and felicity in chuſing miniſters; and ſuch was then eſteemed their faithfulneſs and zeal, their diligence and great abilities in executing her commands; to ſuch a height of military glory did her great general and her armies carry the Britiſh name abroad; ſuch was the harmony and concord betwixt her and her allies; and ſuch was the bleſſing of God upon all her counſels and undertakings, that I am as ſure as hiſtory can make me, no prince of ours was ever yet ſo proſperous and ſucceſsful, ſo loved, eſteemed, and honoured by their ſubjects and their friends, nor near ſo formidable to their enemies. We were, as all the world imagined then, juſt entered on the ways, that promiſed to lead to ſuch a peace, as would have anſwered all the prayers of our religious queen, the care and vigilance of a moſt able miniſtry, the payments of a willing and obedient people, as well as all the glorious toils and hazards of the ſoldiery; when God, for our ſins, permitted 'the ſpirit of diſcord' to go forth; and, by troubling ſore the camp, the city, and the country, (and Oh, that it had altogether ſpared the places ſacred to his worſhip!) to ſpoil, for a time, this beautiful and pleaſing proſpect; and give, in its ſtead, I know not what——Our enemies will tell the reſt with pleaſure'.

The complaint againſt this preface was made by Mr. Hungerford, ſeconded by Mr. Manley, and ſupported by the court-party. But ſir Peter King, ſir Joſeph Jekyll, Mr. Lechmere, and other gentlemen, were very ſtrenuous advocates in its behalf, but to no purpoſe; for the commons, by a majority of a hundred and nineteen againſt fifty-four, voted the preface to be malicious and factious, highly reflecting upon the preſent adminiſtration of public affairs under her majeſty, and tending to create diſcord and ſedition amongſt her ſubjects, and condemned it to be burnt by the hands of the common hangman. It was obſerved, that, when the biſhop's friends brought him the news of the vote, far from appearing diſturbed at it, he ſaid, 'That he eſteemed himſelf very happy to ſuffer with the duke of Marlborough, the earl of Godolphin, and ſo many other illuſtrious patriots, whoſe reputation their enviers endeavoured to blaſt'. On

And if it were reaſonable to imagine, that the two crowns of France and Spain ſhould remain in diſtinct branches of the houſe of Bourbon: yet this is contrary to the grand alliance itſelf, which recites the uſurpation of the Spaniſh monarchy by the French king for the duke of Anjou, as the principal cauſe of this war.

As to Port-Mahon, Gibraltar, the Aſſiento, and the other advantages to Britain propoſed by France (beſides that they are all precarious, and in the power of France and Spain to take from us when they pleaſe) conſidering the ſituation of thoſe kingdoms, and the vaſt wealth and ſtrength, which will be left to them, we conceive it impoſſible for any man to look on thoſe as a compenſation to Britain in any degree; for the leaving Spain and the Indies in the poſſeſſion of the houſe of Bourbon, beſides other manifeſtly fatal conſequences, muſt be extremely prejudicial to our woollen manufacture, if it does not entirely ruin it.

As to the demolition of Dunkirk, though we own it will be a great ſafety to our home trade, yet we have reaſon to apprehend by what was ſaid in the debate, that it is not yet agreed to be demoliſhed, without an equivalent for it to the French king's ſatisfaction.

And in all the particulars relating to the allies, though they are not perfectly adjuſted, yet, by what does appear concerning them, the allies are likely to be left in ſuch a ſtate of inſecurity, as is abſolutely inconſiſtent with our own ſafety.

The Rhine is propoſed for a barrier of the empire, which leaves Straſburg and Hunninghen in the hands of the French; the former of which has always been looked upon as the key of the empire.

The propoſals of France, relating to the barrier for the States-general, not only deprive them of all the places taken ſince the year 1709, but alſo of two or three places more, included in the demand made by the ſtates in that year; which will render their barrier wholly inſufficient, and conſequently very much weaken the ſecurity of Britain.

Portugal ſeems to be wholly abandoned to the power of Spain; notwithſtanding the great advantage we have received during this war by our trade with that kingdom, which might ſtill be extremely beneficial to us.

Upon the whole, there is ſo very little and inconſiderable a difference between theſe offers of France and thoſe made at Utrecht, February the 11th, N. S. and ſigned d'Uxelles, (as appears to us upon comparing them together) that both ſeem to be the effect of a ſecret and particular negotiation with France; and, this houſe having unanimouſly concurred in expreſſing to her majeſty their utmoſt reſentment at thoſe terms offered to her majeſty and her allies by the plenipotentiaries of France, and her majeſty having graciouſly accepted that our addreſs, and rewarded that duty and zeal with her hearty thanks, we cannot, in reſpect to her majeſty, or juſtice to our country, retract that opinion, not think the terms now good for us or the allies, or giving any ſeeming approbation of them, which then were received by this houſe, and all the allies, with ſcorn and deteſtation.

For theſe reaſons we are of opinion, that the offers of France are fallacious and enſnaring, no way proportioned to the advantages, which her majeſty (from the great ſucceſſes, with which it has pleaſed God to bleſs her and her allies during the whole courſe of this war) might juſtly expect for her own kingdoms and for them; very inſufficient for preſerving a ballance of power in Europe, for the future ſecurity of her majeſty and her allies, though they ſhould be never ſo exactly performed; and yet even ſuch as they are, there is no effectual ſecurity offered for the performance of them; which makes it abſolutely neceſſary, as we conceive, that ſuch meaſures ſhould be taken, in concert with the allies, as may induce them to join with her majeſty in a mutual guaranty.

Somerſet,	Dorcheſter,
Godolphin,	J. Bangor,
Devonſhire,	Rutland,
Berkley,	Nottingham,
W. Oxon,	Carliſle,
J. Ely,	Bridgewater,
Haverſham,	Mohun,
Suffolk,	Townſhend,
W. Aſaph,	Cowper,
Bolton,	Montague,
Wharton,	Lincoln,
Marlborough,	Bedford.

[k] The four ſermons were, I. On the death of queen Mary, 1694. II. On the death of the duke of Glouceſter, 1700. III. On the death of king William, 1701. IV. On the queen's acceſſion.

Among the reaſons alledged by the biſhop for publiſhing thoſe ſermons, he gives the following:

'Another reaſon of my publiſhing theſe ſermons, at this time, is, that I have a mind to do myſelf ſome honour, by doing what honour I could to the memory of two moſt excellent princes, and who have very highly deſerved at the hands of all the people of theſe dominions, who have a true value for the Proteſtant Religion, and the conſtitution of the Engliſh government, of which they were the great Deliverers and Defenders. I have lived to ſee their illuſtrious names very rudely handled, and the great benefits they did this nation, treated ſlightly and contemptuouſly. I have lived to ſee our deliverance from Arbitrary Power and Popery traduced and vilified by ſome, who formerly thought it was their greateſt merit, and made it part of their boaſt and glory to have had a little hand and ſhare in bringing it about: And others, who, without it, muſt have lived in exile, poverty, and miſery, meanly diſclaiming it, and uſing ill the Glorious Inſtrument thereof. Who could expect ſuch a requital of ſuch merit? I have, I own it, an ambition of exempting myſelf from the number of unthankful people; and, as I loved and honoured thoſe great princes living, and lamented over them when dead; ſo I would gladly raiſe them up a monument of praiſe as laſting as any thing of mine can be; and I chooſe to do it at this time, when it is ſo unfaſhionable a thing to ſpeak honourably of them.

The fourth ſermon was preached upon the queen's acceſſion to the throne, and in the firſt year, in which that day was ſolemnly obſerved (for, by ſome accident or other, it had been overlooked the year before) and every one will know, without the date of it, that it was preached very early in this reign, ſince I was able to promiſe and preſage its future glories and ſucceſſes, from the good appearance of things, and the happy turn our affairs began to take; and could not then count up the victories and triumphs, that for ſeven years after made it, in the prophet's language, a 'name and a praiſe among all the people of the earth'.

[l] The biſhop wrote the following letter to biſhop Burnet upon this occaſion:

My Lord, June 17, 1712.

I received the favour of your lordſhip's letter, and took it, as I knew it was intended, very kindly. The manner of my receiving the indignity put upon my Preface was neither like a Chriſtian, nor philoſopher, but like a very worldly man. I knew the whole proceſs, and knew it to be a piece of revenge taken by a wicked party, that found themſelves ſorely ſtung; and it affected me accordingly, i. e. very little, I am not one that love to be the talk of the town, and in this part, I confeſs, I was uneaſy, although I think the talk was very much in my favour. The complaint was made by Hungerford, and ſeconded by Manley (people, that ſhould indeed have been ordered to have burnt it) and thirded by what we call the Court, and carried by numbers, without a wiſe word ſaid againſt it. Sir Peter King, Sir Joſeph Jekyll, Mr. Lechmere, and others of the robe, were very ſtrenuous advocates in its behalf; and ſo were other gentlemen, but to no great purpoſe; for the cou t divided one hundred and nineteen, and my friends but fifty-four. If their deſign was to intimidate me, they loſt it utterly; or, if to ſuppreſs the book, it happened much otherwiſe; for every body's curioſity is awakened by the uſage, and the bookſeller finds his account in it above any one elſe. The Spectator has conveyed above fourteen thouſand of them into other people's hands, that would otherwiſe have neither ſeen nor heard of it. In a word, my lord, when I conſider, that theſe gentlemen have uſed me no worſe, than, I think, they have uſed their own country, the emperor, the ſtates, the houſe of Hanover, and all our allies abroad, as well as all the braveſt, and wiſeſt, and the honeſteſt men we have at home; I am more inclined to become vain, than any ways depreſſed at what has befallen me, and intend to ſet up for a man of merit upon this very ſtock. But, pleaſantry apart, my heart is wounded within me, when I conſider to-the other hand, this treatment of a prelate ſo univerſally eſteemed, particularly by the queen herſelf, who was uſed to call him 'her biſhop', was highly reſented, even by many zealous churchmen. But the commons carried ſtill further their obſequiouſneſs to the miniſtry; for, the ſame day, the letter from the ſtates to the queen, in vindication of their conduct, being complained of and read, it was reſolved, 'To addreſs her majeſty, to aſſure her of the juſt ſenſe this houſe had of the indignity offered to her, by printing and publiſhing a letter from the ſtates general to her majeſty: and to deſire her, that ſhe would ſo far reſent ſuch indignities, as to give no anſwer for the future to any letters or memorials that ſhould be printed and publiſhed'. But, the day before, the queen had thought fit to anſwer this letter. And it was obſerved, that a cenſure was paſſed upon it merely to gratify Mr. Secretary St. John; though, on the other hand, ſeveral ſpeeches were made, particularly by Mr. Lechmere, to juſtify the ſtates-general; which gave occaſion to ſome people to ſay, 'That a vote of the commons was the only anſwer, that could be returned to their high mightineſſes' letter'.

On the 17th of June, Mr. Hampden made a motion, 'That an addreſs be made to the queen, that ſhe would be pleaſed to give particular inſtructions to her plenipotentiaries, that, in the concluſion of the treaty of peace, the ſeveral powers in alliance with her majeſty might be guarantees for the Proteſtant Succeſſion to the crown of theſe realms, as ſettled by act of parliament in the illuſtrious houſe of Hanover'. Endeavours were uſed to have this motion dropped; but Mr. Hampden, and ſome of his friends inſiſting to have the queſtion put, it was carried in the negative by a majority of one hundred and thirty-three voices againſt thirty-eight. After which it was reſolved, '1. That this houſe had ſuch an entire confidence, in the repeated declarations her majeſty had been pleaſed to make of her concern for aſſuring to theſe kingdoms the Proteſtant Succeſſion, as by law eſtabliſhed, that they could never doubt her taking the proper meaſures for the ſecurity thereof: and that this houſe would ſupport her majeſty againſt faction at home, and her enemies abroad; and did humbly beſeech her, that ſhe would be pleaſed to diſcountenance all thoſe, who ſhould endeavour to raiſe jealouſies between her majeſty and her ſubjects, eſpecially by miſrepreſenting her good intentions for the welfare of her people'. The commons having attended the queen on the 19th of June with this reſolution, ſhe returned the following anſwer:

'Gentlemen,

'I return you hearty thanks for this reſolution, which is very becoming you, who truly repreſent all my commons.

'You have ſhewn yourſelves honeſt aſſertors of the monarchy, zealous defenders of the conſtitution, and real friends of the Proteſtant Succeſſion.

'What I have ſaid and done, is ſufficient to ſatisfy any perſon, who is in earneſt for the Succeſſion, as by law eſtabliſhed, in the houſe of Hanover, that I need not be put in mind of doing any thing, which may contribute to render that ſucceſſion ſecure'.

Two days after, the queen came to the houſe of lords, and made the following ſpeech to both houſes:

'My lords and gentlemen,

'The laſt time I was here, I ſpoke ſo fully, and afterwards received from both houſes ſuch ſatisfactory addreſſes, that there remains little more for me to ſay at the cloſe of this meeting of parliament, but to repeat my hearty thanks for your late ſolemn aſſurances. They will give me ſtrength to ſtruggle with any difficulties, which may yet be raiſed; and I hope, that neither they, who envy the making a good peace, nor who think it their intereſt to continue the war, will be able to defeat our joint endeavours for the honour and advantage of Great-Britain, and the ſecurity of all our allies.

'Gentlemen of the houſe of commons,

'At the ſame time that I thank you moſt kindly for the ſupplies you have chearfully granted, I cannot but let you know my ſatisfaction in the near view I have of a peace, ſince it will in ſome meaſure recompenſe my ſubjects for their vaſt expences, and alſo lighten that heavy burthen they have borne during the war.

'My lords and gentlemen,

'You have expreſſed how ſenſible you are of the advantage and ſecurity, which accrue to Great-Britain and our allies, by the terms propoſed for a peace. And I need not mention to you the miſchiefs, which muſt follow from the breaking off this treaty. Our burthens would be at leaſt continued, if not increaſed; the preſent opportunity would be irrecoverably loſt of Britain's eſtabliſhing a real balance of power in Europe, and improving our own commerce; and, if any of our allies ſhould gain ſomething by ſuch a proceeding, the reſt would ſuffer in the common calamity. But I hope, by God's bleſſing, ſuch fatal deſigns will be diſappointed.

'You are now returning into your reſpective countries, and I perſuade myſelf you will not be wanting in your endeavours to obviate the deſigns of any ill-minded perſons, who may attempt to ſow ſedition amongſt my ſubjects, and, under ſpecious pretences, carry on deſigns they dare not own.

'I hope, at your next meeting, there will be an opportunity of perfecting what I recommended to you, which you have left unfiniſhed in this ſeſſion.

'I cannot conclude without aſſuring you, that nothing ſhall move me from ſteadily purſuing the true intereſt of ſo dutiful and affectionate a people'.

After this ſpeech, both houſes were adjourned to the 8th of July. This Adjournment, inſtead of a Prorogation, occaſioned various diſcourſes, ſome ſurmiſing, it was intended as a further mortification to Mr. Walpole, who rather choſe to continue a priſoner in the tower, than to make his ſubmiſſion. Others imagined, it was intended, that, at the expiration of the adjournment, the houſe ſhould ſit again for the diſpatch of buſineſs. But, whatever ground there was for the firſt of theſe conjectures, it appeared there was none for the latter; for at their next meeting, on the 8th of July, the parliament was prorogued to the 31ſt of the ſame month. Upon which Mr. Walpole, and the other perſons, who were under confinement by order of the commons, were of courſe ſet at liberty.

Though the queen in her ſpeech ſaid, they approved of her ſcheme of peace, yet that was not in any of the addreſſes; many indeed, who intended to merit by their officious zeal, had magnified it in their ſpeeches, but both houſes had obſerved one caution, not to expreſs their being ſatisfied with the plan of the peace, though it was covertly inſinuated.

On the 12th of June, at an aſſembly of the lord-mayor, aldermen, and common-council of the city of London, a motion was made for addreſſing the queen about the peace; againſt which ſome objections were made by ſir Gilbert Heathcote and ſir Charles Peers, who alledged 'That the making peace or war being the prerogative of the crown, they ought not to meddle with it'. But, the majority, who knew, that ſuch a ſtep would be very acceptable to the court, being of a contrary opinion, it was carried for an addreſs; which being, two days after, preſented, with another from the lieutenantcy, the queen knighted John Caſs and William Stuart, the ſheriffs, and Samuel Clarke. Upon this a new ſet of addreſſes were promoted every where, full of groſs flattery, magnifying the preſent conduct, with ſevere reflections on the former miniſtry, which ſome carried back to king William's reign. Some of thoſe addreſſes mentioned the Proteſtant Succeſſion, and the houſe of Hanover, with zeal; others did it more coldly, and ſome made no mention at all of it. And it was univerſally believed, that no addreſſes were ſo acceptable to the miniſters, as thoſe of the laſt ſort.

But neither the number, nor the noiſe of addreſſes, which, during the remaining part of the year, were preſented to the queen, were able to ſuppreſs the murmurings of the Whigs, and even of many Tories, who did not like the terms of peace contained in the queen's ſpeech. On the other hand, the aſtoniſhment, not to ſay inrioufly whereabouts we are, and whither we are tending. The court party do now own publickly, that, except the allies accept of the conditions that are offered them, king Philip is not to make any Renunciation: And certainly the allies cannot accept of theſe conditions, unleſs they are diſtreſſed to the laſt degree. We muſt, and ſhall have a ſeparate peace, in ſpite of all that can be ſaid; and that muſt be without a Renunciation on the part of France, and without a guaranty from the allies: And what a peace is that like to be? It is now ſaid, that England is to conſtrain the king of France to content the ſtates with a barrier to their liking; and that the reſt will come in, or ſtand out, without any danger. But I am afraid England has loſt all her conſtraining power, and that France thinks ſhe has us in her hands, and may uſe us as ſhe pleaſes, which, I dare ſay, will be as ſcurvily as we deſerve. What a change has two years made? Your lordſhip may now imagine you are growing young again; for we are fallen, methinks, into the very dregs of Charles the Second's politics; ſaving, that then they were more reaſonable, becauſe our enemy was then in ſo full power and luſtre, as might both terrify and dazzle a poor luxurious prince, that would not be diſturbed, nor ſeemed to care much what became of England after he was gone. The preſent times may put you in mind of thoſe, with this bad difference ſtill, that now the ruinous effects of thoſe advices ſeem to be taking place after an interval of five or ſix and twenty years; and after ſuch an interruption, as one would have thought ſhould have quite baffled and deſtroyed them.'.

dignation with which the queen's ſpeech was received in Holland, is ſcarce to be expreſſed; and exceptions againſt it were publiſhed both by the Dutch and Imperialiſts[m].

The ſtates having rightly concluded from the declarations of the Britiſh general in the army, and of the biſhop of Briſtol at Utrecht, that the miniſters of Great-Britain had agreed upon a ſuſpenſion of arms with France, and would impoſe it upon the allies, by withdrawing from the confederate army, not only their national troops, but alſo the auxiliaries in their pay, which would make them abſolute maſters of the negotiation of peace; they took early meaſures to prevent it. Meſſieurs Van Welderen and Hop were ſent to the army, to concert with prince Eugene of Savoy, proper methods to engage the generals of thoſe auxiliaries, and to provide for their ſubſiſtence, which commiſſion was executed with ſucceſs. The duke of Ormond having cauſed bread for ſix days to to be diſtributed to the army under his command, (which ſhewed he deſigned to make ſome motion) prince Eugene aſked the generals of the auxiliaries, Whether they had any orders from their ſovereigns to regulate themſelves by, in caſe the Engliſh ſhould withdraw'? It appeared by their anſwer, that they had received ſecret inſtructions, for, two only excepted, they unanimouſly aſſured the prince, 'That they would not march with the Britiſh general, without communicating the orders they ſhould receive from him to his highneſs: And, in caſe the ſame were not agreeable to the intentions and intereſt of the allies, they would not follow the duke, but look upon themſelves as diſengaged from his command'. On the other hand, the ſtates having reſolved to proſecute the operations of the war, the trenches were opened before Queſnoy, and the ſiege carried on with all imaginable vigour under the command of general Fagel.

The next day the duke of Ormond was invited to a conference, held between the ſtates deputies, prince Eugene, and count Tilly; but he excuſed himſelf on pretence of a ſmall indiſpoſition, that he might avoid concerting any further meaſures with them. And having received a copy of the articles ſigned by the marquis de Torcy (though not entirely as the queen had demanded) he immediately directed the earl of Orkney to prepare himſelf to march with ten battalions, in order to take poſſeſſion of Dunkirk; and the ſame morning he wrote to the marſhal de Villars, 'That he wiſhed the marquis de Torcy would have given himſelf the trouble to have ſigned the copy of the articles, which would have been more regular and more agreeable to the duke's inſtructions. However, he would not obſtruct the accompliſhing ſo good a work, by raiſing difficulties and ſcruples, and inſiſting too much upon the want of formality. That he was juſt going to make prince Eugene and the ſtates deputies a viſit, with whom he was to keep meaſures to the laſt; and that he ſhould endeavour to perſuade them to deſiſt from the ſiege of Queſnoy, and declare to them, that, in caſe of their refuſal, he ſhould be obliged to withdraw the army of the queen. That he ſhould ſend away a detachment the next day, to take poſſeſſion of Dunkirk; but was of opinion, that the marſhal ſhould have given him an order in form for its ſurrender; and deſired he would loſe no time in a matter of ſo great importance: concluding, that, as ſoon as he knew the reſolutions of the prince and the deputies, he would not fail to let him have notice of it'. The ſame day, the duke viſited prince Eugene and the ſtates deputies, in purſuance of his promiſe to acquaint them with any freſh orders he ſhould receive from England, incompatible with his covering the ſiege of Queſnoy; and told them, 'That the French king had agreed to ſeveral articles demanded by the queen, as a foundation for a ſuſpenſion of arms; and, among others, the giving up immediately into our poſſeſſion the town of Dunkirk. That the duke therefore could no longer cover the ſiege of Queſnoy, being obliged by his inſtructions to march with the queen's troops, and thoſe in her pay, and to declare a ceſſation of arms, as ſoon as Dunkirk was delivered up: And he hoped, they would readily concur therein, which would be the moſt powerful motive to induce the queen to take all poſſible care of their intereſts at the peace. He likewiſe endeavoured to ſhew them, that Dunkirk, as a cautionary town, was a place of greater conſequence to the allies than Queſnoy.

The deputies deſired five days to conſult their maſters upon ſo important a matter; which the duke would have allowed them, if, in the mean time, they would have agreed to deſiſt from the proſecution of the ſiege, or at leaſt to make ſome delay in it; which, they ſaid, was not in their power. However, he at laſt conſented to give them three days; that being no hindrance to the execution of his orders, becauſe he could not expect to have an account before that time from the French court, how Dunkirk ſhould be delivered up to him. The deputies refuſed to let a detachment go through any of their towns in the way to Dunkirk, and both they and prince Eugene told the duke, 'That his marching away with the queen's troops and the foreigners in her pay would leave them to the mercy of the French; but that they were ſure the foreigners would not march.' The duke having taken the firſt opportunity to ſound the generals of the foreign troops in the queen's pay, they ſeemed at firſt well inclined to continue ſteady to her intereſt; and particularly general Bulau, who commanded the Hanoverians, who came to the duke, ſeemingly with great joy and ſatisfaction, as ſoon as he had read the queen's ſpeech, and told him, he was ready, with his maſter's troops, to follow all ſuch orders, as he ſhould think fit to give him. But, upon diſcourſing with him now, the duke found, that means had been uſed to prevail upon him, as well as the reſt; who agreed in making excuſes, and pretended they could not ſeparate from the confederacy, without expreſs directions from their maſters, to whom they had ſent couriers. They alledged, 'That neither the grand alliance, nor the particular conventions, admitted of any parties treating of, or making peace, or even a ſuſpenſion of arms, without the conſent of the others.' The duke thought it belonged not to him to enter into theſe particulars; but inſiſted on the commands he had received from the queen, and on the engagements they were under to aſſiſt him, their general, in an effectual compliance with them; repreſenting, at the ſame time, the juſt reaſons the queen had to reſent, and the ill conſequences, that would attend their refuſal. However, the duke finding, that the foreign troops would obey no orders, but what they themſelves, in conjunction with prince Eugene and the deputies, ſhould approve, countermanded the detachment deſigned for Dunkirk; and in the afternoon ſent to marſhal Villars an account of the reſult of his viſit, and deſired to know of him more particularly, in what manner Dunkirk was to be put into our hands, in caſe the Engliſh troops marched alone, without the auxiliaries; which he had reaſon to ſuſpect might ſcruple to go along with him: Adding, He hoped he would not defer ſending the neceſſary orders for the delivery of that town, which would be a means to make every thing relating to the peace go on the more eaſily, and the ceſſation of arms take effect the ſooner.

It is obſervable, Villars having, at this juncture, cauſed ſeveral bridges to be laid over the Senſet, it occaſioned a ſurmiſe, that he might intend to attack the confederate army, in caſe the auxiliaries in Britiſh pay had marched off with the duke of Ormond. On the other hand, it was apprehended, that the Britiſh general might have a deſign upon ſome of the ſtrong towns garriſoned by the Dutch; and therefore prince Eugene ſent for general Hompeſch, governor of Doway, and deſired him to take care, that the Engliſh troops deſigned for Dunkirk might not go through Doway. And the like caution was given to other Dutch governors in relation to the Britiſh forces.

[m] In a letter from a gentleman in Amſterdam, it is ſaid: 'We are at laſt at full certainty as to the good intentions of Great-Britain towards this ſtate, ſet forth at large, in the queen's ſpeech to her parliament. The emperor finds likewiſe in it very ſenſible proofs of affection for him, ſince he may be left in poſſeſſion of the Milaneſe, Naples, Sardinia, and the Low-Countries. But it unluckily falls out, that neither the Imperialiſts, nor the Dutch, will put a favourable conſtruction on theſe good intentions. On the contrary, they ſay, that it is very hard for a prince, who begins his reign ſo gloriouſly as the emperor, to ſee himſelf abandoned, and reduced to give up Catalonia without any equivalent; ſince he is not to have even Sicily, which, it ſeems, is to be kept in petto, the better to allure the duke of Savoy, in caſe he ſhould ſtand out: Beſides the ſecuring to him the ſucceſſion to the Spaniſh monarchy, after the duke of Anjou, and his iſſue, by excluding for ever the houſe of Auſtria from its rights to Spain. As for the Dutch, they complain, that they are not allowed even the barrier agreed on, between them and the queen, in 1709. That by the two or three places, which are to be excepted from that barrier, Liſle and Tournay may be meant, beſides the towns they have taken ſince 1709; which will reduce that barrier almoſt to nothing: And that the exception of ſome ſpecies of merchandize, from the tariff of 1664, which they inſiſt upon, may reach their fiſh, linen, and ſpices, whereby they may be excluded from all their profitable trade, the other branches being more advantageous to France, than to Holland. Theſe are the chief exceptions of the Imperialiſts and Dutch; nor is it altogether without reaſon, that the latter take it ill, that the duke of Savoy's, and king of Pruſſia's ſervices to the common cauſe, are only mentioned and extolled in the queen's ſpeech; and that no manner of notice is taken of this ſtate, which hitherto has ſignalized its reſolution and conſtancy, and never offered to break either its promiſes or engagements, by treating ſeparately with France, though powerful ſolicitations have not been wanting to induce them to it'. The exceptions of the imperialiſts, againſt the ſcheme of peace propoſed in the queen's ſpeech, were afterwards fully expreſſed in a book, intituled, 'The ſighs of Europe', which was publiſhed in Holland by count Zinzendorf's direction. Boyer.

Upon the arrival of two expreſſes from the confederate army at the Hague, with an account of the duke of Ormond's declaration about a ceſſation of arms, the ſtates were immediately aſſembled; and the ſame evening invitations were ſent to the miniſters of the allies at Utrecht, to concert meaſures on the preſent poſture of affairs; and meſſengers diſpatched with circular letters to the ſeveral towns of Holland and Weſt-Friſeland, to ſummon an extraordinary meeting of the ſtates of that province on the firſt of July, N. S. The city of Amſterdam ſent an unprecedented deputation to the Hague, conſiſting of three burgomaſters, and as many principal magiſtrates. Before their departure, the regent burgomaſters held an aſſembly, in which monſieur Corver, their ſenior, a perſon no leſs venerable for his age, being eighty-four years old, than for his integrity and wiſdom, made a memorable ſpeech; wherein he pathetically laid before them the neceſſity of carrying on the war, 'without which their commonwealth was like to be irrecoverably ruined'. He ſaid, 'I am an old man, upwards of fourſcore, and have ſeen far more difficult times, even the French at the very gates; but, by the bleſſing of God on our firmneſs and reſolution, we have hitherto preſerved our State. I have no private intereſt in trade, nor any other concern but the good of my country, and the common cauſe; yet I would give the half of what I have in the world, nay all, rather, than ſuffer the loſs of our liberties. But, if at laſt we are overpowered, then let us lay our cities under water, betake ourſelves to our ſhips, and ſail to the Eaſt-Indies; and let thoſe, who ſee our country laid waſte, ſay, 'There lived a people, who choſe to loſe their country rather than their liberty'. Theſe words had not only an effect upon the aſſembly at Amſterdam, but alſo on that of the ſtates to whom they were reported. However, though the majority of the cities had given their deputies inſtructions to reject the propoſal of a ceſſation of arms; yet the States thought fit not to come to any reſolution about that important affair, but rather to gain time, at leaſt till the reduction of Queſnoy; for which delay the earl of Strafford's abſence from the Hague, and the expectation of his ſudden return, gave them a very plauſible pretence. Mean while the ſtates received aſſurances from the princes, who had troops in Britiſh pay, 'That they would maintain them wholly at their own expence under prince Eugene's command, for one month; and afterwards continue them in the ſervice, and pay half the charges, provided the emperor and the ſtates would pay the other half'. To which the Dutch were ready enough to conſent.

In the mean time the biſhop of Briſtol executed his inſtructions at Utrecht with the ſame punctuality as the duke of Ormond in the army; and, a conference being held between the miniſters of the allies, that prelate in a ſolemn manner communicated to them the conceſſion, which the queen had prevailed on France to make to the allies, and propoſed to them a ſuſpenſion of arms for two months, in order to treat with the French, and, in a friendly manner, adjuſt the demands of all the confederates. None of the miniſters there preſent having thought fit to return him an anſwer, all of them looking on one another with ſurprize, the biſhop left them to conſult together; upon which ſome of them ſpoke very ſeverely againſt the propoſal. In the afternoon he was in conference with the reſt of thoſe miniſters, and urged to them the neceſſity of a ceſſation of arms; but he found them unanimous in their anſwers, that they had no inſtructions about that matter, and muſt wait for freſh orders from their principals. The next day the plenipotentiaries of the allies met at the deputies of the ſtates, and having concerted ſome meaſures, moſt of them repaired afterwards to the Hague, to aſſiſt at the conſultations, that were held in that place.

The duke of Savoy's miniſters were ſo highly offended at the report, which had been induſtriouſly ſpread, that their maſter had agreed to a ſuſpenſion of arms, and to the terms of peace concerted between Great-Britain and France, that they publicly diſowned it as falſe and ſcandalous, declaring, 'That his royal highneſs, their maſter, would remain firm in the grand alliance, being ſenſible, he had been impoſed upon by the inſinuations of a certain miniſter'. On the other hand, count Zinzendorf, the firſt imperial plenipotentiary, on the 28th of June, N. S. preſented to the ſtates-general a memorial, which he called his 'ſentiments upon the affairs of the preſent conjuncture'; wherein having ſhewed, 'The tendency of the queen of Great-Britain's ſpeech to her parliament, and touched upon the declarations of the duke of Ormond and the biſhop of Briſtol, he inſiſted on the danger, that would reſult to the common cauſe from a ceſſation of arms; commended their high mightineſſes for approving what prince Eugene of Savoy and their deputies had done in the army, and in particular their having furniſhed bread to the foreign troops in Engliſh pay; exhorted them to perſevere in theſe generous and vigorous reſolutions; and, in order to maintain a ſtrict union among the allies, he propoſed theſe five points: 1. That the alliance ought to be renewed, in order to compaſs theſe ends, the recovery of the Spaniſh monarchy to the houſe of Auſtria; the ſecurity of that ſtate by a barrier in the Netherlands, and of their trade in Spain and the Weſt-Indies; the procuring a tariff with France; the performance of the treaties with the king of Portugal and the duke of Savoy, with relation to the Spaniſh monarchy; as alſo thoſe with the king of Pruſſia, the elector Palatine, the elector of Hanover, and all the other confederate princes; and that likewiſe for the ſecurity of the aſſociated circles. 2. That all the allies ſhould be invited to join in it. 3. That it was neceſſary to form a plan of the war, ſo as it might be carried on with moſt ſucceſs and leaſt expence. 4. That they ſhould come to ſome reſolution about the war in the North, ſo as they might be ſure of the aſſiſtance of the princes engaged in it, moſt of whom furniſhed troops againſt France. And, 5. That, after theſe meaſures were concerted, repreſentations ſhould be made to the queen of Great-Britain, requeſting her to perform her engagements, and to perſuade her, that it was the intention of the other allies to maintain the common cauſe with inviolable firmneſs; and that they deſired nothing ſo much, as that ſhe would be pleaſed to perſiſt in what ſhe had hitherto done ſo glorioufly for that end. He afterwards aſſured the ſtates, that the emperor would continue to furniſh 20,000 men in Savoy, 30,000 in Spain, 14,000 on the Rhine, 24,000 in the Netherlands, 8,000 in Lombardy, 8,000 in Naples, and 4,000 in Bavaria, in all 108,000 men: That he would furniſh the third of four millions of crowns for the war in Catalonia. That he would endeavour to bring more of his troops into the field againſt France than hitherto, and do his utmoſt to engage the empire in general, and all the princes and ſtates in particular, to make new efforts'.

Whilſt theſe things paſſed in Holland, a remarkable action was performed in the beginning of the campaign, which greatly alarmed the court of France. Prince Eugene of Savoy reſolved to put Champagne and other countries under contribution; and, the deputies of the ſtates having approved his reſolution, he detached fifteen hundred horſe, dragoons, and huſſars, under the command of major-general Groveſtein, with orders to penetrate into France as far as poſſible. Thoſe troops were detached with the utmoſt privacy from the camp at Haſpre on the 10th of June. The next day they met at night at Grouſelle, within three leagues of Neufchatel on the river Aiſne, which they paſſed the 12th, and advanced at night to Suipe in Champagne. The 13th, they paſſed the river Noire, near St. Menehold. The next day, they paſſed the Maeſe at Seneri, and got into Lorrain; and the 15th, paſſed the Moſelle at Pont-a-Mouſon. The 16th, they came before Metz; and the 17th paſſed the Saar, and retired leiſurely towards Traarbach, carrying off with them a vaſt booty, and a great number of hoſtages for the payment of the contributions, they had demanded from the countries, through which they paſſed, amounting to ſome millions. They burnt ſeveral villages and little towns; and at Metz Groveſtein ſent a letter to the marquis de Refuge, the governor, and another to the intendant, to ſummon them to ſend deputies to agree about contributions. The governor anſwered him, that he had nothing to ſend but fire and ball; and that, inſtead of contributions and hoſtages, he would only ſend him ſome guides, to conduct him whither he deſerved to go. Groveſtein, being incenſed at this anſwer, cauſed about thirty or forty villages, and about twenty caſtles or ſeats, to be burnt in ſight of Metz, after having plundered them, and retired ſafe with his booty; for, Villars not being informed of this detachment till twenty-four hours after they were marched, the troops, which he ſent after them, could not overtake them. It is impoſſible to expreſs the great ſurprize this expedition cauſed in the adjacent parts, and even in the ſuburbs of Paris; it being reported, the detachment were advancing to that city. The king himſelf was not thought ſafe at Verſailles with his uſual guards; and therefore all the troops quartered in and about Paris were ordered to repair immediately to the king's palace. But Groveſtein, making his retreat, ſoon put an end to the alarm.

The French were reſolved to revenge this excurſion, and intruſted major-general Paſteur, a famous partiſan, with the execution of their deſign, which he managed with great diligence and diſpatch. For, though he had fifteen or ſixteen hundred men with him, the allies had not the leaſt notice of his march, till he was advanced farther than Bergen-op-Zoom, and had plundered Tortole, an iſland belonging to Zealand, with the town of that name, and ſeveral other places. Thirty ſquadrons were detached from the confederate army, and all the garriſons were drawn out, to intereept the enemy in their retreat. But Paſteur took ſo well his meaſures, that he returned ſafe to Namur with a great booty, and ſeveral hoſtages for contributions.

The ſiege of Queſnoy being carried on with great vigour and ſucceſs, and the duke of Ormond foreſeeing the reduction of that place might increaſe the hopes of the allies and obſtruct the Britiſh meaſures for a general peace, ſent to acquaint prince Eugene, 'That his troops ſhould continue in the army, provided he would give over the ſiege of Queſnoy'. But the prince anſwered, 'That, inſtead of relinquiſhing the ſiege, he would cauſe it to be proſecuted with all imaginable vigour, and would let his grace be eye-witneſs of another expedition, immediately after the taking of that town.' From this time all correſpondence ceaſed between the prince and the duke; and the prince perceiving, that frequent expreſſes went between the duke and the French army, which might prove detrimental to the confederate cauſe, held private conferences with the other generals, in order to ſeparate their forces from the Engliſh, and inſinuated, 'That he ſhould be glad, if the Engliſh would march off, they being now only a burden to the Netherlands, ſince they had declared, they would not fight againſt France.' Theſe paſſages were not wholly unknown to the duke of Ormond, who on the 28th of June, N. S. ſent his adjutant with a written order to the generals of the foreign troops in Britiſh pay, commanding them to hold themſelves and the forces under their command, in a readineſs to march; but, excepting major-general Berner, who commanded four ſquadrons, and one battalion of the troops of Holſtein-Gottorp, and major-general Walef, colonel of a regiment of dragoons of the troops of Liege, who had the queen's commiſſion, all thoſe generals unanimouſly anſwered, as they had done before, 'That they could not follow him, nor ſeparate from prince Eugene, without expreſs orders from their reſpective princes'. Among the reſt the hereditary prince of Heſſe-Caſſel bid the adjutant tell the duke, 'That the Heſſians deſired nothing more than to march, provided it were to fight the French; and that he would wait upon the duke the next day, to give him his reaſons for not obeying his orders at that time'.

In the mean time, the ſiege of Queſnoy was proſecuted with ſuch ſucceſs, that on the 1ſt of July, N. S. the confederates ſtormed and carried the counterſcarp in four places; and on the fourth monſieur Labadie, the governor, ſurrendered the place, and the garriſon priſoners of war, which conſiſted of 2,662 private men; beſides ſeveral perſons of a ſuperior rank. The confederates put a good garriſon into the place under major-general Ivoy; and all poſſible expedition was uſed to repair the breaches, and level the works.

The earl of Strafford, ſoon after the prorogation of the parliament, was again ſent over to induce the ſtates to accept the offers the French were making, and to conſent to a ceſſation of arms. Accordingly, at his arrival at the Hague [n], he deſired they would name deputies to confer with him about matters of the laſt importance, which he had to lay before them. The ſtates made a ſolemn deputation from their own body, to whom the earl of Strafford propoſed a a ſuſpenſion of arms for two months, and the entering into the negotiations for a peace upon the offers of France. After a long conference, the deputies returned to the aſſembly of the ſtates, and made their report. The biſhop of Briſtol being alſo come to the Hague, ſeveral conferences were held, in all which there were great debates about a ceſſation of arms, and the conditions, which France might be brought to grant to the ſtates, if they would treat of a general peace. As to the ceſſation, the Britiſh miniſters urged, that Dunkirk would be delivered up to the Engliſh, as a ſecurity for the performance of what the French had promiſed; to which it was anſwered, 'That there ought to be a ſecurity for the ſtates, and other allies, as well as for the Engliſh'; and, to that purpoſe, mention was made of Straſburg to the Germans, and Namur, Charleroy, and Ypres to the Dutch. It was replied, that Maubeuge and Condé might be put into the hands of the States-general. But this was rejected, becauſe it was ſuggeſted in the other part of the debate, that the ſtates ſhould ſurrender to the French Doway, Liſle, and Tournay. The Dutch deputies being ſtartled at this propoſal, which, they ſaid, was more in favour of France, than of the allies, the Britiſh plenipotentiaries anſwered, They hoped France might be prevailed with to be contented with Liſle and Doway, as an equivalent for Dunkirk; and, upon that condition, to grant to the ſtates the barrier, which they demanded in 1709, and the tariff of 1664, excepting only the following ſpecies of merchandize, which the Dutch ſhould not be permitted to import into France: Whale-oil, ſoap, ſugar, and dry fiſh; as alſo the duty of fifty ſols per tun, which the French king would not remit. The earl of Strafford likewiſe inſiſted, that the ſtates ſhould withdraw their forces from Spain and Portugal, and forthwith return a categorical anſwer to their propoſals. During the debate, the ſtates ſent to the miniſters of Pruſſia and Hanover, to know what they might depend upon as to the troops of their maſters; to which they returned not only a favourable anſwer, but, at the deſire of the ſtates, wrote letters to the generals of thoſe forces, to act according as thoſe miniſters had promiſed they ſhould. On the other hand, the emperor's miniſters, ſuſpecting what would be propoſed, ſignified to the ſtates, that, if they agreed to a ceſſation of arms, prince Eugene had orders immediately to march off with all the emperor's forces into the empire, and leave the Dutch to the mercy both of their Old and New enemies. This, together with the remonſtrance of the penſionary, the regiſter Fagel, and monſieur Slingerland, inclined the ſtates of the province of Holland and Weſt-Friſeland to come to an unanimous reſolution on the 9th of July, N. S. 'That they were entirely diſpoſed to put an end to this bloody and expenſive war by a good peace: That, in order to that, they were ready to liſten to ſuch propoſals, as France ſhould be willing to make in writing, in anſwer to the ſpecific demands of the allies: That, if the ſame were juſt and reaſonable, in ſuch a caſe their high mightineſſes would readily conſent to a general peace; but that they would never depart from their engagements with their allies, without whoſe conſent they could not agree to a ceſſation of arms.' This reſolution was ſo great a mortification to the Britiſh miniſters, that the earl of Strafford ſaid with ſome vehemence, 'That he would go to the army, and execute his orders'. He was prayed to defer his journey for one day, which he refuſed, unleſs prince Eugene were deſired to forbear hoſtilities. After ſome deliberation, he was told, an expreſs ſhould be ſent to prince Eugene, to deſire, that he would undertake nothing till forty-eight hours after the earl of Strafford's arrival in the army.

About this time a report was ſpread in Holland, that the Engliſh had formed a deſign to ſeize Oſtend, which was occaſioned by ſir Thomas Hanmer's repairing to that town towards the end of June, N. S. his cauſing the depth of the harbour to be ſounded; and his viewing the fortifications with the burgomaſter Bawens, who was ſuppoſed to be in the Britiſh intereſt. Sir Thomas having ſpent ſome days at Bruges and Ghent, where his preſence was thought neceſſary to prepare matters for future deſigns; that gentleman, who from this time began to appear with the title of the queen's miniſter, repaired to Bruſſels, where the earl of Strafford arrived the 11th of July, N. S. From thence the earl went the next day to the duke of Ormond's army, then encamped at Cheateau Cambreſis, and found, it was high time to ſeparate the Britiſh forces from the Germans, between whom there had been frequent quarrels, in which many men, and even ſome officers, had been killed on both ſides. The day before, a council of war was held at prince Eugene's quarters at Haſpre, wherein it was agreed, that the army ſhould make a movement to attack Landrecy; that the prince of Anhalt Deſſau ſhould command the ſiege of that place; and, if the Engliſh retired from the army, nothing ſhould be omitted to carry on the war with the utmoſt vigour, in order to take winter-quarters in Picardy. The earl of Strafford, foreſeeing what a martial anſwer he muſt expect, in caſe he ſhould propoſe a ceſſation of arms, continued at the duke of Ormond's quarters, where he conferred with none of the commanders of the auxiliary troops, except the general of the Hanoverians, who was inſtructed to declare, that his maſter, as an elector of the empire, was obliged to follow the reſolutions of the head and members of that great body. Whether the earl of Strafford expected the firſt viſit from prince Eugene and the ſtates deputies is uncertain; but, if he did, he was diſappointed; and, having notified to them his arrival in the duke of Ormond's camp no ſooner than the 14th of July, the prince and the deputies contented themſelves with returning him a compliment upon it.

The news of the Britiſh auxiliaries refuſing to march with the duke of Ormond was variouſly entertained in England, according to the different inclinations and views of the ſeveral parties. Thoſe, who had either oppoſed or diſapproved the late meaſures, could not but rejoice at it; openly declaring their hopes, that the confederates would carry on the war without England; others ſpreading reports of the duke of Ormond's having been threatened by ſome German generals; and others again whiſpering about their ſecret wiſhes, [n] He came there in the midſt of the rejoicings for the ſurrender of Queſnoy, and, being told the reaſon, he ſaid, 'They made a great noiſe for a paltry town'.

BRITISH
13 JY 60
MUSEUM

London, Engraved for Harrisons Edition of Rapin.

Sr RICHARD STEEL.

In the Collection of Jacob Tonson Esqr.

Published as the Act directs Febr:20. 1789.

under the notion of apprehenſions of a deſign formed by thoſe generals to confine the duke for their arrears, and even to diſarm the Britiſh troops, leſt they ſhould join the French army. Whether ſuch a thought was entertained by any of thoſe commanders, is very difficult to determine; but it is certain no ſuch thing was ever propoſed to the States Deputies; and it is more than probable, that, if it had, it would have been rejected with indignation. However, it is obſervable, that the friends of the new miniſtry were apt enough to ſuſpect ſuch a deſign, and very induſtrious in infuſing the belief of it, in order to render the allies ſtill more odious to the people.

However this be, the duke of Ormond found himſelf in a very uneaſy poſture. Upon a ſuppoſition, that Villars would ſend him a ſatisfactory anſwer, and the foreign troops perſiſt in their refuſal to obey his orders, he deſigned to march with all the Engliſh troops, and the artillery, to Dunkirk, where he thought they would be moſt ſecure, and would have the ſea open, in caſe the queen ſhould think fit to recall them. But on the 27th of June he received a letter from Villars which imported, 'That the king (of France) might very well be aſtoniſhed, that, in caſe of a ceſſation, the generals of the auxiliary troops ſhould make any difficulty to ſeparate from prince Eugene; and that it was ſurpriſing, the Dutch ſhould have more power over men, whom they did not pay, to make them hazard their lives, than the queen, who had paid them this dozen years, ſhould have to perſuade them not to expoſe themſelves to any danger'. The duke received alſo the copy of a letter from the marquis de Torcy to Mr. St. John, wherein the marquis urged, 'That in the articles agreed on it was expreſſed, the ceſſation ſhould be between the armies which were at preſent in the Netherlands: That it was upon this view of a general ceſſation, ſo important a place as Dunkirk was to be delivered up: That the chief motive, which made England and France agree to a ceſſation, was, that nothing might happen between the armies to interrupt the meaſures, which were taken for a peace. That, to effect this, nothing but a general ceſſation would be ſufficient; and, if the enemies of peace had ſtill the liberty, the means, and the power of acting left them, the condition, upon which the king was to ſurrender Dunkirk to the queen, would not be complied with on her part: That the king always thought, the queen was entire miſtreſs of the troops, which compoſed her army; and that they had all orders to follow the duke of Ormond's directions; and therefore upon a ceſſation were to forbear an action, as well as the Engliſh. That in caſe the Engliſh alone left the army, prince Eugene, finding himſelf the ſole general at the head of great numbers of men, would hazard any thing to come to an action, and would not at all ſcruple to ſacrifice troops, which his maſter did not pay, and which were to be under the prince's command only during the remainder of the campaign. Therefore, ſince theſe propoſals for a ceſſation neither anſwer the meaſures, which the queen had hitherto taken for a peace, nor agreed to the articles, which had been concerted between her majeſty and the king upon that ſubject, the king was perſuaded, that the queen would give the duke of Ormond full inſtructions to ſeperate the whole entire army, which was in her pay, and actually under the duke's command, from that of prince Eugene: And, when this was done, the king would be ready to deliver up Dunkirk, as it had been agreed upon in the articles for the ceſſation'. This letter gave the duke good reaſon to hope, that the queen would approve of his deferring to ſeparate her troops, and to march towards Dunkirk, till he had ſufficient aſſurance, that the place would be delivered up to him; whereas now the contrary appeared ſo evidently, that he ſhould have thought himſelf immediately at liberty to act in conjunction with the allies, would he have taken upon himſelf to make a ſtep of that conſequence, without the queen's particular orders; but theſe he had further room to expect, ſince the allies were now engaged in the ſiege of Queſnoy, and in no condition therefore at preſent of attacking the enemy. And the duke was the leſs uneaſy under this delay, being ſenſible, that England had not been able, on her part, to make good the condition of a general ceſſation, upon which the immediate delivery of Dunkirk was promiſed. Villars, in his letter, had invited the duke to an interview, which the duke (being no way empowered to agree to it) declined, and excuſed himſelf in a letter to the marſhal. While he was diſpatching an expreſs with an account of all theſe proceedings, a meſſenger brought him a letter of the 14th of June from Mr. Secretary St. John, which gave the duke an account 'That the courier returned from France the night before, and that her majeſty's demands were complied with to her ſatisfaction. If therefore his grace had any difficulties, as ſeveral were foreſeen, which might ariſe in taking poſſeſſion of Dunkirk, he might keep his army entire, and the meaſures were ready in England for ſending over troops ſufficient for that ſervice. That nothing could be more dreadful to the Dutch than this town in Engliſh hands. That he was therefore to conſider the temper they were in; and, if he were likely to have the leaſt diſturbance given him on this account, he was to keep the ſecret, ſend his accounts to the queen, and, in the mean time, the troops ſhould be ready to enter the place from England; where means would be found of concerting things ſo, that the declaration for a ſuſpenſion of arms ſhould be exactly timed with the evacuation of Dunkirk. If he had taken poſſeſſion, well; if not, they could be able to do it from thence; and perhaps, in the preſent ferment, he had better lie ſtill, and let Dunkirk be poſſeſſed firſt, and the clamour happen afterwards'. On the 5th of July came another letter, of June 20, from the Secretary, informing the duke, 'That the queen had ordered lord Strafford to make all poſſible haſte to the army, with inſtructions, which were neceſſary in this critical conjuncture: That the foreign miniſters had been told, that the queen would look upon herſelf as acquitted from all obligations of arrears or ſubſidies to that prince, whoſe troops ſhould refuſe to obey her general's orders without heſitation: That his grace ſhould declare as much to thoſe, who commanded them, and require a poſitive anſwer from them: That, till Lord Strafford came, the beſt uſe, his grace could make of the intermediate time, would be to continue vigilently on his guard, and to ſpeak in the plaineſt and moſt reſolute manner to them'. In this letter was incloſed the copy of one from the ſecretary to the marquis de Torcy of the ſame date, the ſubject of which was, 'That the queen, having received an account of what had paſſed, both from the Duke of Ormond and from France, commanded him to acquaint the marquis, how great a diſſatisfaction it was to her to ſee, that the enemies of peace had again found out means to retard its concluſion, by expoſing the methods, by which it was to be gained, to new difficulties and dangers. But as ſhe had taken a firm and immoveable reſolution, not to give the leaſt way to thoſe obſtructions, and to continue her utmoſt endeavours, in concert with the king, towards eſtabliſhing a general peace; ſo ſhe did not doubt, but ſhe ſhould be able to defeat the laſt efforts of thoſe, who either ſought their own intereſt, or gratified their private reſentments, in prolonging the miſeries of war. That he, in the queen's name, had declared to the miniſters of thoſe princes, who had troops in her pay, that, in this juncture, ſhe would look upon the conduct of the foreign generals, as a declaration of their maſters for or againſt her, ſince they muſt either follow the plan, which ſhe had laid for obtaining a peace, or that, which the emperor and the ſtates had formed for the breaking it off. That the queen could not but perſuade herſelf, that thoſe generals, after a little reflection, would obey the duke of Ormond's orders without the leaſt heſitation; but if they did not, ſhe would pay thoſe troops no longer. That thoſe miniſters had writ to their generals by this courier; and the duke of Ormond would receive orders, not only to make the ſame declarations, but to put them immediately in execution, if they refuſed. That the queen thought this method could not fail of ſucceeding; but, in caſe any of the foreign troops perſiſted in their deſign of ſtaying with prince Eugene, the duke of Ormond ſhould retire with the Engliſh forces, and all the foreigners, who would march with him (which to be ſure would be the greateſt part of them) and declare, that her majeſty would no longer act againſt France, nor pay thoſe, that did. That ſhe, who had hitherto obſerved meaſures with her allies, being forced by them to ſuch an extremity as this, thought herſelf juſtified before God and man, and at liberty to carry on the negotiation at Utrecht, or elſewhere, without regarding, whether they concurred with her or not. So that, if the king would ſurrender the town and forts of Dunkirk into the queen's hands, though all the foreign troops, or ſome of them, ſhould refuſe to obey the duke of Ormond, ſhe would no longer make any ſcruple of concluding her particular peace, and would ſet a time for the others to come in upon thoſe conditions, which ſhould be agreed upon between her and France. That the peace was now in the king's breaſt. If all the army of the duke of Ormond ſhould agree to a ſuſpenſion of arms, the firſt project which was concerted between them, had its effect: if they did not, the duke would withdraw with the Engliſh from the allies, and the foreign troops would be left to take ſervice with the Dutch, who were ſo far from being able to furniſh this new expence, that they were not in a condition to ſupport the charges they were already at. In ſhort, that England would retire from the theatre of war, and, ſince there would be but a few powers left in a capacity to make head againſt France, the peace might be concluded between thoſe two kingdoms in a few weeks. Theſe were the propoſals her majeſty made; and ſhe believed the king would find his account in them, as well upon the latter as the former plan; and that, beſides, he would think it for both their intereſts, to make immediately a general ceſſation, as well by ſea as by land, between the two crowns. That every moment of time was precious in ſuch a juncture; and that therefore the marquis is deſired to diſpatch a courier to the duke at the ſame time he ſent to England. If the duke had notice, that the king had given orders to the officer, who commanded in Dunkirk, for the ſurrender of it, he would immediately execute what the ſecretary had propoſed; and in that caſe her majeſty would ſend ſome regiments from England to take poſſeſſion of that place, which would be a way leſs liable to accidents, than making a detachment from the duke's army, as was at firſt deſigned. The letter concludes, that the queen had reſolved to ſend the earl of Strafford directly to the army. In the poſtſcript of the ſecretary's letter, wherein this to the marquis de Torcy was incloſed, he writes thus: 'I need not caution your grace, that the incloſed for monſieur de Torcy is fit to fall under the eye of no perſon whatſoever but your grace'. And he orders the duke to give Villars an account of the endeavours, which the queen had uſed to ſubdue the obſtinacy of thoſe, who refuſed to obey, and of his expectations to hear from him in an expreſs ſent to France; and a ſecond time, according to what was ſaid to the Marquis de Torcy, the duke is ordered, 'That, if he received an account from the court of France, that her majeſty's laſt propoſals are agreed to, and orders diſpatched for the ſurrender of Dunkirk, without any more ado to declare the ſuſpenſion of arms between Great-Britain and France, and to keep the whole body, which ſhall obey his orders, entire, and to withdraw in the beſt manner his circumſtances will allow'.

This offer was no ſooner received in France, but without the loſs of one moment's time it was accepted and conſented to, as Torcy acquainted Mr. St. John in a letter of the 5th of July, N. S. wherein he mentioned very particularly all the reaſons and engagements, which had been ſo plainly and explicitly propoſed; and upon condition, that the queen immediately made a ſeparate peace, kept no meaſures with her allies, but only left them a time to ſubmit to the conditions, which ſhould be agreed upon for them between France and England, the king of France had determined to ſend his orders to permit the Engliſh troops to enter into Dunkirk. And at the ſame time a courier was diſpatched to Villars to carry him theſe orders. And as a general ceſſation from all hoſtilities both by land and ſea between the two nations had been propoſed by England, till their treaties could be finiſhed, the king of France with the ſame readineſs conſented to that.

Hereupon Sir John Leake ſet out for Deal to take upon him the command of the fleet in the Downs; and to provide tranſports for the troops, that were appointed to take poſſeſſion of Dunkirk, under the command of Brigadier Hill, brother to the lady Maſham; namely, a battalion of Scotch guards, about a thouſand men detached from ſeveral regiments of marines, and the regiments of Hill, Deſaulny, and Kane. At the ſame time Sir James Abercrombie, a creature of duke Hamilton and colonel King, were ſent to Dunkirk, to regulate matters with count d'Aumont, the French governor, who on the 7th of July, N. S. cauſed a royal order to be publiſhed there, by which the French troops in that town, and in the citadel, Riſbank, and other forts, were enjoined to be in readineſs to march out on the appearance of the Engliſh. The day the earl of Strafford arrived in the duke of Ormond's camp, the duke received advice from Dunkirk, that Sir James Abercrombie and colonel King were come thither from England, whereupon he immediately ſent colonel Lloyd, who returned the 15th of July, N. S. in the evening with an account, that count d'Aument had received the French king's orders to reſign the town and forts, as ſoon as the Engliſh came to demand poſſeſſion. Brigadier Hill having embarked, Sir John Leake, with the ſquadron under his command, ſailed early the next morning, and at two in the afternoon came to anchor off Dunkirk. The next day the troops were landed, and the keys of the town were delivered to brigadier Hill, who took poſſeſſion, and the French garriſon marched into Winoxberg. Immediately upon this the queen's colours were hoiſted in three ſeveral places of the town; though not only the civil government was continued in the hands of the French, and ſeveral of their ſhips and gallies permitted to ſtay in the harbour, with two or three battalions of marines in the town, on pretence of guarding the ſtores; but the privateers of that place were indulged the liberty of going in and out, provided they brought no Engliſh prizes into the port.

On the 14th of July, N. S. prince Eugene ſent the duke of Ormond word, that he intended to march on the 16th. The next morning the duke ſent to let the prince know, he was ſurprized at his meſſage, there having not been the leaſt previous concert with him, nor any mention made, which way, or on what deſign he was to march; and therefore he could not reſolve to march with him; much leſs could the prince expect any aſſiſtance from the queen's army, in any deſign thus undertaken. That he thought fit to acquaint him of this beforehand, that he might take his meaſures accordingly, and not attribute to him any misfortune which might happen. The duke likewiſe let him know, that, when he marched, he himſelf ſhould be obliged to take the beſt care he could for the ſecurity of the queen's troops, and, in order to that, change his camp. The ſame day, marſhal Villars giving the duke of Ormond an account, that he had ſent by colonel Lloyd orders for the delivery of Dunkirk, ſays: 'Permit me, Sir, to have the honour to tell you, though it be very advantageous not to be obliged to engage the braveſt and boldeſt of our enemies, yet it is very important to know thoſe, that remain ſo; and I take the liberty to deſire you would do me the honour to ſend me word what troops and what generals will obey your orders, becauſe the firſt attempt the enemy makes, I will not loſe one moment to meet them. The king gives me liberty to fight, which nothing but the negotiations have hitherto prevented, and which the army under my command has a great deſire to make uſe of. I think the work is finiſhed, if the army, which is under your orders, obeys them. This then, Sir, is no indiſcreet curioſity, that I preſume to deſire you to give me ſome lights upon the doubts, which I am in. I ſhall be very much obliged to you, Sir, if, by the return of this trumpet, you will honour me with one word of anſwer upon the lights, which I have deſired of you. You will give me leave to join to this packet a letter for my lord Strafford'. On the 15th of July, the duke, in anſwer to this letter, wrote: 'I ſhould be glad, I were at preſent in a capacity to give you all the inſight you deſire; but it is impoſſible for me. Notwithſtanding, I was unwilling to delay ſending back the trumpet, to let you know I am well aſſured, I ſhall be capable of telling you to-morrow particularly what troops will remain under my command. As to the ſuſpenſion of arms, you already know, Sir, that according to my orders I cannot declare it in form, till I am aſſured the governor of Dunkirk ſhall have executed all the king's orders, for the evacuation of the place. In the mean time, you will agree with me, Sir, that the ſuſpenſion has already its effects on my ſide, ſince I have juſt now informed prince Eugene and the ſtates deputies, that in caſe they ſhould undertake any new operation, I could not give them any aſſiſtance from the queen's army'.

On the 16th of July, N. S. prince Eugene broke up from his camp at Haſpre, and marched off with the troops under his command; being followed by all the Danes, Pruſſians, Saxons, Hanoverians, and other auxiliaries in Britiſh pay, except four ſquadrons of Vander Nath, and a battalion of Berner, of the troops of Holſtein Gottorp, and baron Walef's regiment of dragoons. He encamped at Atre, near Landrecy; which place the prince of Anhalt-Deſſau inveſted the next day, with thirty-four battalions, and as many ſquadrons; whereupon the duke of Ormond decamped the ſame morning from Chateau-Cambreſis, and came to Aveſne le Secq. The day before, he wrote to the marſhal Villars: 'Your trumpet juſt now put into my hands the honour of your letter of the 15th, and I am now to acquit myſelf of the promiſe I made you yeſterday. Prince Eugene is marched this morning, and all the foreign troops have quitted us, except one battalion and four ſquadrons of Holſtein, and two ſquadrons of Walef. Things having paſſed, as I have the honour to tell you, I thought myſelf obliged to acquaint you of it as ſoon as poſſible; and, as I obſerved to you yeſterday, the ſuſpenſion of arms has already its effect on my part, by the ſeparation I have made of the queen's troops, and all her artillery, from thoſe of prince Eugene, and by my declaring to him, I could give him no aſſiſtance; and that the payment of the foreign troops is ſtopped; and that by conſequence there is fallen upon the emperor and Holland a burthen they will not be long able to ſupport. I truſt, ſir, to your good faith, and ſhall, to-morrow, make a movement to put myſelf in another ſituation; and, I hope, I ſhall have news from Dunkirk, that will authorize me to declare the ſuſpenſion of arms'. On the ſame day Villars acquainted the duke, that the governor of Dunkirk was making the neceſſary preparations to evacuat that place; and told him, 'For my part, ſir, as I already reckon you for our ally, I am not at all in haſte to have you further off. You are at your own liberty to come near us, and encamp on the king's territories wherever you ſhall think proper'. Upon this the duke, the next day, ordered a ceſſation of arms for two months to be proclaimed by ſound of trumpet.

Had the firſt deſign taken effect, which was depended upon by France, and ſo far preſumed by England, as to be undertaken for, that all the foreigners in the queen's pay, that compoſed the duke of Ormond's army, ſhould ſeparate and withdraw from the reſt of the allies, it is notorious, that from that inſtant prince Eugene's whole army, unleſs they ſubmitted to the ſame meaſures, had been left at the mercy of the French army, to be cut in pieces, or made priſoners at the will of marſhal Villars, which had left the queen's troops in no better a condition than to have the privilege of being laſt deſtroyed. Yet all the allies, whoſe honour and conſcience would not permit them to abandon their confederates, and leave them as a ſacrifice to France, were puniſhed by England with the loſs of their pay and ſubſidies, which was all that was in the power of the miniſtry to do, to ſhew their reſentment at this great diſappointment of the meaſures of France.

This march of prince Eugene, the earl of Strafford, in a letter to Mr. St. John, thought might be turned upon them; and he prevailed with the duke of Ormond in a meſſage to prince Eugene to ſay, 'That his marching without us, and all the queen's auxiliaries marching from us, expoſed us ſo, that we have been obliged to ſend to the French to declare with us a ceſſation of arms: Nothing leſs could put the queen's troops in ſafety. 'For though, (ſays the earl) Matters fell out ſo pat, that without this we muſt have declared for the ceſſation, yet why ſhould we not turn all this matter upon them'?

Upon a thorough conſideration of this fatal ceſſation, it is very evident, that it was of infinite advantage, and abſolutely neceſſary to the affairs of France; and therefore inſiſted upon by them. And it is as certain, that the Engliſh miniſtry gave early into it, if they were not the firſt adviſers of it; for which no other account need be required, but that, as all their meaſures tended to advance the intereſt of the queen's enemies, they could not fail to be zealous in a point, which contributed more to thoſe views than any one occurrence during the whole negotiation; but as they all along wanted appearances, and conſulted them more than any real advantages to the kingdom, they thought it neceſſary to annex ſome conditions to this important article, that might paſs upon the deluded people, as a juſtification of this unprecedented treachery, The demolition of Dunkirk was always ſo popular, a point, that nothing could ſtrike the imaginations of the people more, than to be told, that this important place was delivered into the queen's poſſeſſion. This ſtep, they thought, well improved, would recommend the peace itſelf, at leaſt juſtify the ceſſation. And as the nation had nothing more at heart than the diſpoſition of the Spaniſh monarchy, after the renunciation had been induſtriouſly cried up, and the queen had declared from the throne, that France and Spain were thereby more effectually divided than ever, theſe two articles were made the eſſential conditions of granting a ceſſation of arms. For the renunciation, France eaſily conſented to it, having declared it to be null and void by the fundamental laws of France. For the other article, it is evident how unwillingly France was brought to ſurrender Dunkirk; but this the miniſtry were reſolved to purchaſe at any rate, as what would eaſily amuſe and ſenſibly affect the nation; and therefore, to obtain this, they engaged not only to grant a ceſſation of arms, but to conclude a ſeparate peace. The proſpect of concluding a ſeparate peace, and the obtaining immediately a ceſſation of arms, which anſwered all the purpoſes of France almoſt as well as a ſeparate peace, by leaving the whole confederacy in their power, and, at their mercy, were ſo great temptations to France, that the ſurrender of Dunkirk was agreed to. But, when it is conſidered what England gained by granting this fatal ceſſation, it will be found, that the demolition of Dunkirk has by no means anſwered the purpoſes pretended by it; and, for the renunciation, the Engliſh miniſtry were told by France, that they ſhould deceive themſelves, who received it as a ſufficient expedient to prevent the union of the two monarchies[n].

In the evening of the ſame day, the duke of Ormond had declared the ſuſpenſion of arms, Villars ſent him word, he had likewiſe that day declared the ſame, purſuant to their agreement. On the 18th of July, N. S. the Britiſh forces marched from Aveſne le Secq to Flines, being joined in the way by two battalions and two ſquadrons of Great-Britain, which made part of the ſeparate body poſted at Denain under the command of the earl of Albemarle. Before the ſeparation of the confederate forces, the deputies of the ſtates ſaid openly, 'That they hoped the duke of Ormond did not intend to march through any of their towns. But, notwithſtanding this declaration, the earl of Strafford and ſome Engliſh officers having that day offered to paſs through Bouchain, they were refuſed entrance at the gates, and told by the guards, 'That poſitive orders were given to let no Engliſhman into the town'. The officers, not being ſatisfied, ſent to the commandant himſelf, who returned the ſame anſwer. When the Britiſh army came near Doway, they met with the like treatment from the commandant of that place, which was the more ſurprizing, becauſe the Britiſh forces had their hoſpital and great quantities of ſtores in that town. The duke of Ormond, the better to provide for the ſecurity and ſubſiſtance of the troops that were with him, as well as for thoſe in the town and citadel of Ghent, where part of his artillery and ammunition was kept, made the diſpoſition for marching towards that place. Prince Eugene and the deputies of the States were ſo alarmed at the duke's intention of going towards Ghent, that on the ſame day they ſent count Naſſau Woudenbourg to the duke with a memorial, but not ſigned, 'To repreſent to him, that after the excuſes made by the lord Albemarle the day before at Bouchain, they were extremely diſſatisfied to hear by public report, that the commandant at Doway had likewiſe refuſed to admit ſome of the Engliſh officers, and to let out the undertakers for the queen's magazines. That they were very much mortified at the extraordinary conduct of thoſe two commandants, and aſſured his grace, they had abſolutely no orders for ſo doing, directly or indirectly; and that they not only diſavowed their proceedings, but would give them ſuch a reprimand, as they deſerved'. But this memorial made no impreſſion on the duke, who was perſuaded, that the commandants had expreſs orders for what they had done; and that thoſe orders were general, ſince, after the preſenting of the memorial, the ſame difficulties happened at Tournay, Oudenard, and Liſle, as had at Bouchain and Doway. But the deſign of thoſe orders ſeems to have been, that the Britiſh officers ſhould be permitted to paſs through the frontier towns, but that the troops ſhould not be ſuffered to poſſeſs themſelves of them. The next day, the duke purſued his march to Fleurival, near Tournay; and on the 26th received a letter from Mr. St. John, now created viſcount Bolingbroke, acquainting him, 'That, for many reaſons, the queen thought it moſt adviſeable, that he ſhould march to Dunkirk, unleſs ſome objection, unforeſeen in England, might ariſe: That his grace ſhould withdraw the queen's forces and ſtores that were in Ghent; and concert every thing with Villars, and promiſe him full ſatisfaction for whatever the queen's forces ſhould take of the ſubjects of France'. The report was then current, that, before the duke of Ormond declared the ceſſation of arms, the earl of Strafford went incognito to the French camp, to concert meaſures with marſhal Villars; and that, amongſt other things, it was agreed, that the Britiſh troops ſhould make themſelves maſters of Ghent and Bruges, whereby they ſhould have the command of the navigation of the Lys and Scheld, and be able to put an effectual ſtop to any further progreſs of the confederate army under prince Eugene, in caſe the French generals found it impracticable to relieve Landrecy. That this was the deſign of the duke of Ormond in bending his march towards Ghent, is highly probable; but whether or no the ſame was concerted by the earl of Strafford and [n] Burnet obſerves on this occaſion: The withdrawing the Engliſh forces in this manner, from the confederate army, was cenſured, not only as a manifeſt breach of faith and of treaties, but as treacherous in the higheſt and baſeſt degree. The duke of Ormond had given the ſtates ſuch aſſurances, of his going along with them through the whole campaign, that he was let into the ſecrets of all their counſels, which by that confidence were all known to the French: And, if the auxiliary German troops had not been prepared to diſobey his orders, it was believed he, in conjunction with the French army, would have forced the ſtates to come into the new meaſures. But that was happily prevented; yet all this conduct of our general was applauded at home as great, juſt, and wiſe; and our people were led to think it a kind of triumph, upon Dunkirk's being put into our hands; not conſidering, that we had more truly put ourſelves into the hands of the French, by this open breach of faith; after which, the confederates could no longer truſt or depend on us. Nor was this only the act of the court and miniſtry, but it became the act of the nation, which by a general voice did not only approve of it, but applaud it. Burnet, vol. II. 610.

marſhal Villars, it is certain, that the earl ſuggeſted that counſel to the duke of Ormond; nor is it leſs certain, that the ſtates-general were extremely alarmed at it.

On the 21ſt of July, N. S. the earl of Strafford, accompanied by general Cadogan, having paſſed through Tournay and Liſle (at both which places he was received with great demonſtrations of reſpect) joined the Britiſh forces at their camp at Fleurival. The next day in the afternoon, the Britiſh troops moved to Petteghem, near Oudenard, and deſired paſſage through that town; but the commandant having no orders about it, thought fit to keep the gates ſhut, which occaſioned bitter reflections againſt the Dutch; but their precaution proceeded from an apprehenſion, that, if the Engliſh were poſſeſſed of any of their ſtrong towns, they ſhould be compelled to ſubmit to the ſcheme of peace, concerted between Great-Britain and France. On the 23d of the evening, the duke of Ormond's army purſued their march to Ghent, of which he took poſſeſſion, as he did alſo of Bruges. This done, he detached ſix battalions to reinforce the garriſon of Dunkirk, and ſent thither a train of artillery, with ſome ammunition; the French having drawn off moſt of their cannon from the ramparts of that place; which, together with the force they had ſtill in it, rendered our poſſeſſion for ſome time precarious °.

It was not long before the allies felt the fatal effects of their being abandoned by the Britiſh forces. Villars having received orders to raiſe the ſiege of Landrecy at any rate, and his army being reinforced with part of the garriſons of ſeveral places, he reſolved to attack the ſmall body of the confederate troops encamped at Denain, which kept an open communication between prince Eugene's army and the village of Marchiennes, through which all their artillery, ammunition, and proviſions muſt neceſſarily paſs; rightly judging, that if he could poſſeſs himſelf of theſe ſtores, the allies would not be in a condition to carry on their ſiege. To execute this deſign, he paſſed the Scheld, and encamping on the Selle towards Chateau-Cambreſis, ordered one thouſand five hundred men to widen and level the roads towards the Sambre, and to lay bridges over that river. Upon theſe motions, Prince Eugene cauſed a great intrenchment to be made before his left, and poſted behind it general Fagel with forty battalions, and cauſed his right to move up nearer about three leagues, that he might be in a condition to maintain the ſiege with all his forces. Mean while Villars cauſed the count de Broglio to advance along the Selle with forty ſquadrons, cauſing all the paſſages of that river to be guarded, to the end that none of the parties of the allies might paſs over it, to obſerve the motions of the French army. At the ſame time he ordered the marquis de Vieuxpont to march with thirty battalions of the left, ſome artillery and pontons, and lay bridges at Neufville over the Scheld, between Bouchain and Denain. He cauſed him to be followed by count Albergotti with twenty other battalions, and by all the army, in four columns, and a fifth of artillery, having ſome days before ſent the heavy baggage to St. Quintin. Notwithſtanding the marquis de Vieuxpont made all poſſible expedition, he could not reach Neufville till the 24th of July, at eight in the morning, where he immediately cauſed bridges to be laid over the Scheld. Broglio arrived about nine, with his forty ſquadrons; as did likewiſe Villars, who ordered him to paſs over before the infantry, which he did with great difficulty, by reaſon of a moraſs, which was beyond the bridge, which the horſe and dragoons were forced to march through four a-breaſt.

The precautions, which Villars had uſed, to conceal his true deſign, and his march from the confederates, ſucceeded ſo well, that prince Eugene had no intelligence of either till the 24th, at ſeven in the morning; when being informed, that the enemy had laid bridges over the Scheld, he haſtened to the camp at Denain, after having given orders to the troops, which he had drawn to ſome diſtance from it, to follow him. The prince viewed the camp and intrenchments at Denain: gave the earl of Albermarle ſuch directions as he thought neceſſary for the defence of that important poſt; reinforced the eleven battalions, that were there, with ſix more from the army; and judging, that fourteen ſquadrons, which were alſo in the intrenchments, would be uſeleſs, he cauſed them to retire with the baggage. After which he went away himſelf, to haſten the march of his troops, in order to attempt the ſuccour of the earl of Albemarle, or at leaſt to ſave part of the infantry. The prince was ſcarce got out of the lines, when Braglio attacked thoſe between Neufville and Denain; and, finding them weakly guarded, he forced them almoſt without any reſiſtance; four batalions of Palatines, and other German auxiliaries, who were poſted there, throwing down their arms, upon the firſt diſcharge. He found within theſe lines five hundred waggons loaden with bread for the confederate army, guarded by five hundred horſe, and the ſame number of foot, who were ſurrounded, and moſt of them either killed or taken. Upon the firſt appearance of the enemy on that ſide, the earl of Albemarle advanced with part of his forces to defend the convoy, and ſuſtain the four battalions; but finding, they had cowardly left that poſt, and a great body of the French infantry were advancing, he returned into his camp, the approach of which was defended by twelve pieces of cannon. The French infantry having paſſed the Scheld, and the lines which Braglio had gained, Villars made the diſpoſitions for the attack with thirty-ſix battalions, in three columns, diſtant two hundred paces from each other, with a reſerve of ſix battalions, marching in a ſecond line, and the cavalry behind to ſupport them. Villars put himſelf at the right of the infantry, as did the marſhal de Monteſquiou and Albergotti at the left. The ſignal being given, the whole line advanced, and marched ſeven or eight hundred paces, towards the intrenchment, without firing once. When they were come within half a muſket-ſhot, the troops of the allies, who lined the rampart, made a diſcharge of their cannon loaded with cartridge-ſhot, and three diſcharges of their muſkets, without diſordering any one battalion. The enemy coming up within fifty paces of the intrenchments, the piquets and grenadiers leaped into the ditch, followed by the battalions, and, after a long reſiſtance, they entered the camp, cutting down all who made head againſt them. The reſt retired into the village and the abbey, where they were forced and purſued to cloſe, that entire battalions threw themſelves into the Scheld; ſo that of thoſe ſeventeen battalions, hardly three thouſand men eſcaped, all the reſt being killed, taken, or drowned. The action was ſcarce over, when Albergotti and the marquis de Nangis marched and poſſeſſed themſelves of the redoubt and bridge, which the confederates had built at the village of Provi, by reaſon of a moraſs lying over againſt Denain, in order to cut off the retreat of the runaways, and hinder their being ſuccoured by prince Eugene's army, which was ſeen advancing in columns on the other ſide of the

° That the taking poſſeſſion of Ghent and Bruges, was not only the deſire of Torcy, but was alſo ſupported by the advice of the earl of Strafford, appears by the earl's letter of July 17, to Mr. St. John, where he ſays: 'I am for having the duke of Ormond ſend ſome party on purpoſe to march through ſome of their towns, to ſee whether or no they would refuſe them paſſage. If they did, that might authorize us the more to do a thing very agreeable to the queen's troops, and what I believe you would approve of,' And, that there might be no doubt of his meaning in what he had adviſed, in another letter of the 21ſt of July he tells Mr. St. John, 'The meaſure, I mentioned would not be diſagreeable to you, was, that of marching to Ghent, which we have now ſo well executed, that we are within two days march of it, and the Engliſh are entire maſters of the citadel, as likewiſe of all the gates of the town. This is a Coup de parti for the ſtates, who did not expect it, elſe they could not have behaved themſelves with the Hauteur they lately did. The thing was ſo well and ſecretly managed, that all preparations were made to march about to Warneton, between Lyſle and Ypres, to have lived upon the French country; and, till we marched a day's march on this ſide the Scarpe, the Dutch and their friends did not perceive our deſign, which, as ſoon as they did, their ſurprize and uneaſineſs were equally great'. Rep. of the Com. of Secr.

How agreeable to the queen and her miniſters the duke of Ormond's conduct was, is plain from Mr. St. John's letter to him, acquainting him: 'That, though the orders, he tranſmitted to his grace in his laſt, did appear to her majeſty, at that time, to be the moſt proper, the methods he had purſued were ſo rightly judged, and ſo well adapted to the preſent conjuncture of affairs, that they anſwered in every point, what ſhe would have wiſhed. That ſhe was unwilling to reſtrain his grace, by particular and poſitive inſtructions, who made uſe of the diſcretionary power given him, ſo much to her honour, and the good of her ſubject, That the news, of Dunkirk being in our hands, could not have been followed by any more agreeable, than that of his grace's having directed his march towards Ghent: For as, by the poſſeſſion of the former place, we ſhould treat with the French under great advantage; ſo, by the ſteps which he had taken for ſecuring the latter, the Dutch and Imperialiſts would be brought to a more decent way of behaviour to the queen, than they had hitherto been in. That her majeſty recommended to his grace the ſecuring to himſelf the poſſeſſion of Ghent, as long as might be thought neceſſary; as alſo the reinforcing the garriſon of Dunkirk, and the furniſhing that place with what ſtores he might ſpare, and the garriſon want'. Cond. of the duke of Ormond.

The lord treaſurer alſo complimented the duke of Ormond in a very uncommon ſtrain;

My Lord, Aug. 5, 1712.

'No pen, nor tongue, is able to expreſs the great pleaſure I took in your grace's ſucceſſes. It was a very great ſatisfaction to ſee ſo much done for public; to ſee an example of ſteady conduct, in ſo great a nobleman, and ſo courageous a heart, is what has made you envied by ſome, dreaded by your enemies, and applauded by all men of knowledge and underſtanding. Your grace's march to Ghent, &c. is a 'Coup de Maitre'; it is owned to be ſo in France and Holland: And I muſt own, I take a double pleaſure in it, becauſe it is done by the duke of Ormond, to whoſe perſon I have ſo entire a friendſhip, and in whoſe ſucceſs I take ſo particular an intereſt. Monſieur Torcy wrote a very juſt compliment on the affair of Denain, 'That the allies might now ſee, what they had loſt by her majeſty's withdrawing her forces, and what value they aught to put upon a nation, which every where led victory with it'. I am, with the utmoſt reſpect and attachment, &c.

Oxford.

Scheld. Upon his arrival, the prince cauſed that redoubt to be attacked; but, it being defended by the regiment of Navarre, ſuſtained by part of the French army, poſted on the bank of the Scheld with artillery, he was obliged to draw off, and encamp the next day near Queſnoy and Bavory, to ſupport the troops employed in the ſiege of Landrecy. The loſs of the French (if we may credit their own accounts) did not amount to above four hundred men killed and wounded; among whom were no perſons of diſtinction, beſides the marquis de Tourville, ſon of the late marſhal of that name, killed; the marquis de Meuſe Choiſeul, dangerouſly wounded; the chevalier de Teſſé, colonel of the regiment of Champagne, and monſieur de Gauſſac, wounded. As to the confederates, it was reckoned they had about one thouſand killed, two thouſand five hundred taken priſoners, and near one thouſand five hundred drowned; among which laſt was the brave Dhona, governor of Mons; and among the ſlain count Naſſau Woudenbourg, an officer of great merit, and highly eſteemed by prince Eugene. Among the priſoners were the earl of Albemarle, general, the prince of Anhault (brother of the prince of Anhault Deſſen) the prince of Naſſau-Seckin, lieutenant-generals; the prince of Holſtein, the baron Dalbergh, and monſieur Zobel, major-generals; the colonels, count de la Lippe, Tengnagel, Spaen, Kavanoch and Greck; and lieutenant-colonels, Donelly, Herbſhauſe, Heuſke, Brakel, Munnick, Els, and Goumoins; and the majors, Winkel, Fabrice, Bulome, Till and Styrum; 50 captains, 121 lieutenants and enſigns; beſides four aids de camp, and the commiſſary of the artillery Taurinus. In the camp were found twelve braſs cannon, a large quantity of ammunition and proviſions, a great number of horſes, and a conſiderable booty, which was given to the ſoldiers.

As it is uſual for the multitude to judge of events, eſpecially thoſe of war, by the ſucceſs, and to cenſure the unfortunate, prince Eugene was blamed, both for ſeeming to deſpiſe the enemy, and leaving the earl of Albemarle expoſed at a great diſtance from the main army; and for ſending him no greater reinforcement than ſix battalions. As to the firſt, it is certain, the prince was not inſenſible of the danger, which the earl was in; and therefore he had propoſed the removing the ſtores of artillery, ammunition, and proviſions from Marchiennes to Bouchain; but it ſeems, the ſtates deputies, through parſimony, were againſt that counſel. As to the ſecond point, the prince, with ſeveral other experienced generals, having viewed the intrenchments at Denain, could not but think ſeventeen battalions ſufficient to defend that poſt, till he came up to their aſſiſtance with the whole army; which they would infallibly have done, had the battalions, attacked by count Broglio, performed their duty. And, if it had not been for the breaking of the bridge by the weight, which was on it, ſo that the reinforcement ſent by the prince could not join the troops under the earl of Albemarle, Villars's attempt might have turned fatally on himſelf, and to the ruin of his whole army. However, the princes's march to Landrecy is thought by ſome to have been the greateſt overſight he ever made, conſidering, that, at this juncture, the French had delivered Dunkirk into the hands of the Engliſh; that Villars was greatly reinforced from the Rhine, and all the garriſons about him; and the duke of Ormond had received his orders for marching off with his troops. It is obſervable likewiſe, that the duke of Ormond, the very evening of the day, on which he declared the ceſſation of arms, ſent to Denain, for the pontons, which he had lent the earl of Albemarle; nor could all, that either the earl, prince Eugene, or the ſtates deputies ſay, prevail with him to leave them but for eight days; and the next day it was reported, that two French engineers in diſguiſe went with thoſe, who took up the pontons, and made ſuch obſervations on the earl of Albemarle's works, as ſerved their purpoſe. However, it does not appear, that the duke knew any thing of it; but his conduct in this affair was very much cenſured, and gave his enemies an handle to ſay, that matters had been concerted between him and thoſe ſent by Villars. And it is certain, that the want of the pontons was the loſs of Denain; for prince Eugene, having ſome notice of the marſhal's deſign, marched the evening before the action with the greateſt part of the army from Landrecy, and was up time enough to have ſuccoured the earl of Albemarle; but, by the time he got to the Scheld, the bridge was broke by the crowd of baggage they had been ſending over; ſo that he was not able to give the earl the leaſt aſſiſtance, but looked on, and ſaw his fate.

Severe reflections were likewiſe made upon the earl of Albemarle; but, the ſtates having appointed ſome deputies of their own, and the council of ſtate ſome of their members, to examine his reaſons, it was reſolved, upon the report of the examination, not only to declare, that the earl had behaved with prudence and bravery in that unfortunate action, but alſo to return him thanks for his conduct [p].

But though it be hard to determine what errors were committed either in the counſels or orders, or in the execution of them, and at whoſe door theſe ought to be laid, yet this misfortune ſerved not a little to raiſe the duke of Marlborough's character, under whoſe command no ſuch thing had ever happened.

The action of Denain being over, Villars ordered Broglio to inveſt Marchiennes on the Scarpe, where the allies principal ſtores were lodged, with above a hundred and fifty bilanders laden with artillery, and all ſorts of ammunition, and proviſions for a whole campaign. At the ſame time he commanded Albergotti to attack St. Amand, ordering other detachments to poſſeſs themſelves of the reſt of the poſts on the Scarpe. Two hundred of the troops of the allies, who were in the abbey of Anchin, and at Pont-a-Roche, yielded themſelves priſoners of war. At the ſame time, count de l'Eſparre made himſelf maſter of the abbey of Haſnan, where he took a hundred priſoners. Albergotti poſſeſſed himſelf likewiſe of Mortagne, at the mouth of the Scarpe, where he took an hundred men; and then of St. Amand, which was defended by eight hundred men, who yielded themſelves priſoners of war. In the mean time, Broglio inveſted Marchiennes, and, having viewed it, found the enterprize much more difficult than he at firſt imagined; that poſt being encompaſſed with moraſſes and ditches full of water; fortified with ſeveral works; defended by brigadier Berkoffer, with ſix battalions and five hundred men, detached from the garriſon of Doway, and by the regiment of Schellart, conſiſting of three ſquadrons of Cuiraſſiers, of the elector Palatine's troops. Theſe difficulties obliged Villars to deſire the marquis de Monteſquiou to take upon him the care of the ſiege. On the laſt day of July (Villars being returned to the ſiege) the town ſurrendered, and the garriſon, to the number of five thouſand, were made priſoners of war, and conducted to Valenciennes. The loſs of this poſt was of very bad conſequence to the allies; for they had there a general magazine of all ſorts of artillery, ammunition, and proviſions, deſigned for the further operations of the campaign. On the other hand, the advantage the enemy obtained by forcing the intrenchments of Denain, and by the taking of Marchiennes, were ſo conſiderable, that the French king wrote an account of it to the archbiſhop of Paris [q]. After this, Doway was inveſted, which obliged prince Eugene to abandon the deſign of beſieging Landrecy, and march to the relief of Doway. The Prince tried to raiſe the ſiege, but did not ſucceed. Indeed the ſtates would not put things to ſo great a venture after ſuch

[p] Prince Eugene, in a letter to an eminent miniſter, ſays: 'I am ſurprized and troubled to hear of the injuſtice people do to my lord Albemarle.—He performed all that a courageous, prudent, and vigilant general could do; and, had all the troops done their duty, the affair would not have gone as it did: But, when they run as ſoon as they have given one fire, and cannot be rallied, no general in the world can help it: And therefore, ſir, I doubt not that you will contribute to the diſabuſing thoſe of the regency, who may have been miſinformed'.

[q] The letter was as follows:

Couſin,

'The ſteps I have taken to effect a general peace, and the ſuſpenſion, which I have agreed on with the queen of England, have not availed to determine the other allies to enter into the ſame ſentiments. On the contrary, they formed a deſign to puſh on their conqueſts, and beſiege Landrecy. The importance of that place (the taking of which would have opened to the enemy an entrance into my kingdom) determined me to give my orders to the marſhals de Villars, and de Monteſquiou (who command my army in Flanders) to attack and fight the enemy, to oblige them to raiſe the ſiege. They have acted with ſo much conduct and prudence, and the ſucceſs has been ſo happy, that the camp, which was poſſeſſed by the enemy at Denain (notwithſtanding the ſtrength of its intrenchments) was forced and defeated with the entire loſs of 17 battalions, which defended it, and of a convoy of about five hundred waggons, who were at the ſame time on the march towards the camp before Landrecy. The defeat of theſe troops encamped at Denain was followed by the taking of the poſt of Marchiennes, where the enemy had ſix battalions, five hundred foot detached from the garriſon of Doway, and three ſquadrons of horſe, who were all made priſoners of war: And being added to thoſe taken in the camp at Denain, and in ſome other poſts along the Scarpe, make the number of above ſeven thouſand men, and upwards of four hundred officers, priſoners; among whom are ſeveral of their general officers. My troops, who in theſe two actions ſhewed all poſſible valour, took thirty-ſeven colours, and three ſtandards. The enemy loſt with Marchiennes a great number of cannon, and ſtores of all ſorts of ammunition, and proviſions laden in above one hundred and fifty bilanders; and their army being weakened by ſo conſiderable a loſs, having no longer communication with the places they are poſſeſſed of towards the Scarpe, have been forced to raiſe the ſiege of Landrecy, to retire towards Mons. And as ſuch an event is a viſible mark of the protection of God, who knows the rectitude of my intentions, I hold myſelf obliged to render to him moſt humble acts of thankſgiving. I deſire therefore, that you will cauſe Te Deum to be ſung in the Metropolitan church of my good city of Paris, &c'.

loſſes: So Villars proſecuted the ſiege with vigour, and battered Fort Scarpe with eighty pieces of cannon: But, notwithſtanding the garriſon of the fort conſiſted but of four hundred men, they defended it fourteen days, and ſurrendered priſoners of war on the 28th of Auguſt, having repulſed the French in ſeveral attacks. After the taking of that fort, the enemy redoubled their fire againſt the town; and, although the garriſon was but weak, general Hompeſch, the governor, contrary to the expectations of the allies or the French, held out till the 8th of September, N. S. when he ſurrendered the garriſon priſoners of war, The enemy during the ſiege were repulſed in ſeveral attacks, and loſt a great number of men (eſpecially when they took the counterſcarp and a half moon, which they were obliged to abandon) and, had the garriſon been numerous enough in proportion to the extent of the place, it is very probable, the French would not have retaken it. Prince Eugene had the mortification to be a ſpectator of the loſs of this place; but it was not his fault, if a vigorous attempt was not made to prevent it, for, during the ſiege, he uſed all poſſible endeavours to engage the enemy; but the French had ſo ſtrongly fortified their camp on the one hand, and the Dutch were ſo cautious of running any hazards in this critical juncture, that the prince, ſeeing no poſſibility of coming to action, returned to his camp at Seclin, from whence detachments were made to ſecure Liſle, Mons, Bethune, Aire, St. Venant, and other places. After the ſurrender of Doway, advice being brought to prince Eugene, that the French were advanced to Malplaquet, and poſted on the ſame ground, where the famous battle of that name was fought three years before, a diſpoſition was made to diſlodge them, and prevent the ſiege of Queſnoy. But the enemy having with great diligence advanced within half a league of Queſnoy, and taken a very advantageous camp, Prince Eugene thought fit to ſtop his march near the wood of Dour, and to encamp with the right near St. Guilain, the left at the mill at Saart, near the wood of Lagniere, and the head quarters at Belian. Villars having, with the utmoſt care, ſecured all the paſſes, and fortified his camp, the neceſſary diſpoſitions were made, for carrying on the ſiege of Queſnoy, which was inveſted the 8th of September, N. S. The French expected to have made themſelves maſters of the town in eight or ten days; but major-general Ivoy, who commanded in the place, made ſo good uſe of the heavy artillery, which the allies left there, after the taking of Queſnoy, that it was the 14th of October, N. S. before he was obliged to ſubmit to the ſame terms, on which Doway had been ſurrendered, that the garriſon ſhould remain priſoners of war: The French gave out, that they found in the place one hundred and ſixteen heavy cannon; a great number of others of ſmall ſize; forty mortars, five hundred thouſand weight of powder; a great quantity of bullets, bombs, grenadoes, and proviſions of all ſorts; the whole being valued at three millions of livres; and that this garriſon compleated the number of forty battalions of the allies, killed or made priſoners ſince the 24th of July, N. S. on which happened the unfortunate affair of Denain. The French being reſolved to loſe no time in enlarging their conqueſts, opened their trenches before Bouchain; which place was ſo indifferently provided, and the garriſon ſo weak, that they made but a ſlender reſiſtance; for, the enemy having taken poſſeſſion of the covered way, and made the diſpoſitions for ſtorming the place, the garriſon beat a parley, and ſurrendered at diſcretion.

While the French were before Bouchain, the allies ſurprized the fort Knocque in the following manner: Brigadier Caris, commander of Oſtend, having received certain intelligence, that the garriſon of Fort Knocque was very weak, reſolved to try to ſurprize it. Accordingly Caris detached one hundred and eighty men, under the direction of captain De Rue, a famous partiſan, who, having marched with the utmoſt privacy, found means to hide themſelves in three little houſes, and in the governor's garden, ſtanding between four draw-bridges, where they lay cloſe all night. In the morning, at the opening of the gates, ſome of the detachment advanced on a ſudden, and made themſelves maſters of the bridge neareſt the fort, having killed the guard. De Rue divided his men into four bodies, and with one of them ſeized a gate, while two other diviſions ran to the other two gates, and the fourth drew up near the Cazerns, to hinder the garriſon from drawing together; which ſucceeded ſo well, that with the loſs of only two men killed, and one wounded, that important fort was taken. The French governor hearing the noiſe, leaped out of bed, and, looking out of the window, cried, quarter! and was made priſoner of war with the garriſon, which conſiſted of three French companies, and one of Swiſs, but a great many of them were ſick. De Rue, having ſecured that poſt, ſent out part of his men, to ſeize all the proviſions in the neighbouring villages, and to bring the ſame into the fort, before the garriſon of Ypres could be informed of the loſs of the place. He diſpatched alſo an expreſs with an account of the ſucceſs to brigadier Caris, who detached forty men to reinforce the garriſon. The precautions taken by De Rue were not uſeleſs; for the loſs of that poſt occaſioned the motion of a great body of troops on each ſide towards the Lys, as if the French deſigned to retake it; but they found that fortreſs was ſo well and ſo ſeaſonably provided, that the French entirely abandoned the deſign of attacking it.

The campaign in the Netherlands ended with the taking of Bouchain by the French; for, a few days after, both armies marched into winter quarters; and prince Eugene, having ſtaid ſome days at Bruſſels to ſettle ſome matters with the council of Brabant, proceeded to the Hague on the 28th of October, N. S.

The loſſes in the Netherlands created a great diſtraction in the councils at the Hague, and it was expected by the courts of Great-Britain and France, that the turn of affairs in the field, after the misfortune at Denain, would occaſion an alteration in the negotiation at Utrecht; and that the Dutch would at laſt agree to a ſuſpenſion of arms, for which the Britiſh miniſters made very preſſing inſtances. The marquis de Torcy would have perſuaded the Britiſh court to force the ſtates to come into their meaſures. In a letter to Mr. St. John upon the news of the earl of Albemarle's defeat at Denain, he took notice of the advantage which the queen had at this time over the Dutch, and inſinuated, 'That ſhe might give law to thoſe people, provided ſhe made the right uſe of Ghent and Bruges, which the duke of Ormond was in poſſeſſion of'. Marſhal Villars alſo at the ſame time ſent a letter to the duke of Ormond, about the action at Denain, wherein he aſcribes the victory to the ſeparation of the brave Engliſh, and inſults the allies as common enemies, who muſt now be ſenſible what wrong meaſures they had taken. He likewiſe deſires the duke to tranſmit this account to the plenipotentiaries at Utrecht, and to make a thouſand compliments from him to lord Strafford. This letter the duke of Ormond cauſed to be made known to his army, ſeveral copies of it being handed about, which indeed ought rather to have been burnt; for it made thoſe, who wiſhed well to the allies, believe he had not acted fairly by them[r]. The Dutch, through the earl of Strafford continued to preſs them, and that with great imperiouſneſs, to agree to a ceſſation of arms, ſhewed, on this occaſion, a remarkable firmneſs. The ſtates of Holland and Weſt-Friſeland, having agreed to take upon them the paying moſt of the auxiliaries lately in Britiſh pay, and reſolved to treat of peace, ſword in hand, the States-general ordered their plenipotentiaries at Utrecht to inſiſt upon ſeveral points, as further preliminaries of the treaty, particularly the reſtoring of Straſburgh to the empire, and the demolition of all the fortified places poſſeſſed by France on the Rhine. The payment and ſubſiſtance of the German and Daniſh troops in the ſervice of Great-Britain, who had joined the forces under prince Eugene, being the moſt preſſing affair, ſeveral conferences were held about it between the miniſters of the princes, to whom thoſe troops belonged, the deputies of the ſtates, and the imperial miniſters. Theſe laſt were not wanting to repreſent the great difficulties, which their maſter had laboured under ſince the death of the late emperor, his brother; and the vaſt change he had been indiſpenſably obliged to be at by his coronation at Francfort and Preſburg, and other growing expences, for the preſervation of the principality of Catalonia, whereby the Imperial treaſury was quite exhauſted. That, however, his Imperial majeſty offered to contribute three hundred thouſand crowns towards the ſubſiſtance of the auxiliary troops, provided the city of Amſterdam would advance that ſum under the ſecurity of the States, for the payment of which he was willing to mortgage the funds in Sileſia, which had punctually anſwered both the principal and intereſt of the loan made ſome years before by the Engliſh. But, tho' no poſitive anſwer was then returned to the Imperial miniſters, yet ſome months after their propoſal was cloſed with. The king of Pruſſia offered to maintain his troops at his own charge, provided the ſtates would give him ſatisfaction as to out the inheritance of the late king William; and the elector of Hanover offered, in the firſt place, to maintain during the war, at his own expence, one half of the troops he had in the ſervice of Great Britain, beſides the regiment of dragoons of Bothmar, and to agree for the maintaining of the reſt upon eaſy terms. The king of Denmark took no leſs vigorous reſolutions than any of the princes of the empire, it being his intereſt not to diſoblige the emperor and his allies, at a juncture when he and the Czar of Muſcovy was threatened with a powerful confederacy of France, Spain, Great-Britain, and Sweden, in order to reſtore the king of Sweden to all his dominions.

[r] And, that there might be no part of the world, where it was in the power of the Engliſh miniſtry to aſſiſt their new friends at the expence of their old allies, Torcy further propoſed, 'That the queen ſhould put a ſtop to count Staremberg's projects in Catalonia, by ſending orders to her troops in Terragona not to let the Germans into that place; and, not content with this, he further deſired, that expreſs orders might be ſent, (and through France, as the ſhorteſt way) to the Engliſh men of war, that were then cruiſing in the Mediterranean, to ſuffer the French ſhips, that were then returning from the Levant, to paſs unmoleſted; which was immediately complied with.

On the other hand, the Britiſh miniſters in Holland propoſed and inſiſted on the admiſſion of king Philip's plenipotentiaries to the congreſs of Utrecht; and it was given out, that, if this was not ſhortly agreed to, the congreſs would be transferred to a town, where the Spaniſh miniſtry might repair without any oppoſition; and Dunkirk was ſaid to be the place. But the ſtates not thinking it their intereſt to diſoblige the emperor ſo far, as to yield a point ſo derogatory to his title to the Spaniſh throne, the court of Great-Britain reſolved to purſue other meaſures, to bring the Dutch to compliance; or, if that failed, to conclude the peace upon the ſcheme near agreed on with France and Spain. To this end, it was judged neceſſary to renew the ſuſpenſion of arms, now expiring; and, the lord Bolingbroke having had the chief management of the preſent negotiation, he was pitched upon to go incognito to the court of France, 'to remove, as his inſtructions expreſſed it, all difficulties and differences, that might obſtruct the general ſuſpenſion of arms between England and France from taking place, or ſettling the treaty of peace in ſuch a courſe, as may bring it to a happy and ſpeedy concluſion. But to declare, that he does not imagine there will be any poſſibility to prevail with the queen to ſign the peace with France and Spain, unleſs full ſatisfaction be given to the duke of Savoy, and unleſs they can take him along with them in the doing thereof. He is therefore to take particular care to ſettle his barrier, and to procure Sicily for him; to ſettle the renunciation in ſuch a manner, that there may be as little room left as poſſible for diſpute or delay: That the elector of Bavaria may have Sardinia, and be reſtored to his dominions in the empire, except the Upper-Palatinate, and the firſt electorate[f]; and, when he has had ſatisfaction in theſe points, he is to proceed to ſpeak to ſuch articles, as relate particularly to the intereſt of Great-Britain, and endeavour to have ſuch of them, as there may appear to be any doubt concerning, explained in the moſt advantageous manner. And then he is to do his beſt to diſcover upon the ſeveral parts of the general plan of peace, what the real ultimatum of France may be; and, when the peace between England and France ſhall be ſigned, that it may be expedient to fix the allies a time to come in, wherein the queen will uſe her good offices, but will not be under any obligation to impoſe upon the allies the ſcheme offered by France, or to debar them from obtaining better terms for themſelves'. By theſe inſtructions it appears, that lord Bolingbroke was empowered to conclude a ſeparate peace with England, France, Spain, and Savoy: That at this time there was ſome doubt concerning ſeveral articles relating to the particular intereſts of Great-Britain, which was to endeavour to get explained; but no inſtruction if his endeavours prove ineffectual, in behalf of Great-Britain, not to conclude the treaty, which in theſe very inſtructions is expreſsly provided for in favour of Savoy; and he is ordered to do his beſt to diſcover the ultimatum of France, which hitherto it ſeems, the miniſtry were ignorant of; but, whether France condeſcended ſo far or not, as to let him into this ſecret, the treaty was concluded; and the miniſtry ſeemed to think, they had ſufficiently diſcharged their duty, in declining to be engaged to impoſe what terms France ſhould think proper upon the allies, thoſe allies, to whom the queen was bound by the faith of treaties, and all the moſt ſolemn engagements and public declarations, to procure all juſt and reaſonable ſatisfaction, according to their ſeveral alliances. But now it ſeemed ſufficient, that the Britiſh miniſtry did not debar them from the liberty of endeavouring to obtain ſtill better terms for themſelves.

With theſe inſtructions the lord Bolingbroke ſet out for Dover on the ſecond of Auguſt, accompanied by Mr. Prior and the abbot Gaultier. The next day he landed at Calais, and was received with all imaginable demonſtrations of joy from the inhabitants, and particular marks of reſpect from the governor. On the 17th of Auguſt, N. S. he arrived at Paris, and alighted at the houſe of the marquis de Torcy, where an apartment was prepared for him. The French miniſter received the Britiſh with uncommon civility, and aſſured him, 'That the king his maſter had ever entertained a great eſteem and reſpect for the queen of Great-Britain; to which ſentiments he now added ſo perfect a friendſhip, that notwithſtanding the late ſucceſſes of his arms in Flanders, he was ſtill willing to make her Britannic majeſty the umpire of the general peace'. Compliments being paſſed on both ſides, the two miniſters entered upon buſineſs, and having adjuſted the principal intereſts of the duke of Savoy, and of the elector of Bavaria, and ſettled the time and manner of the renunciations, agreed to a treaty for a ſuſpenſion of arms between Great-Britain and France, both by ſea and land, for the ſpace of four months. The next day the lord Bolingbroke was conducted by the marquis de Torcy to Fountainebleau, where the king of France then was with his court; and the apartment formerly belonging to the marſhal de Boufflers, was magnificently fitted up for him, and he was received with greater marks of diſtinction than were ever ſhewn to any perſon of his character, who made no public appearance. He was the next morning introduced to a private audience of the king, to whom he preſented the queen's letter. The French king received him in a very gracious manner, and aſſured him, 'That he ever had the higheſt eſteem for the queen: That ſhe had proceeded in ſuch a manner, as to turn that eſteem into the ſincereſt friendſhip; and he hoped, ſhe was ſatisfied he had done every thing on his part, which might facilitate the peace: That he was pleaſed to find it ſo near a concluſion: That there were ſome indeed, who uſed all endeavours to obſtruct it; but that, God be praiſed, they would not be long able to do ſo; and that the ſucceſs of his arms ſhould make no alteration in him: for he would make good all he had offered'. The elector of Bavaria, who arrived at Paris on the 16th of Auguſt, and repaired to Fountainebleau the ſame day the lord Bolingbroke went thither, was alſo in conference with him, whom he deſired to recommend both his and his brother the elector of Cologne's concerns to her Britannic majeſty. The French courtiers, in imitation of their ſovereign, vied with each other, who ſhould beſt entertain the Britiſh miniſter; and, among the reſt, the duke of Noailles gave him a moſt magnificent ſupper, to which the perſons of the firſt rank were invited; as was alſo general Stanhope, who, being lately exchanged for the duke of Eſcalona, took Fountainebleau in his way to England. The lord Bolingbroke, offered that general to preſent him to the king of France; but Mr. Stanhope thought fit to decline it. What was tranſacted in the private conferences between the king, or his miniſters, and the lord Bolingbroke, beſides the treaty for a ſuſpenſion of arms, was kept very ſecret: except only, that it was agreed, that the court of Great-Britain ſhould pay the annual ſum of threeſcore thouſand pounds by way of dower to the late king James's queen; and that the chevalier de St. George ſhould retire out of France. On the 27th of Auguſt, N. S. the lord Bolingbroke took his leave of the king of France, who preſented him with a fine diamond ring, valued at about 4,000l. ſterling, which formerly belonged to his ſon the dauphin, and on the 25th his lordſhip returned to Paris, being ſtill accompanied by the marquis de Torcy.

[f] It ſeems the French had demanded Sicily alſo for the elector of Bavaria as appears from the following particulars: The conſtant compliances in the Engliſh miniſtry encouraged monſieur de Torcy to believe, that they would now ſtick at nothing that could be propoſed. He preſſed, on the 18th of July, the concluding the ſeparate peace between England and France, as what they both agreed in to be the moſt effectual way to make the reſt of the allies comply. He deſires, that the troops in Flanders, under the command of the duke of Ormond, may be left there to make a good uſe of the towns, which he was in poſſeſſion of; but as the king of France could not conſent to the duke of Savoy's having Sicily, except the elector of Bavaria had alſo the Netherlands beſides his electorate, he thinks the queen's having a good army in Flanders, under the duke of Ormond, may render this very practicable: and, as the queen has done a great deal for her own ungrateful allies, it will be for her glory now to contribute to the good of a prince of ſo much merit as the elector of Bavaria, whoſe acknowledgements will be equal to the benefits he ſhall receive. But this would not paſs, even with the miniſtry of Great-Britain. The giving Flanders to the elector of Bavaria was not only contrary to all the propoſitions of peace, that had been made between England and France, but was what would abſolutely engage England in a new war, to oblige the imperialiſts and Dutch to agree to it: And they could not think it for the honour or intereſt of the queen, to make war upon her allies, as ungrateful they had been, in favour of the elector of Bavaria; and eſpecially, conſidering, that, although Ghent and Bruges were for him, the allies had yet an army in Flanders ſo conſiderable, both for the number and goodneſs of their troops, that they were able to defend the conqueſts they had made. And to give him Sicily, which was likewiſe demanded, lord Bolingbroke hoped, that it would not be inſiſted on; 'becauſe it might be the occaſion of continual jealouſies; it might, in particular, be the ſource of diſputes and quarrels betwixt England and France, whoſe ſtrict union and indiſſoluble friendſhip were the points in view, to which all our meaſures had been directed for ſo long a time'. The queen's miniſters think, that when the king of France has made all reaſonable efforts for his allies, he muſt do ſomething for the love of peace, and that a particular intereſt ſhould yield to the general. 'You cannot, ſays lord Bolingbroke, but feel the force of this argument, becauſe you are not at all ignorant, that this negotiation was begun and carried on upon a ſuppoſition, that the queen muſt deſiſt from many conditions, which in right ſhe was obliged to procure for her allies'. He very ſtrongly urges the neceſſity of concluding immediately the peace between England, France, and Spain; but abſolutely inſiſts upon Sicily for the duke of Savoy: which at laſt the king of France conſented to, upon certain conditions, wherein very ample proviſion was made for ſatisfaction to the elector of Bavaria; and one expreſs condition was, that a peace be concluded between England, France, Spain, and Savoy. In anſwer to this letter, lord Bolingbroke acquaints monſieur de Torcy, that he had received the queen's orders to go immediately to France; and he hoped, under the auſpices of the abbot Gaultier, in a week's time, to ſalute him at Fountainbleau. Rep. of the Com. of Secr.

On the 24th of Auguſt, N. S. the ſuſpenſion of arms for four months was proclaimed at Paris with the ſame ceremonies uſually obſerved at the proclaiming of peace, except that there were no public rejoicings. Two days after, one of the queen's meſſengers, who attended the lord Bolingbroke, brought the treaty to Whitehall; and, the lord-treaſurer having, the next day, carried it to the queen at Windſor, to be ratified, her majeſty, in council, ſigned a proclamation, 'declaring the ſuſpenſion of arms, as well by ſea as land, and injoining the obſervance thereof'. This proclamation was publiſhed both by itſelf, and in the London Gazette, in which an order of council was ſubjoined, importing, "That for preventing any inconveniencies, to which her majeſty's ſubjects might be liable, by miſapprehending the purport or effect of this proclamation, and for the improvement and ſecurity of the commerce of her loving ſubjects, her majeſty was pleaſed to declare, that, as ſoon as paſſes could be interchanged, they would be delivered to ſuch of her ſubjects, as ſhould deſire the ſame". Upon peruſal of this order, which laid the Engliſh merchants under a neceſſity of buying French paſſes, many were at a loſs to diſcover wherein the benefit of the ſuſpenſion conſiſted, unleſs it were in gratifying the avarice of the ſecretaries of ſtate, who ſold, at a dear rate, what had coſt them nothing. Beſides, it is obſervable, that, the French court not having ſent over the paſſes ſo ſoon as the Engliſh miniſters tranſmitted theirs, it happened, that ſeveral French ſhips, which were taken by Sir Thomas Hardy, were releaſed upon producing of the Engliſh paſſes, while ſeveral Engliſh ſhips were, at the ſame time, made prizes for want of French paſſes. This good diſpoſition of lord Bolingbroke to the French nation appears from his own letter to Mr. Prior, of the 29th of September, wherein he ſays, 'I have got at laſt the affair of the Griffin [a rich French Eaſt-India ſhip] compounded, not without very great difficulty: And though the ſum paid to the captors was ſo large as 35,000l. the ſhip was plainly a prize, and the paſs, ſent over hither, might have been proved to have been numerically one of thoſe I delivered at Fountainebleau, four days after the Griffin was in Sir Thomas Hardy's power; though Gaultier was ready to ſwear, that he had received it ſome months before; which part of the abbot has, I confeſs to you, done him no good, in my opinion'. Hence it appears that, though this paſs was none of them, paſſes had been granted ſome months before the ſuſpenſion was concluded.

It may here be obſerved, that while the peace was negotiating, various reports were ſpread about the pretender, who, after the ſtile uſed in the queen's ſpeech of the 6th of June, was now called, 'the perſon, who has pretended to diſturb the ſettlement of the Proteſtant Succeſſion of the Houſe of Hanover'. About the latter end of June, the public was informed from Utrecht, that he had been obliged to leave St. Germain's, and was already on his way to Lorrain. However, about the middle of Auguſt, he made a viſit to the king of France at Fountainebleau; but, upon the news of lord Bolingbroke's landing at Calais, it was thought fit, that the Chevalier ſhould again retire from St. Germain's, without his ordinary guard, and go to the caſtle of Livry. Not many days after he came to Paris, and, going to the opera, ſat in the French king's box, which had been appointed for the lord Bolingbroke, who thereupon ſat in another box; which, when known occaſioned no ſmall noiſe in England. It was alſo adviſed from Paris, that the Britiſh miniſter had a private interview with the queen dowager of England; which, together with the rumour of the Chevalier's taking upon him the title of duke of Gloceſter, and retiring to Rheims in Champagne, occaſioned various ſpeculations. Whatever ground there were for theſe and other reports, it is certain, that the Pretender's friends in Great-Britain were, at this juncture, extremely elated with the hopes of his reſtoration; and ſome news-writers in Holland, and, after them, others in London, did not ſcruple to take notice of what was ſaid in Paris, 'That the Pretender was to be aſſociated with her majeſty in the ſovereignty'.

On the 28th of Auguſt, N. S. the lord Bolingbroke ſet out from Paris where he left Mr. Prior to take care of ſome private affairs ſtill under negotiation; and with Mr. Hare, and the abbot Gaultier, proceeded to Dunkirk, and, imbarking for England, arrived at London the 21ſt of Auguſt, O. S.

France was now become intire maſter of all future negotiations, and did not fail to make uſe of the power put into their hands; And upon occaſion of a trifling quarrel, which happened at Utrecht between the ſervants of monſieur Meſnager, and of count Rechteren, one of the Dutch plenipotentiaries, the French made uſe of it as a pretence to keep the negotiations in ſuſpence, as long as it ſerved their purpoſe[1]. The Venetian miniſters immediately offered their mediation to accommodate the matter; and at the ſame time Meſſieurs de Randwyck and Buys engaged the biſhop of Briſtol to interpoſe his good offices in this affair. But the French miniſters having conſulted together refuſed to hearken to any private accommodation, before they had received inſtructions from their court; by which they were directed to inſiſt upon a public ſatisfaction, and on the recalling of count Rechteren, and appointing another plenipotentiary in his place. The ſtates not thinking it conſiſtent with their dignity to ſubmit to thoſe demands, the negotiations at Utrecht was ſuſpended, whilſt the earl of Strafford and ſome other miniſters uſed their endeavours at the Hague to find out an expedient to remove that obſtruction, but, the French king's pride being now again in exaltation, he was intractable. On the other hand the ſtates ſeemed reſolved not to comply with ſo extravagant a reparation. being deſirous of drawing this diſpute into length, that they might avoid entering into a negotiation of peace, which they thought muſt be detrimental to their intereſt, and the common cauſe, and ſtill hoping, that ſomething might happen, which would occaſion ſome favourable turn in the affairs of Europe. To this purpoſe it was obſerved, that at the opening of the aſſembly of the ſtates of Holland on the 13th of September, N. S. penſionary Heinſius, in a very pathetic ſpeech ſhewed 'the impoſſibility of concluding a peace at this juncture, without loſing the fruits of all the blood and treaſure they had expended in the preſent quarrel, and expoſing their country and the liberties of all Chriſtendom, to imminent danger; Urging, that as, of two evils, they ought to chooſe the leaſt, ſo they muſt make extraordinary efforts to carry on the war, till a ſafe and honourable peace ſhould be obtained: And concluding, that, thanks to the Almighty, they were not wholly deſtitute of means for that purpoſe, provided they would act with the ſame conſtancy and harmony, which the republic had exerted on ſo many occaſions'. This ſpeech had its effect, both with the ſtates of Holland, and the ſtates-general; for the earl of Strafford having ſignified to them, 'That the queen was willing to endeavour to engage France to admit them, or any other of the allies, into the ſuſpenſion of arms'; they anſwered they could not reſolve any thing upon it, without the emperor and the other allies; and that it would be too great a diſgrace to the confederacy, to aſk a ſuſpenſion of arms, without being aſſured of obtaining it. As to the earl of Strafford's propoſition of granting paſſports to the plenipotentiaries of king Philip, the ſtates alledged, they could not comply with it, without doing a manifeſt injury to the emperor, who had at leaſt an equal title with king Philip to the crown of Spain.

About this time another accident happened at Utrecht, which was like to prove a new obſtruction to the negociation of peace. The earl of Strafford had, by his lofty carriage, made himſelf very obnoxious to the Dutch; and, it being given out, that the duke of Savoy had abandoned the allies, and agreed to a ſuſpenſion of arms, ſome of the common people, in the night-time, broke the windows, both of the marquiſs del Borgo, one of the duke's plenipotentiaries, and of the earl of Strafford; and, as a farther indignity to the earl they ſet up a wheel on the rails before his houſe, with a paper on it, in which was written the Dutch word, 'Straff-art', alluding to the earl's name, and implying, that he deſerved the puniſhment denoted by the wheel; the word 'Straffen' in Dutch ſignifying to puniſh or chaſtiſe. This inſult was highly reſented by the Britiſh plenipotentiaries; but the magiſtrates of Utrecht having publiſhed a reward of four hundred gilders to any one, who ſhould diſcover the authors of it; and that the name of the informer ſhould be concealed; the Britiſh court thought fit not to take any notice of the affront at this juncture, the rather, becauſe it was by many ſuſpected, that the French emiſſaries were at the bottom of this inſult, in order to irritate the Britiſh nation againſt the Dutch,

[1] It ſeems, as count Rechteren was paſſing by the houſe of monſieur Meſnager, his footmen were laughed and hiſſed at by Meſnager's ſervants that were ſtanding at the door: Which being complained of by count Rechteren, Meſnager promiſed the ſervants ſhould be confronted: but afterwards ſent word, he had examined his domeſtics, and that they denied the fact. Upon this, Rechteren inſiſting that the ſervants ſhould be confronted according to his promiſe, and Meſnager ſtill refuſing it, the count told his people, ſince he could get them no reparation, they muſt decide their own quarrels themſelves. Preſently after, one of count Rechteren's footmen ſtruck one of monſieur Meſnager's, and owned the fact, ſaying, It was true, he had given him a blow or two on the face; but that it was alſo true, he was one of thoſe who had hiſſed at him; which was not denied by the other. This was ſo highly reſented by the French king, and ſuch reparation demanded, that the Dutch would not comply with it: So that a full ſtop was put to all the proceedings at Utrecht for ſome months.

The aſcendant, which France had now gained in all the negotiations of peace, was evident from their inſiſting upon the reſtitution of Tournay, which deſerves to be particularly ſet forth. On the 30th of Auguſt, the Britiſh plenipotentiaries at Utrecht acquainted the lord Bolingbroke, that in ſome diſcourſe with the miniſters of the allies they had carried matters ſo far as to tell them, that though her majeſty would endeavour to promote their intereſt in a peace, and obtain for them the beſt terms, that ſhould be poſſible; yet, if thoſe endeavours ſhould not procure more than the contents of her majeſty's ſpeech, or even in ſome degree fall ſhort of that plan, the fault would be entirely theirs, who had rendered things difficult and uncertain, which otherwiſe would have been eaſy and practicable. And having thus far complied with their late orders to lay all the blame upon the allies, they further inform his lordſhip, that they had however obtained the conſent of the miniſters of the allies to come to a conference with thoſe of France, in order to renew the negotiations; the time to be fixed upon between the Britiſh and French plenipotentiaries, who meeting to have ſome diſcourſe previous to the general conference, parted without coming to any concluſion. The occaſion of their difference, that prevented renewing the conferences, aroſe upon propoſals made by the Britiſh miniſters in relation to Tournay. They, in a letter of the 2d of September, N. S. to lord Bolingbroke, ſtate the caſe in this manner: 'In her majeſty's ſpeech it is expreſſed, 'That the Dutch are to have the entire barrier, as demanded in 1709, except two or three places at moſt. The French miniſters inſiſt, that they muſt have Liſle as an equivalent for Dunkirk; and that the ſame is not to be underſtood as one of the three places mentioned in the ſpeech; and conſequently, that they muſt, in all, have four of the places mentioned in the demands of 1709. This to us appears to be altogether inconſiſtent with what her majeſty has declared; and we accordingly think it contrary to our duty to bring on a conference, in which ſuch an explication is to be made. The French miniſters, on the other hand, have ſhewed us their orders, which poſitively require them to inſiſt upon the reſtitution of Tournay as well as Liſle; and that they can by no means conſent to the ceſſion of Maubeuge or Condé. The Britiſh miniſters then preſſed the French to ſpeak at firſt in terms as general, as their propoſal was conceived in; but the French thought it neceſſary to be particular and expreſs in that point above all others, becauſe they ſhall otherwiſe have tied themſelves up, and given the Dutch an advantage. The reſult of this debate was, not to proceed to a conference, till this point be determined; the French inſiſting, that their orders were ſo plain, as neither to need nor admit any explication; and the Britiſh miniſters thinking the matter as plain on their ſide. They hoped, their zeal for her majeſty's honour would be graciouſly approved, and deſire to be directed what further they are to do in this matter, which they apprehend to be of a deciſive conſequence; becauſe they find even thoſe among the Dutch, who appear to be moſt cordially diſpoſed to ſuch a peace, as may re-eſtabliſh a good harmony between her majeſty and the ſtates, as abſolutely neceſſary for their mutual preſervation, fully reſolved, either to retain Tournay, and have Condé yielded to them; or to take one of theſe two courſes, either to come into any terms, that France offers, or to continue the war at all hazards'. The language which our plenipotentiaries had uſed to the allies, is very much approved of by lord Bolingbroke, in his letter of the 26th of Auguſt, who ſays, they had ſpoke the ſentiments, of the queen's heart, in what they declared the 30th of Auguſt, N. S. and that, if the allies did fall ſhort of the plan laid down in the queen's ſpeech, the fault was entirely their own. His lordſhip ſays, 'Sure it is, that this plan was nothing more than an ultimatum of what France would offer; but he wiſhed, that the Imperial and Dutch policy had not rendered it the ultimatum of what France will grant. The ſame general reflections might be applied to the particular caſe mentioned in their lordſhips letter. France would have yielded Tournay, though much againſt the grain. If France has now any advantages, and refuſes flatly to yield what ſhe only begged to have reſtored, the fault is entirely theirs'. But the diſpatch of the plenipotentiaries, of the 2d of September, relating to Tournay having not yet been conſidered by the lords of the council, his lordſhip could not give any poſitive inſtructions about it till the next opportunity; but, in the mean time, recommended to them two conſiderations: That the keeping of the Dutch in hopes of her majeſty's good offices will prevent them from taking any deſperate reſolutions; and the French inſiſting to have count Rechteren diſavowed, before any further treaty, will put off, for ſome time the deciſion of that great point. The earl of Strafford, in the mean time, by his letters of the 13th and 16th of September, N. S. repreſented the ſtates, 'as mightily ſunk with their misfortunes, and not knowing well what meaſures to take; but that they inſiſted upon Tournay as ſo eſſential to their barrier, that they had actually none without it: And his lordſhip was ſo much of that opinion, that he wiſhes they might have Tournay, though they were forced to truck Ypres, for it: That if he could poſitively aſſure them they ſhould have Tournay, he believed they would ſubmit to the plan of the queen's ſpeech'. This opinion of his lordſhip is not very eaſily reconcileable to what he afterwards wrote to Mr. Prior upon this ſubject October 12, 1712: 'If we had a mind to have Nick Frog ſign with us, we might, for he is ready to do it for Tournay; which, if we ſign together, we cannot well refuſe him; But I expect you will cut that matter ſhort, and I long to hear from you'. But this affair of Tournay was not ſo ſoon ſettled in England; although the difficulty does not ſeem to be, whether the French or Dutch were to have it; but in what manner it was to be procured for France, without a manifeſt contradiction to what was ſaid by the queen, in her ſpeech concerning the barrier. Lord Bolingbroke, on the 10th of September, O. S. writes three letters upon this ſubject, to monſieur de Torcy, to Mr. Prior, and to the plenipotentiaries. In that to monſieur de Torcy, he deſires him, 'to remember the propoſition, which was often laid down by him when in France, and inſiſted upon as a fundamental in all their future proceedings upon the general peace: That the conduct of the queen, in regard to the intereſts of her allies, was in a great meaſure determined by their behaviour: That the violent meaſures, which they had taken to obſtruct the peace, had put the queen in a condition to make her peace, without waiting for their concurrence; in which caſe the queen would declare, that ſhe had ſigned the treaty with France and Spain, and would propoſe the plan brought over by Abbot Gaultier, and delivered the 29th of April 1712, for the allies to treat upon, and would do no more than by her good offices, as a common friend to both parties. But, in caſe the Dutch in particular, or the other allies, ſhould before the concluſion of her peace with France, enter into concert with her majeſty, we ſhould have more meaſures to keep with them; the compaſſion of our people would be moved in their behalf; and the queen's miniſters obliged to make ſome ſteps, which otherwiſe they would abſolutely refuſe to do. Upon this foundation, 'continues his lordſhip', the king's miniſters ſeem to act ſomething more, when they inſiſt the queen's miniſters ſhould propoſe the holding a conference, in which the firſt propoſitions ſtarted would appear, in ſome meaſure, contrary to what the queen ſaid in her ſpeech, touching the barrier of the ſtates. The point in diſpute between your plenipotentiaries and ours is not to know, Whether Tournay ſhall be reſtored to the king, or not? For, to obtain that place, it is not neceſſary you ſhould begin by making this ſpecific declaration. But the queſtion is, Whether the queen ought formerly, and at preſent, to declare that Tournay ſhall be reſtored to France? Which would be to conſent to the explanation, which your miniſters give to this article of the queen's ſpeech. His lordſhip then ſays: 'Not to ſwell my letter too much, which may already ſeem tedious, I refer myſelf to what Mr. Prior ſhall have the honour to explain to you upon this point; and I ſhall content myſelf with ſaying, that, as it is not difficult to find a temperament, I hope we ſhall avoid all things, that may occaſion a diſpute between the miniſters of Great-Britain and France. This temperament is to be found in his letter to Mr. Prior of the ſame day, which, he ſays, is to be looked upon only as a letter from Harry to Mat, and not the ſecretary to the miniſter' He ſends him incloſed an extract of his letter to monſieur de Torcy, 'which, he ſays, relates to a matter, that has given lord-treaſurer and himſelf no ſmall trouble in the cabinet. He likewiſe ſends him a copy of the plenipotentiaries diſpatch of the 2d of September upon the ſame ſubject; wherein, as he will obſerve, their lordſhips are very warm about the diſputes. He can aſſure him, we have thoſe who are not a jot cooler. His lordſhip goes on: The ſolution of this difficulty muſt come from you; which is a matter of management and appearance, more than of ſubſtance. The method of doing it is by making monſieur de Torcy ſenſible of the propoſition ſettled between them in France, that the queen can never do any thing, which ſhall look like a direct reſtraint on her allies from demanding what they judge neceſſary; but as long as they act the part which they now do, ſhe can very juſtly be paſſive and neuter as to their intereſts. This his lordſhip thinks is advantageous enough for France, and ſuch a one, fairly ſpeaking, as a year ago they would have given more than Tournay to be ſure of. They muſt not therefore preſs us to go further than this, nor to do any thing, which may ſeem contradictory to what the queen delivered from the throne. In a word, the uſe which the French will make of the unaccountable obſtinacy of the Dutch, and the other allies, may, in ſeveral reſpects, and particularly, for ought I know, in the inſtance of Tournay, give them an opportunity of ſaving and gaining more than they could have hoped for; and the queen may in the preſent circumſtances contribute paſſively to this end, but actively ſhe never can in any circumſtances'. His lordſhip then very plainly gives his advice how this matter is to be managed, in theſe words: 'I think in my opinion, and I believe I ſpeak the queen's upon this occaſion, it were better the French ſhould, in the courſe of the treaty declare, that whatever they intended to have given the Dutch, when the queen ſpoke from the throne, their conduct has been ſuch, and the ſituation of affairs is ſo altered, that the king is reſolved to have Tournay reſtored to him: I ſay, I believe this were better, than to expect, that we ſhould aſſent to an expoſition of the queen's words, by which her majeſty would yield the town up. Let the conferences begin as ſoon as they will, I dare ſay, buſineſs will not very ſpeedily be diſpatched in them. We ſhall go on to ripen every thing for a concluſion between us and Savoy, France, and Spain, and this is the true point of view, which the French ought to have before their eyes'. This ſcheme being concerted here, and tranſmitted to France, lord Bolingbroke on the ſame day writes to the plenipotentiaries, in anſwer to theirs of the 2d of September, N. S. upon which he had before told them, he could give no inſtructions, till their letter was conſidered by the lords of the council; neither does his lordſhip now ſend them any directions, but enlarges upon the ſame general topics of imputing all the miſchiefs that had happened, and in particular this affair of Tournay, to the obſtinacy of the allies. His lordſhip obſerves, 'That, in the plan brought over by Abbot Gaultier, the king of France begged for Tournay, rather than inſiſted upon it; but was now encouraged to refuſe what he only endeavoured to ſave: And, in ſhort, that France had now gathered ſtrength by our diviſions, and was grown ſanguine enough to make that plan the ultimatum of her conceſſions, which was at firſt nothing more than the ultimatum of her offers; but that the Dutch had no body to blame for all this but themſelves'. His lordſhip adds, 'Her majeſty is very ſenſible of the concern you expreſs for her honour, and will not, you may be ſure, ſuffer herſelf to be a party to any thing, which may appear contradictory to what ſhe has once advanced: And although perhaps the yielding of Tournay might be reconciled to the terms of her ſpeech; yet, ſhould the queen conſent to this expoſition of it, ſuch conſent would be almoſt a formal reſtoration of this place to France: And this, my lords, is what her majeſty will avoid. But I hope the ſolution of this difficulty will come from France; and that, when they have ſo many other quarrels to decide, that court will go back from a meaſure, which muſt involve them in a diſpute with the queen'. Among Mr. Prior's papers the Committee of Secrecy in 1715 found one, which ſeemed to be the draught of a letter from him to monſieur de Torcy, purſuant to what lord Bolingbroke had written to him upon the ſubject of Tournay; which is in ſubſtance the ſame, and almoſt in the very words of lord Bolingbroke's letter to Mr. Prior of the 10th of September, with this addition, that it begins thus: 'There is more appearance than ſubſtance in this affair, that is now under agitation at Utrecht; and my lord-treaſurer does not at all doubt but the court of France will find a remedy'. And his lordſhip was not miſtaken in his expectations. For monſieur de Torcy very readily followed the advice, that was given by the Engliſh miniſtry; and on the 27th of September, N. S. ſends lord Bolingbroke a declaration to be made by the French plenipotentiaries at Utrecht, wherein the king's miniſters were ordered to declare to thoſe of Great-Britain, 'That the king did conſent to treat of the peace upon the plan laid down in the queen's ſpeech to her parliament; but at the ſame time they were to ſay, that the Dutch having refuſed to conform to the ſentiments of that princeſs, having rejected the ſuſpenſion of arms, and given opportunity to the ſeveral changes in affairs, that had happened; it is but juſt, that his majeſty ſhould be recompenſed for the expence he has been obliged to make during the courſe of this campaign. Upon this foundation his majeſty orders his plenipotentiaries not to ſign a peace but upon condition, that Tournay ſhall be reſtored to him, beſides the other places, which he has demanded, and which he had reaſon to believe the queen of Great-Britain did deſign to comprehend in her ſpeech'. However, the meaſures and councils relating to this affair were afterwards altered upon great conceſſions made to France, and advantageous terms procured for the elector of Bavaria. But that Tournay was, at laſt, obtained for the Dutch, was principally owing to the firmneſs and reſolutions of the ſtates, and to the aſſiſtance of the earl of Strafford, who refuſed to ſign the treaty without the ceſſion of that place to the ſtates, on which account he received their ſolemn thanks.

Mr. Prior having been left by lord Bolingbroke at Paris, as the queen's plenipotentiary, he was introduced by the marquis de Torcy to a private audience of the king; and obtained a favourable interpretation of a clauſe inſerted in the late treaty for a ſuſpenſion of arms, which had raiſed a clamour among the merchants in London. For it having been ſtipulated, 'That none of the queen's men of war, or merchants ſhips, ſhould tranſport or convoy into Portugal or Catalonia, or any of the places, where they made war at preſent, any troops, arms, cloaths, proviſions, or ammunition'; The Engliſh traders were juſtly apprehenſive, that under that pretence they might be debarred from their uſual traffic of corn and fiſh, of which there are great demands at Liſbon and Barcelona, in time of peace as well as in war.

While Mr. Prior was in France, news came, that a French ſquadron in the Weſt-Indies was taking the ſugar iſlands belonging to the Engliſh, deſtroying their plantations, carrying away their Negroes, and making hoſtages of the planters. Upon notice of this invaſion of the Leeward-Iſlands by the French, the lord Bolingbroke wrote thus to Prior, September the 19th, O. S. 'This proves a very untoward Contretemps. It gives a theme to the Whigs, and ſerves to awaken the paſſions that were almoſt lulled aſleep. We expected that Coſſart's ſquadron might have gone to the coaſt of Brazil, or to Surinam; but we never imagined our colonies would have been attacked by him, at a time when we were knitting the bonds of friendſhip between the two nations with all poſſible induſtry. Could this ill opinion of our new friends have entered into our heads, I do aſſure you, he ſhould have been accompanied by a fleet of the queen's, which would have kept him in reſpect'. He remembers the orders that were ſo punctually and chearfully obeyed by the duke of Ormond, which, as he thinks, ſaved the French a beating, and then adds: 'In a word, we depended ſo much on the good underſtanding which we thought eſtabliſhed, and were ſo earneſt to prevent any thing, which might break in upon it, that we not only avoided to fortify our ſquadron, as we might have done, but we alſo neglected to put in execution ſome deſigns, which would have annoyed the French and Spaniards perhaps more than any which have been effected in the courſe of the war.

Mr. Prior was ſo entirely devoted to the French court, that, towards the latter end of October, without either leave or orders from the queen, he came over into England, at the deſire of the king of France, who thought him a proper perſon to be intruſted with the great ſecret of prevailing with the queen, by her credit, to obtain what he demanded for the elector of Bavaria; for which purpoſe he brought a credential letter to the queen, importing, 'That his conduct was very agreeable to that monarch'. About the middle of November he was ſent back to France with new inſtructions, wherein the propoſals of a neutrality in Italy was one of the chief articles: And, that he might have a perfect knowledge of the queen's preſent reſolutions and counſels, in relation to the preſent treaty of peace, a copy of the laſt inſtructions to the plenipotentiaries at Utrecht was given him, that, as occaſion ſhould require, he might act in all things conformable to the queen's intentions therein expreſſed. He carried likewiſe a letter from the queen to the king of France, wherein, among other things, it is ſaid, that, Mr. Prior continuing to behave himſelf ſo, as that his conduct may be entirely agreeable to the king of France, he does but literally execute the order the queen had given him, and is a proof of his duty and zeal for her ſervice.

About this time, in order to conquer the obſtinacy of the Dutch, it was induſtriouſly given out in England and Holland, that the duke of Savoy had agreed to a ſuſpenſion of arms; which report had, as yet, no other foundation, than the earneſt endeavours of the Britiſh miniſters to bring him into the queen's meaſures; for which the emperor's backwardneſs to give him ſatisfaction about ſome claims, not ill-grounded, gave them a very plauſible handle. The differences, which had been long depending between the courts of Vienna and Turin, having been very prejudicial to the confederate intereſt, becauſe the duke of Savoy rather choſe to ſtand ſtill, than, by going into the field, to promote the intereſt of an ally, who ſtill put off the performance of his engagements to him: The maritime powers uſed their utmoſt endeavours to put an end to theſe fatal diſputes. Both parties were at laſt prevailed with, to refer the controverſy to the arbitration of the queen and the ſtates, whoſe envoys, Mr. Stanyan and monſieur Vander Meer, having met at Milan, the plenipotentiaries of the emperor and the duke of Savoy, and maturely weighed the allegations on both ſides, they agreed on a ſentence of arbitration, importing in ſubſtance, that either the town of Vigevano, or an equivalent for it, ſhould be given to the duke, together with ſeveral other diſtricts. The duke of Savoy readily acquieſced in this deciſion, for which he returned thanks to the Britiſh and Dutch miniſters; but the Imperial commiſſioners ſolemnly proteſted againſt it; which was very ill reliſhed at the court of Great-Britain. While this affair was depending, the duke of Savoy ordered count Maffei, his firſt plenipotentiary at Utrecht, to repair about the middle of May to London, to ſolicit the arrears of ſubſidies due to him; and, the better to ſucceed in this negotiation, that miniſter did not fail inſinuating, that his maſter was inclineable to enter into the Britiſh meaſures. Upon this hint, Mr. St. John, who ſeized all opportunities to mortify the houſe of Auſtria, ſtarted the propoſals of giving the kingdom of Sicily to the duke of Savoy, in order to engage him in his views. And therefore, though the French plenipotentiary at Utrecht, had early offered that iſland to the emperor, yet the Britiſh miniſter declared to the marquis de Torcy, that the queen abſolutely demanded it for the duke of Savoy. It is, however, obſerveable, that the duke was ſo far from reliſhing this propoſition, that he declared to the earl of Peterborough at Turin, 'That he was not ſo vainly impatient for the title of a king, as to loſe or hazard any real intereſt for an empty name; but that he thought it much more extraordinary, that a prince defeated ten years together by his enemies ſhould remain, at laſt, with the prize contended for, and which ſo often, by parliament, had been declared the juſt and unavoidable motive of the war'. To calm the uneaſineſs of mind the duke of Savoy was in, the earl of Peterborough repreſented in a memorial to him, 'That, in refuſing thoſe offers, he muſt fall out with the queen and the Engliſh miniſters, whom he endeavoured to excuſe from the reproaches caſt upon them, as if they were perſons devoted to France. That for the ſupport of what was propoſed, a ſufficient fleet would be furniſhed, either by England or France, or by both powers jointly; and that he ſhould be guaranteed and protected againſt any power, that ſhould oppoſe this project, or ſhould inſult him for having accepted theſe offers'. The arguments of the Britiſh miniſters prevailed at length with the duke; and, if their deſign was effectually to diſable the emperor from ſupporting himſelf againſt France, after the ſeparation of the Engliſh, by forcing into the intereſt of France an ally ſo conſiderable as the duke of Savoy, theſe meaſures were certainly extremely well calculated for ſuch an end. This forwardneſs of the Britiſh miniſtry to make England a guarantee for conditions advantageous only to France, and which muſt naturally have engaged the nation in a war with the emperor, was the more extraordinary, in that, during the whole courſe of this negotiation, no endeavours were uſed to procure a guaranty of the allies to ſecure the Proteſtant Succeſſion, which had been addreſſed for by both houſes of parliament. While the earl of Peterborough was alluring the duke of Savoy with the promiſe of Sicily, the French endeavoured to draw him off by open force. But the duke of Berwick, after an unſucceſsful attempt to ſurprize fort Edmund and Conti, and the plundering of the neighbourhood of Saluſſes, which occaſioned a warm ſkirmiſh, was obliged to repaſs the Alpes with an inconſiderable booty. On the other hand, count Maffei having, with great addreſs, obtained from the Britiſh court a large ſum of money, in part of the arrears due to his maſter, he returned to his poſt at Utrecht, towards the end of September, O. S. by which time the emperor had ſent orders to his miniſters at Milan, to give the duke of Savoy intire ſatisfaction. But his condeſcenſion had no effect upon a prince, who was already biaſſed by the gold and promiſes of Great-Britain.

The Engliſh miniſters, and their agents, were not equally ſucceſsful in ſome courts of Germany. Mr. Thomas Harley, a near relation of the lord-treaſurer, who, about the beginning of this year, had been appointed to go to Hanover with a ſecret commiſſion, having ſtaid ſome months in Holland, to watch the progreſs of the negotiations at Utrecht and the Hague, ſet out, at laſt, about the beginning of July for Germany. On the 12th of that month, N. S. he arrived at Hanover, accompanied by Mr. St. John, brother to the lord Bolingbroke, and ſome other young Engliſh gentlemen, who were all entertained at the elector's expence. Three days after, Mr. Harley, who from the ſtation of coadjutor to the ſecretary of the treaſury, was now raiſed to the character of ambaſſador extraordinary, had a public audience of the elector, and afterwards of the princeſs Sophia, electreſs dowager, and of the electoral prince and princeſs, by whom he was received with diſtinguiſhing marks of favour, as one ſo nearly related to the prime miniſter of Great Britain. The deſign of this ambaſſy was to perſuade the elector to come into the Britiſh meaſures, which Mr. Harley preſſed ſtrongly, and, amongſt other arguments, told him, 'That the contrary would do him an injury in the minds of the people, who were ſet upon peace'. But the elector remained firm in the ſentiments, which he formerly expreſſed in the memorial preſented about a year before by baron Bothmar, and anſwered Mr. Harley to this effect: 'I do not put myſelf upon the foot of one pretending immediately to the throne of Great-Britain. The queen is a young woman, and, I hope, will live a great many years. When ſhe dies, my mother is before me. Whenever it pleaſes God to call me to that ſtation, I hope to act as becomes me, for the advantage of the people. In the mean time, ſpeak to me, as to a German prince, and a prince of the empire. As ſuch, I muſt tell you, I cannot depart from what I take to be the true intereſt of the empire and the Dutch'. Mr. Harley, having continued above two months at Hanover, ſet out from thence to return to Great-Britain.

Endeavours were likewiſe uſed about this time to bring the king of Pruſſia into pacific meaſures, with no better ſucceſs than at the court of Hanover. But, notwithſtanding theſe and other diſappointments, the Britiſh miniſters purſued their ſcheme with ſteadineſs and reſolution; which being chiefly founded on king Philip's renunciation of the crown of France, the lord Lexington was appointed to go to Spain, to preſs and be witneſs of the performance of that important preliminary.

Though the public negotiation at Utrecht was, for ſome months, at a ſtand, upon account of the diſpute between Meſnager and Rechteren; yet ſome private ſteps were made in the mean while for bringing the war to a concluſion: For on the 9th of October, N. S. the miniſters of the ſtates declared to thoſe of Great-Britain, 'That, for the good of peace, the ſtates were willing to yield Liſle to France, and recede from their pretenſions to have Doway, Valenciennes, and Maubeuge, which they had hitherto inſiſted upon; provided Condé and Tournay were included in the barrier, the tariffs of 1664 reſtored, and that Sicily be yielded to the emperor, and Straſburg to the empire'. This propoſal was immediately tranſmitted to the court of Great-Britain, where it was looked upon as more reaſonable than any of the former ſchemes. On the other hand, the Imperial miniſters finding the ſtates inclined to yield up Spain and the Weſt-Indies to king Philip, to which they knew their maſter was unwilling to conſent, count Zinzendorf propoſed a plan, according to which the emperor, and the ſtates of the empire ſhould furniſh four millions of crowns, which were ſuppoſed to be ſufficient to put their forces in a condition to act offenſively, and to maintain moſt of the auxiliaries lately in the Britiſh pay. But, it having been found by long experience, that there was no great dependance to be made on ſuch promiſes, ſome of the princes, to whom thoſe troops belonged, reſolved to recall them upon various pretences.

On the 4th of October, one of the queen's meſſengers arrived at Utrecht with diſpatches for her miniſters; and after a conference with thoſe of the ſtates, the earl of Strafford, the next morning, ſet out for England, and on the 13th arrived at Whitehall.

The earl's ſudden departure from Holland occaſioned various conjectures both at home and abroad. The general opinion was, that he was ſent for to give the queen and her miniſters a verbal account of the diſpoſition, in which he left the Dutch as to peace and war, and to receive the queen's inſtructions in relation to their late ſcheme. But thoſe, who obſerved what paſſed at court, aſcribed his coming over to a miſunderſtanding, which, about this time, appeared to be among the queen's ſervants. It is evident (from the lord-treaſurer's account of public affairs, ſent to the queen in Auguſt 1714) that there had been ſeveral miſunderſtandings between him and the lord Bolingbroke. He obſerves particularly, that, when it was found neceſſary to create ſome new peers in the ſeſſion of parliament in 1711, ſo many having been brought formerly out of the houſe of commons of thoſe who uſed to manage public affairs, it was propoſed to Mr. Secretary St. John, that, if he would be contented to ſtay in the houſe of commons that ſeſſion, the queen would create him a peer, and he ſhould not loſe his rank: Accordingly, after the ſeſſion was ended, the queen ordered a warrant for him to be a viſcount; which put him into the utmoſt rage againſt the lord-treaſurer and lady Maſham. It availed but little to tell him, how much he had got in place; for, had he been created with the other lords, it would have fallen to his ſhare to have come next after lord Trevor. But the treaſurer, with great patience, bore all that ſtorm, of which lady Maſham was often a witneſs; and Mr. Arthur Moore, a conſiderable time after, told the treaſurer, that lord Bolingbroke ſaid to him, he owed him a revenge upon that head. This diſcontent continued, till there happened an opportunity of ſending him to France, of which there was, ſays the treaſurer, not much occaſion; but it was hoped, this would put him in good humour; which it did, till, in October 1712, there were knights of the garter made; which occaſioned a new reſentment from lord Bolingbroke, which frequently broke out in outrageous expreſſions publicly againſt all then made; who were the dukes of Beaufort, Hamilton, and Kent; the earl Paulet, and the earls of Oxford and Strafford. The duke of Hamilton made a private application to the queen, deſiring, he might be permitted to wear both the garter and the order of the thiſtle; but was anſwered, the ſame was unprecedented; and that the duke of Argyle had laid down the thiſtle, upon his being made knight of the garter.

The lord Lexington, who was appointed to go to Spain, to preſs the renunciation of king Philip to the crown of France, having embarked at Portſmouth on the 15th of September, arrived, October the 7th, at Madrid, where he was received with great marks of honour and diſtinction. Before his arrival, upon information, that Sir—— Burke reſided there, as miniſter of the king of England, whoſe arms he had ſet up before his houſe; the lord Lexington complained of it to the court, and demanded, that he ſhould depart from Madrid, which he was immediately ordered to do. The lord Lexington had then ſeveral conferences with king Philip's miniſters about that prince's renunciation: which being drawn up in form, and agreed to, his majeſty ſigned it on the 5th of November, N. S. and ſwore upon the Holy Evangeliſts, to obſerve it, in preſence of the council of ſtate, and of the chief nobility. The cortez, or ſtates of Spain, having been ſummoned to meet at Madrid, in order to enact this renunciation into a law, king Philip, attended by the preſident of Caſtile, and council of ſtate, went to that aſſembly, and told them, 'That the efforts, which the nation made with ſo much zeal and fidelity, to ſecure his crown in two perilous occaſions, were of ſuch a nature, as never to be forgot. And to ſhew his gratitude, to procure peace for his people, and to be never ſeparated from them, he renounced all pretenſions, which either himſelf, or his iſſue, might have to the crown of France; and deſired them to give their conſent to it'. Upon this the cortez confirmed and approved the renunciation, and the crown of Spain, after king Philip's poſterity, was limited to the houſe of Savoy. The queen, and prince of Aſturias, and the lord Lexington, were preſent at the whole ſolemnity. But it is to be obſerved, that his lordſhip did not yet take upon him any character; and that ſome time before king Philip ſent orders to the marquis de Monteleone, who was then at Paris, to repair to the court of Great-Britain.

The like renunciation was made ſome months after, by the princes of France to the crown of Spain: And king Philip was declared incapable of ſucceeding to the crown of France: It was ſomething ſtrange, to ſee ſo much weight laid on theſe renunciations, ſince the king of France had ſo often, and ſo ſolemnly declared (upon his claiming, in the right of his queen, the Spaniſh Netherlands; when the renunciation made by his queen before the marriage, purſuant to the treaty of the Pyrenees, of all rights of ſucceſſion to her father's dominions, was objected to him) that no renunciation, which was but a civil act, could deſtroy the rights of blood, founded on the laws of nature: But this was now forgot, or very little conſidered.

While theſe things were tranſacting, endeavours were uſed to bring the crown of Portugal into the preſent meaſures of peace; and, leſt perſuaſion ſhould fail, it was thought proper to uſe more forcible arguments. The marquis de Bay who commanded king Philip's forces in Eſtremadura, marched with his army, and incamped within half a league of Elvas. To increaſe the jealouſy, which by this march he had given the Portugueſe, as if he deſigned to beſiege that place, he went to take a nearer view of it, and then returned to his camp. On the other hand, the Portugueſe, deceived by theſe appearances, worked hard in repairing the fortifications of Elvas, and conveyed into it two battalions, drawn out of Campo-Major; which being the town the marquis de Bay had a deſign upon, he marched with the whole army, and inveſted that place. This irruption of the Spaniards, to the number of near twenty thouſand men, at a juncture, when Great-Britain (the main ſupport of Portugal for many years paſt) had reduced all her forces in that country, except two regiments, could not but make the court of Portugal very uneaſy. Their conſternation was very much increaſed, upon the news, that the Spaniards had inveſted Campo-Major, the moſt regular fortification on the frontiers of Portugal; but which, at that time, was not provided either with a ſufficient garriſon, or with ammunition and proviſions for a long ſiege. However, on this occaſion, the Portugueſe exerted themſelves with vigour and reſolution, which was in great meaſure owing to the conduct of major-general Hogan, an Iriſh gentleman, and of brigadier Maſſey, an experienced French Proteſtant engineer, who formed, in conjunction with the count de Ribeira, and ſeveral other officers of note, the deſign of getting into Campo-Major, which was executed with very good ſucceſs at the head of two or three hundred Portugueſe grenadiers, a day or two after the enemy had opened the trenches. Hogan having alſo got into the town with a ſupply of four or five hundred men, the count de Ribeira, who commanded there in chief, made the neceſſary diſpoſitions to defend the place to the laſt extremity, and was ſo well ſeconded by the officers and troops under him, that he obliged the marquis de Bay to raiſe the ſiege. Notwithſtanding this ſucceſs, the expedition of the Spaniards had the effect deſired by the court of France and Great-Britain. For, the Portugueſe finding they were like to be left by England, if they continued the war againſt Spain, the count de Tarouca, the Portugueſe miniſter at Utrecht, was prevailed upon by the biſhop of Briſtol to come into the queen's meaſures, and ſign the ſuſpenſion of arms the 7th of November. He excuſed this proceeding to the miniſters of the allies as a pure effect of neceſſity.

Thus ended the war in Portugal. As to the army in Spain, the latter end of September, brigadier Price, who commanded the Engliſh, received a letter by a trumpeter of the enemy, from Mr. Secretary St. John, with orders from the queen to leave immediately the army of count Staremberg, and march to the ſea-ſide near Barcelona, and there to wait the arrival of ſir John Jennings, who was to tranſport them to Port-Mahon. This ſurpriſing news (ſays the author of the manuſcript account) cauſed a great conſternation among our confederates, and very much enraged the Catalans, who found they were going to be forſaken by thoſe they had moſt reaſon to truſt. To prevent the effects of their reſentment, and our being moleſted upon our march by the Miquelets and other country people, the queen of Spain ſent four perſons of diſtinction to be as ſafe guards to us, and to take care we ſhould be ſupplied with proviſions. We came to Barcelona and incamped by the ſea-ſide, on the very ſpot of ground where king Charles landed with the troops, when he beſieged and took that city. Here we continued ſome time before ſir John Jennings arrived. With him came over colonel Kane, with a commiſſion to break Lepel's regiment, that they might ſell their horſes, and to ſee the men on board, with the regiments of foot, and the train of artillery; which orders were executed in a very ſhort time, and we were all carried to Port Mahon.

The duke of Hamilton (who had been made maſter of the ordnance, vacant by the death of earl Rivers) was appointed ambaſſador extraordinary to the court of France. The choice of the duke for that ambaſſy gave melancholy ſpeculations to thoſe who thought him much in the Pretender's intereſt, and knew, that he was conſidered, not only in Scotland, but likewiſe in England, as the head of his party. On the other hand the king of France named the duke d'Aumont, firſt gentleman of his bed-chamber to go into England with the ſame character of ambaſſador extraordinary; which was likewiſe agreeable to the Pretender's friends, to whoſe intereſt he was openly attached.

All this while the duke of Ormond continued in his quarters in Ghent, where one of the Dutch field-deputies came to him the 7th of September, N. S. being ſent by his colleagues, to ſound him upon ſeveral points. He aſked firſt, Whether the Engliſh troops were to ſtay at Ghent and Bruges the winter, or how long? To which the duke anſwered, He could not tell, but ſaw no appearance of their being withdrawn as yet. He aſked next, Whether the duke would conſent to the ſtates putting ſome of their troops into Ghent, to take care of their convoys, and eſcort them to their frontier garriſons? The duke ſaid, He thought himſelf obliged not to ſuffer any troops, but thoſe of the queen, to continue in the town. However he had no intention, by taking or keeping poſſeſſion of that place, to obſtruct their convoys; and that the Dutch troops might ſtill come to the counterſcarp of the town, and receive whatever was to be carried to the camp, as had been practiſed ever ſince Ghent was in our hands. The deputy's next queſtion was, Whether the duke would let part of the Dutch troops take their winter quarters in Bruges, as they had done ever ſince the reduction of that place? The duke anſwered, He could not admit of any troops whatever, beſides thoſe of the queen, either into Ghent, or Bruges, till he had her majeſty's orders. The lord Bolingbroke highly applauded the duke's conduct on this occaſion, and told him in a letter, 'That the queen had received ſo much ill uſage with reſpect to the commerce of her ſubjects in the Netherlands, and had ſo much reaſon to expect more of the ſame kind, that ſhe was reſolved to treat upon that head with thoſe pawns in her hand'. But, upon recollection, the lord Bolingbroke, in a ſecond letter, acquainted the duke, 'That the poſitive order, contained in his firſt, was not ſent to prevent the admiſſion of other troops beſides her majeſty's, into Ghent and Bruges. That the queen was enough ſatisfied that his grace would take effectual care to preſerve thoſe cautionary places, which could alone ſecure to her any tolerable conditions, with reſpect to the Netherlands, in the terms of peace, but he confeſſed he thought, it could be no way unneceſſary to give his grace a very poſitive and clear order, in an affair, which might perhaps make a great deal of noiſe'. The duke not only punctually obey'd the orders which he received from England, but was alſo very forward in aſſiſting the queen's new friends, the French, even at the expence of her old allies. For being informed of a deſign, which the Dutch, from the late ſucceſs of their enterprize upon Fort Knocque, had been encouraged to form, for ſurprizing Newport or Furnes; and that the fortifying Dixmuyde was made uſe of as a pretence for drawing together a body of troops ſufficient to put the deſign in execution, the duke knew not, but the queen might think it for her ſervice, that the deſign ſhould not ſucceed, ſince if the Dutch were not ſuffered to take poſſeſſion of thoſe garriſons, the queen would not only have a greater influence towards ſettling the commerce of the Netherlands on a good foot, but would be able to ſecure, what was of the higheſt conſequence at that time, a free communication between her troops, which were in Ghent, Bruges, or Dunkirk. He therefore, in a letter of October the 21ſt, acquainted the Secretary with this affair, and left his lordſhip to judge of the importance of it, and the uſe that was to be made of it. But, if the queen thought it moſt for her ſervice to prevent it, he was humbly of opinion, ſome means ſhould be found out to give advice of it to the marſhal de Villars, who might poſſibly think, we owed him that good office, in requital of ſome information his lordſhip knew had been ſent by the marſhal, with a deſign to ſerve her majeſty and the nation'. The queen was of the ſame opinion concerning the uſe to be made of the intelligence mentioned in this letter; but, the campaign being by this time at an end, the duke aſked and readily obtained leave to return to England; and, having taken a view of Dunkirk, embarked there, landed at Dover the firſt of November, arrived in London the next day, and on the fourth waited on the queen at Windſor, where he met with a moſt gracious reception [u].

The ſame day, being the anniverſary of the birth of king William III, great rejoicings were made in the cities of London and Weſtminſter, by the well-affected to the Revolution, and the Proteſtant Succeſſion. Among the reſt, a conſiderable number of lords, gentlemen, and citizens, being met at the Three Tuns and Rummer in Grace-church-ſtreet, to celebrate that feſtival, cauſed a great bonfire to be made before the houſe. The high-church party, being offended at this, raiſed an oppoſite mob, who offering to diſturb the rejoicing round the bonfire, a ſcuffle enſued, in which the aggreſſors were repulſed; but the trained-bands being that day under arms, the fray was ſoon appeaſed, and all was quiet, till the bonfire was conſumed, and the company in the tavern retired. However, this rejoicing was by the Tories repreſented as a ſet deſign to diſturb the government, particularly in the Poſt-Boy. But what was more ridiculous, a report was ſpread of a ſtrange conſpiracy againſt the lord-treaſurer, by ſending him that very day, 'a band-box, with three piſtols charged and cocked, whoſe triggers being tied to a packthread faſtened to the cover, the piſtols would have gone off, and done execution, at the opening of the box, had not the ſame been miraculouſly prevented by Dr. Jonathan Swift, who being then in the room, whilſt his lordſhip was ſhaving, ſuſpected ſomething, and opened the box in ſuch a manner, that no miſchief was done'. This was the firſt ſtory, that was whiſpered about; but the belief of ſuch an extravagant plot was ſoon exploded; when it was found that the three piſtols were no more than a ſteel ſet on a piſtol-ſtock to ſtrike fire, and two inkhorns or ſquibs; ſo that the lucky diſcoverer, Dr. Swift, was by many ſuſpected to have been the ingenious contriver of this political machine.

Another accident happened about this time, which the miniſters laid hold of, to improve a private animoſity, if not into a conſpiracy againſt the government, at leaſt into a party quarrel. A law-ſuit which for about eleven years had been depending between the duke of Hamilton and the lord Mohun, had created a great animoſity between theſe two noblemen; ſo that, on the 13th of November, at a meeting at Mr. Orlebar's, a maſter in Chancery's chambers in the Rolls, the duke having reflected on Mr. Whiteworth, (father of lord Whiteworth late ambaſſador to the Czar) who was examined as a witneſs on the lord Mohun's ſide, ſaying, 'He had neither truth nor juſtice in him'; the lord Mohun thought himſelf obliged to vindicate that gentleman, which he did, by ſaying, 'He had as much as his grace'. The duke having made no reply, all ſeemed to end amicably; for they both continued in the ſame place above half an hour, and, at parting, the duke, going out firſt, made a low bow to the lord Mohun, who, in like manner, returned his civility; ſo that none of the perſons there preſent, ſuſpected any conſequence from what had paſſed. But, the next day, general Maccartney went twice to the duke of Hamilton's houſe, with a challenge to him from the lord Mohun; and, in the evening, the duke, accompanied by colonel John Hamilton, went to meet general Maccartney at the Roſe-Tavern, and was a few minutes in private with him; whilſt the lord Mohun and the colonel were in ſeparate rooms, Mr. Maccartney went ſeveral times between the duke and lord Mohun; from which and other circumſtances, his enemies took occaſion to give out, that he had rather inflamed, than endeavoured to compoſe the quarrel. But all that can be fairly conjectured is, that the time and place of the duel was there fixed and agreed on. The lord Mohun and general Maccartney lay that night at the Bagnio in Long-Acre; and on Sunday the 15th of November about ſeven o'clock in the morning went in a hackney-coach to the lodge in Hyde-Park, where being ſoon after met by the duke of Hamilton, and his ſecond colonel Hamilton, they all leaped over a ditch, into a place called the nurſery. Lord Mohun would not have had the ſeconds engage; but the duke inſiſted that Mr. Maccartney 'ſhould have a ſhare in the dance'; from whence the general's enemies ſtrengthened their ſuggeſtion, that he had been the inſtigator of the duel. All having drawn, the two principals made ſuch violent and deſperate paſſes at each other, being rather intent to give than to parry thruſts, that they ſoon fell down, both mortally wounded; ſo that the lord Mohun died on the ſpot; and the duke, as his ſervants were carrying him to his coach [v]. The two ſeconds did not fight at all, as one of the witneſſes depoſed, or fought with ſuch caution, that colonel Hamilton received only a ſmall wound

[u] Burnet ſays, our army continued this winter about Ghent and Bruges; and we kept a ſort of garriſon in Dunkirk: but that was ſo ill ſupplied with artillery and ammunition, that it was viſible they were not in a condition to keep the place, any longer than the French were willing to let them ſtay in it. And, during that time, they were neither allowed to have a place to worſhip God, nor to bury their dead in, though by a mortality that raged there ſome thouſands died. Burnet, II. 615.

[v] Burnet, on this occaſion, ſays: I will add no character of him: I am ſorry I cannot ſay ſo much good of him as I could wiſh, and I had too much kindneſs for him, to ſay any evil without neceſſity. Nor ſhall I make any reflections on the deplorable effect of thoſe unchriſtian and barbarous maxims, which have prevailed ſo univerſally, that there is little hope left of ſeeing them rooted out of the minds of men; the falſe notions of honour and courage being too ſtrong to be weighed down by prudent or religious conſiderations. Burnet II. 612.

in his inſtep, which, he ſaid, happened by his own ſword, as he was parrying down a full paſs, that Maccartney made at him[w].

The earl of Godolphin died of the ſtone, on the 15th of September, this year. He had ſerved in conſiderable employments under four princes of very different tempers and deſigns. Oppoſite opinions have been delivered of his merit and character. Great abilities and integrity have been aſcribed to him by ſome; while others have freely cenſured him for notorious defects in the latter, and allowed him to have been great by the chance of place and diſtinction. The treaſurer's ſtaff was attended with the ill-will and averſion of the Tories; for his rival, the earl of Rocheſter, by his turbulent zeal, had gained the higheſt place in their favour. As he had commonly acted in oppoſition to the Whigs, they likewiſe entertained great fears and jealouſies of him. His whole miniſtry was embarraſſed with both theſe circumſtances; and even prudence, good temper, and ſucceſs could not ſecure him a general good will and confidence. However, the objections, which have been made to him, will, when every thing is duly weighed, be ſilenced, or perhaps turned to his advantage. He had concurred with the worſt of king Charles II's miniſters, and adhered to the laſt to king James. In theſe two reigns he gave no oppoſition; but the ſame active and paſſive obedience was not practiſed by him under king William. This was aſcribed to his retaining principles, very inconſiſtent with an entire approbation of his government; to which has been added a paſſionate admiration of and attachment to king James's queen. The higher eſteem therefore ſeems due to his memory, when we review his conduct in the fulneſs of his power: In this ſituation it will appear, how truly ſuperior he became to all prejudices and prepoſſeſſions. His deliberations were conſtant and determined for our proſperity at home, and our ſucceſs abroad. If his difficulties and diſadvantages, particularly thoſe with the queen, were duly explained, his attention to the welfare of the nation would be the ſubject of great admiration. The union of the two kingdoms was his work; and, though this tranſaction has been often condemned by great numbers of both parties, yet that does not leſſen the merit of the performance. All changes and alterations, though conducted with the utmoſt honeſty and ſkill muſt be attended with ſeveral inconveniencies; and it is too common with mankind to inſiſt only upon theſe, while they paſs over in ſilence the moſt ſubſtantial advantages. By means of this union, the Proteſtant Succeſſion was ſecured; the influence of France on the affairs of Scotland was much weakened; many occaſions of feuds and animoſities were removed; and the benefits reſulting to the whole iſland were immediate and important, and likely to be perpetually increaſing. Our accounts of the manner of carrying on this affair are not ſufficiently full and exact; for which reaſon the great inſtrument of it cannot have his juſt praiſe. Alliances and the force of recommendations impoſed upon him in ſome inſtances; but his great concern was to employ men of capacity and integrity; and ſuch were ſure of his kindeſt regards. This became the more remarkable, becauſe another great man was not ſo ſkilful and cautious, or very unlucky. He had a true ſenſe of the nation's welfare, and of the proper methods of promoting it. Rude and inſolent reproaches from a certain quarter, on the account of his former attachments and correſpondencies, were clear proofs of his having renounced them. No perſon was more earneſt and ſkilful in projects for annoying the enemy by attempts on France, Spain, Dunkirk, and the Weſt-Indies; but many of them were defeated by winds and other accidents. Late and expenſive experiments have convinced us of the difficulties and hazards of Weſt-India expeditions; and ſuch attempts became improper, when encouragement was given to ſend king Charles into Spain. Had we ſecured that monarchy for the houſe of Auſtria, when it was in our power, we ſhould have been intitled to advantages ſuperior to any conqueſt. The piece 'Upon the management of the war, and the four anſwers to the conduct of the allies', have clearly proved, that there was no partiality to the duke of Marlborough; but that every part of the war was attended to in the moſt proper manner; and we have there accounts given of the advantages of the miniſter's treaties and our alliances with Savoy and Portugal. Our military co-operations with Portugal were embarraſſed with many difficulties and inconveniencies. But what muſt have been the caſe, had the French party prevailed there? No impreſſions could have been made on Spain; which would have been a great diſadvantage to the common cauſe. Without their ports, our fleet muſt have been expoſed to many dangers and diſtreſſes. The prodigious benefits of the commerce then opened are well known, but have not been ſufficiently acknowledged. Thoſe, who ſtudy detraction, obſerve how many circumſtances concurred to his ſucceſsful management of the treaſury. The ſecurity and ſafety of the bank, punctual payments, and the ready command of money in the funds, had been experienced ſeveral years, and moſt effectually ſilenced popular objections. Many defective ways of raiſing the ſupply in king William's time had ſuggeſted proper methods of caution; but, above all, our great ſucceſs abroad was the life and ſupport of public credit. But might not our advantages in ſome degree be aſcribed to the treaſurer's exact care in payments? By his attention to our trade and commerce, did not he lay the foundation for a due and full ſupply? When all the marks of prudence and regularity are attended with ſucceſs, the chief conductor hath a fair claim to a large portion of merit. He is ſaid to have preſerved great appearances of wiſdom by ſilence and reſerve, which are particulars of behaviour ſuppoſed to be inconſiſtent with a great and generous mind. But this was not owing to any thing mean and unworthy; for in all conſultations on buſineſs he diſcovered a ſurprizing greatneſs of courage, and a quick and moſt exact diſcernment. His kind, equal, and obliging temper endeared his memory to all, who had the pleaſure and advantage of his converſation. His behaviour to the queen was ſo faultleſs, that, when ſhe was influenced to diſmiſs him, ſhame and concern would not allow her to admit him into her preſence; and, therefore inſtead of permitting him to reſign into her hands the treaſurer's ſtaff, a letter was ſent to order him to break it. Unbecoming inſtances of behaviour may be produced in the lives of great men of all ages and all employments. Had this been duly conſidered, ſuch ſevere reproaches had not been caſt upon this miniſter for his love of play and horſe-races; by which indeed he became too much, and too frequently engaged with the moſt worthleſs of men, gameſters and jockies. But after all, when this objection is thoroughly examined, nothing will appear but a faulty choice of improper amuſements; and there were no imputations upon him of any fraudulent practices, though ſuch were then not unfamiliar to perſons of his rank. Nor did his love for theſe diverſions ever draw him off from the duties of his high ſtation. Complaints have perhaps been too juſtly made againſt thoſe, who have the chief power in diſpoſing of places, that the merit of perſons of low rank, though very ſignificant, is ſeldom duly conſidered. And therefore inſtances of this kind ſhould not be deemed the peculiar fault of this great man. His letter to the queen juſt before his diſmiſſion furniſhes us with the fulleſt ideas of his worth and character; and time hath abundantly verified the repreſentations, which he therein made with dignity and decency, a becoming warmth, and an honeſt freedom. Such a ſenſe of affairs, and ſuch expreſſions, could only proceed from a mind truly great and truly good.

[w] The High-church men and the Jacobites were ſo ſenſibly touched with the loſs of one of their principal champions, that they charged this unfortunate duel on the whole Whig-party; ſuggeſting, 'That, having tried all other methods in vain, they returned to their expedient of Murder, and employed treachery and violence at once. That their general [the duke of Marlborough] ſet the example of party duels, which was only to give them a ſanction; and deputed that infamous meſſenger of his challenge to be the general bully of the faction. That the preſent lord treaſurer had almoſt miraculouſly eſcaped their laſt engine of aſſaſſination (meaning the band-box.) That the bravo, Maccartney, who depended for his ſupport on the lord Mohun, was forced to keep up his patron's courage with wine, till within a very few hours of their meeting in the field: And that the mortal wound, which the duke received, after his adverſary was run through the heart, could not be given by any but Maccartney'. This laſt accuſation being like to lay an indelible odium on the Whigs, great induſtry, and indeed all indirect means were uſed to propagate the belief of it. In order to that, colonel Hamilton depoſed before the privy-council, 'That ſeeing lord Mohun fall, and the duke upon him, he ran to the duke's aſſiſtance; and that he might with the more eaſe help him, he flung down both their ſwords; and, as he was raiſing the duke up, he ſaw 'Maccartney make a puſh at his grace'. Upon which an advertiſement was publiſhed by the government, 'for the diſcovery of lieutenant-general Maccartney, ſuggeſting that it appeared upon oath, that the wound, whereof the duke died, was given him by Maccartney'. On the other hand, it was alledged, in vindication of the Whigs in general, and of general Maccartney in particular, 'That the duke of Hamilton and the lord Mohun purſued their private animoſities, occaſioned by the law-ſuit before-mentioned, which had been depending many years; which plainly appeared from the duke's having often been forewarned to avoid the lord Mohun's company. That the latter might probably have been inclined to decide the matter by the ſword, upon an apprehenſion, either that the duke would at laſt remove the cauſe to the houſe of peers, where he might hope to ſupply by friends and intereſt what he wanted in juſtice and equity; or that, upon his return from his embaſſy in France, he might beg and obtain of the crown, the late earl of Macclefield's eſtate, which was the prize contended for, upon a pretence, that the outlawry againſt the earl was not reverſed in due form'. As to the ſuggeſtion, that general Maccartney ſtabbed the duke of Hamilton, the falſity of that horrid imputation ſufficiently appeared, both from the ſeveral depoſitions taken at the coroner's inqueſt, and from the reports and declarations of two or three eminent ſurgeons, who were unanimous, 'That the wound the duke received in his right arm, and which was allowed on all hands to have been given by the lord Mohun, was the immediate occaſion of his grace's death'. Colonel Hamilton foully prevaricated at his trial on account of this duel, and perſiſted in accuſing general Maccartney. But his ſilence at the place where they fought, and where they both continued a conſiderable time, taking care of their reſpective principals, raiſed an unanſwerable objection to the colonel's evidence, and fixed upon him an infamous character, either for charging a murder on an innocent man, or for ſuffering the murderer of the noble perſon, whoſe ſecond he was, to make his eſcape, when it was in his power to ſecure him. Under this juſt imputation colonel Hamilton lived obſcurely the remainder of his days, becoming ſo odious to all men of honour, that he was obliged to ſell his company in the guards, and died October the 17th, 1716, of a ſudden vomiting of blood, which could not be ſtopped. Strict ſearch was made after lieutenant-general Maccartney; and, beſides the five hundred pounds promiſed by the queen's proclamation, three hundred more were offered by the dutcheſs of Hamilton, as a reward to whomſoever ſhould diſcover him. But Mr. Maccartney having, after the fatal duel, walked to Kenſington, and thence to Chelſea, went from thence to the duke of Richmond's houſe in the Privy-Garden, near Whitehall; lay there that night; and, early the next morning croſſed the Thames; and then, in a diſguiſe, went over to Flanders.

Upon his death the duke of Marlborough reſolved to go and live beyond ſea. He went away in the end of November, and his ducheſs followed him in the beginning of February following. This was variouſly cenſured; ſome pretended it was the giving up and abandoning the concerns of his country; and they repreſented it as the effect of fear, with too anxious a care to ſecure himſelf. Others were glad he was ſafe out of ill hands; whereby, if the nation ſhould fall into the convulſions of a civil war, he would be able to aſſiſt the elector of Hanover, as being ſo entirely beloved and confided in by all our military men; whereas, if he had ſtaid in England, it was not to be doubted, but, upon the leaſt ſhadow of ſuſpicion, he would have been immediately ſecured; but now he would be at liberty, being beyond ſea, to act as there might be occaſion for it.

There were two ſuits begun againſt him: The one was for the two and a half per cent. which the foreign princes were content ſhould be deducted for contingencies, of which an account has been given. The other was for arrears due to the builders of Blenheim-houſe. The queen had given orders for building it with great magnificence; all the bargains with the workmen were made in her name, and by authority from her; and in the preambles of the acts of parliament, which confirmed the grant of Woodſtock to him and his heirs, it is ſaid the queen built the houſe for him. Yet now, that the tradeſmen were let run into an arrear of 30,000l. the queen refuſed to pay any more, and ſet them upon ſuing the duke of Marlborough for it, though he had never contracted with any of them. Upon his going beyond ſea, both thoſe ſuits were ſtaid, which gave occaſion to people to imagine, that the miniſtry, being diſturbed to ſee ſo much public reſpect paid to a man, whom they had uſed ſo ill, had ſet theſe proſecutions on foot, only to render his ſtay in England uneaſy to him.

The duke ſet out for Dover the 24th of November; embarked on board the North-Britain packet-boat; and, on the 1ſt of December, landed at Oſtend, under a triple diſcharge of all the cannon on the ramparts. At his landing, he was received by general Cadogan and brigadier de Caris, governor of the place, and conducted by a vaſt concourſe of people to captain Brown's, where he dined. He ſupped with the governor; lay that night at the burgomaſter's; and, the next day, ſet out for Antwerp. He was received with extraordinary marks of reſpect in all the Dutch garriſons, particularly at Maeſtricht, from whence he repaired to Aix la Chapelle. But general Cadogan paid dear for the civilities he ſhewed the duke, being ſoon after diſmiſſed from all his employments.

Upon the death of duke Hamilton, it was for ſome days uncertain, who ſhould ſucceed him as ambaſſador to the court of France, the lord Bolingbroke being very much againſt the duke of Shrewſbury's being employed in that ſtation; but, however, he was named by the queen for that employment, and went over to France in the end of December. The ſame yacht, which carried him to Calais, brought over the duke d'Aumont, the French ambaſſador, who was a good-natured and generous man, of profuſe expence, throwing handfuls of money out of his coach, as he went about the ſtreets. He was not thought a man of buſineſs, and ſeemed to employ himſelf chiefly in maintaining the dignity of his character, and making himſelf acceptable to the nation.

On the 20th of November, the earl of Strafford was ſent back to the Hague with the French plan, which came to be called the queen's new plan of peace[x]. The ſubſtance of

[x] A deputation being made to him on the 8th of December, N. S. (to whom were added the penſionary and the regiſter Fagel) the earl of Strafford aſſured them, 'That he was never more pleaſed with being there than on this occaſion, as wiſhing nothing more, than to ſee the antient friendſhip and good correſpondence between her majeſty and that ſtate revived; and flattering himſelf, that he was charged with orders and inſtructions, which tended to procure a good peace for all Europe, and the firm ſecurity of that ſtate; ſo a ſolid and laſting friendſhip and correſpondence might thereby be eſtabliſhed between her majeſty and their high mightineſſes. That he could not forbear ſaying, he wiſhed the love of war, and the private intereſts of ſome perſons, had never given occaſion for a coldneſs in that friendſhip, which might have proved, and ſtill might prove fatal to that ſtate, if the laſt offers now to be made on the part of her majeſty ſhould not be accepted. That the reflecting on what had paſſed might ſerve to prevent inconveniencies for the future, ſince the refuſal to agree to the ſuſpenſion of arms propoſed by her majeſty might have brought ruin on that ſtate, and had coſt them ſo dear; and that there was reaſon to fear much greater evils, in caſe their high mightineſſes ſhould now refuſe to conclude the peace jointly with her majeſty. That the laſt propoſition or overture about peace made by their high mightineſſes, contained one point, which was contrary to the engagements her majeſty had before entered into; namely, that Sicily ſhould be given to the duke of Savoy. That, as to ſome other points, inſurmountable obſtacles had now ariſen, which might have been got over, had not ſo ſtrong oppoſition been made to her majeſty's meaſures, and had not her majeſty been conſtrained to agree ſeparately to a ſuſpenſion of arms. That the irreſolution of that ſtate had been attended by very unhappy accidents; and therefore her majeſty was very deſirous they would at length come to fix upon ſome propoſitions, reaſonable in themſelves, and of ſuch a nature, that, in the unlucky conjuncture, wherein affairs now ſtood, they might be obtained of France. That her majeſty had given him permiſſion to declare further, that he well knew, her majeſty was determined to inſiſt upon and even to procure from France, the ceſſion of Tournay, to ſtrengthen the barrier of that ſtate with a place of ſo great importance; but that he knew likewiſe, that her majeſty's conduct in this matter would wholly depend upon that of the ſtates: And that, after the making ſo conſiderable a ſtep in their favour, it was expected, that on their part, they ſhould forthwith concur with her majeſty in concluding the peace, without ſtarting new objections, and without making other demands. And that as ſoon as that ſtate ſhould declare themſelves in an authentic manner, ſo that her majeſty could depend upon it; then her majeſty would cauſe a declaration to be made in full congreſs, that the article of the ceſſion of Tournay ſhould be one of the conditions of peace ſine qua non. That he was likewiſe to inform their high mightineſſes, That the king of France had made very ſtrong inſtances for his ally, the elector of Bavaria; and that the leaſt, which his moſt Chriſtian majeſty pretended to aſk for him, was, that the ſaid elector ſhould continue in the poſſeſſion of Luxemburg, Namur, and Charleroy; ſubject however to the terms of the barrier for the ſtates-general, till the ſaid elector were reſtored to the electorate of Bavaria, (excluſive of the Upper Palatinate) and placed in the rank and dignity of ninth elector. That the king of France would alſo propoſe, that the kingdom of Sardinia be given to that elector, for effacing, by the title of king, the diſgrace and mortification of being degraded from the rank of firſt elector: And that her majeſty judged, that this point might be granted; that ſo the poſſeſſion of Tournay may be ſecured to the ſtates, and a peace made, which will be ſure and laſting. That he was alſo to repreſent to their high mightineſſes, in her majeſty's name, that her majeſty was deſirous both to re-eſtabliſh and to maintain an intire union between her and that ſtate; and hoped and aſſuredly believed that their high mightineſſes were of the ſame ſentiments with her in this matter. That therefore, it was neceſſary, without any loſs of time, to remove all, that that ſtate might ſeem to have gained, either to the immediate prejudice, or to the future danger, of her majeſty's and her kingdoms intereſt. That he had brought with him a plan of a new treaty of ſucceſſion and barrier; and muſt inſiſt, that it might be ſigned before the concluſion of the peace. That, upon a diſcuſſion of the now-exiſting barrier-treaty, he would make it appear to the miniſters of this ſtate, that many things were therein inſerted, which in England were looked upon as diſadvantageous to her majeſty's ſubjects, and which certainly could not be reconciled either to the letter, or the deſign of the grand alliance; nor were conformable to any principles, upon which the preſent confederacy was made, and the war begun. That he would further ſhew, that the alterations and additions now propoſed, were only ſuch, as were neceſſary to rectify the miſtakes, and explain what was dubious, and to ſupply ſome omiſſions in that treaty, and to take away ſome obſtructions thence ariſing to the commerce of Great-Britain. That, the particular guaranty of the ſucceſſion and barrier being thus explained and rectified, it would not only be an additional ſecurity to both nations, and be cordially executed, whenever the occaſion ſhould happen, but would unite the two nations in ſtricter bonds of friendſhip and affection: Whereas, on the other hand, that ſtate could not but expect a ſlow execution of that treaty, which, by the Britiſh nation, had been declared diſhonourable and diſadvantageous to it. And, in ſhort, that to pretend to hold the ſaid nation under an engagement of ſuch a nature as this, could have no other effect, than to foment jealouſy, and miſunderſtanding, which, one time or other, might break out into an open rupture. That, among the terms of the new plan, the fourth article of the treaty of barrier imported, that her majeſty conſented to the ſtates putting garriſons, providing, changing, augmenting, or diminiſhing them, as they ſhould think fit, in the following places; namely, Furnes, Fort Knocque, Ypres, Menin, the town and caſtle of Tournay, Mons, Charleroy, the town and caſtle of Namur, the caſtle of Ghent, the forts Pearl, Philip, and Damme: That fort St. Dhona being joined to the fortifications of Sluys ſhall be yielded in propriety to the ſtates; and that the fort of Rodenhuyſen, on this ſide of Ghent, ſhall be razed. That in the ninth article it is ſtipulated, that all the revenues of the places to be yielded up by France, which did not belong to the crown of Spain, at the time of the death of king Charles II. ſhall be given to the ſtates, towards maintaining the barrier, except only ſo much as is neceſſary for the civil government of the ſaid towns, places, and caſtellanies; as alſo a million of guilders yearly out of the cleareſt revenues of the reſt of the Spaniſh Netherlands. That what related to Bon, Huy, and Liege, ſhould be ſettled with the miniſters of the emperor and the empire: But that her Majeſty's opinion was, that the firſt of thoſe places ſhould be garriſoned by the Imperialiſts, and the other two by the States. That, in the laſt place, notwithſtanding all the provocations, and all the delays on the part of that ſtate, the queen had hitherto kept the negotiation open: That her majeſty thought ſhe had retarded it long enough, and poſſibly too long in good policy. That therefore the offers, which her majeſty now made by him, were her ultimate reſolutions: And that this was the laſt time ſhe would addreſs herſelf to their high mightineſſes, in caſe they ſhould form new delays, and not anſwer her majeſty's good intentions for their own intereſts. That, in the mean while, her majeſty had judged herſelf obliged in conſideration of the great ſervices done by the duke of Savoy for the common cauſe, and of the danger, to which he was expoſed by his firm adherence thereunto, to take care, not only for his ſecurity, but likewiſe this plan is contained in the concluſion of what the earl ſaid to the deputies of the ſtates and the penſionary, 'Preſſing for a ſpeedy reſolution, whether the ſtates were willing or not to ſign the peace jointly with her majeſty, immediately and without delay, for otherwiſe her majeſty would be obliged to ſign her peace, without waiting for them to come into it any longer than a fortnight or three weeks at fartheſt. That her majeſty, aſſuring herſelf that the ſtates would not delay to conclude the peace with her, would procure Tournay for them, which, with many other places, were not to be expected from France, if the queen ſhould ſign her peace ſeparately. That, as to the empire, there would be no alteration in what is contained in the queen's ſpeech relating thereto, nor in any thing with reſpect to the emperor, only that Sardinia ſhould be given to the elector of Bavaria, and that the duke of Savoy ſhould have Sicily. That her majeſty was very deſirous to have the concurrence of the ſtates in all that related to that duke, as well as to the elector of Bavaria, and to oblige the emperor to conſent to the neutrality of Italy, and to withdraw his troops from Catalonia. That ſhe further deſired, that the plenipotentiaries of the ſtates at Utrecht might be furniſhed with full powers to conclude forthwith the new treaty of barrier'. This new barrier-treaty, of which he delivered a copy to Regiſter Fagel, and by which the former was to be ſet aſide, was deſigned for drawing the ſtates in the more. By it the ſtates were to maintain the Succeſſion to the crown, when required by the queen, but not otherwiſe. This gave ſtill new occaſion for jealouſy. For, whereas, by the former treaty, they were ſtrictly bound to maintain the Succeſſion, ſo that they were obliged to oppoſe any attempts they ſaw made againſt it, they were by this treaty obliged to ſtay till they were ſent to: And, if our miniſters ſhould come to entertain ill deſigns that way, they would take care no notice ſhould be given to the ſtates.

The new plan being communicated to the ſtates of the reſpective provinces, the members of thoſe aſſemblies were variouſly affected. The ceſſion of Tournay, after the treaſurer and ſecretary in England had put France upon inſiſting to have it reſtored, was a great bait to the Dutch; and the threat, that they would loſe it, with ſeveral other places, if the queen ſigned her peace ſeparately, changed the minds of many of them, and inclined them to give a favourable ear to the lord Strafford's propoſals. That lord went incognito to Amſterdam, where he had ſeveral conferences with the leading magiſtrates. Amſterdam has always great influence on the ſtates of Holland, as the ſtates of Holland have on the ſtates-general, and the diſpoſition of that city is generally a rule for the cities and provinces in the affairs of war and peace. But the ſtates of Utrecht (where the biſhop of Briſtol was not idle in the abſence of lord Strafford) were the firſt that conſented to the new plan for the peace and the barrier; and nine days after the ſtates of Holland did the ſame; by which time the other provinces had tranſmitted their ſeveral opinions to the ſtates-general on that ſubject. All of them were unanimous in one point, to come into the queen's meaſures, but every province (except Utrecht) gave their conſent with ſome reſtrictions. Upon this the ſtates wrote a letter to the queen, ſignifying their reſolution to enter into her meaſures, and to conclude and ſign a peace jointly with her, as alſo to take with her new engagements on the Proteſtant Succeſſion and barrier-treaty. However they deſired her to interpoſe for reſtoring Straſburg to the empire, for adding Condé to their barrier, and for ſettling the commerce on the foot of the ancient tariff; as alſo for obtaining more reaſonable terms for the emperor: But things were to fixed between the courts of France and Great-Britain, that there was no room for interceſſion. The demand of Straſburg was rejected by the French with ſo poſitive an air, that the Britiſh court did not move it any more; nor did it appear that we obtained any one condition of the French, but what was offered in their own project.

In concluſion, the ſtates were forced to yield in every particular; and then our miniſters, to give ſome ſeeming content to the nation, and to bring the ſtates into ſome confidence with them, ordered the new barrier-treaty to be ſigned: And it was given out by their creatures, that the French were highly offended at their ſigning this; making it previous to a general peace, and a ſort of guaranty for it. Thus, after all the declamations that were made on the firſt barrier-treaty, the miniſters came into a new one, which, though not ſo ſecure as the former, yet was liable to all the objections, which were made againſt that [y].

likewiſe for his grandeur, by procuring for him Sicily, and the tracts of the country on this ſide the Alps; which were neceſſary to ſecure Exilles and Feneſtrelles, and to cover Piedmont. That his ſucceſſion, after that of king Philip, was acknowledged by the renunciation. That her majeſty deſired the concurrence of this ſtate in all that had been promiſed to his royal highneſs; and that her majeſty deſired likewiſe, that the ſtates ſhould join with her, to oblige the emperor to a neutrality for Italy, and to withdraw his troops from Catalonia: And that her majeſty was reſolved to make the neutrality a condition of tranſporting the ſaid troops, which her majeſty would do at her own expence; for, without that neutrality, the emperor might diſturb all Italy, and particularly the duke of Savoy, on account of his treaty in the year 1703; one of the Imperial miniſters having already threatened a miniſter of the duke of Savoy therewith, which would certainly engage the queen and the ſtates in the troubles and wars in Italy'. Then the earl of Strafford communicated to the deputies an anſwer, on the part of her majeſty, to the laſt memorial of the emperor's miniſter in England, by which her majeſty's ſentiments in this matter were confirmed. His lordſhip further repreſented, 'That her majeſty, being informed of the preſent diſorders in the Spaniſh Netherlands, had ſent over the earl of Orrery to the Hague, to redreſs them, to concert thereupon with the deputies of this ſtate, and to reſume the adminiſtration in common with their high mightineſſes' deputies, and to keep the ſame, till the emperor ſhould accept the Netherlands on the conditions, which the queen and their high mightineſſes ſhould agree upon': Adding, 'That the earl of Orrery had orders not to do any thing in this affair, but according as he ſhould find a diſpoſition in their high mightineſſes to act in concert with the queen'. Annals of queen Anne.

done, the war had been long ſince at an end, and they in poſſeſſion of that which was now impoſſible to obtain: But that they had let the whole burden of the war to fall upon her majeſty and the ſtates-general in Flanders; the getting whoſe money, by exorbitant bargains for their troops they ſeemed to have more at heart, than the providing their contingents for their own army. That, beſides their negligence and remiſſneſs in the proſecution of the war, the oppoſition they had made to her majeſty's meaſures for peace, had put it out of her power to ſerve them. That, when a ceſſation of arms was found neceſſary, they were told from her majeſty, that, if they would enter into it, the allies being united in their counſels, might have obtained from the enemy any thing they could reaſonably have inſiſted upon; but that they rejected that propoſal, and deſerted her majeſty, to follow prince Eugene's chimerical projects, which had already been, and might prove more fatal to the common cauſe, if they did not prevent another campaign by reaſonable propoſals of peace. That her majeſty's caſe was therefore very hard, that, while ſhe proſecuted the war with the utmoſt vigour, ſome of the allies acted with almoſt as much coldneſs and indifference, as if they had been in peace, or had no concern in the war; and, when ſhe found a peace neceſſary, they ſhould then only begin to think of war. And, after all, when by this unaccountable way of acting, they had brought themſelves into inextricable difficulties, they ſhould cry out, that they were deſerted, and endeavour to throw the odium and blame of it upon her. But that, nevertheleſs, ſhe would ſtill do for the four circles, as well as for the reſt of her allies, all that ſhe was obliged to by treaty, and whatever more they had, by their conduct, left in her power'. Both from this anſwer, and the late ſteps of the ſtates, it was generally believed, that the negotiations at Utrecht would ſpeedily be brought to a concluſion: But ſome unforeſeen difficulties, ſtarted by the court of France, made it neceſſary to renew the ceſſation of arms for four months longer; which was done by an agreement ſigned at London the 26th of November, and Verſailles the 14th of December, N. S.

[y] Thoſe readers, that deſire a larger account of what paſſed at Utrecht, may ſee it in the following particulars:

The plenipotentiaries of the four aſſociated circles of Germany laid, the ſame day, a propoſition before the Britiſh miniſters at Utrecht, wherein they repreſented, 'That they entered into the grand alliance, upon an invitation of king William, by a ſolemn treaty concluded at Nordlingen, and afterwards ratified by the preſent queen of Great-Britain. That the circles had, on their part, punctually performed all the conditions of that treaty, and had borne all the calamities of ſo bloody and ruinous a war at their own expence, without troubling her majeſty for one penny ſubſidy, with an entire confidence, that, as ſhe always declared her ſatisfaction with the firmneſs and conduct of the circles, her majeſty would not fail remembering the good ſervices they did the public; and that they ſhould reap the fruits of their labours, ſufferings, and expences: But that notwithſtanding her majeſty's gracious aſſurances, they heard with grief, that ſhe perſiſted in the opinion, that an univerſal peace might be made, without the circles enjoying the leaſt comfort or effect of their alliance; no amends, no barrier, no ſecurity; which would bring the utmoſt deſolation upon the circles, and leave a fatal remembrance to poſterity. Wherefore they made their addreſſes to the juſtice and goodneſs of her majeſty, to the wiſdom and equity of her miniſters, and to the generoſity and honour of the whole Engliſh nation, not to abandon ſo good and faithful allies, nor leave them in the miſerable condition, in which they had been plunged by former treaties'. To this repreſentation the Britiſh miniſters returned the following anſwer, 'That, if the aſſociated circles did not obtain all they deſired, and all her majeſty could wiſh them, the blame was by no means to be laid at her door: Firſt, becauſe, during the war, the empire had very much neglected the proſecution of it on that ſide; and the emperor and other princes and ſtates had been very deficient in furniſhing their reſpective quotas of troops, and other neceſſaries; which if they had

The marquiſs de Monteleone, appointed by king Philip to be one of his plenipotentiaries at Utrecht, being about this time come to London, and the queen returned from Windſor to St. James's, he had the next day a private audience, wherein he told her, 'That his maſter had ſent him to return her a thouſand thanks for the great pains ſhe had been pleaſed to take to procure peace to Europe. And that the whole Spaniſh nation in particular, owed their lives to her majeſty; for, had the war continued, there was not one true Spaniard, who would not have ſpent the laſt drop of his blood in his maſter's quarrel'. The queen thanked her brother, the king of Spain, for this compliment, and ſaid, 'She thought herſelf very happy in being able to contribute to the ſafety of ſo brave a nation, and ſo loyal a people'.

In the mean time, the queen being informed, that the electoral prince of Saxony was expected at Rome, in order to make there public profeſſion of the Popiſh religion, ſhe thought proper to renew her good offices with king Auguſtus, to perſuade him to recall his ſon out of Italy, and diſmiſs the Popiſh ſervants about him; and at the ſame time invited the king of Pruſſia, the elector of Hanover, and the ſtates-general, to join their efforts with her's to engage his Poliſh majeſty not to induce his ſon to change his religion. But all theſe endeavours were rendered fruitleſs by the powerful allurement offered by the Roman Catholics to engage the young prince, namely, the proſpect of a marriage between him and one of the archducheſſes, which would open him the way to the Imperial throne, in caſe the preſent emperor ſhould die without male iſſue.

The expreſs, ſent by count Zinzendorf to Vienna, with the queen's laſt plan of peace, being returned to Utrecht on the 3d of January, N. S. the emperor's

Soon after the ſigning of the barrier-treaty, the Pruſſian miniſters at Utrecht received advice, that their king, who for ſome time had been indiſpoſed, but afterwards was thought out of danger, had a relapſe, and his diſtemper increaſed to ſuch a degree, that on the 25th of February, about noon, he expired as he was ſpeaking to the prince his ſon, and ſome of his miniſters; having preſerved his ſenſes to the very laſt. He was in the fifty-ſixth year of his age, the twenty-fifth of his government, as elector of Brandenburgh, and the thirteenth of his reign as king of Pruſſia. Four days before his death he gave a ſignal inſtance of his compaſſion for the perſecuted Proteſtants of France, whom he recommended to the queen of Great-Britain's protection by a very moving and affectionate letter. He was a virtuous man, and full of zeal in the matters of religion. He raiſed above two hundred new churches in his dominions. He was weak and much in the power of his miniſters and flatterers; but was ſo apt to hearken to whiſpers, that he changed twice the whole ſet of his miniſtry. His aſſuming the title of a king, and his affecting an extraordinary magnificence in his court, brought a great charge on himſelf, and on all about him, which made him a ſevere maſter to himſelf, and ſet him on many pretenſions, chiefly thoſe relating to the prince of Friſeland, which were not thought well grounded. He was ſucceeded in his dignities by his only ſon, father of the late king of Pruſſia.

Though the treaty of peace was now almoſt concluded, yet the advantages, which Great-Britain was to expect from her endeavours to aſſiſt and ſupport the cauſe of France, were in a great meaſure unſettled and undetermined. France began to cavil, and, as lord Bolingbroke ſaid, go back from what the king had promiſed the queen; and his lordſhip could not be perſuaded, as he told Mr. Prior, 'That the French acted either fairly or wiſely. They preſs us, ſays he, to conclude, that they may have others at their mercy; and at the ſame time they chicane with us concerning the moſt eſſential article of all our treaty, and endeavour to elude an agreement made, repeated and confirmed'. The two great points of moment, in diſpute, were concerning the fiſhery at Newfound-peror's intentions. The ratifications of a treaty for the ſuſpenſion of arms between France and Spain on the one ſide, and Portugal on the other, were now exchanged, having been delivered into the hands of the Britiſh plenipotentiaries, who long before this time had little elſe to do in the congreſs, than to act as mediators. In this capacity they had, on the 8th, a long conference with the plenipotentiaries of France, in which they delivered to them the draught of a project for bringing the empreſs home from Barcelona, and withdrawing the Imperial troops out of Catalonia. On the 15th count Zinzendorf had a long conference with the Portugueſe miniſters, about the terms of peace offered by France to that crown, which the emperor did not entirely approve. The marſhal de Bicherſtein arriving at Utrecht, the 16th, from the court of Berlin, had a long conference with the earl of Strafford, by particular orders from the king of Pruſſia his maſter. The ſame day the miniſters of France were in conference with thoſe of Great-Britain; and the next day monſieur Buys was alſo with the Britiſh miniſters, by whoſe interpoſition the difference between monſieur Meſnager and count Rechteren was brought into a fair way of being accommodated, in order to the reſuming of the general conferences. There was alſo that day a conſultation at the biſhop of Briſtol's houſe, between the Proteſtant miniſters, about the abolition of the clauſe relating to religion in the fourth article of the treaty of Ryſwick, and the meaſures to be taken, that the Proteſtants in Sileſia and Hungary might, for the future, enjoy entire liberty of conſcience. The miniſters of Great-Britain preſſed this affair more earneſtly than all the reſt, and exclaimed againſt the Imperial court for perſecuting the Proteſtants of the empire and Hungary. But they ſpoke in a leſs vehement ſtile of the perſecutions, which the Proteſtants had ſuffered in France. Soon after the Britiſh plenipotentiaries conferred with the Imperial miniſters, who ſeemed at laſt inclined to come into the queen's meaſures for procuring a general peace. To that end, count Zinzendorf drew up ſome propoſals for ſetting on foot a negotiation between the Imperial and French miniſters, which were delivered to the latter by the lord privy-ſeal, who the next day acquainted that count and baron Kirchner, how far they had proceeded in that affair. The plenipotentiaries of Pruſſia had alſo a long conference with the Britiſh miniſters, in which they expreſſed their maſter's inclination to conclude a peace, whenever the queen ſhould think fit. On the other hand, the miniſters of Savoy returned thanks to the Britiſh plenipotentiaries on the behalf of their maſter, for the great care that had been taken of his intereſts; and gave aſſurances, that they were ready to concur in whatever ſteps the queen of Great-Britain ſhould judge proper for the bringing the peace to a happy concluſion.

All this while the miniſters of the Proteſtant powers continued their private conſultations about the abolition of the clauſe relating to religion, in the fourth article of the treaty of Ryſwick; and were very preſſing with the Roman Catholic miniſters on that affair. But the Imperial and French plenipotentiaries (agreed, perhaps, in this point only) found means to draw it out into length, referring it from the one to the other. The former pretended, it was the French inſerted that clauſe into the treaty, and therefore ought to get it aboliſhed: To which the French anſwered, 'That, it being an affair, which concerned the empire, it was the buſineſs of the Imperialiſts to look after it'. The Roman Catholic miniſters of the empire having demanded, that the Proteſtants ſhould, by a deputation, communicate to them the reſolution they had taken about that affair, the counts Wertheren and Metternich were named to repreſent to them the juſtice of aboliſhing that clauſe, and put them in mind of the diſputes, jealouſies, and other ill conſequences, with which it had been attended to the empire. Count Zinzendorf ſignified, he was ready to return them an anſwer on the part of the emperor; and a meeting being held for that purpoſe, he aſſured them, 'That his maſter did not intend to oppoſe the abolition of the clauſe, but would acquieſce in the relief that ſhould be given to the Proteſtants in a general treaty of peace'.

The ſame day the queen of Great-Britain's anſwer to the letter of the ſtates-general arrived at the Hague, but, being directed to her plenipotentiaries at Utrecht, was not brought to the aſſembly of the ſtates till the next day, when it was read there, and alſo in the aſſembly of the ſtates of the province of Holland, wherein were the following paragraphs:

'By the real and ſolid proofs we have given of our friendſhip for your State; by the continual efforts we have made to defeat the intrigues of thoſe who, either through private paſſion or intereſt, have endeavoured to divide you from us; and laſtly, by the grief we have been afflicted with, when any attempt has been made to break the good intelligence, that was between us and your republic, it will be eaſy for you to judge of the ſatisfaction, which your letter of the 29th paſt has given us.

'Our conduct has ever run upon the conſtant principle of a ſincere deſire of preſerving the balance of Europe, and to procure not only the ſafety, but alſo the augmentation of your ſtate.

'Your reſolution to enter with us into new engagements about the ſucceſſion and barrier, to make a new treaty thereupon, and to conclude and ſign it before the peace, cannot but be attended with the beſt conſequences. And, when all occaſions of diſpute about the reciprocal intereſts of the two nations ſhall be removed, we ſhall then be in a condition to concert with you the providing for thoſe of our allies, and to treat more effectually with the Potentates againſt whom we have made war.

'The declaration you have lately made, that you are 'reſolved to join with us', to enter into the meaſures we have taken for a peace, and to conclude and ſign it jointly, and at the ſame time with us, will, in ſome meaſure, make amends for the misfortunes, that have been occaſioned by the diſunion of the allies, and prevent thoſe that were to be feared for the future.

'We ſhall take your intereſts to heart equally with our own; and we ſhall be ready to do all that lies in our power to advance them, being ſorry, that we are not in a condition to ſupport both yours, and thoſe of our common allies, as effectually as we could have done the laſt ſpring. Done at our court at St. James's, the 18th of January, 1712-13, [N. S.]

ANNE REGINA'.

This letter quickened the pace of the negotiation; but, previous to the general conferences, it was abſolutely neceſſary, that the differences which had ſo long obſtructed them, ſhould be adjuſted; which, by the mediation of the Britiſh miniſters, was at laſt brought to paſs on the 29th of January in this manner: Three of the plenipotentiaries of the States, viz. monſieur Vanderduſſen, the baron de Renſwoude, and count de Kniphuyſen, went to the marſhal d'Uxelles's houſe; where, in the preſence of the three plenipotentiaries of France, they were to declare, that the diſpute between monſieur Meſnager and count de Rechteren had happened without the knowledge or approbation of the ſtates-general. But monſieur Vanderduſſen, who was the ſpokeſman, had ſcarce with gravity pronounced theſe words, Our maſters, the ſtates-general, when the marſhal d'Uxelles interrupted him, and told him, 'Sir, the king, my maſter, is thoroughly perſuaded, that meſſieurs the ſtates-general had no knowledge of monſieur de Rechteren's behaviour; and that they have too much reſpect for his majeſty to approve it'. This difficulty being removed, the Dutch plenipotentiaries went to the lord biſhop of Briſtol's houſe, where they were in conference with him and the earl of Strafford from eleven at night till between four and five the next morning, when the new treaty of barrier and ſucceſſion was ſigned by the miniſters of Great-Britain, and thoſe of the ſtates-general; and, about an hour after, Mr. Harriſon was ſent over to England with it, for her majeſty's ratification, and approbation of ſome explanations, that were inſerted by the Dutch plenipotentiaries. The next day, January the 31ſt, the emperor's plenipotentiaries had for the firſt time a private conference with thoſe of France at the biſhop of Briſtol's houſe, where an agreement was propoſed concerning the tranſporting of the empreſs, the evacuation of Catalonia, and the amneſty for the Catalans: ſo that all things ſeemed now to tend to a general peace.

On the 4th of February, N. S. the plenipotentiaries of France and Pruſſia met, for the firſt time, at the lord privy-ſeal's houſe, and the following days the miniſters of the emperor and the queen of Great-Britain had ſeveral conferences together, in which count Zinzendorf communicated a ſecond plan, which was ſaid to come very near the contents of the queen's ſpeech from the throne. The 9th, the plenipotentiaries of France were in conference with thoſe of Portugal, and afterwards with the miniſters of Savoy, at the houſe of the lord privy-ſeal. But the negotiations were for ſome days put to a ſtand by the ſudden departure of the abbot de Polignac, who the night between the 10th and 11th of February ſet out for the court of France, on pretence of his being lately named cardinal by the pope, at the recommendation, as was ſaid, of the chevalier de St. George. Before his departure, he received from the Britiſh plenipotentiaries, a propoſal of the emperor and empire, importing, 'That Catalonia ſhould be evacuated, upon condition, that the inhabitants had a full pardon, and a confirmation of all their privileges. That the elector of Bavaria ſhould have the title of king, but not the iſland of Sardinia; and that his electorate (but not the Upper Palatinate) ſhould be yielded to his electoral highneſs's ſon; ſo that he himſelf ſhould not ſet foot in the empire. That the electorate of Bavaria ſhould be the laſt of the nine. That Landau ſhould remain to the empire: And, in the laſt place, that France ſhould demoliſh Saar Louis, and ſeveral other places': Which monſieur de Polignac promiſed to lay before the king his maſter.

The plenipotentiaries of France had almoſt from the beginning of the negotiations demanded paſſports of the Dutch for the admiſſion of the duke of Oſſuna, the marquis de Monteleone, and the count de Bergheyck, to the congreſs, as plenipotentiaries of Philip V. king of Spain; which the ſtates-general had ſtill declined to grant, for fear of diſobliging the emperor, with whom it was their intereſt to keep firmly united. But the imperial miniſters having by this time conſented, in their maſter's name, to the evacuation of Catalonia, and neutrality in Italy, which was a kind of tacit acknowledgment of king Philip's title to the crown of Spain, and the Weſt-Indies; the ſtates-general, by the mediation of the Britiſh miniſters, were at laſt prevailed with to grant the paſſports. The paſſports, which the French plenipotentiaries demanded alſo for the electors of Cologne and Bavaria, were granted with leſs difficulty, and delivered to them about the middle of March.

The courier, ſent to the French court, being come back to Utrecht, the negotiation for evacuating Catalonia, and for a ceſſation of arms in Italy, was on the 19th of February ſet again on foot. On the 27th the Imperial and French miniſters were together in conference, in the preſence of the Britiſh, by whoſe mediation, they at laſt agreed upon the ſubject of evacuating Catalonia, and a convention was ordered to be drawn up for that purpoſe. On the ſecond of March, the miniſters of France and Savoy conferred about a convention for the neutrality in Italy. See Annals of Queen Anne.

land, and in what manner the ceſſion of Cape-Breton was to be made. The other was about the treaty of commerce. As to the firſt, it is to be obſerved, that, in the queen's inſtructions to the duke of Shrewſbury, he is directed to propoſe, as the queen's laſt reſolution, that ſhe will conſent to give and yield up to his moſt Chriſtian majeſty the entire poſſeſſion and propriety of the iſland of Cape-Breton; but with this expreſs condition, that his majeſty ſhall, on his part, in conſideration of the ſame, relinquiſh all manner of right to fiſhing and drying fiſh on the coaſt of Newfoundland, or any part, reſerved to his ſubjects by the articles ſigned at London the 27th of September, and 8th of October, 1711.

Several repreſentations were ſent backward and forward, ſhewing the fatal conſequences of what was demanded by France: And though lord Bolingbroke, in his letter to Mr. Prior of the 19th of January, 1712-13, inſiſted, that the queen had never yielded what France pretended to, which then remained an unſurmountable difficulty; yet, in his letter to the duke of Shrewſbury of the ſame date, he tells him, 'if the French cloſe with the overture he then made them with regard to the diſputes concerning commerce, the queen is willing to accept the laſt expedient, propoſed by monſieur de Torcy for adjuſting our differences about North America, and to conſent, that the king, in the ceſſion of Newfoundland, do reſerve to his ſubjects a right of fiſhing and drying on the coaſt of Newfoundland from Port Riche, North about, to Cape Bonaviſta'. And here no direction is given concerning Cape-Breton, of which the French got the entire ceſſion and propriety, altho', in the duke of Shrewſbury's inſtructions, it is declared, 'That the queen looked upon Cape-Breton to belong to her; and reckoned that iſland a part of the antient territory of Nova-Scotia, which is by this treaty reſtored to her'. But, if the duke could not prevail upon them to agree with him in the article of commerce, he was to declare, that neither would the queen agree with them in their propoſition concerning Newfoundland'. As to commerce, the great diſpute about it is thus repreſented in the lord Bolingbroke's letter to the duke of Shrewſbury: In Torcy's anſwer to lord Bolingbroke's memorial of the 24th of May, 1712, it was, among other things agreed, that Britain and France ſhould grant to the ſubjects of each reciprocally the ſame privileges and advantages, which they ſhall either of them grant to the ſubjects of any other nation whatſoever. Upon this foundation was eſtabliſhed the principle of treating and being treated as 'Gens Amiciſſima;' and purſuant to this principle, the tariff of 1664, which was granted to Holland (except the four ſpecies of merchandize) was likewiſe to be granted to England; and by the eighth and tenth articles of the project of the treaty of commerce it was ſo ſettled. But France, pretending now, that this tariff would be too beneficial to the Engliſh, refuſed to grant it, till another tariff ſhould be made in Great-Britain, exactly conformable to that of 1664, whereby the Britiſh duties ſhould be reduced as low as theirs were in France by that tariff. 'This (lord Bolingbroke in his letter to the duke of Shrewſbury ſays) is an open violation of faith; and by this (adds he) they are removing a corner ſtone, which was laid early in the foundation of a building brought almoſt to perfection; the fall whereof muſt prove at laſt of as fatal conſequence to them as to us' He confeſſes, 'I was ſtrangely ſurprized when I ſaw the precedent of the Ryſwick treaty quoted, to perſuade us to refer our commerce, as the Dutch then did theirs, to commiſſioners, to be treated of after ſigning the peace. The behaviour of the French on that occaſion has given us warning; and it is from thence we have learned, that whatever is referred, is given up; and they muſt have a mean opinion of thoſe, whom they would perſuade to purſue the ſame method to get the tariff of 1664, by which the Dutch then loſt it'. But it is very remarkable, that his lordſhip on the 24th of May, had himſelf propoſed, 'That, ſeveral points relating to commerce, requiring a longer diſcuſſion than that criſis would admit, commiſſaries ſhould be appointed to ſettle and adjuſt the differences'. Indeed, in his letter to the duke of Shrewſbury, he offers an expedient, which was to ſolve all the difficulties; and tells his grace, 'I am commanded to acquaint you, that, having fully opened to the French miniſters her majeſty's ſenſe of the king's engagements to her upon this head, you are to propoſe to them, to ſtrike out of the project of the treaty of commerce the ninth and tenth articles, and, inſtead thereof, inſert one to the effect of that, which I have drawn, and which comes here incloſed'. And as the acceptance of this amendment was to put an end to all differences, and, at the ſame time, gave ſuch ample advantages to France, the French readily agreed to it; and inſerted this article verbatim, as it was ſent in the treaty of commerce, which makes the ninth article of the treaty, as it now ſtands, and is the ſame, which was afterwards rejected by the parliament. And this article, which has ſince been ſo univerſally condemned, appears to be the work of the Engliſh miniſtry, and the price, for which they ſold to France the fiſhery of Newfoundland.

This treatment of France could not but give the miniſtry the greateſt uneaſineſs, though their apprehenſions, leſt the circumſtances they were in ſhould be known, far exceeded their concern at the diſappointment, which Great-Britain was like to meet with. They had ſigned a ſeparate treaty with France, in September 1711, upon this ſingle principle, that the intereſts of Great-Britain were in the firſt place to be adjuſted; and, as long as they had this to ſay, they were unconcerned at all other events. They had gone on for fourteen months together, and acted in every thing as the inſtruments of France, and were at laſt in danger of being diſavowed by France in the moſt eſſential part of all their treaty. One of the chief inducements and principal conditions, upon which the fatal ceſſation of arms was granted, was, that no privileges or advantages relating to commerce with France ſhall be yielded to any foreign nation, which ſhall not at the ſame time, be granted to the ſubjects of her Britannic majeſty; but France had now reaped the full benefit of the ſuſpenſion, and were at liberty to diſpute the principle of Gens Amiciſſima.

In theſe circumſtances were the Engliſh miniſtry in January 1712-13; and, to extricate themſelves, they gave up all points in diſpute in North America, and the fiſhery of Newfoundland, upon the ſingle conſideration of the ninth article of the treaty of commerce, which (as will be ſeen) the parliament, with a juſt indignation, rejected. However, to bring France to a compliance, even upon theſe conditions, the duke of Shrewſbury, in the ſame letter, was inſtructed to prevail with France to come to this reſolution, without the loſs of one moment's time. The parliament was ſuddenly to meet; and it would be neceſſary for the queen to communicate to both houſes the preſent ſtate of the negotiation. The duke is then to repreſent to Torcy, 'How ſmoothly every thing would glide along, if the queen was able to ſpeak of her own intereſts as abſolutely determined with France; and, on the other hand, what travels we ſhall be expoſed to, and what confuſion may ariſe, if our negotiation appears to be ſtill open, and if the ſecret comes to be divulged, that France refuſes to make good in the treaty the full effect of former promiſes to the queen'. His lordſhip having finiſhed what he had to ſay concerning her majeſty's particular intereſts, he proceeds upon the general plan of peace, and inſtructs the duke what he was to inform the French miniſters would be the meaſure of her majeſty's conduct, and what they might expect from her. 'That as the French miniſters deſire, that the queen would precipitate the concluſion of her peace, and leave all the confederacy at their mercy; they muſt be told, that, when the mutual intereſts of France and England are ſettled, as they will be, if the propoſitions contained in the firſt part of this letter are accepted, the plenipotentiaries of Great-Britain ſhall publickly declare in the congreſs, that they are ready to ſign with thoſe of France, and ſhall call upon the allies to quicken the negotiations, and conclude without loſs of time. But, if they ſeek unneceſſary delays, or make unreaſonable demands, her majeſty, who had induced them to treat, will, by the ſame meaſures, engage them to conclude, or at leaſt ſhe will ſign without them. And, the queen having once declared her intereſts to be ſettled, and her treaty ready to be ſigned, the general peace becomes from that moment ſure, and the remainder of the negotiation eaſy. It is therefore wiſe for the French to comply with her majeſty'.

The great diſtraction the miniſtry was in, appears ſufficiently from this long letter of lord Bolingbroke's to the duke of Shrewſbury; but ſtill more, from two letters written by him about this time, and upon this ſubject, to Mr. Prior; one of January the 19th, the other of the 22d, O. S. The firſt was of the ſame date as his letter to the duke, wherein he ſays to Mr. Prior, 'I have exhauſted all my ſtock of arguments in the long letter, which, by the queen's order, I write to the duke of Shrewſbury. To you I can only add, we ſtand upon the brink of a precipice, but the French ſtand there too. Pray tell monſieur de Torcy, from me, that he may get Robin and Harry hanged; but affairs will ſoon run back into ſo much confuſion, that he will wiſh us alive again. To ſpeak ſeriouſly, unleſs the queen can talk of her intereſts as determined with France; and unleſs your court will keep our allies in the wrong, as they are ſufficiently at this time, I foreſee inextricable difficulties. My ſcheme is this: Let France ſatisfy the queen; and let the queen immediately declare to her parliament, and in the congreſs, that ſhe is ready to ſign; and, at the ſame time, let the French plenipotentiaries ſhew a diſpoſition to conclude with all the allies'. And then he enumerates the ſeveral offers, which he would have France to make to the ſeveral allies; and, though theſe were very general and inſufficient, he ſays, if ſuch overtures as theſe (made to the allies) were not inſtantly accepted, our ſeparate peace would, the parliament ſitting, be addreſſed for, and approved; and the cauſe of France, for once, become popular in Britain. If they were accepted, let monſieur de Torcy ſit down, and conſider what a bargain would be made for France. Let him remember his journey to the Hague, and compare the plans of 1709 and 1712. Monſieur de Torcy has a confidence in you: Make uſe of it once for all upon this occaſion, and convince him thoroughly, that we muſt give a different turn to our parliament and our people, according to their reſolution at this criſis'. The next letter from lord Bolingbroke to Mr. Prior, was upon the ſame ſubject, and of the ſame ſtrain: 'We are now (ſays he) at the true criſis of our diſeaſe: We die at once, or recover at once. Let France depart from that ſhameful expedient by which they thought to bubble us out of the advantages, which they had ſolemnly yielded, and all is well; otherwiſe, by God, both they and we are undone. The queen can neither delay the meeting of the parliament longer than the 3d, nor ſpeak to the houſes till we hear from you. My compliments to monſieur de Torcy. Let him know, that, if they do not agree with the queen, I may, perhaps, be a refugee. If I am I promiſe beforehand to behave myſelf better in France, than the French refugees do here. Make the French aſhamed of their ſneaking chicane. By Heaven, they treat like pedlars, or, which is worſe, like attornies'.

As all theſe public tranſactions paſſed through the hands of lord Bolingbroke, who, although he was ſecretary of ſtate, acted extra-provincially in all his correſpondence with France; ſo it appears, at the ſame time that he was not the only perſon in the ſecret, but that a greater influence chiefly directed and governed all theſe councils; and the lord-treaſurer was in this tranſaction, as well as in the affair of Tournay, the chief conductor; as may very reaſonably be concluded from ſeveral letters, which Mr. Prior wrote about this time to his lordſhip, though that gentleman did not think fit to produce afterwards to the Committee of Secrecy, one letter from his lordſhip to him. It is obſerved, that theſe letters to the lord-treaſurer were chiefly wrote on the ſame days, that Mr. Prior ſent diſpatches to the ſecretaries of ſtate, giving an account of his proceedings, and deſiring the queen's directions upon them; but, it ſeems, he did not think that ſufficient, without knowing his lordſhip's particular pleaſure upon them. Mr. Prior's diſpatch to the ſecretary's office, giving a full account of the preſent ſtate of the treaty, together with ſeveral papers, memorials, and propoſitions relating to the points in diſpute, and concerning commerce and North-America, is dated December 28, 1712. The day after Mr. Prior wrote to the lord-treaſurer, and told him, 'I have written a book inſtead of a letter to my lord Bolingbroke, which I deſire your lordſhip would be pleaſed to run over, that, knowing what I have done, you may honour me with your commands as to what I am to do'. He hoped his propoſal about Newfoundland, which he ſends his lordſhip incloſed, was ſuch as may terminate that affair to our advantage; and, if his lordſhip was of the ſame opinion, he ſhould have entire ſatisfaction.

On the 8th of January, 1712-13, Mr. Prior, having ſent another full account in form to the ſecretary of ſtate, wrote the ſame day to the lord-treaſurer, that he had been in conference with the French miniſters, to adjuſt the points undecided between her majeſty and the king of France; that he had ſent lord Bolingbroke the reſult of thoſe conferences, as well what was agreed to by the French miniſters, as his own remarks upon each particular head, and ſays, 'I hope your lordſhip will find the whole adjuſted ſo far to your ſatisfaction, as that our plenipotentiaries may receive their final orders. I will not doubt but the whole affair of Newfoundland is adjuſted to your deſire. There were ſome points inſiſted upon by our plenipotentiaries, which the miniſters here thought very unreaſonable; and to ſay a truth to my lord-treaſurer plainly, which I a little mitigate to my lord Bolingbroke, I think not very reaſonable'. He then gives an account that Torcy was ſurprized that the Dutch had but in part complied with what the earl of Strafford declared to them to be her majeſty's reſolutions, to which he hopes the queen will ſend ſuch an anſwer, as may cut off all delays; and, upon this occaſion, Mr. Prior ſays to the lord-treaſurer, 'This I only write to your lordſhip, it being a thing, that ſhould not be called in council; and I have promiſed that the king ſhould have her majeſty's anſwer upon it, as he deſires'. January 19, 1712-13, N. S. Mr. Prior writes again to the lord-treaſurer, and acquaints him, 'That the duke of Shrewſbury now ſends to lord Bolingbroke the ſubſtance of their laſt conferences with monſieur de Torcy, upon the ſubject of Newfoundland; to which I take leave to add, that your friend Torcy is in the laſt concern to find the duke's inſtructions ſo ſtrict in a point, which cannot be given up by France, at a time, when we well hoped that difference was adjuſted. Pray, my lord, let us have your diſtinct and poſitive orders hereupon by the firſt. I ſend your lordſhip incloſed a copy of my letter to my lord Bolingbroke; and the duke of Shrewſbury deſires, that he may have your orders to finiſh. I believe Torcy writes himſelf to you'. On the 23d of the ſame month, N. S. Mr. Prior writes once more to the lord-treaſurer, and tells him, 'I have already wrote ſo amply to your lordſhip on the two great points of Newfoundland, and the tariff of 1664; and ſo expect daily your laſt orders upon theſe two points, that I will not trouble you at preſent further than to ſay, if theſe two are ſettled, the peace may be determined here to-morrow, and ſent the next day to Utrecht to be ſigned'. And, on the 2d of February, Mr. Prior writes to his lordſhip, 'If I deſire you to write to me, it is, becauſe I really think it for the queen's ſervice, that in this great poſt, where you have put me, I may be able to ſay, I have the immediate commands of my lord-treaſurer; and, in regard to that friendſhip, with which you have ſo publickly honoured me, and which, by the bye, does all the buſineſs here'. And, on February the 4th, 'I ſhall direct myſelf as you ſhall be pleaſed to inſtruct me privately'.

If the Committee of Secrecy had found among the papers delivered by Mr. Prior, the lord-treaſurer's anſwers to theſe letters, it is highly probable, that it would have appeared from them, how far the giving up the fiſhery of Newfoundland, and the accepting of the ninth article of the treaty of commerce, was owing to his immediate orders. It ſeems however to be a very extraordinary proceeding, that the queen's miniſters in France acting by her authority, and under her inſtructions, ſhould apply to the lord-treaſurer for his diſtinct and poſitive orders to releaſe them from the queen's poſitive inſtructions, becauſe they are thought by the French miniſters to be too ſtrict. And if it be a doubt by whoſe order or advice it was procured, ſo much is certain, that theſe applications had their deſired effect; and the Newfoundland fiſhery was given up; and the advantages, which Great-Britain was to receive from being treated upon the foot of 'Gens Amiciſſima', were all buried in the ninth article of the treaty of commerce.

The difficulties relating to North America and commerce being in this manner determined, France was wholly intent upon concluding and ſigning with Great-Britain, without taking in the reſt of the allies; and in this they had the good fortune to have the concurrence and aſſiſtance of the Britiſh miniſtry. By good management the diſpute raiſed at Utrecht had been ſo ordered that the miniſters of the allies could not obtain any conference with thoſe of France, till the points in difference were adjuſted between England and France; by which means it was February 1712-13, before the Dutch and French were ſuffered to meet. And, it being now the buſineſs of France to conclude with England ſeparately, the temper the French plenipotentiaries appeared in, made all buſineſs ſo impracticable, that the Britiſh plenipotentiaries were under a neceſſity of complaining of it to lord Bolingbroke, and to acquaint him, February 3, 1712-13: 'The French appear ſo very uncomplying in every point debated, and ſo very froward and poſitive in their refuſal of a great many things, which the Dutch took to be granted and ſettled, as well by her majeſty's ſpeech, as the declarations lately made by lord Strafford, that the diſappointment they met with, put them into the greateſt conſternation. Reaſon was alſo given us to participate in theſe diſcontents, and to regard ſeveral things, which appear contrary to what her majeſty has declared, as very unfair; Yet all that could be ſaid, prevailed not'. But it is not ſurprizing that the inſtances of the Britiſh plenipotentiaries had ſo little effect with the French, who then expected, that orders ſhould be ſent to the Britiſh miniſters immediately to ſign the peace, which, according to their expectation, were ſent February 20, 1712-13, by Mr. St. John, brother to the lord Bolingbroke, to conclude and ſign with France as ſoon as the duke of Shrewſbury ſhould ſend them advice, that the propoſitions he was to make at the French court were accepted; and, on the 28th, lord Bolingbroke with the utmoſt joy acquainted them, 'That he had received from the duke of Shrewſbury the expected returns, and which he doubted not would have reached their lordſhips. He had therefore, without ſtaying to enter into any other detail, diſpatched a courier to them, to renew thoſe inſtructions, which he hoped were clearly enough ſignified in thoſe papers, which his brother carried. He acquaints them, that the duke of Shrewſbury had declared, that their lordſhips had orders, in caſe the French complied, as they now actually have done, to ſign her majeſty's peace with France without farther delay; and that his grace had alſo declared, that in this caſe her majeſty would open the parliament, by the telling them, ſhe had made a peace with France. Theſe two conſiderations, his lordſhip ſays, were perhaps the moſt prevalent inducements to the French court, to come roundly into her majeſty's propoſitions; and the queen thinks herſelf, for this reaſon, ſtill the more obliged punctually and religiouſly to fulfil theſe promiſes. The latter ſhe will herſelf perform on Tueſday; and the former, it is her poſitive command, that your lordſhips make good as faſt as the neceſſary forms of preparing and executing the inſtruments will allow. And his lordſhip looking upon it now, that the chief difficulties, relating to the treaty of peace, were removed; as likewiſe in the treaty of commerce, by the article drawn by himſelf, and propoſed by the duke of Shrewſbury, he gives them poſitive orders, without any delay, to execute the treaties of peace and commerce between Great-Britain and France'. On the 7th, and on the 20th of March, O. S. lord Bolingbroke repeats theſe poſitive orders, and inſiſts, that the peace ſhould be concluded with that precipitation, which her majeſty would have uſed.

The court of France, being acquainted with theſe good diſpoſitions of the Engliſh miniſtry, thought proper now to comply with the duke of Shrewſbury's demand, that the dukes of Berry and Orleans ſhould make a ſolemn renunciation to the crown of Spain in the parliament of Paris, in like manner as king Philip had renounced the crown of France in the cortez of Spain. This was ſolemnly done on the 15th of March; and, at the ſame time, were eraſed out of the regiſters of the parliament the letters patent, by which the rights of the king of Spain to the crown of France were preſerved, when he ſet out for Madrid. It will be neceſſary now to turn a little to the affairs of the North.

The favourable turn, which towards the end of the year 1712, attended the Swediſh affairs, both in the north of Germany and in Turky, as it preſaged new dangers to the empire, and made the ſtates and the emperor uneaſy, was, no doubt, a powerful motive to incline them to hearken to the inſtances of the Britiſh miniſters, to come into the queen's meaſures. The Muſcovites, Danes, and Saxons, who miſcarried in their deſign to reduce Pomerania in the year 1711, ſeemed confident to have taken ſuch meaſures in 1712, as to be able to drive the Swedes from their territories on this ſide the Baltic: But their not going into the field ſo ſoon as they intended, proved the cauſe of their diſappointment. The Muſcovites and Saxons had undertaken to conquer Pomerania; but through the miſunderſtanding of their generals (ſome being for the ſiege of Stralſund, others of Stetin, and others again for the attack of the iſle of Rugen) the whole campaign was ſpent in fruitleſs debates, and all that the Czar and king Auguſtus could do at laſt, was, to quarter their troops in Pomerania, as they had done the year before, in order to keep the Swedes in awe.

The king of Denmark made a better uſe of his time, he beſieged and took Staden, and reduced the duchy of Bremen. After which, upon ſlight pretenſions, he obliged the city of Hamburgh to pay him three hundred thouſand crowns, which proved a ſeaſonable ſupply to ſubſiſt his troops. The northern allies ſeeming contented with theſe ſucceſſes, had ſent their troops into quarters, when an unexpected motion of the Swedes obliged them once more to take the field. Count Steenbock, who ſome time before was arrived in the iſland of Rugen, being ſenſible of the impoſſibility of ſubſiſting his forces in the narrow compaſs of land he was poſſeſſed of, reſolved to look for quarters in the country of Mecklenburgh; and ſucceeded in his deſign without the loſs of a man. The northern confederates reſolved to draw their forces from their lines, in order to oblige the Swediſh general to return into Pomerania, where they knew he could not maintain his army. But when it was generally expected, that both armies were ready to engage, a ceſſation of arms, for fifteen days, was on a ſudden concluded between the Poliſh and Swediſh generals. This ſuſpenſion expiring, the troops were all again in motion. The king of Denmark, who appeared againſt the truce, marched five days before from Holſtein towards Mecklenburgh, in order to join his allies, and endeavour to fight the Swedes. But count Steenbock, with great foreſight, reſolved to prevent, and engage the Danes, before they were reinforced; which he did near Gadeſbuſh, where the Daniſh troops and ſome Saxon cavalry ſuffered almoſt a total defeat. The Swediſh general was not wanting to improve this ſucceſs; and entering Holſtein, not only raiſed great contributions, but, in a barbarous manner, and upon frivolous pretences, burnt the Daniſh open town of Altena near Hamburgh. At the ſame time the Swedes were animated by reports from Conſtantinople, of the war being like to break out again between the Turks and the Czar, on pretence, that the Czar had not performed one of the moſt eſſential articles of the late peace, namely, the withdrawing of his forces from the territories of Poland. This new rupture was attended with the diſgrace of the grand vizir, who was the third Turkiſh miniſter of that rank, who fell a ſacrifice to the intrigues of the king of Sweden, and of thoſe, who ſupported his intereſt at the Ottoman Porte. The king of Sweden had all the aſſiſtance the French could give him in ſoliciting this war, which gave the emperor great apprehenſions. He was afraid diſorders in Hungary might follow upon it, which would defeat the meaſures he had taken to ſettle matters in that kingdom, ſo that, being ſafe on that ſide, he might turn his whole force againſt France, and, by that means, encourage the States to continue the war. Thoſe in Holland, who preſſed the accepting the offers that France made them, repreſented that as a thing not poſſible to be ſupported: The promiſes of the emperor and the princes of the empire had ſo often failed them, that they ſaid, they could not be relied on: And the diſtractions in the north made them apprehend, that thoſe princes might be obliged to recall their troops, which were in the ſervice of the ſtates.

The ſudden and unexpected proſperity of the king of Sweden ſoon came to an end. Whilſt he was uſing all poſſible means to engage the Turk into a new war with the Czar, the party at the Porte, that oppoſed it, ſtudied to get rid of him and his importunities. By his intractable obſtinacy he threw himſelf into great dangers. Orders were ſent him to march back into his kingdom: and they undertook to procure him a ſafe paſſage to it; but he treated the perſon that was ſent with this meſſage, with great inſolence, and fortified himſelf, as well as he could, with the Swedes that were about him, and reſolved to defend himſelf. A force much ſuperior to his, was brought againſt him; but he maintained himſelf ſo reſolutely in his houſe, that ſome hundreds of thoſe who attacked him were killed: The Turks, upon that, ſet fire to the houſe, whereupon he was forced to ſurrender, and was put under a guard; and moſt of his Swedes were ſold for ſlaves: he was carried to a houſe near Adrianople, but not ſuffered to come to court; only the ſultan diſowned the violence uſed to his perſon. In the mean while, the Czar ſhipped an army from Peterſburgh, that landed in Finland: The Swedes were not able to ſtand before him; every place, as he advanced, ſubmitted to him; and he was now maſter of Abo, the capital of Finland, and of that whole province. Steenbock, with his army, maintained himſelf in Tonningen, as long as their proviſion laſted: But, all ſupplies, being carefully ſtopped, he was forced at laſt to deliver up himſelf, and his army priſoners of war; and theſe were the beſt troops the Swedes had, ſo that Sweden was ſtruck with a general conſternation.

Though the plenipotentiaries at Utrecht had received ſuch poſitive orders from lord Bolingbroke to ſign the peace, the behaviour of the French was ſo different from what had been promiſed, that they were mightily perplexed, and ſcrupled to ſign a ſeparate treaty. They wrote to the lord Bolingbroke, 'That they could ſay a great deal to juſtify their cautious proceedings with the French; and were ſatisfied he would be of the ſame opinion if he were to ſee their way of negotiating with all the allies; and how hard it was for the Britiſh miniſters to obtain, what to his lordſhip ſeemed impoſſible the French ſhould make any difficulty to grant'. What made them ſtill more averſe, was the great importunity, with which the French preſſed them to conclude with them alone, of which they apprehended the conſequences at home; and, to juſtify themſelves, they had acquainted the duke of Shrewſbury, in a letter of March 20, That, beſides other conſiderations, their chief objection was, that though they had orders to ſign a particular peace, yet their full powers under the great-ſeal, only authorized them to negotiate, agree, and conclude the conditions of a good and general peace, agreeable to the intereſts of all and each of the allies. The lord Bolingbroke in his letter of the 20th of March, O. S. pretended, that, 'he had not ſagacity enough to find the objections the plenipotentiaries had made to their firſt full powers',

However, for their ſatisfaction he ſent them a new commiſſion, and repeated to them poſitive orders to ſign and conclude with France. By this new commiſſion, he tells them they had a power, as before, to treat and conclude the conditions of a good and general peace, which, as his lordſhip explained, 'was no more than to offer, jointly with the miniſters of France, the plan of a general peace to the allies'. But the difficulties of the plenipotentiaries made the lord treaſurer, who never failed to exert himſelf, when it was abſolutely neceſſary, think it high time to interpoſe his authority; and accordingly, on the 31ſt of March, he wrote to the earl of Strafford in this manner: I muſt felicitate your excellency upon the ſucceſs of all your zeal, and the true love you have ſhewn to your queen, your country, and the repoſe of all Europe. The remaining danger is, leſt we ſhould ſuffer ſhipwreck in the ſight of port. The nation here are five hundred to one for peace. The warriors are driven from their out-works; the laſt retrenchment they have is delay; and I muſt ſay, this operates much here. The ferment begins to work; and it will be impoſſible to anſwer for the turn the houſe of commons will take, if theſe delays provoke them farther. They all feel how many hundred thouſand pounds this needleſs protraction coſts them. We now maintain forty-nine thouſand effective men by land, and thirty-thouſand, within a trifle, by ſea. In the mean time the merchants lie off, and will not come into port. The amuſement of ſtories invented by the faction, and the correſpondence and encouragement that party gives to their friends to hold out, and to wait for ſome unhappy accident, that may unravel all which is done: Add to this, the ill-humour which will grow in members by being kept ſo long in town idle; and, in one word, all, that has been unſettled for many days, is not worth one day's charge England is at extraordinarily by this delay. I find this ſeems to be the prevailing univerſal opinion here; and that France has acquitted herſelf. The only ſtop is now at Utrecht'. But this ſtop did not now remain long; and, as the treaſurer never yet appeared in vain, all further obſtructions at Utrecht were after this ſoon removed [z]. For on the 7th of April, N. S. the Britiſh miniſters declared to the Dutch and Imperial plenipotentiaries, that they were ready, as well as the plenipotentiaries of ſome other princes, to ſign their reſpective treaties on Tueſday the 11th of that month. The plenipotentiaries of the emperor immediately declared, that neither they, nor the miniſters of the empire, were ready to ſign the treaty; nor would they hearken to peace, without the reſtitution of Straſburgh; adding, that they were ordered to make ſuch a proteſtation againſt ſuch a treaty of peace. The miniſters of the ſtates deputed three members of their body, Randwyck, Vanderduſſen, and Renſwoude, to go to the Hague, to receive new inſtructions on this important affair. They arrived there Sunday morning, and, after having conferred with the penſionary, had a conference with the deputies of the ſtates. The penſionary communicated the ſame day to the ſtates of Holland and Weſt-Frieſeland what had been tranſacted at Utrecht; whereupon the ſtates declared for peace. The deputies of the ſtates had a ſecond conference with their plenipotentiaries, and the next morning their laſt orders were drawn up, and communicated to the ſtates of Holland, who having approved the ſame, the plenipotentiaries ſet out in the evening for Utrecht, with the character of ambaſſadors, accompanied by monſieur Van Spanbroeck, the new plenipotentiary of the province of Zealand, in the room of monſieur Moermont. Count Zinzendorf, who came the 10th in the morning from Utrecht to the Hague, had immediately a conference with the penſionary, in which he uſed all imaginable endeavours to have the ſigning of the peace put off, at leaſt till he had received new inſtructions from Vienna, and declared, that if the ſtates ſigned before his maſter, his Imperial majeſty would immediately withdraw his troops out of the Netherlands: But, finding his reaſons and repreſentations ineffectual, he proteſted againſt this peace, as he had done before at Utrecht, whither he returned that evening. The ſame day in the morning, upon the return of meſſieurs Randwyck, Vanderduſſen, and Renſwoude, the Dutch miniſters had a conference with the Britiſh plenipotentiaries; and then another with thoſe of France, at the lord Privy-Seal's houſe, from four in the afternoon till two in the night, wherein was ſettled whatever related to the treaty of peace and commerce with the ſtates-general. The 11th in the morning the miniſters of the Proteſtant allies had a conference together in the town-houſe, to which the marquis de Miremont, appointed by the queen of Great-Britain, to take care of the intereſts of the Proteſtants of France, was, for form ſake, invited; but the reſult of this conſultation was only, that a repreſentation ſhould be made in favour of thoſe ſufferers to the miniſters of France, which was immediately laid before them by the Britiſh plenipotentiaries. This done, they went to count Zinzendorf's, and communicated to him the plan, which they had agreed on with the miniſters of France, for the emperor and empire; having ſtipulated, that his Imperial majeſty ſhould have time to conſider, whether he would accept of it, or no, till the firſt of June, N. S. during which interval, however, France would not grant a ceſſation of arms; and withal declared to him, that they were going to ſign the queen's peace. After this, the Britiſh plenipotentiaries went to the other miniſters of the allies, to whom they made the ſame declaration; and, being returned to the lord privy-ſeal's houſe, the French ambaſſadors repaired thither, and about two in the afternoon ſigned, with thoſe of Great-Britain, the treaties of peace and commerce. One inſtrument of the treaty was drawn up in Latin by the Britiſh miniſters; and another, on the part of the French, in their own language; each party ſigning firſt, in their reſpective inſtruments: And it was agreed, that the ratifications ſhould be exchanged at Utrecht within four weeks. The miniſters of Savoy, who ſoon after came to the lord privy-ſeal's houſe, ſigned alſo with thoſe of France their maſter's treaty, which was drawn up in French, and by which it was particularly ſtipulated, 'That his royal highneſs ſhould not take upon him the title of king of Sicily, till after the peace was concluded and ſigned with Spain'. This done, all the ambaſſadors, who had ſigned the peace, as well as thoſe, who intended to ſign it, namely, thoſe of Portugal, Pruſſia, and the States-general, went and dined at the earl of Strafford's. As ſoon as dinner was over, moſt of thoſe miniſters retired to their houſes, to collate their reſpective treaties; and, afterwards returning to the earl of Strafford's, the Portugueſe ambaſſadors ſigned their treaty, drawn up in their own tongue, about eight o'clock in the evening, as the Pruſſians did theirs in French about eleven; the French having inſiſted, that they ſhould ſign before thoſe of the States, becauſe, in the treaty, their maſter was ſtiled king, and acknowledged as ſuch by France. The ambaſſadors of the States did not ſign till near three hours after, having not only been taken up longer than the reſt in collating their treaties of peace and commerce, but endeavoured to have ſome expreſſions altered, particularly as to the title of the emperor, who, in the inſtruments drawn up in French, was not ſtiled otherwiſe than head of the houſe of Auſtria; but they were obliged to recede from all their pretenſions. This important negotiation being thus brought to a concluſion, the Britiſh miniſters immediately diſpatched an expreſs to Mr. St. John, ſecretary to the Britiſh ambaſſy, who, the day before, ſet out for the Brill, in order to carry over to Great-Britain the treaties of peace and commerce, for the queen's ratification. At the ſame time, the French miniſters diſpatched a courier to monſieur de Beringhen, who ſet out the 10th for Malines, in order to wait there the news of the ſigning of the peace. The other miniſters diſpatched alſo expreſſes to their reſpective courts. The States-general ſent copies of the treaties to the reſpective provinces, as they did likewiſe to the towns of the province of Holland in particular. But when the terms of peace were divulged, the body of the people was highly diſſatisfied to find, that woollen manufactures, ſugars, and ſome other merchandizes were excepted from the tariff of 1664, and continued charged with high duties; being apprehenſive, that by theſe exceptions, their trade with Spain, which ſets all the other branches of their commerce in motion, would in a manner be ruined.

On the 13th of April, count Zinzendorf having declared to the miniſters of Great-Britain, and of the ſtates-general, that he was to ſet out two days after for Germany, the Britiſh plenipotentiaries, on the 14th, delivered to him a writing intitled, 'Offers and demands of the French king, for making peace with the houſe of Auſtria and the empire'. The Imperial and other German miniſters expreſſed the higheſt indignation at their being ſo meanly treated, as to have terms impoſed upon them by France, in relation to the electors of Cologne and Bavaria. They alſo reſented the ſlight put upon the emperor by the French and Spaniards refuſing to give him that title; and they were particularly diſſatisfied with the Dutch for ſigning, before the return of the expreſs ſent laſt to Vienna. But the Dutch excuſed themſelves, alledging the common plea of the neceſſity of affairs. It was now given out, that the emperor and the empire would carry on the war, and hazard their all, rather than ſubmit to theſe conditions. And, as France might turn all her force againſt Germany, count Zinzendorf intimated to the miniſters of the empire, that it would be neceſſary to cauſe, not only the Imperial troops to march from Flanders to the Rhine, but alſo thoſe formerly in the pay of Great-Britain. To this purpoſe it may be obſerved, that the king of Pruſſia ſigned the peace only in that quality, and not as an elector of the empire, though it was ſaid, he made a private agreement with France, to furniſh no more troops than his quota, in caſe the emperor and empire ſhould continue the war.

[z] It is obſervable, that among all the demands that were made, upon account of any prince or ſtate in the grand alliance, none, at this time, met with the leaſt regard from the Britiſh court; when, at the ſame time, the intereſt of the princeſs Urſini, who, at this juncture, had a prevailing influence at the court of Madrid, was eſpouſed in the ſtrongeſt terms. For, in the ſame letter, where the lord Bolingbroke ſays, 'That her majeſty did not much enter into the notion of the degradation of Hanover, as a matter of any importance'; his lordſhip declares, 'That the principality, in ſome part of the Spaniſh Netherlands, with a revenue of thirty thouſand crowns, demanded for the princeſs Urſini, muſt be made to the emperor, and all parties concerned, a condition, ſine qua non, of the general peace'. Rep. of the Com. of Secr.

On the 3d of April, being Good-Friday, Mr. St. John arrived at Whitehall with the treaties of peace and commerce, ſigned the Tueſday before between the Britiſh and French plenipotentiaries, and the news, that the miniſters of Portugal, Savoy, Pruſſia, and the States-general, had likewiſe ſigned their reſpective treaties; which was immediately notified in the evening by popular rejoicings. Four days after, the queen held a council at St. James's, in which the lord keeper Harcourt was declared lord-high chancellor of Great-Britain; and at the ſame time the duke of Athol was ſworn of the privy-council. This done, the queen propoſed to the board the ratifying the treaties of peace and commerce: To which the earl of Cholmondeley objected, ſaying, 'This matter being of the higheſt importance for her majeſty and her kingdoms, as well as all Europe, it required the matureſt conſideration; and theſe treaties containing ſeveral terms of the civil law, in which the leaſt equivocation might be of great conſequence, and being, beſides, couched in Latin and French, it ſeemed very neceſſary to have them tranſlated into the vulgar tongue'. He was ſupported by another member, but, the time agreed on for the exchanging of the ratifications not admitting of delays, their opinion was over-ruled, and ſo the queen ratified the treaties. The next day the white-ſtaff, as treaſurer of the houſehold, was taken from the earl of Cholmondeley, and Sir Richard Temple was removed from his command of the regiment of dragoons, formerly commanded by the earl of Eſſex. The peace being thus ſigned and ratified, the queen reſolved not to defer any longer the meeting of the parliament. Accordingly on the 9th of April, to which day it was laſt prorogued, ſhe went to the houſe of peers and made the following ſpeech to both houſes:

My lords and gentlemen,

"I Ended the laſt ſeſſion with my hearty thanks for the ſolemn aſſurances you had given me, by which I have been enabled to overcome the difficulties contrived to obſtruct the general peace.

"I have deferred opening the ſeſſion until now, being very deſirous to communicate to you, at your firſt meeting, the ſucceſs of this important affair. It is therefore, with great pleaſure, I tell you, the treaty is ſigned, and in a few days the ratifications will be exchanged.

"The negotiation has been drawn into ſo great a length, that all our allies have had ſufficient opportunity to adjuſt their ſeveral intereſts. Though the public charge has been thereby much increaſed, yet I hope my people will be eaſy under it, ſince we have happily obtained the end we propoſed.

"What I have done for ſecuring the Proteſtant Succeſſion, and the perfect friendſhip there is between Me and the houſe of Hanover, may convince ſuch, who wiſh well to both, and deſire the quiet and ſafety of their country, how vain all attempts are to divide us; and thoſe, who would make a merit by ſeparating our intereſts, will never attain their ill ends.

Gentlemen of the Houſe of Commons,

"As great a progreſs has been made in reducing the public expence, as the circumſtances of affairs would admit.

"What force may be neceſſary for ſecuring our commerce by ſea, and for guards and garriſons, I leave entirely to my parliament.

"Make yourſelves ſafe, and I ſhall be ſatisfied.

"Next to the protection of the Divine Providence, I depend upon the loyalty and affection of my people.

"I want no other guaranty.

"I recommend to your care thoſe brave men, who have ſerved well, by ſea or land, this war, and cannot be employed in time of peace.

"I deſire you to provide the ſupplies you ſhall judge requiſite; and to give ſuch diſpatch, as may be neceſſary for your own eaſe and the public ſervice.

My lords and gentlemen,

The many advantages, I have obtained for my own ſubjects, have occaſioned much oppoſition and long delay to this peace.

"It affords me great ſatisfaction, that my people will have it in their power, by degrees, to repair what they have ſuffered during ſo long and burdenſome a war.

"The eaſing of our foreign trade, as far as is conſiſtent with national credit, will deſerve your care.

"And to think of proper methods for improving and encouraging our home trade and manufactures, particularly the fiſhery, which may be carried on, to employ all our ſpare hands, and be a mighty benefit, even to the remoteſt parts of this kingdom.

"Several matters were laid before you laſt ſeſſion, which the weight and multiplicity of other buſineſs would not permit you to perefct. I hope you will take a proper opportunity to give them a due conſideration.

"I cannot, however, but expreſsly mention my diſpleaſure at the unparalleled licentiouſneſs in publiſhing ſeditious and ſcandalous libels.

"The impunity, ſuch practices have met with, encourages the blaſpheming every thing ſacred, and the propagating opinions tending to the overthrow of all religion and government.

"Proſecutions have been ordered, but it will require ſome new law to put a ſtop to this growing evil, and your beſt endeavours in your reſpective ſtations, to diſcourage it.

"The impious practice of dueling requires ſome ſpeedy and effectual remedy.

"Now we are entering upon peace abroad, let me conjure you all, to uſe your utmoſt endeavours for calming men's minds at home, that the arts of peace may be cultivated.

"Let not groundleſs jealouſies, contrived by a faction, and fomented by a party-rage, effect that, which our foreign enemies could not.

"I pray God to direct all your conſultations for his glory and the welfare of my people."

The queen being retired, and the commons gone back to their houſe, the duke of Beaufort made a motion for an addreſs of thanks, which occaſioned a debate, chiefly about the expreſſion of a 'general peace'. Some peers urged, that it could not be ſaid to be general, ſince the emperor, the elector of Hanover, and other princes and ſtates of the empire were not yet come into it. But they were anſwered, that it might juſtly be called 'general', ſince the major part of the allies had ſigned it. After this another motion was made, that, in the addreſs of thanks, a clauſe might be inſerted, 'That her majeſty would be pleaſed to lay before the houſe the treaties of peace and commerce': But the queſtion being put, it was carried in the negative by a majority of ſeventy-four againſt forty-three. The addreſs of congratulation being agreed to, though, without any approbation of the peace, it was preſented to the queen [a]. The commons obſerved the ſame caution in their addreſs, and waved the motion for having the treaties laid before them [b].

Moſt of the corporations and other bodies of men ſoon followed the example of both houſes of parliament, in returning the queen thanks for the peace, before they knew what that peace was. However, general Stanhope having renewed the [a] In their addreſs, 'They returned thanks for communicating to them, that a peace was concluded; by which they hoped, with the bleſſing of God, that the people would, in a few years, recover themſelves after ſo long and expenſive a war; and they congratulated her majeſty upon the ſucceſs of her endeavours for a general peace. They declared, that they never had the leaſt doubt, but that her majeſty, who was the great ſupport and ornament of the Proteſtant Religion, would continue to take, as ſhe had always done, the wiſeſt meaſures for ſecuring the Proteſtant Succeſſion, towards which nothing could be more neceſſary than the perfect friendſhip there was between her majeſty and the houſe of Hanover. And they aſſured her majeſty, that as ſhe expreſſed her dependance, next under God, upon the duty and affection of her people, they thought themſelves bound, by the ſtricteſt ties of religion, loyalty, and gratitude, to make all the dutiful returns, that could be paid by the moſt obedient ſubjects to the moſt indulgent ſovereign.

[b] There was a ſmall debate about the words, 'to ſee accompliſhed', which, by a great majority, were voted to ſtand. The addreſs was as follows:

'We your majeſty's moſt dutiful and loyal ſubjects, the commons of Great-Britain in parliament aſſembled, beg leave, with all humility, to approach your royal perſon with our unanimous acknowledgments for all the benefits we enjoy under your majeſty's moſt auſpicious reign.

The many and great ſucceſſes, which have attended your majeſty's arms, had left nothing to be wiſhed, but ſuch a peace, as might be conducted by your councils, which now we have the happineſs to ſee accompliſhed. And motion for addreſſing the queen, to communicate to the houſe the treaties of Peace and Commerce, it was carried in the affirmative, with the addition of the words, ‘ in due time’, inſiſted on by the court-party; and ſo the addreſs met with a gracious reception, and the queen was pleaſed to anſwer, that ſhe intended to communicate to her parliament the treaties this houſe deſired, as ſoon as it was practicable’.

After the addreſſes of thanks for the peace, and a vote for a ſupply, the commons, in complaiſance to the court, proceeded to the ſtigmatizing of thoſe that ‘ delighted in war’. To this end Mr. Shippen made a report of miſmanagements from the committee, to examine the debts due to the army. They paſſed a ſlight cenſure on William Churchill, a member of their houſe, for being, when a commiſſioner for ſick and wounded, a partner in contracts relating to that office. They alſo made an attempt to faſten a miſdemeanor on the earl of Wharton, for taking 1000l. of one Hutchinſon for procuring him the office of regiſter of ſeizures in the cuſtoms, but it was dropped, becauſe it was done before the laſt act of indemnity.

On the 28th of April the ratifications of the treaties of peace and commerce were exchanged at Utrecht between the miniſters of Great-Britain and France; and, being brought to London, by Mr. Ayerſt, chaplain and ſecretary to the earl of Strafford, the queen on the 4th of May, the ſame day of the month on which the war had been proclaimed eleven years before, ſigned a proclamation for publiſhing the peace; which was performed the next day with the uſual ceremonies. The ratifications of the treaties between France and the States-general were alſo to have been exchanged on the 29th of April; but upon an unexpected difficulty about the elector of Bavaria's renunciation of the Spaniſh Netherlands (yielded to him by king Philip) which the Dutch miniſters alledged not to be in due form, that exchange was deferred till the 12th of May, N. S. About this time moſt of the miniſters at Utrecht received by the poſt under a cover, a printed Proteſtation of the Pretender to the crown of Great-Britain, who ſtiled himſelf James the Third, and addreſſed himſelf to all kings, princes, republics, &c. By the date April 12, 1712, it appeared to have been drawn up a year before, and imported, ‘ That, ſince after a war ſo long and ſo pernicious to all Chriſtendom, all parties ſeemed ready to come to a peace, and were ſpeedily about to ſign it, he thought it fit and neceſſary by this ſolemn proteſtation, to aſſert his undoubted right againſt any thing, that might be done towards the diminution of it. That he would not enlarge upon what had been unjuſtly done againſt him, ſince nobody could doubt of the juſtice of his cauſe. Nor was he indeed only moved with the condition of his own affairs, but, being incapable to change his affection towards his ſubjects, he could not, without the moſt ſenſible grief, behold, that neither their blood, nor their wealth, had hitherto been ſpared, to ſupport the great injuſtice, that had been done him; and that they were at laſt reduced ſo far, that if a peace were made excluſive of him, they muſt neceſſarily become a prey to foreigners. That, ſince he underſtood, that the confederate powers had no regard to his right, he thought himſelf moſt indiſpenſably obliged to himſelf, to poſterity, and to his ſubjects, not to ſeem, by his ſilence, to conſent to what was tranſacting to the prejudice of him, and the lawful heirs of his kingdoms. And therefore he ſolemnly proteſted againſt all that might be agreed or ſtipulated to his prejudice, as being void by all the laws in the world’. No manner of public notice was taken of this proteſtation.

Baron de Kirchner, the only Imperial miniſter now at Utrecht, having received repeated orders to leave that place, the Britiſh plenipotentiaries made their laſt effort to remove the difficulties that ſtill obſtructed the concluſion of a general peace. At their requeſt, the Imperial miniſter met thoſe of France, at the lord privy ſeal's houſe, where the French made ſome new overtures relating to the emperor and empire: But, this conference having proved ineffectual, and Kirchner's orders for leaving the place of congreſs being poſitive, he ſet out from Utrecht, on the 17th of May, N. S.

The parliament had now ſate a month, when Mr. Benſon, chancellor of the Exchequer, delivered to the houſe of commons a meſſage from the queen, importing, ‘ That as it is the undoubted prerogative of the crown to make peace and war, ſhe had ratified the treaties of peace and commerce with France, which had been ſigned by her order, and had concluded a treaty with Spain, which would be ſigned, as ſoon as the Spaniſh miniſters were arrived there. That ſhe determined from the firſt, on this extraordinary occaſion, to communicate theſe treaties to her parliament, and had therefore, now ordered them to be laid before the houſe’. After this meſſage he preſented to the houſe the copies of the treaties of peace and commerce made at Utrecht, with tranſlations of them.

By the treaty of peace, the French king was bound to give neither harbour nor aſſiſtance to the Pretender, but acknowledged the queen's title and the Proteſtant Succeſſion, as it was ſettled by ſeveral acts of parliament: Dunkirk was to be razed, in a time limited, within five months, after the ratifications; but that was not to be begun, till an equivalent for it was put into the hands of France. Newfoundland, Hudſon's-Bay, and St. Chriſtopher's were to be given to England; but Cape Breton was to be left to the French, with a liberty to dry their fiſh on Newfoundland: This was the main ſubſtances of the article of peace[c]. The treaty of commerce ſettled a free trade, according to the tariff in the year 1664, excepting ſome commodities, that were ſubjected to a new tariff in the year 1699, which was ſo high, that it amounted to a prohibition: All the productions of France were to come into England under no other duties, but thoſe that were laid on the ſame productions from other countries; and, when this was ſettled, then commiſſaries were to be ſent to London, to agree and adjuſt all matters relating to trade: The treaty of commerce with Spain was not yet finiſhed. As for the allies, Portugal and Savoy were ſatisfied; the emperor was to have the duchy of Milan, the kingdom of Naples, and the Spaniſh Netherlands: Sicily was to be given to the duke of Savoy, with the title of king: And Sardinia, with the ſame title, was to be given to the elector of Bavaria, in lieu of his loſſes: The ſtates were to deliver up Liſle, and the little places about it: And, beſides the places of which they were already poſſeſſed, they were to have Namur, Charleroy, Luxemburg, Ypres, and Newport: The king of Pruſſia was to have the Upper Guelder, in lieu of Orange, and the other eſtates, which the family had in Franche Comté. The emperor was to have time to the firſt of June, to declare his accepting it.

The treaties being read, a day was appointed to conſider of the treaty of commerce, particularly the eighth and ninth articles; by the eighth all the ſubjects of Great-Britain and France were to enjoy, as to all duties and impoſitions whatever, the ſame privileges, which any other nation, the moſt favoured, did then, or ſhall hereafter enjoy. By the other article, a law was to be made within two months in Great-as we are truly ſenſible of your majeſty's gracious and generous intentions, in undertaking that great work; ſo we have all poſſible reaſon to admire your ſteadineſs in carrying it on, and overcoming the many difficulties contrived to obſtruct it: And it is with the higheſt ſatisfaction we congratulate your majeſty upon the happy concluſion of this treaty; for we are ſo much convinced of your majeſty's tender regard to the public welfare, and the many inſtances of your wiſdom have taught us to have ſo perfect a reliance upon it, that we cannot doubt but your majeſty hath procured all reaſonable ſatisfaction for your allies, and eſtabliſhed the intereſt of your own kingdoms in ſuch a manner as to make us not only ſecure for the future, but a flouriſhing and a happy people.

Your majeſty can give no higher proof of the care you take of poſterity, than by the concern you are pleaſed to expreſs for the Proteſtant Succeſſion in the houſe of Hanover, upon which the future happineſs of this kingdom ſo much depends. We hope, and truſt, that nothing will ever be able to interrupt the friendſhip between your majeſty and that illuſtrious family, ſince the wicked deſigns of thoſe, who would endeavour to ſeparate your intereſts, muſt be too plain ever to ſucceed.

Your faithful commons can never enough expreſs the grateful ſenſe they have of the many gracious aſſurances contained in your majeſty's ſpeech; and after what your majeſty hath done to eaſe your ſubjects of the heavy burthen which before lay upon them, and after your unparalleled goodneſs in demanding nothing from them for the time to come, but what they themſelves ſhall judge requiſite for their own ſafety; the beſt return they can make, will be a ready and dutiful compliance with every thing you have been pleaſed to recommend; and they cannot fail moſt chearfully to ſet about providing the ſupplies neceſſary for this year's ſervice. Your majeſty's repeated condeſcenſions muſt in the ſtrongeſt manner engage the hearts and affections of all your ſubjects to your majeſty; and we are ſatisfied we cannot more truly repreſent them, than by contributing our utmoſt endeavours to make your reign as proſperous, glorious, and eaſy to yourſelf, as it is beneficial and happy to your people’.

To which addreſs the queen returned this anſwer:

‘ That this addreſs could not but be very agreeable to her, as it came from her loyal commons, and as it was a continuation of thoſe expreſſions of duty and affection, which they had ſhewn through this whole parliament’.

[c] It was obſerved on theſe articles: As to Newfoundland, it was thought the French ſettling at Cape Breton, inſtead of Placentia, would be of great advantage to them with relation to the fiſhery, which is the only thing that makes ſettlements in thoſe parts of any value. The Engliſh have always pretended, that, the firſt diſcovery of Newfoundland being made in Henry the ſeventh's time, the right to it was in the crown of England. The French had leave given them, in king Charles the firſt's time, to fiſh there, paying tribute, as an acknowledgment of that licence: It is true, they carried this much further, during the civil wars; and this grew to a much greater height in the reign of Charles the ſecond: But, in king William's time, an act of parliament paſſed, aſſerting the right of the crown to Newfoundland, laying open the trade thither to all the ſubjects of Great-Britain, with a poſitive and conſtant excluſion of all aliens and foreigners. Burnet, II. 619.

Britain, that no more cuſtoms be paid for goods brought from France than what are payable for the like goods imported from any other country in Europe. Theſe were articles very diſadvantageous to England. During king Charles the ſecond's reign, our trade with France was often and loudly complained of, as very prejudicial to the nation; there was a commiſſion appointed in the year 1674, to adjuſt the conditions of our commerce with that nation; and then it appeared, in a ſcheme that was prepared by very able merchants, that we loſt every year a million of money by our trade thither. This was then ſo well received, that the ſcheme was entered into the journals of both houſes of parliament, and into the books of the cuſtom-houſe: But the court at that time favoured the intereſts of France ſo much, preferably to their own, that the trade went ſtill on till the year 1678, when the parliament laid, upon all French commodities, ſuch a duty, as amounted to a prohibition, and was to laſt for three years, and to the end of the next ſeſſion of parliament: At the end of the three years, king Charles called no more parliaments; and that act was repealed in king James's parliament: But, during the whole laſt war, high duties were laid on all the productions and manufactures of France; which by this treaty were to be no higher charged, than the ſame productions from other countries. It was ſaid that, if we had been as often beat by the French, as they had been by us, this would have been thought a very hard treaty; and, if the articles of our commerce had been ſettled, before the duke of Ormond was ordered to ſeparate his troops from the confederates, the French could not have pretended to draw us into ſuch terms, as they had inſiſted on ſince that time, becauſe we put ourſelves into their power. We were engaged by our treaty with Portugal, that their wines ſhould be charged a third part lower than the French wines; but, if the duties were, according to this treaty of commerce, to be made equal, then, conſidering the difference of freight, which is more than double from Portugal, the French wines would be much cheaper; and, the nation generally liking them better, by this means we ſhould not only break our treaties with Portugal, but if we did not take off their wines, we muſt loſe their trade, which was at preſent the moſt advantageous that we drove any where: For beſides a great vent of our manufactures, we brought over yearly great returns of gold from thence; four, five and ſix hundred thouſand pounds a year. We had brought the ſilk manufactures here to ſo great perfection, that about 300,000 people were maintained by it. For carrying this on, we brought great quantities of ſilk from Italy and Turky, by which people in thoſe countries came to take off as great quantities of our manufactures: So that our demand for ſilk had opened good markets for our woollen goods abroad, which muſt fail, if our manufacture of ſilk at home ſhould be loſt: which, if once we gave a free vent for ſilk ſtuffs from France among us, muſt ſoon be the caſe; ſince the cheapneſs of proviſions and of labour in France, would enable the French to underſell us, even at our own markets. Our linen and paper manufactures would likewiſe be ruined by a free importation of the ſame goods from France.

Notwithſtanding all this, a motion was made on the day appointed, May 14, to bring in a bill to make good the eighth and ninth articles of the treaty of commerce with France. A debate aroſe, which laſted till ten in the evening, when it was reſolved, by a great majority, that the bill ſhould be brought in[d].

The peace had been proclaimed in London, and afterwards throughout Great-Britain, with the loudeſt acclamations of the people, who fondly expected great benefits from it; but it was not long before the eyes of the generality were opened. For, about the beginning of May, ſignior Bruciado, the Portugueſe miniſter in London, in a memorial repreſented to the court, 'That, in caſe any breach was made in the treaty concluded in 1703, whereby the duties on French wines were ſtipulated to be, at leaſt, one third higher than on thoſe of Portugal, the king, his maſter, would renew the prohibition of the woollen manufactures and products of Great-Britain': which alarmed not only the Portugal merchants in London, but alſo all perſons concerned in the woollen manufacture. On the other hand, the treaties of peace and commerce having been publiſhed in print, that of commerce raiſed ſuch a general clamour, as awakened the whole nation, which before ſeemed to have been ſunk into a lethargy. Several gentlemen, and particularly Mr. Robert Walpole, general Stanhope, ſir Theodore Janſſen, &c. exerted themſelves, and publiſhed ſeveral excellent pieces, which ſhewed the advantages of the trade with Italy, Spain, and Portugal, to which nations we conſtantly exported more than we imported from them, and brought the balance in money; whereas a trade with France would be deſtructive of our home manufactures, and of our commerce with other nations. Theſe things came to be ſo well underſtood, that, even while flattering addreſſes were coming to court from all parts of England, petitions were ſent up from the towns and counties concerned in trade, ſetting forth the prejudice which they apprehended from this treaty of commerce. The treaty, however, was to be ſupported at any rate; the perſons concerned in making it, either could not, or would not, ſee the miſtakes in it; and the nation was to be convinced, that through their great ſkill in trade, they had made an excellent treaty of commerce. To theſe ends Daniel de Foe was employed; though, in a weekly paper publiſhed ſome years before, called the Review, he had very often condemned the French trade as detrimental to this kingdom. He undertook, however, the cauſe now, and publiſhed a paper thrice a week, by the title of 'Mercator, or Commerce retrieved; being conſiderations on the ſtate of the Britiſh trade, particularly as it reſpects Holland, Hanover, and the Dutch barrier; the trade to and from France; the trade to Portugal, Spain, and the Weſt-Indies, and the fiſheries of Newfoundland and Nova Scotia: with other matters and advantages accruing to Great-Britain by the treaties of peace and commerce lately concluded at Utrecht'. In this paper he undertook to prove, that the trade to France, though contrary to all experience, had always been beneficial to this kingdom, and would be ſo again upon the foot of the treaty. And as he had the art of writing very plauſibly, and thoſe who employed him, and furniſhed

[d] The ſubſtance of the debate on this occaſion was as follows:
Mr. Arthur Moore, one of the commiſſioners of trade, and whoſe ſkill and knowledge in commercial affairs, the Britiſh miniſtry had chiefly relied on in drawing up the treaty in queſtion, endeavoured to ſhew the great advantages, that would accrue to the nation from a free trade with France; and ſir James Bateman, ſir Thomas Hanmer, ſir William Wyndham, Mr. chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. Ward, Mr. Shepherd, and ſome others, ſpoke on the ſame ſide. Mr. Nicholas Lechmere endeavoured, on the contrary, to prove, that the trade with France would be very prejudicial to our woollen, ſilk, and paper manufactories, and to our commerce with Portugal; and he was ſupported, not only by general Stanhope, Mr. John Smith, Mr. Nathaniel Gould (an eminent merchant, formerly governor of the bank of England) ſir Peter king, ſir Joſeph Jekyll, Mr. Wortley Montague, the lord Caſtlecomer, and ſome others of the Whigs; but alſo by ſir George Newland and Mr. Robert Heyſham, who had before gone with the court. Mr. Moore, in order to make good his aſſertion, having enumerated the different ſorts of commodities of the growth and manufacture of Great-Britain, which the French drew from hence before the laſt two wars, inſinuating, that in all probability they would do the ſame again for the future, if a free trade with them were ſet upon an equal foot: Mr. Gould anſwered him, that he begged the very thing in queſtion; and that, in his opinion, the opening a free trade with France would rather be highly detrimental to the nation. To make this out, Mr. Gould urged, 'That, ſince the revolution, the ſtate of commerce was entirely changed; and as France had ſet up, and very much encouraged woollen manufactures, and made ſhift without ſeveral goods, which they drew from hence; ſo England had learned to be without the product of France, by ſetting up ſilk manufactures and paper-mills; encouraging the making of all manner of toys, &c. which ſaved and gained vaſt ſums of money to the nation, and employed an infinite number of artificers, who would be reduced to beggary, if the importation of French goods of the ſame kind were allowed; becauſe the French had their work done for leſs money, and conſequently could ſell their commodities cheaper. He added, that the moſt valuable branch of our trade was that to Portugal; the increaſe of which, of late years, was mainly owing to the great quantities of wines, that were imported from thence, and conſumed in Great-Britain, inſtead of French wines, by reaſon of the high duties laid on the latter. But, if theſe duties were purſuant to the treaty of commerce in queſtion, reduced and made equal with thoſe on Portugal wines, the importation and conſumption of the latter would infallibly decreaſe, and thereby our profitable commerce to Portugal be in danger of being loſt'. On the other hand, ſir William Wyndham took this occaſion to reflect on the late miniſtry, 'who in his opinion, had let ſlip the opportunity of making a good peace, when they had it in their power: But that a time might come, and, he hoped was not far off, when the miſmanagement of the enemies to their country ſhould be animadverted upon. As to our Portugal trade, he ſaid, that that kingdom would ever have occaſion for the woollen manufactures and the corn of England, and conſequently be obliged to take off great quantities from hence, as they did before the year 1703, even at a time, when the court of Portugal had laid high duties on Engliſh goods and merchandizes'. General Stanhope made hereupon a long ſpeech, wherein, among other things, he ſaid, 'That the affair now in queſtion was not a party buſineſs; neither did it concern the late or the preſent miniſtry, but the whole Britiſh nation, and therefore, for his own part, he would freely ſpeak his thoughts about it with the utmoſt impartiality. That, the peace being made, it was now prepoſterous to ſay any thing for or againſt it. But, that as no treaty could bind the commons of Great-Britain to make any act or deed againſt their own intereſt; the only point to be conſidered was, Whether a free trade with France would be advantageous or no? And that, in order to clear that important matter, it was neceſſary to conſult the merchants and manufacturers who had preſented ſeveral petitions and repreſentations about it'. This was likewiſe urged by Mr. John Smith, who made a motion for adjourning the debate, and taking the papers before them into conſideration. But the main queſtion being put, was carried in the affirmative by a majority of two hundred and fifty-two voices againſt one hundred and thirty. Mr. ſpeaker having reſumed the chair, ſir Gilbert Dolben made his report from the committee, and, after further debate, the Whigs, finding themſelves overpowered by the court-party, moſt of them went out of the houſe; and ſo it was reſolved by above an hundred voices againſt twelve or thirteen, that a bill be brought in, to make effectual the eighth and ninth articles of the treaty of commerce and navigation between Great-Britain and France.

him with materials, had the command of all public papers in the cuſtom-houſe; he had it in his power to do a great deal of miſchief, eſpecially amongſt ſuch, as were unſkilled in trade, and at the ſame time very fond of French wines, which it was then a crime to be againſt. Several ingenious merchants, of long experience, and well ſkilled in trade, joined together to contradict the impoſitions of this writer: They knew he had many heads beſides the advantages of public papers to help him; and therefore thought the publication of a joint weekly paper the moſt feaſible way to confute him, and ſet our trade in a clear light, becauſe they were ſenſible that it was impoſſible for any one man to be maſter of ſo much experience, as was required to furniſh materials from ſo many different branches of our trade, as would be touched upon in this debate. The paper they publiſhed was, in oppoſition to Daniel de Foe's title, called the 'Britiſh Merchant, or commerce preſerved', and was publiſhed twice a week [d]. The perſon, to whom the public was chiefly obliged for this paper, and who had the greateſt hand in it, was Henry Martin, who was afterwards made inſpector general of the exports and imports. He was aſſiſted by ſir Charles Cooke, merchant, afterwards made commiſſioner of trade; ſir Theodore Janſſen, bart. James Milner, Nathaniel Torriano, Joſhua Gee, Chriſtopher Haynes, David Martin, merchants; and Charles King, who afterwards collected and reprinted thoſe papers. Lord Hallifax and general Stanhope had likewiſe a conſiderable ſhare in the encouragement of this paper, which had ſo great an effect, that the thoughts of the Whigs about commerce, which, at firſt, were repreſented as the reſult of diſcontent and ſpirit of party, appeared to be the univerſal ſenſe of all traders.

The houſe of commons gave an aid of two ſhillings in the pound, though the miniſter hoped to have carried it higher; but the members durſt not venture on that, ſince a new election was ſoon to follow the concluſion of the ſeſſion. They proceeded next to renew the duty on malt for another year; and here a debate aroſe, that was kept up ſome days in both houſes of parliament, whether it ſhould be laid on the whole iſland. It was carried in the affirmative; of which the Scots complained heavily, as a burden, that their country could not bear: And whereas it was ſaid, that theſe duties ought to be laid equally on all the ſubjects of the united kingdom, the Scots inſiſted on an article of the Union, by which it was ſtipulated, that no duty ſhould be laid on the malt in Scotland during the war, which ought to be obſerved religiouſly. They ſaid, it was evident, the war with Spain was not yet ended: No peace with that crown was yet proclaimed, nor ſo much as ſigned: And though it was as good as made, and was every day expected, yet it was a maxim in the conſtruction of all laws, that odious matters ought to be ſtrictly underſtood; whereas matters of favour were to be more liberally interpreted: It was farther ſaid on the Scots ſide, that this duty was, by the very words of the act, to be applied to deficiencies during the war: So this act was, upon the matter, making Scotland pay that duty during the war, from which the articles of Union did, by expreſs words, exempt them. A great number of the Engliſh were convinced of the equity of theſe grounds, which the Scots went upon, but the majority was on the other ſide. So, when the bill had paſſed through the houſe of commons, all the Scots of both houſes met together, and agreed to move for an act, for diſſolving the Union; they went firſt to the queen, and told her how grievous, and indeed intolerable this duty would be to their country, ſo that they were under a neceſſity to try, how the Union might be broken. The queen ſeemed uneaſy at the motion; ſhe ſtudied to divert them from it, and aſſured them, that her officers ſhould have orders to make it eaſy to them. This was underſtood to imply that the duty ſhould not be levied; but they knew this could not be depended on: So the motion was made in the houſe of lords, and moſt of the lords of that nation ſpoke to it: They ſet forth all the hardſhips that they lay under ſince the Union; they had no more a council in Scotland; their peers at preſent were the only perſons in the whole iſland, that were judged incapable of peerage by deſcent; their laws were altered in matters of the higheſt importance, particularly in matters of treaſon; and now an impoſition was to be laid on their malt, which muſt prove an intolerable burden to the poor of that country, and force them to drink water. Upon all theſe reaſons, they moved for liberty to bring in a bill to diſſolve the Union, in which they would give full ſecurity, for maintaining the queen's prerogative, and for ſecuring the Proteſtant Succeſſion. This was oppoſed with much zeal by the miniſters, but was ſupported by others; who, though they did not intend to give up the Union, yet thought it reaſonable to give a hearing to this motion, that they might ſee how far the Proteſtant Succeſſion could be ſecured, in caſe it ſhould be entertained; but the majority were for rejecting the motion: When the malt-bill was brought up to the lords, there was ſuch an oppoſition made to it, that fifty-ſix voted againſt it, but ſixty-four were for it, and ſo it paſſed [e].

[d] The authors of this work, aſſerted, 'that, if the 8th and 9th articles of the treaty of commerce between us and France had been rendered effectual by a law, this very thing had been more ruinous to the Britiſh nation, than if the city of London were to be laid in aſhes. This city has been once burnt to the ground; but the people were ſtill in being. They were, notwithſtanding this calamity, a conſtant mart for the product and manufactures of the country. But, if ſuch a law, as that above-mentioned, had paſſed, France would have gone on from that moment to exhauſt the treaſures of the kingdom. We ſhould have preſently loſt our beſt markets both at home and abroad. Our gentlemen muſt have felt a ſudden and univerſal decay of their rents; and our common people muſt have either ſtarved for want of work, come to the lands or the pariſh for ſubſiſtence, or have retired to foreign parts for bread'.

[e] This affair more at large is thus related: During the adjournment of the parliament for a week on account of the Whitſun-holidays, there appeared an uneaſineſs in many of the Scots members upon the diſappointment of their endeavours to get their country eaſed of part of the Malt-Tax. Hereupon they conferred with ſeveral of the Scots peers ſitting in parliament; and laying aſide all party diſtinctions, conſulted together how to redreſs their grievances. They deputed the duke of Argyle, the earl of Mar, Mr. Lockhart, and Mr. Cockburne, who by word of mouth repreſented to the queen, 'That their countrymen bore, with great impatience, the violation of ſome articles of the Act of Union; and that laying ſuch an inſupportable burthen as the Malt-Tax upon them was like to raiſe their diſcontent to ſuch an height, as to prompt them to declare the Union diſſolved'. To this unexpected remonſtrance, the queen anſwered, 'This was a precipitate reſolution; and ſhe wiſhed they might not have reaſon to repent it: but, however, ſhe would endeavour to make all things eaſy'. The Scots members being met again the next day, and their deputies having made their report of her majeſty's anſwer, it was unanimouſly agreed, that, before they proceeded farther, they ſhould lay their grievances before the houſe of lords. Accordingly on Thurſday the 28th of May, after the lords had adjourned the debate about the eighth and ninth articles of the treaty of commerce, the earl of Findlater made a motion, that ſome day ſhould be appointed to conſider the ſtate of the nation: Whereupon the lords appointed Monday the 1ſt of June, when all the lords in town were ſummoned. The debate began between one and two, being opened by the earl, who made the motion, and who repreſented the grievances of the Scots nation, which he reduced to four heads: 'Firſt, Their being deprived of a privy-council. Secondly, the laws of England in caſes of treaſon extending to Scotland. Thirdly, The Scots peers being incapable of being made peers of Great-Britain, as it was adjudged and declared in the caſe of the late duke of Hamilton. And, Fourthly, the Scots being ſubjected to the Malt-Tax, which would be the more inſupportable to them now, in that they never were ſubjected to it, during the war, and had reaſon to expect to reap and enjoy the benefits of peace: Concluding, that, ſince the Union between the two nations had not thoſe good effects, as were expected from it, he therefore moved, That leave might be given to bring in a bill 'for diſſolving the ſaid Union, and ſecuring the Proteſtant Succeſſion in the houſe of Hanover, ſecuring the queen's prerogative in both kingdoms, and preſerving an entire amity, and good correſpondence between the two kingdoms'. This motion was ſeconded by the earl of Mar; but oppoſed by the lord North and Grey, who, in a long ſpeech, endeavoured to ſhew, that the complaints of the Scots were groundleſs, and the diſſolving the Union impracticable; not without ſome reflections on the poverty of the Scots nation. He was anſwered by the lord Eglington, who allowed the Scots nation to be poor, and therefore unable to pay the Malt-Tax. The lord North and Grey replied, 'That it was nothing but what was agreed to by the treaty of Union; the fourteenth article of which imported, that Scotland ſhould not be charged with any impoſition on malt during the war only, which was now at an end'. The earl of Ilay confeſſed, that there was ſuch a clauſe, but that the ſame article imported, 'That, ſeeing it could not be ſuppoſed, that the parliament of Great-Britain would ever lay any ſort of burdens upon the united kingdom, but what they ſhould find of neceſſity, at that time, for the preſervation and good of the whole, and with due regard to the circumſtances and abilities of every part of the united kingdom; therefore it was agreed, that there ſhould be no farther exemption inſiſted on, for any part of the united kingdom, but that the conſideration of any exemption, beyond what was already agreed on in this treaty, ſhould be left to the determination of the parliament of Great-Britain'. He urged, 'That, when this treaty was made, the Scots concluded the parliament of Great-Britain would never go about to lay any impoſition, that they had reaſon to believe grievous'; and having ſet forth the inability of the Scots to pay the Malt-Tax, concluded for the earl of Findlater's motion. Hereupon the earl of Peterborough made a long ſpeech, wherein he endeavoured to ſhew the impoſſibility of diſſolving the Union, ſaying, among other things, 'That he had often heard the Union compared to a marriage; and, according to that notion, ſince it was made, it could not be diſſolved by any power upon earth. That, though England, who, in this national marriage, muſt be ſuppoſed to be the huſband, might in ſome inſtances have been unkind to the lady, yet ſhe ought not preſently to ſue for a divorce, the rather, becauſe ſhe had very much mended her fortune by this match: Adding, 'That the Union was a contract, than which nothing could be more binding'. To this the earl of Ilay anſwered, 'That if the Union had the ſame ſanction as marriage, which was an ordinance of God, he ſhould be for obſerving it as religiouſly as that; but that he thought there was a great difference'. To which the earl of Peterborough replied, 'He could not tell how it could be more ſolemn than it was, except they expected it ſhould have come from Heaven like the Ten Commandments? Animadverting, in the concluſion, on the Scots, 'as a people, that would never be ſatisfied; That they would have all the advantages of being united to England, but would pay nothing by their good will: And that they had more money from England, than all their eſtates amounted to in their own country'. To him the duke of Argyle replied, in a very warm ſpeech, wherein, among other things, he ſaid, 'That he was by ſome reflected on, as if he was diſguſted, and had changed ſides; but that he deſpiſed their perſons, as much as he undervalued their judgments. That it was true, he had a great hand in making the Union: That the chief reaſon which moved him to it, was the ſecuring the Proteſtant Succeſſion; but that he

The matter of the greateſt conſequence in this ſeſſion was, the bill for ſettling the commerce with France, according to the eighth and ninth articles of the treaty, which had been ordered by the commons to be brought in. The traders in the city of London, and thoſe in all the other parts of England, were alarmed, with the great prejudice this would bring on the whole nation. The Turkey company, thoſe that traded to Portugal and Italy, and all who were concerned in the woollen and ſilk manufactures, appeared before both houſes. and ſet forth the great miſchief, that a commerce with France, on the foot of the treaty, would bring upon the nation; while none appeared on the other ſide, to anſwer their arguments, or to ſet forth the advantage of ſuch a commerce. It was manifeſt, that none of the trading bodies had been conſulted in it; and the commiſſioners for trade and plantations had made very material obſervations on the firſt project, which was ſent to them for their opinion: And afterwards, when this preſent project was formed, it was alſo tranſmitted to that board by the queen's order, and they were required to make their remarks on it: But Arthur Moore, who had riſen up from being a footman without any education, to be a great dealer in trade, and was the perſon of that board, in whom the lord-treaſurer confided moſt, moved, that they might firſt read it every one a-part, and then debate it; and he deſired to have the firſt peruſal: So he took it away, and never brought it back to them, but gave it to the lord Bolingbroke, who carried it to Paris, and there it was ſettled. The bill was very feebly maintained by thoſe who argued for it; yet the majority went with the bill till the laſt day; and then the oppoſition to it was ſo ſtrong, that the miniſters ſeemed inclined to let it fall: But it was not then known, whether this was only a feint, or whether the inſtances of the French ambaſſador, and the engagements that our miniſters were under to that court, prevailed for carrying it on. It was brought to the laſt ſtep; and then a great many of thoſe, who had hitherto gone along with the court, broke from them in this matter, and beſtirred themſelves ſo effectually, that when it came to the laſt diviſion, a hundred and eighty-five were for the bill, and a hundred and ninety-four were againſt it: By ſo ſmall a majority, was a bill of ſuch great importance loſt [f].

The rejecting this bill being an expreſs condemnation of

he was ſatisfied, that might be done as well now, if the union were diſſolved: That he ſpoke as a peer of England as well as of Scotland: That he believed in his conſcience, it was as much for the intereſt of England as of Scotland, to have it diſſolved; and, if it were not, he did not expect long to have either property left in Scotland, or liberty in England. He urged, that the tax upon malt in Scotland was no leſs unequal, than the taxing land by the acre throughout England would be; becauſe land is worth five or ſix pounds an acre about London, and not ſo many ſhillings in remote parts of the country. That this was the caſe between the Scots and Engliſh malt; the latter being worth three or four ſhillings the buſhel, the other not above one; ſo that if this tax were collected in Scotland, it muſt be done by a regiment of dragoons'. Some other Scots peers ſaid, 'That the end of the Union was the cultivating amity and friendſhip between the two nations; but it was ſo far from having that effect, that they were ſure, the animoſities between the two nations were now much greater than before the Union; and therefore they were of opinion, that, if the Union were diſſolved, the two nations would be better friends'. The lord chief-juſtice Trevor urged, on the other hand, the impoſſibility of ſuch a diſſolution; and he was ſupported by the lord-treaſurer, who ſaid, 'That the earl of Findlater's motion was no leſs ſtrange than unexpected: That, the Union being made by two diſtinct parliaments of both kingdoms, he did not ſee how it could be diſſolved, now the two nations were in different circumſtances, becauſe the power that made it, was no more in being; and nothing could make it void, but the power that created it: Concluding, that, if the Scots had any grievances to complain of, there might be ſome other method thought of to redreſs them, without proceeding to that extraordinary way of diſſolving the Union, which had been made in ſo ſolemn a way, and brought about with ſo much difficulty'. This was anſwered by the earl of Nottingham, who repreſented the advantages of the Union, if the views, with which it was made, had been ſteadily purſued. He added, 'That, though the two nations were now in other circumſtances, than when the Union was made, yet the ſame power that was in the two parliaments, when they were ſeparated and diſtinct, was lodged in them now they were conſolidated; and therefore, if they had power to make it, they certainly had it ſtill to diſſolve it: And that he knew not any thing, but what the parliament could do, except deſtroying the preſent conſtitution; which, he owned, they had not power to do. That the inconveniencies which had attended the Union, could not be foreſeen, till the trial was made: And, ſince the Scots, who were the beſt judges of the affairs of their kingdom, found, that it did not anſwer the ends propoſed, he was for diſſolving it'. The earl of Sunderland ſaid to the ſame purpoſe, 'That, though he had a hand in making the Union, yet if it had not that good effect which was expected from it, he was likewiſe for diſſolving it'. The lord viſcount Townſhend ſaid, That he was of the ſame opinion, provided that means could be found to ſecure the Proteſtant Succeſſion; and therefore he deſired to know, what ſecurity the Scots could give for that eſſential point, before they proceeded any further? To this ſome of the Scots lords replied, That would appear when the bill was brought in: That then it was a proper time to ſhew what ſecurity they could give; and therefore moved, That the queſtion might be put immediately, Whether a bill ſhould be brought in, or not? The earl of Nottingham deſired, that another day might be appointed to conſider further of a matter of ſuch conſequence, that the lords might be better apprized of it. The lord Hallifax declared alſo for diſſolving the Union, provided it could be made appear, that the Succeſſion could be ſecured; but yet deſired, that a further day might be appointed to conſider of ſo important a matter. And the earls of Mar and Loudon, who were before for putting the queſtion immediately, declared themſelves better ſatisfied with that lord's reaſons. There were ſeveral other ſpeeches made both by the Engliſh and Scots lords, particularly by the earl Paulet, and the earls of Scarborough and Scarſdale. And it is obſervable, that, when the danger England would be in from the Pretender, if the Union were diſſolved, was urged, the lord Townſhend anſwered, 'That the queen, lords, and commons of England, if joined in one intereſt, need fear no enemy in the world; and therefore ought to deſpiſe the Pretender and all his abettors'. The duke of Argyle, having mentioned the Pretender, ſaid, 'He knew not what appellation to give him, his name being now as uncertain as his parents'. But the earl of Scarſdale called him the Prince, or, added he, the Pretender, which you will. Upon the whole matter, all the Engliſh court lords were againſt diſſolving the Union; and, on the other hand, ſuch Whig peers, as appeared to be for it, had principally in view the fomenting the diſcontents of the Scots, in order to incline them to chuſe, at the next election, ſuch repreſentatives as ſhould oppoſe the preſent miniſtry. The queſtion being put upon the earl of Findlater's motion, it was carried in the negative by four voices, there being fifty-four lords preſent on each ſide; and ſeventeen proxies for the negative, and only thirteen for the affirmative. It is remarkable, that the lord-treaſurer having, in the courſe of this debate, advanced, 'That, though the Malt-Tax were laid, it might be afterwards remitted by the crown, and not levied'; the earl of Sunderland ſaid, 'He wondered ſuch expreſſions, as tended to eſtabliſh a 'deſpotic diſpenſing power, and arbitrary government', ſhould come from that noble lord'. To this, the lord-treaſurer ſaid, 'That his family had never been for promoting and adviſing arbitrary meaſures, as others had done': Which the earl of Sunderland taking to be a reflection upon his father, he not only vindicated him, but added, 'That the other lord's family was hardly known in thoſe days'. Pr. H. L.

[f] The proceedings at large were as follow:

On the 9th of June, the commons, in a grand committee, took that bill into conſideration, ſir Robert Davers being in the chair; and heard Mr. Cooke, a merchant, who, in behalf of the Levant company, made a long ſpeech; wherein, with great ſolidity of reaſon, he ſhewed, how detrimental the opening a trade with France would be to the Britiſh woollen and ſilk manufactures, and to all the branches of our trade. The merchants being withdrawn, the commons took their allegations into conſideration; and, among the reſt, general Stanhope, to corroborate what Mr. Cooke had alledged, quoted the preamble of an act of parliament, made in the thirteenth year of king Charles the ſecond, which runs thus: 'Foraſmuch as it has been by long experience found, that the importing French wines, brandy, linnen, ſilk, ſalt, and paper, and other commodities of the growth, product, or manufactures of the territories and dominions of the French king, has much exhauſted the treaſure of this nation, leſſened the value of the native commodities and manufactures thereof, and cauſed great detriment to this kingdom in general: Be it therefore enacted, &c.' Hereupon the ſpeaker, ſuppoſing that Mr. Stanhope had made a miſtake, ſaid, 'There was no ſuch thing in that act'. But Mr. Stanhope inſiſted, that the clerk ſhould read the ſaid act; and, his quotation appearing to be right, he and other members animadverted with ſome vehemence on the ſpeaker's blunder. At laſt, the debate cooled, and was put off till the next day; and it was reſolved, that the petitioners, who had not been yet, ſhould then be heard.

On the 10th of June, the queen came to the houſe of peers, and, the commons attending, her majeſty gave the royal aſſent to 'the act for continuing the duties on malt, &c. the act to revive and continue the act for taking and ſtating the public accounts', &c. and to ſome other private and public bills. The commons being returned to their houſe, and having reſolved themſelves into a grand committee upon the bill relating to the treaty of commerce, the Spaniſh, Italian, and Portugal merchants, and the weavers of London, were admitted to be heard upon their ſeveral petitions. Mr. Torriano, who ſpoke in behalf of the Spaniſh trade, having animadverted on the eighth and ninth articles of the treaty of commerce, and mentioned the tenth and eleventh as relating to the two former, ſome court members were offended at it; and, after he had done ſpeaking, moved the committee, that a mark of their diſpleaſure might be ſet upon him. But general Stanhope, Mr. Lechmere, ſir Peter King, and Mr. John Smith ſaid, 'That, unleſs they gave the merchants full liberty of ſpeech, the houſe would never be able to form a right judgment on that important affair; and they hoped, that no man ſhould be reprimanded for ſtanding up for the trade of Great-Britain'. This, with a noble ſpirit, which appeared in the houſe on behalf of the merchants, by the great number of members, both Tory and Whig, who, all at once, ſtood up to defend Mr. Torriano, made the courtiers drop that matter; and then Mr. Wyat ſpoke for the Italian merchants, Mr. Milner for the Portugal trade, and colonel Leheux for the London weavers. The merchants being withdrawn, the ſpeaker reſumed the chair; and it was reſolved, That the grand committee ſhould, the next day, conſider further of the bill, and that the other petitioners be then heard. It was alſo ordered, That the miniſters of the Levant Company, and all memorials, petitions, repreſentations, ſchemes of trade, and papers relating thereunto, that were either before the commiſſioners of trade and plantations, or before the commiſſioners of the cuſtoms, relating to the trade between England and France, be laid before the houſe.

The next day, June 11, the grand committee heard ſeveral petitioners, and read many petitions, and other papers; and, two days after, a clauſe was ordered to be inſerted in the bill, declaring, 'That the privileges, liberties, and immunities, as to all duties, impoſitions, or cuſtoms relating to commerce, or to any other right whatſoever, that had been, or might be granted by France, with reſpect to the ſubjects, goods, or merchandizes, of any foreign nation, ſhould be underſtood to extend as well to the four ſpecies of goods, excepted in the ninth article from the tariff of 1664, as to all other merchandizes whatſoever, imported into France by the ſubjects of Great-Britain. Then the commons, in a grand committee, made a further progreſs in the bill, and went through it on the 15th of June. Three days after, ſir Robert Davers reported the amendments made to the bill; which, with ſome others, were agreed to by the houſe. Then a motion being made, that the bill be ingroſſed, it occaſioned a warm debate from three o'clock in the afternoon till near eleven at night. General Stanhope, ſir Peter king, Mr. Gould, Mr. Hampden, and ſome others, ſhewed the diſadvantage of an open trade with France, upon the foot of the laſt treaty of commerce: And the member, who ſpoke moſt in favour of the bill, was the ſame, who had been chiefly employed in that treaty, Mr. Arthur Moore; but, ſome of his arguments being ſtrained and precarious, the majority even of his own party adhered to the opinion of ſir Thomas Hanmer, who made a long and elaborate ſpeech, wherein, among other things, he ſaid, 'That, before he had fully examined the affair in queſtion, he had given his vote for bringing in the bill; but, that having afterwards maturely weighed and conſidered the allegations of the traders the treaty of commerce, and laying the managers of it open to future inquiries, the miniſtry uſed their utmoſt efforts to procure a palliative addreſs from the commons; which the majority of that houſe were the more ready to come into, becauſe the Whigs began to exult, as if they had already triumphed over their adverſaries. Sir Thomas Hanmer, by whoſe influence chiefly the bill had been loſt, was engaged to make a motion for an addreſs, returning her majeſty the humble thanks of this houſe, for the great care ſhe had taken of the ſecurity and honour of her kingdoms in the treaty of peace; and alſo, for what ſhe had done in the treaty of commerce with France, by laying ſo good a foundation for the intereſts of her people in trade: And humbly to deſire her majeſty, that ſhe would be pleaſed to appoint commiſſioners, to treat with commiſſioners on the part of France, for adjuſting ſuch matters, as ſhould be neceſſary to be ſettled in the treaty of commerce between her majeſty and France; that the treaty might be explained and perfected, for the good and welfare of her people'. Many of the members who voted againſt the bill, being abſent, it was carried for the addreſs by a majority of one hundred and ſixty-ſix voices againſt ſeventy-two: Whereupon general Stanhope made a motion, 'to repreſent in the addreſs the ſenſe of the houſe, that her majeſty's commiſſioners, who were to treat of the commerce between Great-Britain and France, ſhould inſiſt, that liberty be given to her majeſty's ſubjects to trade to all the ports in the French king's dominions'. But this was rejected.

The addreſs being preſented to the queen by the whole houſe, ſhe, 'thanked them moſt heartily for an addreſs, which ſo fully expreſſed their approbation of the treaties of peace and commerce with France: Adding, that it was with no ſmall difficulty, that ſo great advantages in trade were obtained for her ſubjects; and that ſhe would readily comply with their deſires, in continuing her utmoſt care to ſecure the benefits ſhe had ſtipulated for her people'. This was very ſurprizing, ſince the houſe of commons had ſufficiently ſhewn, how little they were pleaſed with the treaty of commerce, by their rejecting the bill, which was offered to confirm it; and this was inſinuated in their addreſs itſelf. But it was pleaſantly ſaid, that the queen anſwered them, according to what ought to have been in their addreſs, and not according to what was in it. Beſides, it was obſervable, that her promiſe, to maintain what was already ſtipulated, did not at all anſwer the prayer of their addreſs. However, the ſpeaker having, early the next day, reported the queen's anſwer to a very thin houſe, it was unanimouſly reſolved to return her thanks for it.

As it did not appear in the treaty of peace, what equivalent the king of France was to have for Dunkirk, the commons addreſſed the queen, deſiring to know what that equivalent was. Some weeks paſſed before they had an anſwer; but, at laſt, the queen by a meſſage ſaid, that in purſuance to the treaties, as well between her and the French king, as between that king and the ſtates, the equivalent to be given for the demolition of Dunkirk was already in the hands of his moſt Chriſtian majeſty. This ſtill left the matter in the dark, no further explanation being made of it; however, though many members were diſſatisfied with this dubious anſwer, the majority acquieſced in it. At the ſame time the queen being alſo addreſſed 'for an account of what ſhe had ſtipulated for the ſake of Great-Britain in Flanders, and how the ſame was ſecured, the report of the commiſſioners of trade about this matter was laid before the commons; which being read, an addreſs was preſented to her, 'That ſhe would take care, the towns in Flanders in her poſſeſſion be not evacuated, till thoſe who were to have the ſovereignty of the Spaniſh Netherlands agreed to ſuch articles for regulating trade, as might put the ſubjects of Great-Britain upon an equal foot with thoſe of any other nation'. To this ſhe returned a favourable anſwer.

This was all that paſſed in this ſeſſion of parliament with relation to the peace. It was once apprehended, that the miniſters would have moved for an act, or at leaſt for an addreſs, approving the peace, but no ſuch motion was made[z].

traders and manufacturers in their ſeveral petitions and repreſentations, he was convinced, that the paſſing of it would be of great prejudice to the woollen and ſilk manufactures of this kingdom; conſequently increaſe the number of the poor, and, in the end, affect the land. That, while he had the honour to ſit in that houſe, he would never be blindly led by any miniſtry; neither on the other hand, was he biaſſed by what might weigh with ſome men, viz. the fear of loſing their elections. But that the principles, upon which he acted, were the intereſt of his country, and the conviction of his judgment; and, upon theſe two conſiderations alone, he was againſt the bill'. This ſpeech made a great impreſſion on many of the members; and, Mr. Aiſlabie, one of the lords commiſſioners of the admiralty, and Mr. Francis Annetley, one of the commiſſioners of the public accounts, having ſpoke alſo againſt the bill, the queſtion, Whether it ſhould be ingroſſed, was at laſt carried in the negative, by a majority of one hundred and ninety-four voices, againſt one hundred and eighty-five. It was obſerved, that, of the four members for the city of London, one only, ſir William Withers, voted for the bill; and that ſir Richard Hoare, then lord-mayor, ſir George Newland, and ſir John Caſs, voted againſt it; as did alſo the two members for Weſtminſter, Mr. Medlicot, and Mr. Thomas Croſs. On the other hand, it was given out that the lord-treaſurer, foreſeeing the ill effects of paſſing ſuch a bill at this juncture, wrote, the night before, a letter to the ſpeaker of the houſe of commons, deſiring him to uſe his intereſt, that it might drop; which ſtep he might probably be induced to take from the oppoſition the bill was like to meet with in the houſe of lords; where, that very afternoon, July 17, the earls of Angleſey and Abington, and ſome other peers, had declared againſt it. However, ſome ſuſpected either the reality or true deſign of ſuch a letter, becauſe moſt of the court and Scots members voted for the bill. Pr. H. C.

[z] Biſhop Burnet ſays, that, if ſuch a motion had been made he would have ſpoken the following ſpeech, being the only one he ever prepared before hand, which he has inſerted in his hiſtory, in order to deliver down to poſterity his thoughts of this great tranſaction.

'My lords, this matter now before you, as it is of the greateſt importance, ſo it may be ſeen in very different lights; I will not meddle with the poliical view of it; I leave that to perſons, who can judge and ſpeak of it much better than I can: I will only offer to you what appears to me, when I conſider it, with relation to the rules of morality and religion; in this I am ſure I act within my proper ſphere. Some things ſtick ſo with me, that I could have no quiet in my conſcience, nor think I had anſwered the duty of my function, if I did not make uſe of the freedom of ſpeech, that our conſtitution and the privileges of this houſe allow me: I am the more encouraged to do this, becauſe the bringing thoſe of our order into public councils, in which we have now ſuch a ſhare, was originally intended for this very end, that we ſhould offer ſuch conſiderations, as ariſe from the rules of our holy religion, in all matters that may come before us. In the opening my ſenſe of things, I may be forced to uſe ſome words, that may perhaps appear ſevere: I cannot help it, if the nature of theſe affairs is ſuch, that I cannot ſpeak plainly of them, in a ſofter ſtrain: I intend not to reflect on any perſon: And I am ſure I have ſuch a profound reſpect for the queen, that no part of what I may ſay, can be underſtood to reflect on her in any ſort: Her intentions are, no doubt, as ſhe declares them to be, all for the good and happineſs of her people; but it is not to be ſuppoſed, that ſhe can read long treaties, or carry the articles of them in her memory: So, if things have been either concealed from her, or miſrepreſented to her, 'She can do no wrong': And, if any ſuch thing has been done, we know on whom our conſtitution lays the blame.

The treaties that were made ſome years ago, with our allies are in print; both the grand alliance, and ſome ſubſequent ones: We ſee many things in theſe, that are not provided for by this peace; it was in particular ſtipulated, that no peace ſhould be treated, much leſs concluded, without the conſent of the allies. But, before I make any obſervation on this, I muſt deſire you will conſider how ſacred a thing the public faith, that is engaged in treaties and alliances, ſhould be eſteemed.

I hope, I need not tell you, that even heathen nations valued themſelves upon their fidelity, in a punctual obſerving of all their treaties, and with how much infamy they branded the violation of them: If we conſider that which revealed religion teaches us to know, that man was made after the image of God, the God of all truth, as we know who is the father of lyes; 'God hates the deceitful man, in whoſe mouth there is no faithfulneſs'. In that leſs perfect religion of the Jews, when the Gibeonites had, by a fraudulent proceeding, drawn Joſhua and the Iſraelites into a league with them; it was ſacredly obſerved; and the violation of it, ſome ages after, was ſeverely puniſhed. And, when the laſt of the kings of Judah ſhook off the fidelity, to which he had bound himſelf to the king of Babylon, the Prophet thereupon ſaid with indignation, 'Shall he break the oath of God, and proſper'? The ſwearing deceitfully is one of the worſt characters; and 'He who ſwears to his own hurt, and changes not', is among the beſt. It is a maxim of the wiſeſt of kings, that the throne is eſtabliſhed in righteouſneſs. Treaties are of the nature of oaths; and, when an oath is aſked to confirm a treaty, it is never denied. The beſt account that I can give of the diſuſe of adding that ſacred ſeal to treaties, is this:

The Popes had for ſome ages poſſeſſed themſelves of a power, to which they had often recourſe, of diſſolving the faith of treaties, and the obligation of oaths: The famous, but fatal ſtory of Ladiſlaus, king of Hungary, breaking his faith to Amurath the Turk, by virtue of a papal diſpenſation, is well known. One of the laſt public acts of this ſort, was, when pope Clement the ſeventh abſolved Francis the firſt, from the treaty made and ſworn to at Madrid, while he was a priſoner there: The ſevere revenge that Charles the fifth took of this, in the ſack of Rome, and in keeping that Pope for ſome months a priſoner, has made Popes more cautious, ſince that time, than they were formerly: This alſo drew ſuch heavy but juſt reproaches, on the papacy, from the reformers, that ſome ſtop ſeems now to be put to ſuch a barefaced protection of perjury. But the late king told me, that he underſtood from the German Proteſtant princes, that they believed the confeſſors of popiſh princes had faculties from Rome, for doing this as effectually, though more ſecretly: He added, that they knew it went for a maxim among popiſh princes, that their word and faith bound them as they were men, and members of ſociety; but that their oaths, being acts of religion, were ſubject to the direction of their confeſſors; and that they, apprehending this, did, in all their treaties with the princes of that religion, depend upon their honour, but never aſked the confirmation of an oath, which had been the practice of former ages. The Proteſtants of France thought they had gained an additional ſecurity, for obſerving the edict of Nantes, when the ſwearing to obſerve it was made a part of the coronation oath: But it is probable, this very thing undermined and ruined it.

Grotius, Puffendorf, and others who have wrote of the law of nations, lay this down for a rule, that the nature of a treaty, and the tie that ariſes out of it, is not altered by the having, or not having an oath; the oath ſerves only to heighten the obligation. They do alſo agree in this, that confederacies do not bind ſtates, to carry on a war to their utter ruin; but, that princes and ſtates are bound to uſe their utmoſt efforts in maintaining them: And it is agreed by all, who have treated of theſe matters, that the common enemy, by offering to any one confederate all his pretenſions, cannot juſtify his departing from the confederacy; becauſe it was entered into with that view, that all the pretenſions, upon which the confederacy was made, ſhould be inſiſted on, or departed from, by common conſent.

It is true, that in confederacies, where allies are bound to the performance of ſeveral articles, as to their quotas or ſhares, if any one fails in the part he was bound to, the other confederates have a right to demand a reparation

The houſe of commons was, as to all other things, except the affair of commerce, ſo entirely in the hands of the miniſters, that they ventured on a new demand of a very extraordinary nature, which was made in as extraordinary a manner. The civil liſt, which was eſtimated at 600,000 l. a year, and was given for the ordinary ſupport of the government, did far exceed it. And this was ſo evident, that, during the three firſt years of the queen's reign, 100,000 l. was every year applied to the war; 200,000 l. was laid out in building of Blenheim-houſe; and the entertaining the Palatines had coſt the queen 100,000 l. So there was apparently a large overplus, beyond what was neceſſary towards the ſupport of the government. Yet theſe extraordinary expences had put the ordinary payments into ſuch an arrear, that, at Midſummer, 1710, the queen owed 510,000 l. But, upon a new account, this was brought to be 80,000 l. leſs; and, at that time, there was an arrear of 190,000 l. due to the civil liſt: Theſe two ſums amounting to 270,000 l. the debt that remained, was but 240,000 l. Yet now, in the end of the ſeſſion, when upon rejecting the bill of commerce, moſt of the members were gone into the country, ſo that there were not one hundred and eighty left, a meſſage was ſent, on the 25th of June, to the commons, from the queen, 'acquainting them with the difficulties, which, in a particular manner, ſhe lay under, by the debts contracted in her civil government, occaſioned by ſeveral extraordinary expences formerly incurred; ſo that ſhe thought herſelf obliged, in juſtice to many creditors, to order an eſtimate to be laid before them of what was owing on the civil liſt, in the year 1710. Adding, ſhe had uſed unexampled parſimony, to remove, if poſſible, this burden from herſelf; but, that the granting away, and leſſening ſome part of her revenue by parliament, having made that impracticable, ſhe therefore hoped, that they who on all occaſions, had ſhewed themſelves ſo well-affected to her, would not be unwilling to impower her to raiſe ſuch a ſum of money on the civil liſt funds, as might enable her to diſcharge the debts, and ſettle the expence to be regularly paid for the future. With this meſſage was preſented to the houſe an eſtimate of the debts owing to the ſeveral heads of expence about Midſummer, 1710; to which Mr. John Smith, one of the tellers of the Exchequer, having raiſed ſome objections, ſaying, in vindication of the late miniſtry, 'That to his certain knowledge, the debts of the civil liſt, in the month of Auguſt, 1710; did not amount to one hundred and fifty thouſand pounds; for the payment of part of which there were ſome monies ſtanding out, beſides great quantities of tin, whereas, by the eſtimate now laid before them, the debts to Midſummer 1710, that is, about two months before, were made to amount to four hundred thouſand pounds'. A motion was then made to addreſs the queen for an account of the arrears of the civil liſt funds, ſtanding out at Midſummer 1710: And alſo, for an account of the debts of the civil liſt, as they were at this time, and of the arrears of the civil liſt funds to pay the ſame: but this was rejected, to the great ſurprize of many. On the contrary, a bill for enabling the queen to raiſe five hundred thouſand pounds on the civil liſt revenues, to be applied towards payment of ſuch debts and arrears owing to her ſervants, tradeſmen and others, was read, June 30, a ſecond time, and committed. After this, the motion made ſome days before, being again propoſed with better ſucceſs, it was reſolved to addreſs the queen, firſt, for 'an account of the debts on the civil liſt to Midſummer 1710': And, ſecondly, for 'a yearly account of the neat produce of the civil liſt funds, ſince her acceſſion to the throne'. This laſt addreſs was made upon a ſuggeſtion, that the civil liſt funds yielded now above eight hundred and fifty thouſand pounds. But, whether this was ſo or not, it is certain, no anſwer was returned to the addreſs.

The bill for raiſing the 500,000 l. met with great oppoſition, as it appeared to be of bad conſequence, ſince the granting of ſuch demands to one prince would be a precedent to grant the like to all future princes; and as the account of the queen's debts was deceitfully ſtated, ſo it was known, that the funds, ſet off for the civil liſt, would increaſe conſiderably in times of peace. However, though there was a great ſuperiority in point of argument againſt the bill, there was a conſiderable majority for it. And all people concluded, that the true end of getting ſo much money into the hands of the court, was to furniſh their creatures ſufficiently for carrying their elections.

The lords were ſenſible, that the method of procuring this ſupply was contrary to their privileges, ſince all publick ſupplies were either aſked from the throne, or by a meſſage ſent to both houſes at the ſame time. This practice was enquired into by the lords: No precedents came up to it; but ſome came up ſo near it, that nothing could be made of the objection. But the miniſters apprehending, that an oppoſition would be made to the bill, if it came up alone, got it conſolidated with another of 1,200,000 l. that was before them. And the weight of theſe two joined together made them both paſs in the houſe of lords, without oppoſition.

While this was in agitation, the earl of Wharton moved in the houſe of peers, 'That an addreſs be preſented to the queen, that ſhe would uſe her moſt preſſing inſtances with the duke of Lorrain, and with all the princes and ſtates in amity or correſpondence with her, not to receive, or ſuffer to continue in their dominions, the Pretender to the imperial crown of theſe realms'. Several members being ſurprized at this unexpected motion (which was deſigned to try the inclinations and affections of ſome perſons) there was a pauſe for a long while. At laſt, the lord North and Grey broke ſilence, and endeavoured to have that motion laid aſide; repreſenting, that ſuch an addreſs would ſhew a diſtruſt either of the queen, or of the miniſters: And that her majeſty would be puzzled what to do, in caſe the princes and ſtates in amity with her, ſhould be unwilling to comply with her inſtances, ſince it would not be in her power to compel them: concluding with this queſtion, 'Where would they have the Pretender reſide, ſince moſt, if not all the powers in Europe, were in amity with her majeſty'? To this the earl of Peterborough anſwered, 'That, ſince he began his ſtudies in Paris, the fitteſt place for him to improve himſelf was Rome'. After ſome warm expreſſions between the earl of Wharton and the lord-treaſurer, the motion made by the earl was carried; and on the 2d of July, the houſe of lords attended the queen with their addreſs. To which ſhe anſwered, 'That ſhe took extremely kind their addreſs; and the thanks they gave her for what ſhe had done, for eſtabliſhing the Proteſtant Succeſſion. That ſhe would repeat her inſtances to have that perſon removed, according to their deſire: And that ſhe promiſed herſelf, they would concur with her, that, if they paration for his non-performance: but, even in that caſe, allies are to act as friends, by making allowances for what could not be helped, and not as enemies by taking advantages, on deſign to diſengage them from their allies. It is certain, allies forfeit their right to the alliance, if they do not perform their part: But the failure muſt be evident, and an expoſtulation muſt be firſt made: And, if upon ſatisfaction demanded, it is not given, then a proteſtation ſhould be made, of ſuch non-performance; and the reſt of the confederates are at liberty, as to him who fails on his part: Theſe are reckoned among the cuſtoms and laws of nations: And, ſince nothing of this kind has been done, I cannot ſee how it can be made out, that the tie of the confederacy, and by conſequence, that the public faith has not been firſt broken on our ſide.

My lords, I cannot reconcile the carrying on a treaty with the French, without the knowledge and concurrence of the other confederate ſtates and princes, and the concluding it without the conſent of the emperor, the principal confederate; not to mention the viſible uneaſineſs, that has appeared in the others, who ſeem to have been forced to conſent, by declarations, if not by threatenings; from hence I ſay, I cannot reconcile this, with the articles of the grand-alliance, and the other later treaties, that are in print: This ſeems to come within the charge of the prophet againſt thoſe 'who deal treacherouſly with thoſe who had not dealt treacherouſly with them'; upon which the threatening that follows may be juſtly apprehended: It will have a ſtrange ſound among all Chriſtians, but more particularly among the Reformed, when it is reported, that the plenipotentiary of the head of the reformed princes ſaid openly to the other plenipotentiaries, that the queen held herſelf free from all her treaties and alliances: If this be ſet for a precedent, here is a ſhort way of diſpenſing with the public faith; and, if this was ſpoken by one of our prelates, I am afraid it will leave a heavy reproach on our Church; and, to ſpeak freely, I am afraid it will draw a much heavier curſe after it. My lords, there is a God in Heaven, who will judge all the world, without reſpect of perſons: Nothing can proſper without his bleſſing: He can blaſt all the counſels of men, when laid in fraud and deceit, how cunningly ſoever they may be either contrived or diſguiſed: And I muſt think that a peace made in oppoſition to the expreſs words of ſo many treaties, will prove a curſe inſtead of a bleſſing to us: God is provoked by ſuch proceedings, to pour heavy judgments on us, for the violation of a faith ſo often given, which is ſo openly broken: By this our nation is diſhonoured, and our church diſgraced: and I dread to think, what the conſequence of thoſe things is like to prove. I would not have expreſſed myſelf in ſuch a manner, if I had not thought, that I was bound to it by the duty that I owe to Almighty God, by my zeal for the queen, and the church, and by my love to my country. Upon ſo great an occaſion, I think my poſt in the church and in this houſe lays me under the ſtricteſt obligations to diſcharge my conſcience, and to ſpeak plainly without fear or flattery, let the effect of it, as to myſelf, be what it will: I ſhall have the more quiet in my own mind, both living and dying, for having done that, which ſeemed to me an indiſpenſable duty.

I hope this houſe will not bring upon themſelves, and the nation, the blame and guilt of approving that, which ſeems to be much more juſtly cenſurable: The reproach that may belong to this treaty, and the judgments of God, that may follow on it, are now what a few only are concerned in. A national approbation is a thing of another nature; the publick breach of faith, in the attack that was made on the Smyrna fleet forty years ago, brought a great load of infamy on thoſe who adviſed and directed it; but they were more modeſt than to aſk a publick approbation of ſo opprobrious a fact: It lay on a few; and the nation was not drawn in to a ſhare in the guilt of that, which was then univerſally deteſted, though it was paſſed over in ſilence: It ſeems enough, if not too much, to be ſilent on ſuch an occaſion. I can carry my compliances no further'. Burnet, Vol. II. 623.

could cure their animoſities and diviſions at home, it would be the moſt effectual method to ſecure the Proteſtant Succeſſion'. This anſwer ſeemed to import, that the queen had already preſſed the duke of Lorrain to remove the Pretender; though the miniſters in the houſe of lords, and particularly the duke of Buckingham, preſident of the council, acknowledged, that they knew of no applications made to the duke of Lorrain, and therefore thought the words of the anſwer related only to the inſtances the queen had uſed, to get the Pretender to be ſent out of France. But the natural ſignification of the words ſeeming to relate to the duke of Lorrain, the earl of Sunderland made a motion for a ſecond addreſs, which was ſupported by the earl of Nottingham; and, after ſome oppoſition, it was ordered, 'That an addreſs be preſented to the queen, to thank her for her anſwer to their addreſs, and for the aſſurances ſhe had given them, of repeating her inſtances for removing the Pretender; and to expreſs their ſurprize, that ſuch inſtances had not had their full effect, notwithſtanding the French king, and the king of Spain, had ſhewn their compliance with her deſires on that occaſion: and to aſſure her, that this houſe would ſupport her, in whatever ſhe ſhould judge proper for obtaining a demand, which was ſo warranted by the laws of nations, and ſo neceſſary for the honour and ſafety of her majeſty, and for the preſent and future peace and quiet of the people'. All the anſwer brought to this addreſs was, that her majeſty received it graciouſly. Though applications of this nature were known to be ungrateful both to the queen and her miniſters, yet, on the 1ſt of July, general Stanhope made a motion in the houſe of commons, to the ſame purpoſe with that of the earl of Wharton in the houſe of peers, and was ſeconded by Mr. Lechmere. The only objection, againſt it, was made by ſir William Whitlocke, who ſaid, he remembered, 'That the like addreſs was formerly made to the Protector, for having Charles Stuart removed out of France; notwithſtanding which, that prince was, ſome time after, reſtored to his father's throne'. But, the members, who were ſuſpected of favouring the Pretender, being unwilling to diſcover their inclination in ſo critical a juncture, when the parliament was ſo near expiring, and a new election coming on, it was, according to Mr. Stanhope's motion, reſolved unanimouſly, 'That an addreſs be preſented to her majeſty, acknowledging the great care ſhe had always taken, particularly in the late treaties of peace and guaranty, to prevent the Pretender to her throne being in a condition to diſturb theſe realms; and to beſeech her, that ſhe would uſe the moſt ſpeedy and preſſing inſtances with the duke of Lorrain, and with all other princes in amity with her, that they would not, under any pretext whatſoever, receive, or ſuffer to continue within their dominions, the perſon, who, in defiance of her majeſty's moſt undoubted title to the crown, and the ſettlement thereof in the illuſtrious houſe of Hanover, had aſſumed the title of king of theſe realms; and, to aſſure her, that the commons of Great-Britain would on all occaſions, ſupport her in ſuch ſteps, as ſhould be neceſſary towards rendering thoſe inſtances effectual'. The addreſs, being prepared and approved, was, July 8, preſented by the whole houſe to the queen, who coldly told them, 'She thanked them for it, and would give directions according as they deſired': Which, however, was not complied with till two or three months after, at the ſolicitation of the lord-treaſurer. It was generally believed, that the duke of Lorrain did not conſent to receive the Pretender, till he ſent one over to know the queen's pleaſure upon it, of which he was very readily informed.

Thoſe, who enquired into the reaſons of theſe addreſſes againſt the Pretender, rightly aſcribed them, not only to the good reception he met with in Lorrain, but alſo to the affection, which many ſhewed openly for him in Great-Britain. To this purpoſe it is remarkable, that two addreſſes were about this time preſented to the queen by ſir Hugh Paterſon, introduced by the earl of Mar, and afterwards inſerted in the London Gazette. The firſt, of the magiſtrates and town-council of the burgh of Inverneſs in North Britain, contained the following paragraphs: 'We, without reſerve, depend on your majeſty's wiſdom in ſecuring our religion, and the Succeſſion to the hereditary crown of Great-Britain in the family of your royal progenitors, the moſt antient line of ſucceſſion in the world: being as much convinced, that our guaranty is entirely in your hands, as your ſerene majeſty does place yours in your people'. The other addreſs, from the town-council and inhabitants of the loyal burgh of Nairn, had this paſſage in it: We know not with what modeſty we can preſume to addreſs your majeſty in the matter of Succeſſion, leſt we ſhould ſeem to call in queſtion your majeſty's unqueſtionable prudence, or the faithfulneſs of your majeſty's council: and therefore we ſincerely declare, that our utmoſt wiſhes reach no further, than that our poſterity may reap the effects of your majeſty's wiſe choice, while we think ourſelves happy under your majeſty's adminiſtration all our days'. But, on the other hand, an addreſs from the city of Glaſgow, in a quite different ſtrain as to the Succeſſion, was preſented to the queen by the members for that city, introduced by the duke of Argyle.

The queen having appointed the 7th of July for a public thankſgiving, 'for the ſafe and honourable peace' lately concluded, and invited her parliament to attend her to St. Paul's, both houſes went with the uſual ſtate; but the queen not having entirely recovered her ſtrength ſince her laſt fit of the gout, ſhe could not be preſent at that ſolemnity. The Whigs were abſent for another cauſe. In the evening there were great bonfires and illuminations throughout the cities of London and Weſtminſter, and magnificent fireworks were played off on the Thames over-againſt Whitehall.

On the 16th of July, the queen came to the houſe of peers to paſs the bills, and put an end to the ſeſſion, when ſhe made the following ſpeech to the parliament:

My lords and gentlemen,

'I Come now to put an end to this ſeſſion with great ſatisfaction, and return you all my hearty thanks for the good ſervice you have done to the public.

Gentlemen of the houſe of commons,

'I muſt particularly thank you for the ſupplies you have now given; I will take care to apply them, as far as they will reach, to ſatisfy the ſervices you have voted.

'I hope, at the next meeting, the affair of commerce will be ſo well underſtood, that the advantageous conditions, I have obtained from France, will be made effectual for the benefit of our trade.

'I cannot part with ſo good and ſo loyal an houſe of commons, without expreſſing how ſenſible I am of the affection, zeal, and duty, with which you have behaved yourſelves; and I think myſelf therefore obliged to take notice of thoſe remarkable ſervices you have performed.

'At your firſt meeting you found a method, without farther charge to my people, to eaſe them of the heavy load of more than nine millions; and the way of doing it may bring great advantage to the nation.

'In this ſeſſion you have enabled me to be juſt in paying the debts to my ſervants.

'And, as you furniſhed ſupplies for carrying on the war, ſo you have ſtrengthened my hands in obtaining a peace.

'Thus you have ſhewed yourſelves the true repreſentatives of my loyal commons, by the juſt regard you have paid to the good of your country and my honour. Theſe proceedings will, I doubt not, preſerve the memory of this parliament to poſterity.'

My lords and gentlemen,

'At my coming to the crown, I found a war prepared for me. God has bleſſed my arms with many victories, and at laſt has enabled me to make them uſeful by a ſafe and honourable peace.

'I heartily thank you for the aſſiſtance you have given me therein, and I promiſe myſelf, that, with your concurrence, it will be laſting.

'To this end I recommend it to you all, to make my ſubjects truly ſenſible what they gain by the peace; and that you will endeavour to diſſipate thoſe groundleſs jealouſies, which have been ſo induſtriouſly fomented amongſt us, that our unhappy diviſions may not weaken, and in ſome ſort endanger, the advantages I have obtained for my kingdoms.

'There are ſome (very few, I hope) who will never be ſatisfied with any government: It is neceſſary therefore, that you ſhew your love to your country, by exerting yourſelves, to obviate the malice of the ill minded, and to undeceive the deluded.

'Nothing can eſtabliſh peace at home, nothing can recover the diſorders, that have happened during ſo long a war, but a ſteady adhering to the conſtitution in church and ſtate.

'Such, as are true to theſe principles, are only to be relied on; and, as they have the beſt title to my favour, ſo you may depend upon my having no intereſt nor aim, but your advantage, and the ſecuring of our religion and liberty.

'I hope, for the quiet of theſe nations, and the univerſal good, that I ſhall next winter meet my parliament reſolved to act upon the ſame principles, with the ſame prudence, and with ſuch vigour, as may enable me to ſupport the liberties of Europe abroad, and reduce the ſpirit of faction at home'.

Few ſpeeches from the throne have been more ſeverely reflected on than this was. It ſeemed ſtrange, that the queen, who did not pretend to underſtand matters of trade, ſhould paſs ſuch a cenſure on both houſes, for their not underſtanding the affair of commerce; ſince at the bar of both houſes, and in the debates within them upon it, the intereſt of the nation did appear ſo viſibly to be contrary to the treaty of commerce, that it looked like a contempt put upon them, to repreſent it as advantageous to England, and to rank all thoſe, who oppoſed it, among the ill-minded, or at leaſt among the deluded. Nor did it eſcape cenſure, that ſhe ſhould affirm, that the nation was by the parliament eaſed of the load of nine millions, without any further charge, ſince the nation muſt bear the conſtant charge of intereſt at ſix per cent. till the capital ſhould be paid off.

The ſharpneſs with which ſhe expreſſed herſelf, was ſingular, and not very well ſuited to her dignity or ſex: nor was it well underſtood, what could be meant by her ſaying, that ſhe found a war prepared for her at her coming to the crown; ſince ſhe herſelf began it upon the addreſſes of both houſes. It was alſo obſerved, that there was not in all her ſpeech one word of the Pretender, or of the Proteſtant Succeſſion. But that, which made the greateſt impreſſion upon the whole nation, was, that this ſpeech diſcovered plainly, that the court was reſolved to have the bill of commerce paſs in the next ſeſſion. All people concluded, that the miniſters were under engagements to the court of France to get it ſettled; and this was taken to be the ſenſe of the queen's words concerning the making the peace laſting.

After this ſpeech both houſes were prorogued to the 28th, but never to meet again, being diſſolved before that day came. And thus ended the third and laſt ſeſſion of the third Britiſh parliament, which ſome have diſtinguiſhed by the epithet of pacific. It may however be obſerved, that how far ſoever the commons carried their obſequiouſneſs to the miniſters in the affair of peace; yet the majority could not be prevailed with to approve the treaty of commerce, ſo deſtructive to the trade of England[h].

The ſentence of the houſe of lords, by which Dr. Sacheverel was forbid to preach during the ſpace of three years, expiring on the 23d of March, that day was celebrated in London, and in ſeveral parts of the kingdom, with extraordinary rejoicings. The Sunday following in the afternoon the Doctor preached the firſt time at his church of St. Saviour, where a great multitude thronged to hear, or at leaſt to ſee him, expreſſing their joy at his returning to the exerciſe of his function. His ſubject was the duty of praying for our enemies from St. Luke xxiii. 34. 'Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do'. In his ſermon he made a tacit but obvious parallel between his ſufferings and thoſe of Jeſus Chriſt. Not long after, the houſe of commons, to ſhew their diſlike of his former proſecution and cenſure, deſired him to preach before them at St. Margaret's, Weſtminſter, on the 29th of May, being the Reſtoration-day; which he did, and had the thanks of the houſe for his ſermon. Nor was the court backward in rewarding his late ſervice; for, the rectorſhip of St. Andrew's, Holborn, becoming vacant, he was promoted to that rich benefice. About this time alſo Dr. Jonathan Swift, who had ſerved the preſent managers by writing ſeveral libels againſt the Whigs and laſt miniſtry, by whom he had been diſappointed in his ſolicitations for preferment, was by the duke of Ormond promoted to the deanery of St. Patrick, Dublin.

In the end of May, died Dr. Sprat, biſhop of Rocheſter; his parts were very bright in his youth, and gave great hopes; but theſe were blaſted by a lazy libertine courſe of life, to which his temper and good nature carried him, without conſidering the duties, or even the decencies of his profeſſion: He was juſtly eſteemed a great maſter of our language, and one of our correcteſt writers. Atterbury ſucceeded him in that ſee, and in the deanery of Weſtminſter: Thus was he promoted, and rewarded for all the flame that he had raiſed in our church. Dr. Smalridge, a divine of the ſame principles with Atterbury, and dean of Carliſle, was made dean of Chriſt-Church, Oxford. At the ſame time, care was taken to put the moſt important towns in the kingdom in the hands of ſuch perſons, as were prepared blindly to follow the queen's meaſures. With this view, the earl of Dorſet, being removed from being governor of Dover, and warden of the Cinque-ports, was ſucceeded by the duke of Ormond, whoſe ſon-in-law, the lord Aſhburnham, was made deputy-governor and deputy-warden; and ſir Henry Bellaſyſe was appointed governor of the town of Berwick upon Tweed. Not long after a penſion of five thouſand pounds per annum was granted to the duke of Ormond, for the term of fifteen years, out of the revenues of Ireland, in conſideration of his eminent ſervices; and the lord Aſhburnham was appointed colonel and captain of the firſt troop of horſe-guards in the room of the earl of Portland, who was ordered to diſpoſe of that poſt for the ſum of ten thouſand pounds. Sir John Powel, one of the judges of the Queen's-Bench, dying in June on his return from Bath, was ſucceeded by ſir Thomas Powis; and ſir William Baniſter, a ſerjeant at law, was made one of the barons of the Exchequer, in the room of ſir Salathiel Lovel, lately deceaſed. The duke of Mountague having obtained the queen's leave to travel beyond ſea, reſolved to follow the fortune of the duke of Marlborough, his father-in-law. The duke of Montroſe, who was well affected to the Proteſtant Succeſſion, being removed from the place of lord Privy-Seal of Scotland, was ſucceeded in it by the duke of Athol; which change rather increaſed than abated the preſent ferment in that part of Great-Britain. For, on the one hand, the Preſbyterian miniſters refuſed to obſerve the public thankſgiving-day for the peace, appointed by the queen; and, on the other hand, the friends of the Pretender, made great preparations to celebrate his birth-day.

The danger with which the Hanoverian Succeſſion was threatened, appeared to be the more real and imminent, by reaſon of the great countenance, which the Roman Catholics and Jacobites received from the diſtinguiſhing marks of favour, which at this juncture, were ſhewn to the duke d'Aumont, ambaſſador extraordinary from France, who came to London on the ſecond of January, 1712-13, and was lodged at Powis-houſe in Ormond-Street. He was at firſt attended in public with great acclamations by the populace, amongſt whom he threw out from his coach handfuls of money; but, having ſoon diſcontinued that cuſtom, they changed their note, and inſulted him with the cry of, 'no Papiſt, no Pretender'; and great inſolencies were offered before his houſe by ſome, who being oppoſed by others, it occaſioned a ſcuffle between them; whereupon it was thought proper to order the conſtables of the pariſh to look to the ſecurity of his houſe. Nor was this precaution unneceſſary; for by this time there was a general clamour among the people againſt him, on account of great quantities of wines, ſilks, and other goods, which his domeſtics were ſaid to have imported cuſtom-free, to the prejudice of the tradeſmen of London and Weſtminſter. The fact was, ſome French merchants took that opportunity to bring over a good deal of Burgundy and Champagne; which, before his arrival, were ſold by retail at his houſe, and other places, at lower rates than at the taverns; and at the ſame time, other Frenchmen, who pretended to be of his retinue, brought alſo ſilks, buttons, perukes, toys, and other ſmall-wares, which they expoſed to ſale, unknown to the ambaſſador. But though it was certain, that all the wines imported on this occaſion (except two tuns allowed to an ambaſſador extraordinary) paid the full duties, which amounted to about 2500l. And though the duke d'Aumont, upon his arrival at London, forbad the ſelling of wines or any other commodities in his houſe, yet the people put up the ſign of a Bunch of Grapes before it in the night-time; and ſeveral ballads were written both in French and Engliſh, one of them called, 'The Merchant a-la-mode', containing many ſevere reflections, not only againſt the ambaſſador, but againſt the queen's miniſters; ſtrict ſearch was made after the publiſhers of it, one of whom was committed to Newgate. Beſides theſe public inſults, ſeveral letters were ſent to the ambaſſador, to give him notice, that his houſe would be ſet on fire; which, whether by deſign or accident, happened on the 26th of January. That day the duke d'Aumont entertained at dinner the ambaſſador of Venice, the envoys of Sweden and Florence, the lord Waldegrave, and ſome other perſons of diſtinction, whom, by way of jeſt, he acquainted with the threatening letters he had received. But the company were ſoon alarmed in good earneſt by a cry of fire; which having broke out about three in the afternoon in an upper room, ſpread itſelf with ſuch violence, that, in leſs than two hours, the whole houſe was burnt to the ground; and all that the ambaſſador's domeſtics could do, was to ſave his plate, and part of his richeſt furniture. The duke of [h] Burnet concludes his hiſtory with ſaying: I am now come to the end of the war, and of this parliament, both at once: It was fit they ſhould bear ſome proportion to one another; for, as this was the worſt parliament I ever ſaw, ſo no aſſembly, but one compoſed as this was, could have ſate quiet under ſuch a peace: But I am now arrived at my full period, and ſo ſhall cloſe this work: I had a noble proſpect before me, in a courſe of many years, of bringing it to a glorious concluſion; now the ſcene is ſo fatally altered, that I can ſcarce reſtrain myſelf from giving vent to a juſt indignation in ſevere complaints: But an hiſtorian muſt tell things truly as they are, and leave the deſcanting on them to others: So I here conclude this hiſtory of above three and fifty years. Burnet, Vol. II. 631.

Ormond, having notice of this accident, cauſed detachments of the horſe and foot-guards to march to Ormond-ſtreet, to ſecure the ambaſſador's goods, and went himſelf to direct and encourage the engineers and firemen. The loſs, the ambaſſador and his domeſtics ſuſtained, was by ſome magnified to an immenſe degree, whilſt others made it inconſiderable. How the fire began, was then, and ſtill remains a more difficult queſtion to be reſolved. It was at firſt given out, that it happened by the careleſsneſs of his confectioner. Others ſaid, the houſe was ſet on fire by an iron pot full of charcoal, that had been put in the middle of a room newly painted, in order to dry it. Others again reported, it was ſet on fire by two bricklayers, who had been employed to mend the tiles of the houſe, and who did it, at the inſtigation of the Whigs. Upon this ſuſpicion, the two bricklayers were taken into cuſtody, and an advertiſement was publiſhed in the London Gazette, 'That her majeſty thought fit to promiſe, that if any of the perſons, who wrote the letters to the duke d'Aumont, or any other perſon whatſoever, ſhould diſcover the contrivers or actors of ſo ſcandalous and wicked a deſign, ſo that they, or any of them, might be brought to juſtice; ſuch perſon, or perſons, ſhould receive a reward of five hundred pounds, and her majeſty's pardon for the offence'. The ſtricteſt enquiry, that could be made, not affording ground to fix this fire upon any particular perſon, the generality continued in their firſt opinion, that it happened through accident. But many, who conſidered, that, as ſoon as the queen was informed of the misfortune that had befallen the French ambaſſador, ſhe gave immediate orders that the beſt apartment in Somerſet-houſe ſhould be prepared for his accommodation, began to entertain a ſuſpicion, that Powis-houſe was deſignedly ſet on fire, for a pretence to remove the French ambaſſador to a royal palace on the Thames, where any perſon might have private acceſs to him. Others carried their ſurmiſes ſo far, as to imagine, that the Pretender himſelf was come over with the ambaſſador, and had private interviews with the queen and ſome of her miniſters. Theſe jealouſies were increaſed by the frequent entertainments and balls, which the duke d'Aumont gave in his apartment; where a great concourſe of perſons reſorting in maſks, he had an opportunity to ſound the ſentiments of many about the chevalier de St. George.

Mr. Prior, having, in the queen's name ſolicited the releaſe of the French Proteſtants, who were on board the gallies on account of their religion; the marquis de Torcy took that opportunity of complaining to him, that the French refugees in England made it their buſineſs to inveigh againſt the king his maſter; and naming, in particular, Mr. Dubourdieu, a French miniſter of the royal chapel in the Savoy (who indeed had diſtinguiſhed himſelf that way) deſired, he might be puniſhed, and made an example to the reſt. At the ſame time, Torcy directed the duke d'Aumont to demand the ſame at the court of Great-Britain; upon which he preſented a memorial againſt Dubourdieu, to deſire that exemplary puniſhment might be inflicted on him and all miniſters, who abuſed their pulpits by declamations againſt his maſter.

Mr. Prior having beforehand acquainted the lord Bolingbroke with the purport of this memorial, which claſhed with the conſtitution of our free government, the queen was prepared with an anſwer, 'That this was none of her buſineſs, but the biſhop of London's'; to whom the memorial was referred, with orders to examine Dubourdieu. He having appeared before the biſhop with four elders of his church, the biſhop communicated to them the French ambaſſador's memorial; and aſked the French miniſter, What he had to ſay to it? Dubourdieu anſwered, 'The memorial containing only general complaints, he had nothing elſe to ſay, but that, during the war, he had, after the example of ſeveral prelates, and other clergymen of the church of England, freely preached againſt the common enemy and perſecutor of the church; and that, the greateſt part of his ſermons being printed with his name affixed, he was far from diſowning them; but that, ſince the proclamation of the peace, he had not ſaid any thing that in the leaſt concerned the perſon of the French king'. The biſhop made him repeat the words, 'Since the proclamation of the peace'; and aſking of the elders, 'Whether this was true?' They anſwered, That it was. Upon which the biſhop ſaid, he would make his report to the queen: which he did in ſuch a manner, that the French ambaſſador found no encouragement to inſiſt on his demand.

On the 1ſt of July, the duke d'Aumont made his public entry with great magnificence, attended by two gentlemen of horſe, twelve pages, thirty footmen, and nine of his own coaches, five of which were drawn by eight horſes, the other by ſix; his liveries being of ſcarlet cloth, covered with a gold and green lace. Having, according to cuſtom, been ſplendidly entertained for three days at the queen's expence in Somerſet-Houſe, he was from thence conducted to his firſt audience of the queen, to whom he addreſſed himſelf in a ſpeech full of compliment and flattery.

About the middle of July, the French miniſtry reſolved to try the weight of their intereſt with the court of Great-Britain. Monſieur Tugghe, deputy from the magiſtrates of Dunkirk, preſented to the queen an addreſs or petition, 'wherein he begged her majeſty's clemency for ſparing the harbour and port of that town'. But he was told by the lord Bolingbroke, 'That the queen beheld with ſorrow the damages, which the inhabitants of that town would ſuſtain by the demolition of its ramparts and harbour: but ſhe did not think it convenient to make any alteration in an affair agreed on by a treaty'. Tugghe, not diſcouraged by this repulſe, preſented a ſecond addreſs, wherein he ſuggeſted, 'That the preſervation of the harbour of Dunkirk, without works and fortifications, might, in time, be equally uſeful, and become even abſolutely neceſſary, both for her majeſty's political views, and the good of her ſubjects. This he endeavoured to evince, by a long deduction of ſeveral particulars, and then concluded with preſuming to hope, 'That her majeſty would graciouſly be pleaſed to recall part of her ſentence, by cauſing her thunderbolts to fall only on the martial works, which might have incurred her diſpleaſure, and by ſparing only the mole and dykes, which, in their naked condition, could, for the future, be no more than an object of pity'. What anſwer was returned to this memorial, never came to public knowledge; but Tugghe, whether of his own head, or by the encouragement of other perſons, having cauſed it to be printed and diſperſed in Engliſh, to try how it would be reliſhed by the people, Mr. Richard Steele, who with Mr. Addiſon, and Mr. Arthur Maynwaring, exerted himſelf in defence of the liberties of England, and of the Whig cauſe, and who, at this very juncture, was writing a weekly paper, called the Guardian, anſwered Tugghe's memorial with great ſpirit, and, in order to expoſe it to the reſentment of all men, who valued their country, or had any reſpect to the honour, ſafety, or glory of their queen, ſuggeſted, in his paper of the 7th of Auguſt, 1713,

'That the Britiſh nation expected the immediate demolition of Dunkirk.

'That the very common people knew, that within two months after the ſigning of the peace, the works towards the ſea were to be demoliſhed, and, within three months after it, the works towards the land.

'That the peace was ſigned the laſt of March, O. S.

'That the parliament had been told from the queen, that the equivalent for it is in the hands of the French king.

'That the ſieur Tugghe has the impudence to aſk the queen, to remit the moſt material part of the articles of peace between her majeſty and his maſter.

'That the Britiſh nation received more damage in their trade from the port of Dunkirk, than from almoſt all the ports of France, either in the ocean, or in the Mediterranean.

'That fleets of above thirty ſail have come together out of Dunkirk, during the late war, and taken ſhips of war, as well as merchantmen.

'That the Pretender ſailed from thence to Scotland; and that it is the only port the French have, till you come to Breſt, for the whole length of the Channel, where any conſiderable naval armament can be made.

'That deſtroying the fortifications of Dunkirk is an inconſiderable advantage to England, in compariſon to the advantage of deſtroying the mole, dykes, and harbour, it being the naval force from thence, which only can hurt the Britiſh nation.

'That the Dutch, who ſuffered equally with us from thoſe of Dunkirk, were probably induced to ſign the treaty with France, from this conſideration, that the town and harbour of Dunkirk ſhould be deſtroyed.

'That the ſituation of Dunkirk is ſuch, as that it may always keep runners to obſerve all ſhips ſailing on the Thames and Medway.

'That all the ſuggeſtions, which the ſieur Tugghe brought concerning the Dutch, were falſe and ſcandalous.

'That, whether it might be advantageous to the trade of Holland or not, that Dunkirk ſhould be demoliſhed, it was neceſſary, for the ſafety, honour, and liberty of England, that it ſhould be ſo.

'That, when Dunkirk was demoliſhed, the power of France, on that ſide, ſhould it ever be turned againſt us, would be removed ſeveral hundred miles further off Great-Britain, than it was at preſent.

'That after the demolition, there could be no conſiderable preparations made at ſea by the French in all the Channel but at Breſt; and that Great Britain being an iſland, which cannot be attacked but by a naval power, we might eſteem France effectually removed by the demolition from Great-Britain, as far as the diſtance from Dunkirk to Breſt.

Theſe reflections were not only a great mortification to Tugghe and the other French agents, but alſo gave no ſmall offence to ſome of the Britiſh miniſters, as appeared by the ſevere animadverſions that were publiſhed by the authors of the Examiner. But, on the other hand, the neceſſity of the immediate demolition of Dunkirk was urged by ſeveral other writers, and particularly by Mr. Toland in a pamphlet, intitled, 'Dunkirk or Dover'.

About the beginning of September, the colonels Armſtrong and Clayton were appointed commiſſioners to ſee the fortifications of Dunkirk demoliſhed; and at the ſame time two captains of men of war were, by the admiralty, named to ſee the harbour filled up. Accordingly, on the 7th of September, the two colonels ſet out for Dunkirk, where three French battalions, and as many Swiſs being come, and encamping, the one without Port-Newport, the other without Port-Royal, they began on the 26th the demolition, the French between theſe two gates, and the Swiſs between the baſon and the citadel. The ſame day a diſpute aroſe between ſir James Abercromby, the Britiſh commandant, and monſieur le Blanc, the French intendant of the province, about the manner of carrying it on. The French intended to have made a breach in the ramparts, or main fortifications of the town; but the two Engliſh commiſſioners having made the commandant ſenſible, that, if the ſame was permitted, the Engliſh garriſon was not ſafe, and the French, might eaſily make themſelves maſters of the place; ſir James inſiſted, and it was at laſt agreed to by le Blanc, that all the out-works, both towards the ſea and the land, ſhould be firſt demoliſhed; next the harbour ruined and filled; afterwards the main fortifications of the place razed and deſtroyed; and laſt of all, the citadel. This point being cleared, the French and Swiſs ſoldiers went to work again, and removed the great guns from Fort Gallard, Fort de Revers, the Riſbank, and the two forts at the heads or entrance of the port; and the miners made preparations to blow up theſe forts, and the other outworks; which was done towards the end of November. But notwithſtanding all this, the French found afterwards an expedient to evade the letter of this treaty, by making a new canal in Mardyke, which had a communication from the ſea to the baſon of Dunkirk.

The duke d'Aumont having taken his audience of leave at Windſor about the end of Auguſt, he ſet out from London on his return to Paris the 7th of November.

Before the queen left Kenſington, ſhe reſolved to beſtow ſome marks of her favour on the earl of Peterborough, who, though not in any great confidence with the prime managers, had yet been inſtrumental in the change of the miniſtry in 1710, and had ſupported their pacific meaſures. He was on the 3d of Auguſt elected knight of the garter, in the room of the late duke of Hamilton; and the next day inſtalled at Windſor, with the dukes of Beaufort and Kent, earl Paulet, the earl of Oxford and Mortimer, and the earl of Strafford; ſir Jacob Banks ſtanding proxy for this laſt. About the ſame time the biſhop of Briſtol, lord privy-ſeal, was tranſlated to the ſee of London, vacant by the death of Dr. Henry Compton, a generous and good-natured man, but eaſy and weak, and much in the power of others. On the 8th of Auguſt, a proclamation was publiſhed for diſſolving the parliament, and another on the 17th, for calling a new one.

Some days before, ſeveral letters ſubſcribed with an H (the initial letter of the earl of Oxford's family name) were ſent by the poſt to the mayors, and other magiſtrates of divers corporations, 'recommending them to promote the intereſt of the Pretender in the next elections; which it was ſuggeſted, would be acceptable to the queen and miniſtry'. Some of theſe letters having been tranſmitted to the ſecretaries of ſtate, an advertiſement, ſigned by the lord Dartmouth, was inſerted in the Gazette, promiſing the queen's pardon, and a reward of one hundred pounds, to any perſon who ſhould diſcover the author of the letters. This occaſioned various conjectures. Some aſcribed the letters to the diſcontented Whigs; others to the Pretender's friends, both of whom hated the lord-treaſurer, the Whigs, for having done too much, and the others for having done too little for the Pretender's intereſt. On this account he was in a very difficult ſituation, eſpecially, as he had been for ſome time upon ill terms with the lord Bolingbroke, as appears from his own letter to the queen, of the 9th of June 1713. Before the laſt ſeſſion of parliament, Bolingbroke had formed a ſcheme to put himſelf and chancellor Harcourt at the head of the High-church party, and had oppoſed the duke of Shrewſbury's being ſent over to France. However, with lady Maſham's aſſiſtance, the lord-treaſurer brought his own ſcheme to bear, which was, 'That the duke of Ormond ſhould ſtay in England, to attend the army affairs, which was neceſſary at the time of diſbanding: That the duke of Shrewſbury ſhould go to Ireland, as lord-lieutenant, upon his return from France: That the earl of Findlater ſhould be chancellor of Scotland; The earl of Mar third ſecretary of ſtate; the lord Dartmouth privy-ſeal; Mr. Speaker Bromley ſecretary of ſtate; and ſir William Wyndham chancellor of the Exchequer, in the room of Robert Benſon, lately created lord Bingley, and named ambaſſador extraordinary to the court of Madrid'. This new ſcheme perfectly defeated that of lord Bolingbroke and his friends, which threw them into a great rage; and the lord chancellor declared the promotion of the earl of Findlater to be againſt law, and would not treat the earl with decency; and lord Mar and Secretary Bromley received many inſtances of ill uſage. Moſt of theſe changes were declared from the middle of Auguſt to the middle of September; and, about that time, Thomas Foley was appointed auditor of the impreſt accounts, in the room of Mr. Maynwaring deceaſed; the lord Lanſdown, treaſurer of the houſhold, in the room of the earl of Choldmondeley, formerly removed; ſir John Stonehouſe, comptroller of the houſhold, in the room of the lord Lanſdown; the lord de la War, treaſurer of the chamber, in the room of the lord Fitzharding deceaſed; Francis Gwin, ſecretary of war, in the room of ſir William Wyndham; and Thomas Moore, brother to Arthur Moore, paymaſter of the land-forces abroad, in the room of Mr. Bridges. About this time, likewiſe, the duke of Northumberland and ſir John Stonehouſe were ſworn of the privy-council; and the earl of Denbigh made one of the tellers of the Exchequer.

All this while the party-writers and managers on both ſides were extremely buſy in preparing the minds of the people to favour their reſpective intereſts in the new elections for parliament men. But notwithſtanding the weight and influence of the court, and the viſible partiality of ſome returning officers, a far greater number of Whigs were choſen, than was by many expected.

There happened about this time an incident, which did not a little contribute to ſecure the treaſurer's intereſt at court. An advertiſement had been inſerted in the London Gazette, whereby it was propoſed to raiſe three hundred thouſand pounds for paying off part of the debts of the navy, by way of loan, on the ſecurity of the South-ſea ſtock, depoſited, for that purpoſe, into the hands of the chamberlain of London, and the deputy-tellers of the Exchequer. Whether monied men did not like the ſecurity, or the truſtees; or whatever was the reaſon, not above ſeventy thouſand pounds were ſubſcribed into this loan in ſix or ſeven weeks; which made many believe, it would never be filled up. But, upon an order of the 9th of September by the lord-treaſurer, that whoever ſhould ſubſcribe one hundred pounds to the loan, ſhould be intitled to buy ten tickets of ten pounds each in the houſhold lottery of five hundred thouſand pounds, there was the next day ſuch a croud of ſubſcribers, both at the Exchequer and Guild-hall, that more than three hundred thouſand pounds were ſubſcribed. The treaſurer improving the opportunity, enlarged the loan to five hundred thouſand pounds, which in a few days was filled up, as was at the ſame time the lottery of the like ſum: So that, by this means, the treaſurer raiſed a million ſterling in two or three days, which greatly advanced his credit and reputation,

The marquis de Miremont, whom the queen had ſent to Utrecht with a commiſſion to take care of the intereſt of the French Proteſtants, being come over, waited on the queen, and returned her thanks for procuring the enlargement from the gallies of France of one hundred and thirty-ſix Proteſtants. He deſired her ſtill to interpoſe her good offices for the deliverance of one hundred and eighty-five more of theſe ſufferers, who were ſtill detained in the gallies on the ſame account. The marquis de Rochegude ſpoke to her likewiſe in their behalf, and delivered to her letters from the States and the princeſs Sophia to the ſame purpoſe. The queen, who had been given to underſtand, that all the French Proteſtant ſufferers had been enlarged, was ſurprized to find, there were ſo many ſtill under affliction; and deſired the marquis de Rochegude to give her a liſt of them. The archbiſhop of York, lord Almoner, having likewiſe been informed about this matter, he ſeconded both the French marquiſſes ſolicitations with great zeal; which had the deſired effect. About this time Charles Roſs, colonel-general of the dragoons, and lieutenant-general, was appointed envoy extraordinary to the king of France.

Some days before, a very remarkable thing happened in Scotland. George Lockhart of Carnwath, an avowed friend of parliament for Edinburgh; a great number of the inhabitants ſigned a petition, to be preſented to the houſe of commons, for bringing in a bill to diſſolve the Union. This done, the populace went to the Parliament Cloſe in Edinburgh, and there, by the ſtatue of king Charles II, drank healths to the queen, the diſſolution of the Union, and all true Scotchmen; and afterwards went to the market-croſs and did the like, with repeated acclamations. It was likewiſe reported, that ſome Scots merchants cauſed a petition to be preſented to the king of France by Mr. Arbuthnot, their agent at Roan, repreſenting their grievances in point of trade, and other matters, and deſiring his protection for their redreſs, in conſideration of the ancient alliances between France and Scotland. But, this application bordering upon treaſon, no further ſteps were made in it.

About the latter end of the year 1713, the following incident happened: By the regency bill, which was to take place on the queen's death, power was given to the perſon next in ſucceſſion, to nominate as many as he or ſhe pleaſed, to act with the great officers named in the bill. This was, properly ſpeaking, the ſafeguard of the Proteſtant Succeſſion. The act was very particular, in directing ſeveral things to be done in that affair, by the perſon next in ſucceſſion abroad, and by his miniſter or agent here. Mr. William Benſon, apprehending ſome omiſſions in this reſpect, by which the nomination could not be of any uſe, applied to baron Bothmar for information, and found his fears were not groundleſs. The act directed, that the inſtruments of nomination ſhould be three in number, and tranſmitted hither to the reſident of the perſon next in ſucceſſion, whoſe credentials were to be inrolled in Chancery; and, after ſuch inrolment, the reſident was to depoſit one part with the archbiſhop of Canterbury, another with the lord-chancellor or keeper, and the third was to remain with the reſident, and that the ſeals of theſe three perſons ſhould be fixed to the covers in which the inſtruments were included. Now Bothmar, in whoſe hands one of theſe inſtruments was left, had not the character of reſident; and Mr. Kreinberg, who was reſident, and whoſe credentials were inrolled, was not concerned in the matter. Nor was Bothmar's, nor Kreinberg's, nor the chancellor's ſeal affixed to the inſtruments, but the ſeal of baron Schutz and of the lord Cowper, who was no longer chancellor. If therefore the queen had died, whilſt the matter was in this ſituation, theſe inſtruments could not have been opened, becauſe the act had not been complied with. In this light Benſon repreſented the affair to Bothmar, who deſired that chief juſtice Parker might be acquainted with it. Parker appointed a meeting of the chief perſons truſted by the houſe of Hanover, and Bothmar was to bring his part of the depoſited inſtruments with him. Accordingly, there was the next morning a meeting at the duke of Devonſhire's, and, upon examination, all were of opinion, the whole was wrong, and that it was of the utmoſt conſequence it ſhould be redreſſed as ſoon as poſſible. Parker undertook to direct the proper forms; and a meſſenger was diſpatched to Hanover, who returned with great expedition with inſtruments according to law; the firſt of which was to appoint Kreinberg reſident, and, after the inrollment of his credentials, he had new inſtruments to be depoſited by him, purſuant to the act. Kreinberg went immediately to chancellor Harcourt, and delivering his new credentials, deſired they might be inrolled, which the chancellor ſaid ſhould be done in a few days. But, the thing being delayed, Kreinberg went to the chancellor, and told him, if his credentials were not inrolled by the next poſt, he muſt acquaint the princeſs Sophia with it. This was reſented; but, however, he was bid to come again in a day or two, at which time the chancellor delivered to Kreinberg, not his credentials, but a copy only, or a common piece of paper.

When this paper was ſhewn to chief-juſtice Parker, as delivered by the chancellor to Kreinberg, for his credentials inrolled, he was greatly ſurpriſed, and carried the paper with him to Weſtminſter-hall (where he was then going) to ſhew it to the chancellor, and ſpeak to him about it. Parker producing the paper to the chancellor told him, it had been delivered to the Hanover reſident as his credentials inrolled, without ſaying who had done it. The chancellor, as if he knew nothing of the matter, ſaid with great warmth, 'This is very wrong, but this is a young fellow juſt come into his office, his father being lately dead; but let me have the paper, and I will take care to ſet this matter to rights for Mr. Kreinberg, if he will come to me in a day or two'. Kreinberg did not fail going, and at laſt got his credentials again properly inrolled about the 27th of March 1714. Shortly after the inſtrument appointing the perſons to be added to the lords regents on the queen's deceaſe were depoſited in proper form, which had not been done before in eight years, for ſo long the act had ſubſiſted, being paſſed in 1706.

Ireland, ſince the lord Wharton had reſigned the government of it, was become Jacobite almoſt without reſerve, and the boldneſs of the Papiſts, countenanced by chancellor Phipps, alarmed the Proteſtants, and put them upon their guard againſt the attempts of their enemies, who, about this time, induſtriouſly fomented the diſputes occaſioned by the election of a lord-mayor for the city of Dublin. The aldermen having choſen Mr. Pleaſants, it was ſtrenuouſly oppoſed by the then lord-mayor, and the deciſion of the affair being left to the privy-council (where the lords-juſtices, of whom Sir Conſtantine Phipps was one, had the direction) they came on the 4th of September to theſe reſolutions; 1. That the lord-mayor of the city of Dublin, for the time being, has the right of nominating three aldermen to be put in election for lord-mayor of Dublin; and that the lord-mayor and aldermen are obliged to elect one of the three to be ſucceeding lord-mayor, unleſs juſt objections be made againſt them. 2. That the proceeding of ſeventeen aldermen in the election of alderman Pleaſants for lord-mayor, and James King for ſheriff, in the abſence of ſir Samuel Cooke, lord-mayor, was a breach of the new rules; and that ſuch elections were null and void'. Six days after, the lord-mayor ſummoned the aldermen to meet, and proceed to a new choice; and, in purſuance of the reſolution of the council, he named ſir William Fownes and aldermen Conſtantine and Maſon, the ſame who were in nomination before. But twenty aldermen inſiſted on a previous queſtion concerning the firſt in nomination, and offered ſome objections to him; upon which, the lord-mayor having diſſolved the court, nothing was determined.

In this ferment the duke of Shrewſbury found the city of Dublin, when he arrived there on the 27th of October, to take upon him the government of Ireland: and perceiving the Pretender's friends had received no ſmall encouragement from chancellor Phipps, he took all proper occaſions to make good the expectations of the well-affected to the revolution and the Proteſtant Succeſſion; but more particularly on king William's birth-day, when he declared, 'He was ſtill the ſame he was in the year 1688, and publickly drank to the pious and glorious memory of king William.'

A new parliament being called, the ſtruggle in Ireland between the two parties was as great as in England. The warmeſt contention was in the city of Dublin, where ſir William Fownes and Mr. Tucker were ſet up by the Tories, and Mr. recorder Forſter and Mr. Burton by the Whigs. The poll began on the 6th of November; and the ſheriffs, perceiving the electors were going into a riot, ſent for ſome of the guards to prevent it: upon which a tumult aroſe, and the guards, being aſſaulted by the populace, fired ſome ſhot among them, killed one man, and wounded ſome others. Both parties immediately made their complaints to the lord lieutenant, who, the next day, appointed a committee to make a ſtrict inquiry into the diſorder, and directed the ſheriffs to take the poll at two different places, to prevent the meeting and claſhing of the two contending parties; and upon information, that the Papiſts and Jacobites were the chief promoters of the riot, he cauſed ſeveral popiſh chapels in Dublin to be ſhut up; which was very grateful to all Proteſtants. On the 17th of November the ſheriffs cloſed the poll; and Forſter and Burton were declared duly elected by a great majority.

The parliament of Ireland being met on the 25th of November, the lord-lieutenant made a ſpeech to both houſes, importing, 'That her majeſty having procured a ſafe and honourable peace, had nothing now to wiſh, but that her ſubjects might enjoy the benefits and advantages of it. That her majeſty had nothing more at heart, than the preſervation of the rights and liberties of her people, and the ſettling them upon a laſting foundation, by ſecuring the Proteſtant Succeſſion in the houſe of Hanover'. He earneſtly recommended to the commons, 'That as the Proteſtants in that kingdom were united in one common intereſt, they might all agree in the ſame means of promoting it, by laying aſide all warmth or reſentment; which would appear by the unanimity of their proceedings'.

Notwithſtanding this caution, there was the next day a great conteſt in the houſe of commons about the choice of a Speaker; Sir Richard Levinz being put up by the Tory party, and Alan Broderick by the Whigs; but, upon a diviſion, Broderick was choſen by a majority of four voices.

The addreſſes of compliment to the queen and the lord-lieutenant having been preſented, the commons proceeded in providing by good laws, for the ſecurity of the Proteſtant religion, againſt the deſigns of the Papiſts. They ordered a bill to be brought in to attaint the Pretender, and all perſons that adhered to him, of high-treaſon, with the promiſe of a reward to any perſon that ſhould take the Pretender alive or dead. They appointed a committee to enquire into the proceedings againſt Edward Lloyd, for publiſhing a book called, The memoirs of the chevalier de St. George [i], and againſt Dudley Moore, and others, relating to a pretended riot at the play-houſe, occaſioned by that gentleman's ſpeaking the prologue to Tamerlane, in praiſe of king William. They confirmed the election of Foriter and Burton, and unanimouſly reſolved upon an addreſs to the queen, for the removal of ſir Conſtantine Phipps from the chancellorſhip [k],

On the other hand, the biſhops of Ireland, reſolving not to leave the chancellor to the reſentment of the commons, uſed their utmoſt endeavours to get a contrary addreſs voted in the houſe of lords, where it was reſolved, that chancellor Phipps had, in his ſeveral ſtations, acquitted himſelf with honour and integrity. And, a committee being ordered to draw up the addreſs, it was preſented to the lord-lieutenant to be tranſmitted to England [l].

On the 21ſt of December, the commons, taking into conſideration the ſtate of the nation, came to ſeveral reſolutions againſt the proceedings of thoſe who had lately been the managers of the affairs of that kingdom [m].

Mr. Moleſworth, (afterwards viſcount Moleſworth) famous for his Preface to the ſtate of Denmark, being a privy-counſellor in Ireland as well as member of parliament, was at the caſtle of Dublin, with ſome other members, on the day the commons preſented their addreſs againſt the chancellor: The two houſes of convocation coming thither, to preſent a contrary addreſs, Mr. Moleſworth ſaid in the hearing of ſome gentlemen about him, 'They that have turned the world upſide down, are come hither alſo'? Upon this the lower houſe of convocation ſent a complaint to the upper, repreſenting, 'That they looked upon the words uttered by Mr. Moleſworth to be an intolerable profanation of the Holy Scriptures; and that his ſpeaking them at that time, and in that place, was with deſign to caſt an odium and aſperſion on their graces and their lordſhips, and the whole clergy, and to repreſent them as a turbulent and ſeditious body. That they thought themſelves in duty obliged to lay the matter before the upper houſe; not only for the reaſons above mentioned, but, becauſe they conceived it to be a high affront to her majeſty, and great diſreſpect to her repreſentative, the lord-lieutenant: And they humbly prayed their lordſhips to vindicate the whole clergy from this wicked calumny'. The biſhops immediately laid this complaint before the houſe of lords; who deſired a conference with the commons, and left with them a copy of the paper delivered by the biſhops. The commons laid no great ſtreſs on that complaint; but, the matter having been repreſented in England in the moſt odious colours, Mr. Moleſworth was removed from the privy-council.

It is obſervable that chancellor Phipps had many champions for him in Great-Britain; every Tory thinking himſelf obliged to vindicate him, upon the account of his zealous adhering to the church's cauſe in Dr. Sacheverel's tryal, and giving out, that the reſolutions of the commons againſt him 'were not of Iriſh growth, but the reſult of the joint counſels of the Whigs of both kingdoms'. On the other hand, the Whig party loudly juſtified the proceedings of the Iriſh houſe of commons againſt that miniſter, who, to ſay no worſe, had been the occaſion of unhappy diſtinctions among the Proteſtants of that kingdom [n]. Theſe diviſions gave ſo great encourage-

[i] This book was written in defence of the legitimacy of the Pretender, and of his title to the crown. Lloyd had publiſhed advertiſements of his intentions to reprint that book, exhorting all good people to ſubſcribe for it. For this he had been indicted, and the bill found in Michaelmas-term, 1712. Notwithſtanding which, he went about at large till July 1713; and chancellor Phipps wrote a letter to the duke of Ormond in favour of Lloyd, recommending him as an object of the queen's mercy, and 'as a perſon who had no evil intention in printing and publiſhing that book'; upon which Lloyd obtained a noli proſequi. See Conduct of the Purſe in Ireland, p. 35.

[k] The commons, December 18, unanimouſly reſolved, 1. That the Memoirs of the chevalier de St. George was a ſeditious and treaſonable libel. 2. That the remiſs proſecution of Lloyd was an encouragement to the popiſh, and other friends of the Pretender. That ſir Conſtantine Phipps, in repreſenting Lloyd as an object of mercy, in order to obtain a noli proſequi, acted contrary to the Proteſtant intereſt. 4. That an addreſs be preſented to the queen, to remove ſir Conſtantine Phipps from the place of lord high-chancellor, for the peace and ſafety of her Proteſtant ſubjects.

[l] At the ſame time, Mr. Richard Nuttal, a lawyer, was cenſured by the lords, for ſaying, 'The lord-chancellor of Ireland is a canary-bird and a villain, and has ſet the kingdom together by the ears, and ought to be hanged'.

[m] As theſe reſolutions will explain the conduct of the duke of Ormond, and thoſe employed under him, and other lord-lieutenants and juſtices, it may not be improper to inſert them:

'1. That for ſome years laſt paſt there had been a deſign formed and carried on to ſubvert the conſtitution, and alter the government of the city of Dublin. 2. That, to carry on that deſign, a corrupt and illegal attempt was made in 1711, to corrupt alderman Ralph Gore, then lord-mayor, by offering him a bribe of five hundred pounds, to name thirty-two perſons, marked in a liſt then delivered to him by Martin Tucker, eſq; ſub-collector of the port of Dublin, to be common-council men for the ſaid city. 3. That it appears, on the examination of Martin Tucker, eſq. that he was ſent to offer the ſaid ſum of five hundred pounds to alderman Ralph Gore, while ſir Conſtantine Phipps, knight, lord high-chancellor of Ireland, and lieutenant-general Ingoldſby, were lords-juſtices. 4. That the city of Dublin had, of late, been, and ſtill continued, in great diſorder and confuſion, by reaſon of the frequent diſapprobations of perſons elected lord-mayors and ſheriffs of the ſaid city, all of them of known affection to her majeſty's perſon and government, and to the conſtitution in church and ſtate. 5. That ſir Conſtantine Phipps had been the chief cauſe and promoter of ſuch frequent diſapprobations, and thereby the occaſion of the ſaid diſorder and confuſion. 6. That, ſince the making the new rules 1672, until ſir Conſtantine Phipps arrived in that kingdom, no perſon elected lord-mayor of the city of Dublin, had been diſapproved, except in the government of the earl of Tyrconnel. 7. That the council-board had not at this time, nor had not ſince the time (given them by the act of explanation) expired, any power to make rules or orders for regulating the election of magiſtrates in any corporation in that kingdom. 8. That the right of election of lord-mayor of Dublin is in the lord-mayor and aldermen of the ſaid city; and that the aldermen are in no ſort reſtrained, in the choice of the ſucceeding lord-mayor, to one of any three perſons nominated or propoſed, to be put in election by the lord-mayor'.

[n] We have a large account of his behaviour there, in a pamphlet printed at London in 1714, in 8vo. intitled, 'The Conduct of the Purſe in Ireland: In a letter to a member of the late Oxford Convocation, occaſioned by their having conferred the degree of doctor upon ſir Conſtantine Phipps'. The author obſerves, p. 10, 'That he will not take upon him ſo far to judge ſir Conſtantine, as to ſay, he was an enemy to the Proteſtant Intereſt and Proteſtant Succeſſion. I will, ſays he, ſuppoſe, that he might not have had any intention of prejudicing either the one or the other. But whether it hath happened through miſtake, or through paſſion, and too warm a purſuit of his own particular quarrels and reſentments, or of the reſentments of others; whether he hath been miſguided by the miſrepreſentations of men and things, or the true intereſt of the country, where he reſided, or of the true temper and genius of that people; whatſoever his intentions really were, I think I may very confidently affirm this, that, had a profeſſed enemy to the Proteſtant intereſt of that kingdom been placed in that government, when he was, ſuch perſon could not with any diſcretion or ſafety have purſued meaſures more likely to divide, weaken, and ſubvert the Proteſtant intereſt of that kingdom, than this doctor had purſued from the time of his landing there'. The author remarks, p. 19, that before ſir Conſtantine's arrival in Ireland, the inhabitants knew little of the diſtinction of Whig and Tory, of High-Church and Low-Church: Theſe diviſions had not affected them in any degree; the chief diſtinction amongſt them was that of Papiſt and Proteſtant. But ſoon after his arrival the diſtinctions of Whig and Tory were propagated with great induſtry, and thoſe, who were of the firſt claſs, fell under his diſpleaſure, and were diſplaced from their employments, and, as far as was in the power of him, or his wife, or their dependents, by their ſolicitations or influence to effect, they were removed from, or cramped in all manner of buſineſs or trade, by which they got their livelihood: And he deſcended ſo low, when in the government, as in perſon to ſolicit gentlemen to change their taylors, and their other tradeſmen, upon theſe accounts. Informers, or, as they call them, Lions, were encouraged to put themſelves into the companies of gentlemen, and to report to the government what was ſaid there. Several gentlemen of Weſt-Meath, for having only drank the health of the duke of Marlborough, and the late lord Godolphin, were accuſed by a fryar, one of the new converts, of having formed a plot againſt the government, and thereupon were ſent for in cuſtody of meſſengers. Other gentlemen were informed againſt for words of little or no ſignification. In a word, an end was put to almoſt all converſation, and to the intercourſe of all good offices, charity, and love amongſt Proteſtants. And though the diſcoveries were of very little ſignificance; yet the trouble given to gentlemen by theſe informations was ſo conſiderable, that the whole ſeemed as it were deſigned to convince Proteſtant gentlemen, that the government had no mind to let them meet together at all. The rooms of the gentlemen diſplaced (excepting the place of attorney and ſolicitor-general) were filled up for the moſt part with perſons of little or no fortunes, and ſuch as were moſt remarkable for a temper violent againſt the diſſenters, and moderate towards the Papiſts. Such, and the new converts, were chiefly the objects of his favour, and were brought into all ſtations, magiſtracies, and employments. But the corporations being in the hands of men, who were thankful for the Revolution, in order to reform them, the chief governors and the privy-council, having an authority of approving or diſapproving the elections of magiſtrates of moſt corporations in that kingdom, (which authority was veſted in them by act of parliament, only with intent to exclude Papiſts and perſons popiſhly inclined;) as it was not to be imagined, but in every corporation the doctor might find ſome one or two men willing to proſtitute themſelves to his will and pleaſure; ſo, having found ſuch, he prevailed with the majority of the privy-council to concur with him in diſapproving the election of every other than ſuch perſon; hereby ſtraining the power of approbation into that of a nomination. By this means ſeveral corporations conceiving they had a power of electing their own magiſtrates, and not willing to put their privileges into the hands of ſuch, as they thought they could not truſt, who were generally ſuch as your doctor had a mind for, they were obliged to infinite elections, returns, and attendances upon the privy-council; and, all being diſapproved, without any manner of reaſon given, ſome corporations continued without magiſtrates for ſeveral months; ſome for above a year; and, during ſuch time, in the utmoſt confuſion and diſorder, eſpecially in Dublin. There creditors had no way to recover their ſmall debts: There were no ſheriffs to execute writs upon any account; no criminals could be tried or executed; no mayor to correct the abuſes of the bread, and other markets: No juſtice could be had; and when his agents had raiſed a tumult againſt the aldermen and others (who conceived themſelves bound by oath to maintain the privileges of that corporation, one of which was the freedom of electing their own magiſtrates) by repreſenting them as factious perſons, who ſtew in the face of the government; in theſe diſorders there was no magiſtrate to keep the public peace; and when Proteſtants were knocking one another on the head, and the Papists were chearfully yielding their hand to that work; a young Proteſtant officer, who had charitably interpoſed with ſome ſoldiers to prevent bloodſhed, was confined, and threatened to be caſhiered for his pains, by a very good friend of your doctor's, if not at his requeſt. Thus hath the doctor divided and ſet the Proteſtants of Ireland together by the ears; he hath heightened their animoſities to a degree that hath never before been known in that country; inſomuch that, had the leaſt attempt been made upon that kingdom, they muſt in all probability have fallen an eaſy prey to their mortal enemies the Papiſts'.

ment to the Pretender's friends, that men were almoſt publickly inliſted into his ſervice; of which the commons took notice in their votes of the 22d of December. And the grand jury of the county of Dublin having made a preſentment of that traiterous practice, and laid it before the lord lieutenant, a proclamation was iſſued out for apprehending lieutenant Butler in lord Galway's regiment, who had inliſted William and Michael Letry to ſerve the Pretender, and told them, he had inliſted fourteen men more for the ſame purpoſe.

This parliament not being reliſhed by the miniſtry in England, the duke of Shrewſbury received orders to prorogue them; but, before he did it, he ſent for the ſpeaker of the houſe of commons out of the country, and told him, the queen was willing to give them an opportunity to do themſelves juſtice; but, if they did not proceed with unanimity at their next meeting, he had orders to diſſolve them. As the parliament was by no means diſpoſed to acquieſce in all the miniſter's meaſures (which was the meaning of proceeding with unanimity) they ſat no more in this reign. The duke himſelf did not much like his ſituation, and, having conſtant intelligence of the ill ſtate of the queen's health from Dr. Shadwell, one of her phyſicians [o], he thought it too dangerous for him to be abſent from court in ſo critical a juncture, as her deceaſe was likely to be. So he deſired and obtained leave to return to England. Chancellor Phipps and archbiſhop Lindſey, with the archbiſhop of Tuam, were appointed juſtices of Ireland [p].

In England all diſguiſe was now thrown off by the Jacobites, and the Pretender's right to the crown was publickly maintained in a large volume, called, 'The hereditary right of the crown of England aſſerted: The hiſtory of the ſucceſſion ſince the conqueſt cleared, and the true Engliſh conſtitution vindicated from the miſrepreſentations of Dr. Higden's view and defence', &c. The author, after having ſhewn in the introduction, 'that allegiance is not due to all powers in poſſeſſion' [q], endeavours to prove, 'That the people's ſubmiſſion to ſuch kings, as were not heirs to the crown by immediate deſcent, is no argument, that poſſeſſion gives right to allegiance'. And, to elude the force of Dr. Higden's arguments againſt Hereditary Right, grounded on the ſeveral deviations from the lineal deſcent in the ſucceſſion of the crown ſince the conqueſt, he maintains, that the kings of England had antiently a power of diſpoſing of the crown by teſtament: That the conſent, reſignation, and ceſſion of the rightful heir were certainly ſufficient to make kings de facto rightful: And that therefore ſubmiſſion might be paid them on one of theſe accounts'. This being a point very material to the author's deſign, he endeavours to evince it by the example of William the Conqueror, whom he aſſerts to have been a lawful king in both theſe regards, and juſtifies Edward the Confeſſor's nomination of him for his ſucceſſor [r]. Then he labours to prove, that William Rufus and Henry the firſt were alſo lawful kings. This done, he comes to king Stephen, whom he calls the firſt uſurper, and pretends, that, in his reign, the moſt turbulent of any, there were no footſteps of Dr. Higden's principle, of allegiance being due to kings de facto. On this occaſion the author mentions particularly the earl of Glouceſter, who owned himſelf bound in conſcience to the right of the empreſs Maud; the king of Scotland, who ſuffered much in defence of her right; and the behaviour of the clergy, who made a diſtinction between king Stephen and a king de jure; ſhews what influence the Pope's pretended power of ſetting up kings had in thoſe days; and aſſerts, That our hiſtorians date Stephen's reign from his agreement with Henry; which concurs with the author's main deſign, which is to eſtabliſh a teſtamentary and ceſſionary right, in order to account for the allegiance which, at divers times, the clergy, nobility, and people, have paid to unlawful poſſeſſors of the throne. In the ſame views he paſſes on to Henry the ſecond, whom he maintains to have been a rightful king, becauſe it is moſt probable, that his mother, the empreſs Maud, had reſigned her right to him. Here he anſwers Dr. Higden's argument from a paſſage in our Homilies; diſcovers a miſtake committed by the compilers of them; defends bishop Merks againſt Dr. Higden's reflections upon his pretended ſubmiſſion to Henry IV; argues againſt the doctor, who ſays, there were no nonjurors under kings de facto; and pretends, that ought to be preſumed, till the contrary is proved; and produces inſtances of ſeveral, that ought to be reputed ſuch. He alſo takes notice, that in thoſe days the inferior clergy were not obliged to take oaths of allegiance; and ſuggeſts, that, had the clergy of England enjoyed this privilege, at the time of the late revolution, near four hundred of them had quietly continued in poſſeſſion of their livings, of which they were for no other reaſon deprived, but becauſe they were nonjurors, &c. The author aſſerts, that a king de facto 'is not legally qualified to give a commiſſion to judges; nor are proceedings in his courts of judicature of any authority. He cannot create a nobleman, or make a biſhop. All his preſentations to benefices are voidable. All lands beſtowed upon him are reſumable, at the pleaſure of the rightful ſucceſſor'.

This book was not only advertiſed in the London Gazette, with particular allowance (as was then reported) of Mr. Secretary Bromley, but diſperſed and recommended with great induſtry; and many copies of it were given gratis, by ſome men in power, to ſeveral officers of the army. It was ſaid likewiſe to have been preſented to the queen herſelf by Mr. Robert Nelſon. As it was obvious to every reader, that the [o] He uſed to write to the duke and ducheſs of Shrewſbury under the name of J. Smith.

[p] The duke of Shrewſbury had reaſons, both of private and public concern, to wiſh himſelf in England. He had not been long in Dublin, before he found, that he was little more than the pageant of the government of Ireland, of which the main ſprings were in the lord-chancellor's hands: For, upon the deceaſe of Dr. Narciſſus Marſh, archbiſhop of Armagh, the duke deſigned to have advanced to that primacy his kinſman, Dr. Talbot, biſhop of Oxford: But, upon the recommendation of ſir Conſtantine Phipps, Dr. Lindſey, biſhop of Raphoe, was immediately preferred, as a perſon ready to go all lengths, to favour the ſcheme in hand. From this, and other inſtances, the duke began to ſurmiſe, either that the lord-treaſurer's profeſſed friendſhip ſlackened, or that his intereſt was upon the decline.

[q] In the introduction the author pretends, 'That the firſt time, the duty of paying allegiance to powers in poſſeſſion began to be taught in this kingdom, was, during the uſurpations, which ſucceeded the death of king Charles the First. That in all former revolutions the princes, who got poſſeſſion of the crown, claimed it by ſome right, and never inſiſted on poſſeſſion as right. But, the Rump parliament, and Cromwell, and the following uſurpers, having no tolerable pretence to any claim of right, their friends were reduced to a neceſſity of pleading poſſeſſion, as a right to obedience; and ſeveral books were then publiſhed by Papiſts, Fanatics, and Deiſts, to enforce and prove it. But that this principle was then generally rejected by all the members of the church of England, and by many Preſbyterians, who maintained, that allegiance was due to the rightful king, who was not in poſſeſſion. That, after the reſtoration, the acts and judicial proceedings of the governments preceding were all null and void, except ſuch as were authorized by a new law. And it was declared by an act of parliament, that all the ſaid powers before in poſſeſſion were 'rebellious, wicked, traiterous, abominable uſurpations, deteſted by this preſent parliament'. That here the conſtitution was again reſettled on its antient foundation, not in poſſeſſion, which all the uſurpers had, but upon the undoubted right of the lawful heir, who had been out of poſſeſſion, and of his heirs and lawful ſucceſſors: And that, agreeably to this conſtitution in that reign, it was the conſtant doctrine of lawyers and divines, that allegiance was not due to all powers in poſſeſſion. That the revolution, which happened after, was begun, carried on, ended, and juſtified on theſe grounds, that allegiance was not due to all kings in poſſeſſion: That king James was lawfully deprived; and that king William and queen Mary were lawfully put in poſſeſſion. But theſe poſitions did not ſuit with the principles of many lawyers and divines, who had conſtantly maintained, that the depoſition of a lawful king was abſolutely unlawful, by the law of God, and the laws of this kingdom. Therefore, to juſtify the tranſlation of their allegiance, the former opinion, that ſeemed buried at the reſtoration, was revived; viz. That allegiance was due to all powers in poſſeſſion; and many eminent members of the church of England received it, as conſiſtent with the doctrine of Non-reſiſtance. That divers treatiſes were then publiſhed by divines and lawyers to defend it; particularly, 'The unreaſonableneſs of a new ſeparation and the caſe of allegiance due to ſovereign power'. That the inſtances of hiſtory and parliament records, uſed in the firſt, were enquired into by an exact and faithful hiſtorian, and unanſwerably refuted: And the arguments of the laſt, from Scripture and reaſon, the doctrine of the church, and the laws of the kingdom, were refuted likewiſe by ſeveral writers. That no reply of moment being made, that controverſy ſeemed to be buried again, till Dr. Higden thought fit to examine the diſpute again, and was convinced, that allegiance was due to kings in fact, by laws divine and human. But that, as the doctor's opinion makes the moſt unjuſt poſſeſſion (as was Oliver's) rightful, and deſtroys the hereditary right, ſo long eſtabliſhed by the conſtitution, the author has followed him through all his labyrinths, refuted his arguments, and rectified his errors.

[r] What the author inſinuates on this occaſion deſerves particular notice: 'If it be ſaid that Edward the Confeſſor was an unjuſt poſſeſſor, his nephew, by his elder brother, being then living, to whom he ought to have reſigned the crown: I anſwer, that, when hiſtories are ſilent, it does not become private men to be forward in paſſing judgments on the actions of princes. The authors, who have tranſmitted to us an account of Edward's reign, ſay nothing upon this ſubject; either that the deſcendants of Edward Ironſide laid claim to the crown; or that king Edward diſcovered any inclination to do them juſtice, at leaſt till the eleventh year of his reign: But it may, poſſibly, be unreaſonable from hence to infer, that all that time he was a wrongful poſſeſſor, becauſe caſes may be ſuppoſed of princes, who, for want of power and opportunity of doing right to the lawful heir, are forced to endure the burden of a crown, which they would readily and gladly caſe themſelves of, upon a proper occaſion: As when the rightful heir is abroad, in a diſtant kingdom, and perhaps at the diſpoſal of a foreign prince, on whoſe will and pleaſure, his return to his country chiefly depends. When the poſſeſſor of a throne has this to plead for himſelf (which may be true of king Edward, for any thing that can be alledged to the contrary) I may appeal to the ſevereſt interpreters of the actions of princes, whether the exerciſe of royal power, in ſuch circumſtances, can be charged with uſurpation; or, as ſome chuſe rather to expreſs themſelves, whether ſuch a perſon is only a king de facto: For it is not the bare ſeizing, and filling a throne, but the will of the poſſeſſor, that muſt denominate him an uſurper. He that invades another's right, with an intention to detain it from him, and a reſolution never to reſtore it to the true proprietor, is certainly guilty of the higheſt injuſtice; but, if he accepts of a crown, only that he may ſecure it to the right owner, and the better diſappoint the deſigns of his enemies, moſt certainly he obliges him by a very extraordinary act of friendſhip'.

deſign of this performance was to prepare the way for the reſtoration of the Pretender, the well-affected to the houſe of Hanover could not but be alarmed at it; eſpecially, as the book came abroad with marks of diſtinction and public countenance; not to mention the quotations in it, out of ſome manuſcripts in the library of the lord-treaſurer. However, the miniſtry thought it neceſſary to animadvert upon it; and Mr. Richard Smith, the bookſeller, having, by a warrant from the lord Bolingbroke, been brought to his office, and there examined, he declared, that Mr. Hilkiah Bedford, a nonjuring clergyman, had delivered the copy to the printer. This being owned by Bedford, they were both bound over to appear before the court of Queen's-Bench. But, though a proſecution was afterwards, for form-ſake, begun and carried on againſt Bedford, yet it was the general opinion, that he had but a ſmall ſhare in that performance, which was judged to be the reſult of the joint labours of ſeveral nonjurors[s]. This book was ſoon refuted in ſeveral anſwers, of which one was ſuppoſed to be written by Mr. Wills, then fellow of All-Souls college in Oxford, and now lord-chief-juſtice of the Common-Pleas, intitled, 'The preſent conſtitution and the Proteſtant Succeſſion vindicated'.

About this time it was publickly declared, that the queen had granted a pardon under the great-ſeal to Daniel de Foe, againſt whom an information of high treaſon had been lodged, for writing three pamphlets, which ſeemed to favour the Pretender's intereſts [t].

By this time the elections for parliament-men were over; and, in North-Britain, the nobility had choſen ſuch repreſentatives, as were moſt of them ready to concur in all the queen's meaſures; namely, the duke of Athol, the earls of Mar, Eglinton, Kinnoul, Loudoun, Findlater and Seafield, Selkirk, Northeſk, Dundonald, Broadalbin, Dunmore, Orkney, Roſeberry, Portmore, and Kilſyth, and the lord Balmerinoch: And, in order to attach yet more the earl of Dunmore to the court, he was, not long after, declared colonel of the Scots regiment of foot-guards, in the room of the marquis of Lothian. About the ſame time, the regiment of dragoons, lately commanded by ſir Richard Temple, was given to major-general Evans; and the regiment of horſe of the marquis of Harwich (ſon of the duke of Schomberg) lately deceaſed, to major-general Syburg. Some time before, Mr. Richatd Steele, being choſen for the borough of Stockbridge, thought fit to reſign his place of one of the commiſſioners of the Stamp-office. About the ſame time the lord Willoughby of Brooke, was made dean of St. George's chapel, in the caſtle of Windſor; but Dr. Smalridge, being named to ſucceed the lord Privy-Seal, as biſhop of Briſtol, declined that offer.

On the 18th of October, the parliament was, by proclamation, further prorogued, from the 12th of November to the 10th of December, which was occaſioned by the queen's illneſs, and the conteſts among the miniſters. It was then ſtrongly reported, that the lord Bolingbroke, Mr. Secretary Bromley, and ſir William Wyndham (who, on the 1ſt of November, was made a privy-counſellor) having gained the aſcendant, the lord-treaſurer entertained thoughts of retirement. And, indeed, the author of the paper, called the Examiner, thought fit, about the middle of November, to prepare the minds of the people for an approaching change in the miniſtry [u]. But what appeared more ſurprizing, was the ludicrous ſtile in which the ſame author, who was the the mouth of thoſe in power, ſpoke of the queen's indiſpoſition, and of the ſucceſſion in caſe of a demiſe. [w].

Whilſt things were in this dangerous ſituation, Mr. Steele publiſhed his 'Criſis, or a diſcourſe repreſenting, from the moſt authentic records, the juſt cauſes of the late happy revolution, and the ſeveral ſettlements of the crowns of England and Scotland on her majeſty; and, on her demiſe without iſſue, upon the moſt illuſtrious princeſs Sophia, electreſs and ducheſs-dowager of Hanover, and the heirs of her body being Proteſtants; by previous acts of both parliaments of the late kingdoms of England and Scotland; and confirmed by the parliament of Great-Britain: With ſome remarks on the danger of a Popiſh Succeſſor'. The deſign of this piece was firſt ſuggeſted to Mr. Steele, by Mr. Moor of the Inner-Temple; and the work itſelf paſſed through the hands of Mr. Addiſon, Mr. Lechmere, and Mr. Hoadley. And it was ſo well received by the public, that many were confirmed by it in their affection to the Proteſtant Succeſſion.

Some time before, the earl of Peterborough ſet out on his ambaſſy to the king of Sicily; and, as he took Paris in his way, it was given out, that he was charged to intercede with the French king in favour of the Catalans, who, formerly, upon his promiſes of the queen's firm protection, had declared for king Charles the Third; and who, though abandoned, ſeemed now reſolved to defend their liberties to the laſt extremity.

All this while the queen continued in a very dangerous ſtate of health at Windſor; of which various accounts were ſpread abroad; but the truth was thus, as repreſented by Dr. Shadwell, in his letters to the duke and ducheſs of Shrewſbury: 'On Wedneſday the 23d of December, her majeſty was very uneaſy all night with the gout in her foot. The next morning it went entirely off, and ſhe ſaid ſhe was well. But, about one o'clock that day, ſhe complained of a pain in her thigh, and was ſeized with a violent ſhivering, which laſted above two hours. Extreme heat followed, with intenſe thirſt, great anxiety, reſtleſsneſs, and inquietude. The pulſe was full, hard, and quick; which Dr. Shadwell finding, the next day, he very much preſſed bleeding, urging, it would probably carry off a good part of the fever, and bring a fit of the gout; but it was not agreed to; and theſe ſymptoms continued till Saturday morning, when her majeſty fell aſleep, waked refreſhed, and on Sunday morning there was a perfect intermiſſion of the ſymptoms; but the pulſe, in Dr. Shadwell's opinion was not quiet. The next night about twelve, ſhe was attacked with an exacerbation of the fever, which laſted all the Monday till midnight. Moſt of the queen's phyſicians judging her diſtemper to be an ague, propoſed and [s] In the introduction to one of the anſwers, called 'Treaſon unmaſk'd', the author ſays, 'This book contains a great variety of hiſtorical facts, poſitions and arguments, couched in an elegant, flowing ſtyle; but then there are in it ſo many glaring contradictions and inconſiſtencies, that it is hardly credible, the whole piece ſhould be the work of any one man. For here any tolerably attentive reader may find hiſtory claſhing with hiſtory; law deſtroying law; and divinity refuting divinity, in caſes exactly parallel: A fault I will not charge upon any ſingle perſon, till I am convinced that a too favourable opinion of gentlemen, and men of letters, led me into a miſtake'. But it is now known that the real author of the book was one Mr. Harbin, a nonjuring clergyman, who died in the year 1744.

[t] The firſt intitled, 'Reaſons againſt the ſucceſſion of the houſe of Hanover, with an inquiry, how far the abdication of king James, ſuppoſing it to be legal, ought to affect the perſon of the Pretender': The ſecond intitled, 'And what if the Pretender ſhould come? Or ſome conſiderations of the advantages and real conſequences of the Pretender's poſſeſſing the crown of Great-Britain'. And the third called, 'An anſwer to the queſtion that no body thinks of, viz. What if the queen ſhould die? The preamble to the patent of pardon ſet forth, that Daniel de Foe had by his humble petition repreſented to her majeſty, 'That he, with a ſincere deſign to propagate the intereſt of the houſe of Hanover, and to animate the people againſt the deſigns of the Pretender, whom he always looked upon as an enemy to her majeſty's ſacred perſon and government, did publiſh the ſaid pamphlets; in all which books, although the titles ſeemed to look as if written in favour of the Pretender, and ſeveral expreſſions, as in all ironical writings it muſt be, might be wreſted againſt the true deſign of the whole, and turned to a meaning quite different from the intention of the author; yet he had humbly aſſured her majeſty in the ſolemneſt manner that his true and only deſign, in all the ſaid books, was, by an ironical diſcourſe of recommending the Pretender, in the ſtrongeſt and moſt forcible manner to expoſe his deſigns, and the ruinous conſequences of his ſucceeding therein; which will appear by the books themſelves, where the following expreſſions are very plain, viz. That the Pretender is recommended 'as a perſon proper to amaſs the Engliſh liberties into his own ſovereignty; ſupply them with the privileges of wearing wooden ſhoes; eaſing them of the trouble of chuſing parliaments, and the nobility and gentry of the hazard and expence of winter journies, by governing them in that more righteous method of his abſolute will, and inforcing the laws by a glorious ſtanding army; paying all the nation's debts at once by ſtopping the funds, and ſhutting up the Exchequer; eaſing and quieting their differences in religion, by bringing them to the union of Popery, or leaving them at liberty to have no religion at all'. Daniel De Foe's appeal to honour and juſtice. p. 33.

[u] In the Examiner of November the 16th, the author ſuggeſts, 'That in a conſtitution, which hangs together by ſo many minute parts, and which depends upon ſuch variety of wheels and motions, where power and freedom are in a perpetual flux and reflux, we muſt of neceſſity be liable to turns and contingencies——That this uncertainty is redoubled, wherever ſtrife and contention are let looſe in a nation, where factions rage and worry one another; and even the government itſelf is treated as a party——Thus, under theſe circumſtances, a miniſtry is obliged to act in another capacity than that which properly belongs to them. They muſt ſometimes act like military as well as civil officers; draw forth their forces, and appear at the head of ſquadrons and battalions, whenever faction takes the field, and declares open war againſt them. There wants but very little of bringing things, as they now ſtand, to this deplorable criſis——That the poſſeſſion of power under theſe difficulties, is almoſt as great an uncertainty, as the fortune of war, and ſtands expoſed to as many turns and croſs accidents——And that theſe conſiderations amount to a full proof, that the beſt of patriots are more expoſed to mortality, as miniſters of ſtate, than as men, &c.

[w] The Examiner of January the 8th, 1713-14, contains what follows:

'According to the beſt advices ſent us by the Whigs, and their oracles, the demiſe of the crown happened upon Thurſday the 24th of December, being Chriſtmas-Eve, at four of the clock in the morning, in the year 1713. All ages, ranks, ſexes, and orders of men, at firſt hearing of the ill news, were affected with the deepeſt ſorrow; and a general panic ran through the whole kingdom. For a long time, we were diſtracted and inconſolable; in the utmoſt horror and confuſion, upon the loſs of our moſt excellent queen, who then became immortal: But theſe black clouds were ſoon diſperſed, our fears and jealouſies vaniſhed, and we revived from a deplorable ſtate of grief and miſery, at the firſt joyful tidings of the happy acceſſion of her moſt ſacred majeſty queen Anne the ſecond (whom God long preſerve) to the throne of her anceſtors: The nature of our monarchy being ſuch, that, immediately after the death of the perſon in poſſeſſion, the crown, by right of inheritance, deſcends to the next heir, without any previous formalities and conditions, or admitting ſo much as the leaſt vacancy, or interregnum, &c.

preſſed the giving her the Jeſuits-bark; but, though this was warmly oppoſed by Dr. Shadwell, yet the phyſician, who watched that night, gave it, ſaying, he found the pulſe calm. No exacerbation appeared after this: But nevertheleſs Dr. Shadwell ſtill declared, he did not like the pulſe: That there was no perfect intermiſſion of the fever; but that the pulſe was at work, to ſeparate the morbific matter into the gout, or ſome worſe ſhape. The pains of the thigh increaſing, till three or four doſes of the bark were given, Dr. Shadwell laid a ſtreſs upon having that part examined; but the other phyſicians called it a fit of the gout. Dr. Shadwell anſwered, it could not properly be called ſo in the muſcles; and being of opinion, that this was an inflammatory fever from the tranſlation of the gout, and not a common ague, or intermitting fever; and finding, that, after thirty-nine hours continuance, there was a perfect remiſſion, but no intermiſſion, he made a prognoſtic, that, unleſs the feveriſh matter were ſeparated and thrown off into a ſmart fit of the gout, a worſe ſymptom might happen; as its falling into the thigh, and fixing into an eryſipelous tumour. This opinion was juſtified by a ſevere fit of the gout, that came upon her majeſty a few days after, and gave ſome hopes of her entire recovery'.

While the queen was in this uncertain ſtate of health, the minds of the ſeveral parties were variouſly agitated. The friends of the Pretender believed, that all things were preparing for his reſtoration; and, on the other hand, the alarm of the well-affected to the Hanoverian Succeſſion was not a little increaſed upon the news, that a ſquadron of fourteen men of war was fitting out in the ports of France; and that they were to take on board twelve or fourteen thouſand landmen. The public funds fell gradually from the beginning till the end of January; when ſuch a panic ſeized on a ſudden the monied men, that there was a great run upon the bank for ſome days. The directors ſent four of their members to the lord-treaſurer, to repreſent the dangers which threatened the public credit, and to deſire his advice and aſſiſtance. The treaſurer received this application very favourably; endeavoured to diſpel their fears; and promiſed to uſe his utmoſt endeavours to ſupport the bank in this exigency. The doubts, which were ſtill entertained about the queen's health, being one of the chief occaſions of the public alarm, ſhe, by the advice of her miniſters, wrote the following letter to ſir Samuel Stanier, lord-mayor of London:

Anne, R.

"Right truſty and well-beloved, we greet you well. Although an aguiſh indiſpoſition ſucceeded by a fit of the gout has detained us at this place, longer than we deſigned; yet ſince it has pleaſed Almighty God to reſtore us to ſuch a degree of health, that we hope to be able ſoon to return to our uſual reſidence, we continue determined to open our parliament on Tueſday the 16th of this inſtant February, according to the notice given by proclamation. Thus much we have judged proper to communicate to you, and by you to the court of aldermen, and to our loving ſubjects of our good city of London, to the intent that you may all, in your ſeveral ſtations, contribute to diſcountenance and put a ſtop to thoſe malicious rumours, ſpread by evil-minded perſons, to the prejudice of credit, and to the imminent hazard of the public peace and tranquillity. And ſo we bid you farewell".

Given at our caſtle at Windſor, the firſt day of February 1713, in the twelfth year of our reign.

By her majeſty's command,

Bolingbroke.

This letter, and the news, which, at the ſame time, came from Holland, That the troops, which had been reported to be aſſembled in the Bologneſe, were mere chimeras, and that the Pretender continued in Lorrain, diſpelled the fears of the generality, and ſoon put a ſtop to the run upon the bank[x]. While the nation was in this ferment, and under various apprehenſions, there was publiſhed a remarkable pamphlet, intitled, 'The art of reſtoring; or the piety and probity of general Monk, in bringing about the laſt Reſtoration, evinced from his own authentic letters: With a juſt account of ſir Roger, who runs the parallel as far as he can: In a letter to a miniſter of ſtate at the court of Vienna'. This piece was levelled againſt the treaſurer, and contributed the more to render him obnoxious to the friends of the Proteſtant Succeſſion, when it was known to be the performance of Mr. Toland, a perſon formerly intruſted and employed by that miniſter. To remove theſe ſuſpicions, the treaſurer thought fit to have the reputed author of the late treatiſe, aſſerting hereditary right, brought to his trial; and Bedford being found guilty of publiſhing that book, he was ſentenced, 'To pay a fine of a thouſand marks; to be committed to the Queen's-Bench priſon, till he paid the ſame; to remain in cuſtody there for the term of three years; to find four ſufficient ſureties, who, with him, were to be bound in a recognizance of five thouſand pounds for his good behaviour during life. He was alſo to be brought into all the courts of Weſtminſter-hall, with a paper on his head denoting his offence. But, after ſentence was paſſed, an order was produced from the government, counterſigned by a ſecretary of ſtate, directing the judges of the Queen's-Bench to ſuperſede the ignominious part of the puniſhment, by reaſon of the ſacred function of the criminal; which proceeding, as Mr. Lechmere obſerved in a ſpeech, 'could bear no other conſtruction, than as a licence and protection to men in holy orders, to propagate that deſtructive poſition with impunity; and the character of the perſon, which ought in juſtice to have aggravated his guilt, and heightened his puniſhment, became his indemnity againſt the reproach of it, even by the authority of the government itſelf, againſt which that treatiſe was levelled. This indulgence appeared the more glaring, conſidering what ſeverities were, at the ſame time, exerciſed againſt thoſe perſons, who had courage enough to aſſert the intereſt of their country, and of the Proteſtant Succeſſion'.

During theſe tranſactions at home, the treaty of peace between Great-Britain and Spain had been ſigned on the 13th of July, 1713, N. S. but the treaty of commerce was not concluded till the 28th of November O. S. In the mean time the emperor choſe rather to make a bold ſtand againſt the whole power of France, than to accept the conditions impoſed upon him by that crown. But the loſs of Landau and Friburg, after two memorable ſieges, inclined him to hearken to overtures of peace, made him on the part of France, by the electors of Cologne and Palatine.

The conferences held at Radſtadt towards a treaty between prince Eugene of Savoy and the marſhal de Villars were managed with ſuch ſecrecy, as gave no ſmall uneaſineſs to the two maritime powers, and was generally looked upon as a ſlight upon Great-Britain. The earl of Strafford, who ſtill continued at the Hague, was ordered to confer upon it with the deputies of the ſtates, to whom he made a long harangue. The ſubſtance of what he ſaid will be plainly ſeen, in the anſwer returned by the ſtates a few days after to the earl of Strafford: 'They thanked him for the aſſurances of friendſhip he gave them on the part of her majeſty of Great-Britain, and offered to concert with her the meaſures proper to be taken for the ſecurity of the Proteſtant religion, eſpecially in the empire, and for procuring the abolition of the clauſe of the fourth article of the peace of Ryſwick. As to the apprehenſion of a new war in Italy, the ſtates hoped, that, by the peace of Radſtadt, the emperor and the king of France had provided for the tranquillity of that country; and that they had likewiſe regulated the affairs relating to the duke of Savoy, and to Sicily; for this reaſon, and becauſe the conditions of that peace were not yet known to them, they could not, at preſent, enter into deliberation with the earl of Strafford upon thoſe matters. That as to the treaty with Spain, the ſtates had the regards they ought to her majeſty's recommendations, for the intereſts of the princeſs Urſini; but that they had given ſuch good reaſons, why they could not agree in a guarantee, that the king of France, and even the king of Spain, had acquieſced in them. That, for this reaſon, the ſtates promiſed themſelves, from the queen's goodneſs and equity, that ſhe would not inſiſt upon a thing, which even the king of Spain himſelf had let drop. That, as to the affairs of the Spaniſh Netherlands, the ſtates would always be ready to confer with the earl of Strafford on the points relating to the intereſts of thoſe countries. As to the town of Oſtend in particular, they declared, that they would withdraw their troops from thence, and deliver it into the hands of Walloon troops, as ſoon as Dunkirk ſhould be demoliſhed; provided, at the ſame time they were put into poſſeſſion of the caſtle of Ghent, as by the treaty of barrier they ought: But that the ſtates were abſolutely of opinion, it would be proper to communicate theſe things to the emperor, and to act in concert with him, it not being to be doubted, that the Spaniſh Netherlands were yielded to him by the peace of Radſtadt. That they were extremely glad of the declarations her majeſty had cauſed to be made to them, of her willingneſs to withdraw her troops from the caſtle of Ghent; as alſo from Bruges and Newport; and to aſſiſt the ſtates in recovering from Brabant the million, which by the treaty of barrier they ought to have from that province: But as to the conditions, which were added to that declaration, the ſtates expected from her equity and affection, that it would not be her intention, that the effect of theſe things ſhould be made dependant on ſome conditions, which were not expreſſed in the treaty of barrier, and that, on the contrary, ſhe would be pleaſed to look upon that treaty as a meaſure and a rule, as the ſtates did on their part; and that they would not join the execution of it to conditions, which are new and foreign to that treaty. That they had a common intereſt with the queen in ſecuring the freedom of commerce in the Baltic: That they were not yet in a condition to take a poſitive reſolution thereupon; but, when they were, they would confer about it with the earl of Strafford'.

[x] The Directors, however, were obliged to call in, twice, twenty per cent. upon the ſubſcription for circulating Exchequer bills.

The earl was very buſy in negotiating with the miniſters of the Proteſtant princes of Germany, or deputations from the Proteſtants, to aſſiſt at the congreſs at Baden in Swiſſerland, for concluding a peace between the emperor and France, purſuant to the reſolution taken at Radſtadt. But it was generally ſuſpected, that this proceeding of the Engliſh miniſtry was rather to perplex the emperor, than to favour the Proteſtants; and therefore, when the earl of Strafford declared to the miniſters of the Proteſtant electors and princes of the empire, 'That the queen, his miſtreſs, had received the letter, which the Proteſtant body had written to her from Augſburg, touching the clauſe of the fourth article of the treaty of Ryſwick: That her majeſty would ſpeedily return a favourable anſwer to it; and that ſhe reſolved to ſend a miniſter to the congreſs at Baden, whither ſhe deſired the States-general and the Proteſtant ſtates of the empire to ſend theirs'; The States anſwered, 'That, the empire having referred it to his Imperial majeſty to conclude the peace, it was believed, the electors and princes would not ſend any miniſters thither; and, for that reaſon, they did not think it proper to ſend any on their part'. It ſeems, the ſtates had been given to underſtand, that the emperor would not admit any miniſter from the queen of Great-Britain, (though ſhe had appointed Mr. Charles Whitworth for that purpoſe) nor from them, that there might be no diſtinction.

On the other hand, the emperor, to ſhew his reſentment of the negotiation at Utrecht, not only reſolved to conclude his treaty with France, without the intervention of the maritime powers; but, as a further mortification to Great-Britain, baron Heems declared to the ſtates-deputies, 'That his Imperial majeſty was diſpoſed to treat with the ſtates, concerning a barrier in the Netherlands: That the treaty might be prepared and brought to ſome maturity at the Hague; but that the emperor would be glad to have it concluded at Vienna, whither the ſtates were deſired to ſend a miniſter: And that Oſtend might not be alienated from the Netherlands'. The ſtates-deputies having acquainted the earl of Strafford with this declaration, he expreſſed his great ſurprize at it, and told them, 'He was obliged to inform them, that the ſtates were guarantees of the Succeſſion in the Proteſtant line, as well as the queen was guarantee of the barrier in the Spaniſh Netherlands; and that the Proteſtant Succeſſion ſhould ſtand good, and have effect, as it ſhould come in order; but that ſhe would never ſuffer any laws to be preſcribed or impoſed upon her on that account. That the queen, as well as the ſtates, was intereſted in the affair of the barrier; and therefore no ſtep ought to be taken in it, without acting in concert with her: That he had orders to declare, in the name of the queen, that the treating and concluding on the barrier at Vienna ſeemed to be propoſed, with intention only to exclude her from the negotiations about it: That, in ſuch a caſe, ſhe would forthwith renounce all engagements with the republic; for that ſhe abſolutely inſiſted upon ſending a miniſter likewiſe thither, for the reaſons before-mentioned: That ſhe had ſent to the king of France for an explanation, touching the exchanging ſome places in the Spaniſh Netherlands, according to the treaty of Radſtadt, and had received for anſwer, that the king of France would not concern himſelf therein: That, as to what baron Heems had mentioned in relation to Oſtend, he (the earl of Strafford,) declared, he was content with it; but earneſtly deſired, that the ſtates would not ſend to Vienna, nor do any thing in this negotiation, but in concert with her majeſty: Adding, once more, that, purſuant to his orders, he muſt declare, that ſhe would look upon ſuch a proceeding as a formed deſign to diſſolve all engagements now ſubſiſting between her and the ſtates'. Had the Dutch been as warm as the Britiſh miniſters, and taken them at their word, the conſequences muſt have been fatal to both: But the matter was accommodated afterwards. The earl of Strafford endeavoured to draw to the Hague the negotiation of peace in the north; and engaged the court of France by monſieur de Chateauneuf, their ambaſſador at the Hague, to offer their mediation for that purpoſe to the northern allies. But, the king of Pruſſia having cauſed the king of Poland to be ſounded, whether he was inclined to enter into the engagement baron Sparre and the count de Rottenburg had propoſed at the Hague, on the part o France, his Poliſh majeſty ſignified, that he could never have any ſuch thoughts, for it could never be his intereſt to ſeparate himſelf from his allies.

By this time the earl of Strafford, and indeed all the miniſters at the Hague were more attentive to the tranſactions in Great-Britain, than to any thing, that paſſed on the Continent. The queen, upon her recovery, being informed of the death of Dr. Sharp, archbiſhop of York, named ſir William Dawes to that metropolitan ſee, which had been ſtrongly ſolicited by biſhop Atterbury. At the ſame time, Dr. Smalridge was made biſhop of Briſtol, and lord almoner to the queen; and Dr. Gaſtrell, preacher at Lincoln's-Inn, biſhop of Cheſter, in the room of ſir William Dawes. The ſecond troop of horſe grenadier guards, vacant by the death of the earl of Crawford, was given to the young earl Mariſchal, a Scots peer of known zeal for the Jacobite cauſe.

On the 6th of February, being the anniverſary of the queen's birth-day, it was celebrated with great ſolemnity; and the Whigs, particularly the Hanover Club, took this occaſion to ſignalize their zeal and affection to the Proteſtant Succeſſion, by cauſing the effigies of the devil, the pope, and the pretender, to be carried in proceſſion from Charing-Croſs to the Royal-Exchange, and ſo back to Charing-Croſs, where they were burnt. Three drummers of the foot-guards attending the proceſſion, and having, contrary to the rights of the city, beat their drums there, were ſeized, and committed to Newgate by warrant of the lord-mayor. Some endeavoured to repreſent this proceſſion as a formed plot againſt the government; but, the miniſtry not thinking proper to take notice of the affair, the drummers were diſcharged.

Whatever profeſſions of affection to the Proteſtant Succeſſion were made by ſome of the miniſters, it was obvious, that every ſtep, others took in favour of France, was alſo in favour of the Pretender. The treaſurer, during the queen's illneſs, endeavoured to perſuade her to ſend the duke of Kent to Hanover, with a public character. But the duke declined the employment, unleſs he was impowered to offer more real ſecurities than fair words and promiſes. However, Mr. Harley, couſin to the treaſurer, went from the Hague to the court of Hanover, about the middle of February, accompanied by Secretary Bromley's ſon, Mr. Creſſet, and Mr. Winnington.

The queen, on the 16th of February, removed from Windſor to Hampton-Court, and next day came to St. James's. The day before, the new parliament met, and the lord Scudamore propoſed ſir Thomas Hanmer for ſpeaker, and was ſeconded by three or four other members, particularly by Mr. Steele, who obſerved, 'That, at the cloſe of the laſt parliament, her majeſty was graciouſly pleaſed to declare from the throne, that the late rejected bill of commerce between Great-Britain and France ſhould be offered to this houſe. That this declaration was certainly made, that every gentleman, who ſhould have the honour to be returned to parliament, might make himſelf maſter of that important queſtion. That it is a demonſtration, that was a moſt pernicious bill; and therefore no man could have a greater merit to this houſe, than his by whoſe weight and authority that pernicious bill was thrown out. That he roſe up to do ſir Thomas Hanmer honour, and diſtinguiſh himſelf by giving that gentleman his vote for that his ineſtimable ſervice to his country'. At Mr. Steele's mentioning the Bill of Commerce, the clamour againſt him began; at calling it pernicious, it increaſed; and at the words, 'doing him honour', it grew inſupportably loud: By which he ſaw the temper of the houſe with regard to himſelf. But ſir Thomas Hanmer was choſen without any oppoſition, and the houſe adjourned to the 2d of March.

During the adjournment, the South-ſea company held a general court, in which the directors communicated to them ſeveral papers they had prepared in concert with the lord-treaſurer, relating to the Aſſiento Contract. Several members were extremely ſurpriſed at the propoſals; for, whereas they expected that the queen had procured the whole Aſſiento Contract for the company, they now found, that one half of the clear profits were reſerved for the queen, and the king of Spain, beſides ſeven and a half per cent. granted to an unknown perſon. Beſides theſe exceptions, Mr. Milner, a Portugal merchant, declared his opinion, 'That the company might very well ſpare the trying the experiment of a trade, by which other nations were known to have been loſers; eſpecially upon ſuch terms, as were offered to the company; the rather, becauſe the trade would be precarious, and at the mercy of the late reconciled enemies.' He was ſupported by other merchants, ſo that Arthur Moore, who ſpoke in behalf of this trade, could not make any proſelytes to his opinion. The reſult of this aſſembly was an order for the printing of the papers laid before them, in order to their being further conſidered in another general court. This ſecond meeting was very numerous; and after the reading of the papers, ſeveral ſpeeches were made for and againſt the accepting the Aſſiento Contract, of which Mr. Moore and Mr. Ward endeavoured to ſhew the great advantages. But Mr. Craggs, Mr. Newman, Mr. Fiſher, and ſome other gentlemen of great ſkill and experience in commercial affairs, maintained the contrary opinion, with ſuch force of argument, that it was thought, if the queſtion had then been put for accepting, or not accepting, it would have been carried for the latter by a great majority. But it being moved and agreed, to decide the queſtion by ballot, and the members to have one vote for every five hundred pounds capital ſtock; what by the influence of the directors, who were to be the managers of the trade, and who (as in all other ſocieties of this nature) were almoſt ſure to be gainers, whatever became of the reſt; what by the contrivance of ſtock-jobbers, whoſe buſineſs was to keep the public funds in perpetual fluctuation, and, in order to that, to engage companies in dubious adventures; what by the juſt apprehenſions, the generality of the members were under that the rejecting of this trade would be interpreted as an affront to the lord-treaſurer, who might reſent it to ſuch a degree, as to grow leſs ſolicitous for the concerns of the company, who wanted his protection for the annual proviſion of the intereſt of the capital ſtock, till the year 1716: Upon theſe, and ſome other conſiderations it was carried by a great majority, 'That the general court agreed with the reſolution propoſed by the court of directors, relating to the Aſſiento Contract'.

About the ſame time, were brought over from Holland the ratifications exchanged of the treaty of commerce between Great-Britain and Spain, and the peace was proclaimed on the 1ſt of March. The chief articles were: France and Spain were never to be united: The Proteſtant Succeſſion acknowledged, and never to be oppoſed on any pretence: Navigation and commerce, as in the treaty of 1667: No licence to be given to the French or other nations to introduce negroes, or any merchandiſes, into the Spaniſh dominions in America, except what might be agreed by the treaty of commerce, and the privileges granted in the Aſſiento de Negroes; except alſo what ſhould be granted by the Catholic king, after the Aſſiento de Negroes ſhould be determined: The American dominions were not to be alienated from the crown of Spain, to the French or other nations: Gibraltar and the iſland of Minorca were given up for ever to England: No Moors to come there, but on account of traffic: All the Spaniſh inhabitants to enjoy their eſtates and religion; or to ſell their eſtates and retire: The South-ſea company to have the privileges, incluſive of others, to introduce negroes into ſeveral parts of America for thirty years, beginning from 1713, in the ſame manner as enjoyed by the French: The Catalans to have a full pardon, with the poſſeſſion of all their privileges, eſtates, and honours, and likewiſe the ſame privileges with the inhabitants of both Caſtiles: Sicily was yielded to the duke of Savoy, but to return to Spain, in caſe of no heirs. By two ſeparate articles, the queen promiſed to perſiſt in the meaſures, by which ſhe had taken care, that no other part of the Spaniſh monarchy ſhould be torn from it: and obliged herſelf to procure the princeſs Urſini to be put into poſſeſſion of Limburg, or ſome other country in the Netherlands, which ſhould produce thirty thouſand crowns a year, purſuant to a grant from king Philip, September 28, 1711.

The day after the publication of this peace, the queen went in a chair to the houſe of lords (the parliament having been opened by commiſſion) and made the following ſpeech to both houſes:

My lords and gentlemen,

"I Have much ſatisfaction in being able, at the opening of this parliament, to tell you, that the ratifications of the treaties of peace and of commerce with Spain are exchanged, by which my ſubjects will have greater opportunities than ever to improve and extend their trade. Many advantages, formerly enjoyed by connivance, and procured by ſuch methods, as made a diſtinction between one Britiſh merchant and another, are now ſettled by treaty, and an equal rule is eſtabliſhed.

"It has pleaſed God to bleſs my endeavours to obtain an honourable and advantageous peace for my own people, and for the greateſt part of my allies. Nothing, which I can do, ſhall be wanting to render it univerſal; and I perſuade myſelf, that, with your hearty concurrence, my interpoſition may at laſt prove effectual to compleat the ſettlement of Europe.

"In the mean while, I congratulate with my own ſubjects, that they are delivered from a conſuming land-war, and entered on a peace, the good effects whereof nothing but inteſtine diviſions can obſtruct.

"It was the glory of the wiſeſt and greateſt of my predeceſſors to hold the balance of Europe, and to keep it equal, by caſting in their weight as neceſſity required. By this conduct they enriched the kingdom, and rendered themſelves dreadful to their enemies, and uſeful to their friends. I have proceeded on the ſame principle, and I doubt not but my ſucceſſors will follow theſe examples.

"Our ſituation points out to us our true intereſt; for this country can flouriſh only by trade, and will be moſt formidable by the right application of our naval force.

Gentlemen of the houſe of commons,

"I have ordered ſuch accounts to be prepared and laid before you, as will ſhew you, at the concluſion of the war, the true ſtate of your condition, whereby you will be better able to judge what aids are neceſſary: And I only aſk of you ſupplies for the current ſervice of the year, and for the diſcharge of ſuch debts, as you ſhall find, on examination, to be juſt and reaſonable.

My lords and gentlemen,

"The joy, which has been generally expreſſed on my recovery from my late indiſpoſition, and on my coming to this city, I eſteem as a return to that tender affection which I have always had for my people.

"I wiſh that effectual care had been taken, as I have often deſired, to ſuppreſs thoſe ſeditious papers, and factious rumours, by which deſigning men have been able to ſink credit, and the innocent have ſuffered.

"There are ſome, who are arrived to that height of malice, as to inſinuate, that the Proteſtant Succeſſion in the houſe of Hanover is in danger under my government.

"Thoſe, who go about thus to diſtract the minds of men with imaginary dangers, can only mean to diſturb the preſent tranquility, and bring real miſchief upon us.

"After all I have done to ſecure our religion and your liberties, and to tranſmit both ſafe to poſterity, I cannot mention theſe proceedings without ſome degree of warmth; and I muſt hope you will all agree with me, that attempts to weaken my authority, or to render the poſſeſſion of the crown uneaſy to me, can never be proper means to ſtrengthen the Proteſtant Succeſſion.

"I have done, and ſhall continue to do my beſt for the good of all my ſubjects. Let it be your endeavour, as it ſhall be mine, to unite our differences, not by relaxing from the ſtricteſt adherence to our conſtitution in church and ſtate, but by obſerving the laws yourſelves, and inforcing a due obedience to them in others.

"A long war has not only impoveriſhed the public (however ſome particular men have have been gainers by it) but has alſo greatly affected government itſelf.

"Let it be your care ſo to improve the preſent opportunity, as to lay the foundation of recovering from thoſe diſorders.

"I had the concurrence of the laſt parliament in making the peace. Let it be the honour of this to aſſiſt me in obtaining ſuch fruits from it, as may not only derive bleſſings on the preſent age, but even down to the lateſt poſterity".

It is obſervable, though the queen ſaid in her ſpeech, that ſhe was perſuaded her interpoſitions might at laſt prove effectual, and compleat the ſettlement of Europe, the emperor, then in treaty with France, would not let her know any thing of what was tranſacted, or have the leaſt communication with her to the laſt hour of her life. But, how diſſonant ſoever the queen's ſpeech was in ſeveral particulars, both lords and commons fell in for the moſt part with it; and after ſhe had thanked the lords for their affectionate addreſs, ſhe added, 'That they, who were neareſt the throne, would firſt of her ſubjects feel the evil conſequences of any diminution of the regal authority; that it was a comfort to her ſhe had the aſſurance of their ſupport; and they might depend upon it, ſhe would never give way to the leaſt attempt on the juſt authorities of the crown, or any of their rights and privileges'.

The commons likewiſe reſolved on an addreſs without oppoſition, only ſir Peter King, recorder of London, ſuggeſted, 'That they ought not to act by a ſpirit of divination, and return thanks for the treaty of commerce with Spain, before they knew, whether the ſame was advantageous, or not: which occaſioned ſome modifications in the addreſs with reſpect to that head. The next day the convocation (which had met with the parliament, and choſen Dr. Stanhope prolocutor) complimented the queen in a joint addreſs on her recovery, and happy return to her royal city in health and ſafety: concluding with their wiſhes, 'That, after a long and happy reign, ſhe might be able to tranſmit the protection of this church and ſtate to a Proteſtant Succeſſor in the illuſtrious houſe of Hanover, which her majeſty to the great ſatisfaction and comfort of all her faithful and good ſubjects, had ſo often declared to be at her royal heart'. Notwithſtanding this, and the angry expreſſions in the queen's ſpeech, the fears and jealouſies of the well-affected to the Hanover Succeſſion were rather increaſed than removed, who, from the daily diſcouragements and even inſults they met with, could not but conclude that ſucceſſion to be in danger.

The earl of Wharton made a complaint in the houſe of lords againſt a libel, intitled, 'The public ſpirit of the Whigs ſet forth in their generous encouragement of the author of the the Criſis'. This libel (which was fathered upon Dr. Swift and lord Bolingbroke) was written in the ludicrous and ſarcaſtic ſtrains of the Tale of a Tub. After ſome ſcurrilous reflections on Mr. Steele, and occaſionally on the earl of Nottingham, with ſome jeſts on the implicit munificence of the ſubſcribers to the Criſis: the author attacks the Union, reflects on the whole Scots nation, and, without reſerve, inſults the duke of Argyle, who of late had broken all meaſures with the miniſtry [y]. This piece was generally looked upon as very impolitic and ill-timed; ſince the ſixteen Scots peers, who ſat in the houſe of lords, and who (at leaſt there) were the principal ſupport of thoſe at the helm, were involved in the general reflections on the Scots nation. The earl of Wharton's complaint againſt this libel being warmly eſpouſed by the majority of the peers, the lord-treaſurer proteſted he knew nothing of it; exclaimed againſt the malicious inſinuations contained in it; and readily joined with the houſe, in an order for committing John Morphew, the publiſher, to the cuſtody of the black-rod. Morphew upon his examination, having declared, that an unknown porter had brought to his houſe the copies of the pamphlet in queſtion, from the houſe of John Barber, printer of the Gazette, and of the votes of the houſe of commons, Barber was alſo ordered into cuſtody, and both he and Morphew were, ſeverally, examined at the bar of the houſe of lords. Morphew ſtood to his former declaration, and owned the publiſhing and ſelling of that libel; but Barber ſaid, he knew nothing of it, and inſiſted not to anſwer any queſtions, the anſwer to which might tend to accuſe himſelf, or to corroborate the accuſation againſt him'. Being both withdrawn, the earl of Wharton ſaid, 'They had nothing to do either with the publiſher or printer; but that it highly concerned the honour of that auguſt aſſembly, to find out the villain, who was the author of that falſe and ſcandalous libel, in order to do the Scots nation juſtice': And moved, 'That, in order to that diſcovery, Barber might be again examined the next day, together with his journeymen and ſervants'. This was readily agreed to; but, the next day, the earl of Mar, one of the ſecretaries of ſtate, acquainted the houſe, that, purſuant to the queen's commands, he had directed John Barber to be proſecuted. The earl of Wharton deſired to know, upon what evidence they deſigned to proceed againſt him? But the earl of Mar, replied, That he wondered, ſuch a queſtion ſhould be put to a ſecretary of ſtate, who was known to be under an oath of ſecrecy: And this put a ſtop to all further enquiries about Barber's affair, in a parliamentary way. Three days after, Barber aad Morphew were, upon their petition, enlarged from the cuſtody of the black-rod. However, the lords reſolved upon an addreſs, reciting the ſteps they had taken in this affair; notwithſtanding which, 'they had not been able to diſcover the author of the libel, which they conceived to be a falſe, malicious and factious libel, highly diſhonourable and ſcandalous to her majeſty's ſubjects of Scotland, tending to the deſtruction of the conſtitution and (by making falſe and unjuſt reflections upon the Union, and the ſteps and motives to it) moſt injurious to her majeſty, who had been pleaſed often to declare from the throne, that the Union of the two kingdoms was the peculiar happineſs of her reign, in making a full proviſion for the peace and quiet of her people, and the ſecurity of their religion, by ſo firm an eſtabliſhment of the Proteſtant Succeſſion throughout Great-Britain. That nothing therefore might be wanting on their parts towards the diſcovering and puniſhing ſo great a criminal, they humbly beſought her majeſty to iſſue her royal proclamation, with a reward to any perſon, who ſhould diſcover the author'. Accordingly, the ſame day, a proclamation was publiſhed, with a reward of three hundred pounds. But, nevertheleſs, Dr. Swift, the reputed author, remained undiſcovered to the public, though, at the ſame time, notwithſtanding the indecency of his character as well as of his writings, he was daily careſſed by the lord-treaſurer, as Barber the printer was by the lord Bolingbroke [z].

The commons, having readily voted a ſupply, proceeded on controverted elections, and coming to ſeveral reſolutions about qualifying the members to ſerve in parliament [a], they

[y] The paſſage that gave moſt offence to the lords was as follows:

'This work (the Union of the two kingdoms) was unſucceſsfully attempted by ſeveral of her majeſty's predeceſſors, though I do not remember it was ever thought on by any, except king James the firſt, and the late king William. I have read indeed, that ſome ſmall overtures were made by the former of theſe princes towards an Union between the two kingdoms, but rejected with indignation and contempt by the Engliſh. And the hiſtorian tells, that, how degenerate and corrupt ſoever the court and parliament then were, they would not give ear to ſo infamous a propoſal. I do not find, that any of the ſucceeding princes before the Revolution, ever reſumed the deſign, becauſe it was a project, for which there could not poſſibly be aſſigned the leaſt reaſon or neceſſity. For I defy any mortal to name one ſingle advantage, that England could ever expect from ſuch an Union. But, towards the end of the late king's reign, upon an apprehenſion of the want of iſſue from him, or the princeſs Anne, a propoſition for uniting both kingdoms was begun, becauſe Scotland had not ſettled their crown upon the houſe of Hanover, but left themſelves at large, in hopes to make their advantage. And it was thought highly dangerous to leave that part of the iſland, inhabited by a 'poor, fierce Northern People', at liberty to put themſelves under a different king. However, the oppoſition to this work was ſo great, that it could not be overcome, until ſome time after her preſent majeſty came ſince dead, an act of parliament was obtained for the Scots, which gave them to the crown, when, by the weakneſs or corruption of a certain miniſter leave to arm themſelves; and ſo the Union became neceſſary, not for any actual good it could poſſibly do us, but to avoid a probable evil; and at the ſame time ſave an obnoxious miniſter's head, who was ſo wiſe, as to take the firſt opportunity of procuring a general pardon by act of parliament, becauſe he could not with ſo much decency or ſafety deſire a particular one for himſelf. The facts are well enough known to the whole kingdom. And I remember, diſcourſing above ſix years ago with the moſt conſiderable perſon [lord Sommers] of the adverſe party, and a great promoter of the Union, he frankly owned to me, that this neceſſity, brought upon us by the wrong management of the earl of Godolphin, was the only cauſe of the Union.

Therefore I am ready to grant two points to the author of the Criſis: Firſt, that the Union became neceſſary, for the cauſe above related; becauſe it prevented this iſland from being governed by two kings, which England would never have ſuffered; and it might probably have coſt us a war of a year or two to reduce the Scots. Secondly, that it would be dangerous to break this Union, at leaſt in this juncture, while there is a Pretender abroad, who might probably lay hold of ſuch an opportunity. And this made me wonder a little at the ſpirit of faction laſt ſummer, amongſt ſome people, who, having been the great promoters of the Union, and ſeveral of them the principal gainers by it, could yet proceed ſo far, as to propoſe in the houſe of lords, that it ſhould be diſſolved; while at the ſame time thoſe peers, who had ever oppoſed it in the beginning, were then for preſerving it upon the reaſon I have juſt aſſigned, and which the author of the Criſis hath likewiſe taken notice of.

But when he tells us, The Engliſhmen 'ought, in generoſity, to be more particularly careful in preſerving this Union', he argues like himſelf. 'The late kingdom of Scotland (ſaith he) had as numerous a nobility as England, &c'. They had indeed; and to that we owe one of the great and neceſſary evils of the Union, upon the foot it now ſtands. Their nobility is indeed ſo numerous, that the whole 'revenues of their country would be hardly able to maintain them according to the dignity of their titles'; and what is infinitely worſe, they are never likely to be extinct, until the laſt period of all things, becauſe the greateſt part of them deſcend to heirs general. I imagine a perſon of quality, prevailed on to marry a woman much his inferior, and without a groat to her fortune, and her friends arguing ſhe was as good as her huſband, becauſe ſhe brought him as numerous a family of relations and ſervants, as ſhe found in his houſe. Scotland in the taxes is obliged to contribute one penny for every forty pence laid upon England; and the repreſentatives they ſend to the parliament are about a thirteenth. Every other Scots peer hath all the privileges of an Engliſh one, except that of ſitting in parliament; and even precedence before all of the ſame title, that ſhall be created for the time to come. The penſions and employments poſſeſſed by the natives of that country now among us do amount to more than the whole body of their nobility ever ſpent at home; and all the money, they raiſe upon the public, is hardly ſufficient to defray their civil and military liſts. I could point out ſome with great titles, who affected to appear very vigorous for diſſolving the Union, although their whole revenues before that period would have ill maintained a Welch juſtice of the peace; and have ſince gathered more money than ever any Scotſman, who had not travelled, could form an idea of'.

This paſſage, by reaſon of the offence it might give to the Scots peers, was, a few days after the publication of the libel, cancelled, and the reſt publiſhed with a new title under the pretence of a ſecond edition. But it was reſtored by Dr. Swift, in the late edition of his political tracts.

[z] Dr. Swift, in his advertiſement prefixed to this pamphlet among his political tracts, ſays, The reaſon of offering ſo ſmall a reward was, became 'the queen and miniſtry had no deſire to have the author taken into cuſtody'.

[a] Theſe reſolutions were:

'I. That, notwithſtanding the oath taken by any candidate, on or after any election, his qualifications may be afterwards examined into.

II. That the perſon, whoſe qualification is expreſly objected to, in any petition relating to his election, ſhall, within fifteen days after the petition read, give, to the clerk of the houſe of commons, a paper ſigned by himſelf, containing a rental or particular of the lands, tenements, or hereditaments, whereby he makes out his qualification: Of which any perſon concerned may have a copy.

ordered a bill to be brought in, ‘ for ſecuring the freedom of parliaments, by limiting the number of officers in the houſe of commons’; which was perfected towards the end of March.

Notwithſtanding all the care and induſtry uſed by the court-managers in the late elections, many profeſſed enemies of the preſent miniſters were choſen. But, of theſe, none was ſo obnoxious to the men in power, as Mr. Steele, who in ſeveral public writings had arraigned the late meaſures with great boldneſs, as one, who was encouraged, and ſure to be ſupported, by the whole Whig party. It was therefore agreed by the miniſters (how much ſoever they differed in other matters) to exert their endeavours to remove him from his ſeat in parliament. A petition, which was lodged againſt his election, happening to be the ſeventeenth of that kind, and therefore not like to come on this ſeſſion, it was reſolved to take a ſhorter way, and attack him about ſome of his late political writings. Mr. Hungerford, a noted lawyer, who had been expelled the houſe of commons for bribery in the reign of king William, moved, on the 11th of March, to take into conſideration that part of the queen’s ſpeech, which related to the ſuppreſſing ſeditious libels; and complained, in particular, of ſeveral ſcandalous papers lately publiſhed, under the name of Richard Steele, eſq. a member of that houſe. He was ſeconded by Mr. Auditor Foley, a near relation to the lord-treaſurer, who ſuggeſted, That unleſs means were found to reſtrain the licentiouſneſs of the preſs, and to ſhelter thoſe, who had the honour to be in the adminiſtration, from malicious and ſcandalous libels; they, who by their abilities are beſt qualified to ſerve their queen and country, would decline public offices and employments. This was ſupported by ſir William Wyndham, who added, ‘ That ſome of Mr. Steele’s writings contained inſolent injurious reflections on the queen herſelf, and were dictated by the ſpirit of rebellion’. The next day, Auditor Harley (the lord-treaſurer’s brother) made a formal complaint to the houſe againſt certain paragraphs of the three printed pamphlets, which had given moſt offence to the court; ‘ The Engliſhman, of January 19; The Criſis; and The laſt Engliſhman’, all ſaid to be written by Richard Steele, eſq. which pamphlets being brought up to the table, it was ordered, that Mr. Steele ſhould attend in his place the next morning.

This brought a large concourſe of members and ſpectators to the houſe; and, Mr. Steele attending, ſeveral paragraphs, contained in the pamphlets complained of, were read: After which Mr. Foley, Mr. Harley, and ſome other members, ſeverely animadverted upon the rancour and ſeditious ſpirit conſpicuous in thoſe writings. Mr. James Craggs, jun. ſtanding up to ſpeak in Mr. Steele’s behalf, he was prevented by a confuſed noiſe of ſeveral voices calling to order; intimating, that, according to the order of the day, Mr. Steele was to be heard himſelf in his place. Upon this Mr. Steele ſaid, ‘ That being attacked upon ſeveral heads without any previous notice, he hoped the houſe would allow him, at leaſt, a week’s time to prepare for his defence’. Auditor Harley having excepted againſt ſo long a delay, and moved for adjourning this affair to the Monday following, Mr. Steele, to ridicule his two principal proſecutors, Foley and Harley, who were known to be rigid Preſbyterians, though they now ſided with the High Church, aſſumed their ſanctified countenance, and owned, ‘ in the meakneſs and contrition of his heart, that he was a very great ſinner; and hoped, the member, who ſpoke laſt, and who was ſo juſtly renowned for his exemplary piety and devotion, would not be acceſſary to the accumulating the number of his tranſgreſſions, by obliging him to break the Sabbath of the Lord, by peruſing ſuch profane writings, as might ſerve for his juſtification’. This ſpeech, ſpoke in a canting tone, having put the generality of the aſſembly in good humour, Mr. Steele carried his point; and the further conſideration of the charge againſt him was deferred for a week, by which time it was expected, that ſir Richard Onſlow, Mr. Hampden, Mr. Lechmere, and ſome other leading members of the Whig party, who were abſent, would be come to town. This ſucceſs encouraged Mr. Steele, not only to ſtand upon the defenſive, but even to attack his accuſers. As he believed a great part of the ill-will, he had brought upon himſelf, was owing to what he wrote about Dunkirk, he thought it would make for his defence, to have what paſſed, relating to the colluſive demolition, appear to the houſe before his day came on. He therefore moved, on the very Monday propoſed by Mr. Harley for his trial, ‘ That an addreſs be preſented to the queen, to give directions, that the ſeveral repreſentations of her engineers and officers, who had the care and inſpection of the demolition of Dunkirk, and all orders and inſtructions given thereupon, be laid before the houſe’. But the motion was rejected by two hundred and fourteen voices, againſt one hundred and nine. But the court-party did not think fit to oppoſe another motion, which, with the ſame intent, was then made by the lord Lumley, eldeſt ſon to the earl of Scarborough, who being ſeconded by the earl of Hertford, it was unanimouſly reſolved, ‘ That an addreſs be preſented to her majeſty, that ſhe would be pleaſed to order an account to be laid before the houſe, what ſteps had been made for the removing the Pretender from the dominions of the duke of Lorrain, purſuant to the addreſs of both houſes of the laſt parliament; and what anſwers had been given by the duke of Lorrain’.

On the 18th of March, the day appointed for Mr. Steele’s trial, the court-party thought proper to clear the houſe of all ſtrangers; which being done, Auditor Foley moved, that before they proceeded any further, Mr. Steele ſhould declare, whether he acknowledged the writings that bore his name? Upon which Mr. Steele owned all the papers laid to his charge to be part of his writings: That he wrote them in behalf of the houſe of Hanover, and owned them with the ſame unreſervedneſs, with which he had abjured the Pretender’. Then, a debate ariſing upon the method of proceeding, Mr. Foley propoſed, that Mr. Steele ſhould withdraw; but, after ſeveral ſpeeches, it was carried, without dividing, that he ſhould ſtay, in order to make his defence. Mr. Steele deſired, he might be allowed to anſwer to what might be urged againſt him, paragraph by paragraph; but though he was powerfully ſupported by Mr. Robert Walpole, general Stanhope, the lord Finch, eldeſt ſon to the earl of Nottingham; and the lord Hinchinbroke, ſon to the earl of Sandwich; yet his accuſers inſiſted, and it was carried, ‘ That he ſhould proceed to make his defence generally, upon the charge given againſt him’. Mr. Steele proceeded accordingly, being aſſiſted by Mr. Addiſon, who ſat near him, to prompt him, upon occaſion; and for near three hours ſpoke to the ſeveral heads, extracted out of the three pamphlets above mentioned (which had been given in print to all the members) with ſuch temper, eloquence, and unconcern, as gave entire ſatisfaction to all, who were not prepoſſeſſed againſt him.

Mr. Steele being withdrawn, moſt members expected, that Mr. Foley would have ſummed up, and anſwered his defence; but he contented himſelf with ſaying, in general, ‘ That, without amuſing the houſe with long ſpeeches, it was plain that the writings, that had been complained of, were ſeditious and ſcandalous, injurious to her majeſty’s government, the church and the univerſities, and moved, that the queſtion ſhould be put’. This occaſioned a very warm debate, which laſted till eleven at night. Mr. Robert Walpole, who ſpoke firſt in favour of Mr. Steele, made a long and elegant ſpeech. He began with ſhewing, ‘ That this extraordinary and violent proſecution ſtruck at the liberties of the ſubject in general, and of the members of that houſe in particular. He then juſtified Mr. Steele on all the heads of the accuſation raiſed againſt him; and ſaid, he hoped the houſe would not ſacrifice one of their members to the reſentment and rage of the miniſtry, for no other crime, than his expoſing their notorious miſmanagements; and, like a good patriot, warning his countrymen againſt the imminent danger, with which the nation in general, and in particular her majeſty’s ſacred perſon, were threatened, by the viſible encouragement, that was given to the Pretender’s friends. If a Papiſt, (ſaid Mr. Walpole) nay an Iriſh Papiſt, [ſir Patrick Lawleſs] who for many years has been ſervant to the late king James, and the Pretender; one, who has borne arms againſt her majeſty in France and Spain; one, who is ſtrongly ſuſpected of having imbrued his hands in the blood of the late duke of Medina Celi, and marquiſs of Leganez; if ſuch a man be not only permitted to come into England, but to appear at court, in the preſence-chamber; if he be careſſed by the miniſters; nay, I ſpeak it with horror, if ſuch a man ‘ III. That, of ſuch lands, tenements, or hereditaments, whereof the party hath been in poſſeſſion, for three years before the election, he ſhall alſo inſert in the ſame paper, from what perſon, and by what conveyance, or act in law, he claims and derives the ſame; and alſo the conſideration, if any paid, and the names and places of abode of the witneſſes to ſuch conveyance and payment.

IV. That, if a ſitting member ſhall think fit to queſtion the qualification of a petitioner, he ſhall, within fifteen days after the petition read, leave notice thereof in writing, with the clerk of the houſe of commons; and the petitioner ſhall, in ſuch caſe, within fifteen days after ſuch notice, leave with the ſaid clerk of the houſe the like account in writing of his qualification, as is required from a ſitting member.

be admitted to her majeſty's private audience in her cloſet, will not every good ſubject think her majeſty's perſon in danger? And is it then a crime in Mr. Steele to ſhew his juſt concern for ſo precious a life?

As to that paſſage in Mr. Steele's Criſis, wherein he ſays, 'That a late treaſonable book on the Succeſſion of Hereditary Right has publiſhed the will of king Henry VIII, which ſeems to be intended as a pattern for the like occaſion'; and a little lower, 'Let thoſe, who act under the preſent ſettlement, and yet pretend to diſpute for an abſolute Hereditary Right, quiet themſelves with the arguments they have borrowed from Popery'; Mr. Walpole ſaid, it could not be denied, 'That the lord-treaſurer was the patron of learned men, for whoſe uſe and improvement he had ſet up a fine library: and that it appeared by the book called, 'The Hereditary Right of the Crown of England aſſerted, &c'. that the author had free acceſs to that library, and had drawn very material paſſages out of ſome manuſcripts in it. But that the lord treaſurer's care to ſupply him with materials towards that work went yet further, ſince his lordſhip had employed a man to look among old muſty papers for the will and teſtament of king Henry the eighth, which the author had inſerted at length in the appendix to his book. That he appealed to Mr. Lowndes, a member of the houſe, and ſecretary to the treaſury, whether he had not paid, by the lord treaſurer's orders, twelve or fourteen pounds to the perſon, that had made that great diſcovery; but, that in caſe he ſhould deny it, he had evidence to prove it'. Mr. Lowndes ſeemed not to deny the fact; and only ſaid, that will was not ſo rare a piece, ſince it was to be ſeen in a place, which he named, in Weſtminſter Abbey. On this occaſion Mr. Walpole mentioned three points, in which he endeavoured to prove, that the peace had already been broke: The firſt he ſaid, was the demolition of Dunkirk, which ought to have been finiſhed five months after ſigning the treaty; but, inſtead of that, the French had yet only pulled down part of the outward fortifications, without touching the foundations, which, on the one hand, rendered the Engliſh garriſon uſeleſs, and expoſed to any inſults; and, on the other hand, would afterwards make it eaſy for the French to reſtore and rebuild thoſe fortifications: which was the more probable to be in their thoughts, ſince, inſtead of ruining the harbour, they were actually repairing the ſluices, and working on a new canal. The ſecond point was, the renunciations of the princes of the houſe of Bourbon, which were laid down as the foundation and baſis of the peace, and as a pretence, that thereby the crowns of France and Spain would be more divided than ever: But that, ſuppoſing (what he could not by any means grant) that thoſe renunciations were to be depended upon, they were yet conditional, and ſuppoſed the emperor's renunciation of the crown of Spain: And therefore, as no care had been taken to engage his Imperial majeſty to agree to that neceſſary condition, ſo the renunciations of the princes of the houſe of Bourbon became not binding and void'. The third inſtance, which Mr. Walpole gave of the violation of the peace, was the French king's ordinance, dated September the 18th, 1713, N. S. 'forbidding the children of French refugees, though born out of his dominions, to come into them, without his permiſſion, upon pain of being ſent to the gallies'. This ordinance was againſt natural right and the law of nations, and in particular derogatory to the rights and liberties of the Britiſh nation, which the children of the refugees, born in England, were entitled to enjoy as well as the other natives. That he would adventure to ſay in their behalf, that it were to be wiſhed, that all, who have the happineſs to be born in England, were as good Engliſhmen as the ſons of the refugees; and that the Britiſh nation was the more concerned in having that ordinance repealed, in that the refugees and their children were the fitteſt to carry on a trade with France'.

Mr. Horace Walpole ſeconded his brother in favour of the French refugees, 'and deplored the lamentable condition of their miniſters and the poor amongſt them, to whom the lord-treaſurer had not paid one penny of the fifteen thouſand pounds per annum, voted by parliament, and allowed in the civil liſt, towards their ſubſiſtence and relief, ſince he came into his office'. Adding, 'That ſome amongſt the refugees ſuffered now more in England, than they did during the proſecution in France; ſince there were always ſome charitable people, who relieved them while they were in priſons and dungeons, whereas here they were left to ſtarve'.

The lord Finch ſupported, likewiſe, Mr. Robert Walpole, and juſtified Mr. Steele with relation to the tendereſt part of the charge againſt him, 'his third Wiſh', in the cloſe of his laſt Engliſhman: That his electoral highneſs of Hanover would be ſo grateful, as to ſignify to all the world the perfect good underſtanding he had with the court of England, in as plain terms, as her majeſty was pleaſed to declare ſhe had with that houſe on her part'. He ſaid, 'That ſuppoſing there was in this Wiſh ſome injurious inſinuations, yet the ſame could not, without injuſtice, be applied to the queen, but only to her miniſters: That no body doubted the good underſtanding between her majeſty and the houſe of Hanover; but that it was notorious, that the miniſters ſhewed no great regard to that illuſtrious houſe. Witneſs (to paſs over other inſtances) the ſlight they put upon the baron Bothmar's memorial, which the queen had perhaps never ſeen, had not the ducheſs of Somerſet ſhewed it to her majeſty in print in the Daily Courant'. He likewiſe juſtified Mr. Steele in relation to his reflections on the peace. We may, ſays he, give it all the fine epithets we pleaſe, call it here, honourable; but I am ſure it is accounted ſcandalous in Holland, Germany, Portugal, and over all Europe, except France and Spain. We may call it advantageous; but all the trading part of the nation find it to be otherwiſe. If therefore it be really advantageous, it muſt be ſo to the miniſtry that made it'. Sir William Wyndham replying, 'That the miniſtry would not ſay, the peace was advantageous to them; the lord Finch anſwered, 'Then it was plain it was advantageous to no body but our late enemies'.

The lords Lumley and Hinchinbroke, and ſome other members, ſpoke alſo in favour of Mr. Steele, and againſt the conduct of the miniſtry. But Mr. Foley, ſir William Wyndham, the attorney-general, and ſome other courtiers, being ſupported by a great majority, ſtill inſiſted on the queſtion, and it was carried at laſt by two hundred forty-five voices againſt one hundred fifty-two, Firſt, 'That a printed pamphlet, intitled, The Engliſhman, being the cloſe of the paper ſo called, and one other pamphlet, intitled, The Criſis, written by Richard Steele, eſq. a member of this houſe, are ſcandalous and ſeditious libels, containing many expreſſions highly reflecting upon her majeſty, and upon the nobility, clergy, gentry, and univerſities of this kingdom, maliciouſly inſinuating, that the Proteſtant Succeſſion in the houſe of Hanover is in danger under her majeſty's adminiſtration, and tending to alienate the affections of her majeſty's good ſubjects, and to create jealouſies and diviſions among them. Secondly, That Richard Steele, eſq. for his offence in writing and publiſhing theſe ſcandalous and ſeditious libels, be expelled this houſe'.

It is obſervable, that only two Scots members ſpoke in this long debate, Mr. Baillie, and ſir James Stuart, judge-advocate in North-Britain. Mr. Baillie ſaid, 'He was little acquainted with the affairs of England, but had made it his buſineſs to know thoſe of his own country; and, by all the obſervations he could make for ſome years paſt, they, who appeared the moſt zealous for the Pretender's intereſt, were the moſt favoured and countenanced by thoſe in power'. This was confirmed by ſir James Stuart, who added, 'That to his certain knowledge, three or four thouſand pounds had been yearly remitted to the Highland clans, whoſe chiefs, and the men under their command, were known to be entirely devoted to the chevalier'. Hence it appears, this affair gave the enemies of the miniſtry an occaſion to take notice of ſeveral things, which, but for this proſecution, had perhaps never been mentioned in the houſe of commons; and which, being ſpoken in the hearing of ſeveral lords, occcaſioned the like reflections and ſtricter enquiries in the houſe of peers. A few days after, the commons adjourned till after the Eaſter holidays; and in the mean time ſir James Stuart was removed from his place for what he had ſaid.

On the 17th of March, the lords taking into conſideration the ſtate of the nation, the earls of Wharton, Nottingham, and Sunderland, the lords Cowper, Hallifax, and ſome others, repreſented the danger that threatened the Proteſtant Succeſſion, by reaſon of the Pretender's not being yet removed from Lorrain, and the ill condition the affairs of Europe were left in by the late treaties of peace, and moved, that addreſſes be preſented to the queen, 'Firſt, for an account of what ſteps had been taken for removing the Pretender from the dominions of the duke of Lorrain, and what anſwers had been given by that duke? Secondly, an account of the negotiations of peace: What meaſures had been taken, to render the peace univerſal: And what obſtructions her majeſty had met with? Thirdly, An account of what inſtances had been made for reſtoring to the Catalans their antient privileges, and all letters relating thereto. Fourthly, An account of the monies granted by parliament, ſince the year 1710, to carry on the war in Spain and Portugal'. Theſe addreſſes were ordered to be preſented to the queen without

BRITISH
13 JY60
MUSEUM

Engraved for Harrison's Edition of Rapin's History of England.

GEORGE HAMILTON, EARL of ORKNEY.

Mingaud pinxit. Taylor sculp.

In the Collection of the R.t hon.ble the Earl of Inchiquin.

Published as the Act directs Dec.r 28. 1787.

any oppoſition. But, in the mean time, to give the houſe ſome amuſement, the lord-treaſurer moved for leave to bring 'in a bill for the further ſecurity of the Proteſtant Succeſſion, by making it high-treaſon to bring any foreigh troops into the kingdom': which greatly ſurprized many peers. Among the reſt, the earl of Nottingham, who immediately perceived the dangerous conſequence of that motion, repreſented, 'That ſuch a bill might be turned againſt the very guarantees of the Proteſtant Succeſſion, and ſo weaken that happy ſettlement, for the ſecurity of which the bill was pretended to be deſigned'. The lord Bolingbroke replied, 'He doubted not, but the noble peer, who made the motion, meant only ſuch foreign troops, as might be brought into the kingdom by the Pretender or his adherents'. The lord-treaſurer having declared this to be his meaning, it was anſwered, 'In that caſe, ſuch a bill was altogether unneceſſary, ſince ſuch troops were either open enemies, if foreigners, or traitors and rebels, if natives'. The earl of Angleſea put an end to the debate, with ſaying, 'That the lord, who made the motion, was not acquainted with the methods of proceeding in that houſe; for every peer has the privilege of bringing in what bill he thinks fit: That the lord-treaſurer's aſking leave for it, was but a compliment to the houſe; and therefore, when he had brought in the bill, it would be then a proper time to conſider of it'. So the motion was dropped. The ſame day, a noble lord reflected on the 'Biſhop of Sarum's Preface to his Paſtoral Care'; but, that prelate offering to vindicate himſelf, no farther notice was taken of it.

Two days after, in a farther debate on the ſtate of the nation, ſeveral lords ſpoke again in favour of the Catalans, and inſiſted, 'That the houſe ought ſtrictly to examine how that poor people came to be abandoned, after they had been ſolicited and drawn in to declare for the emperor'. The earl of Angleſea, ſeeing the miniſtry thus attacked, endeavoured to ward off the blow, by ſaying, 'That, for his own part, he was one of the firſt, that appeared againſt the late miniſters, becauſe he was fully convinced of their maladminiſtration, corruption, avarice, and unbounded ambition. That he would, in like manner, be one of the firſt that ſhould attack the preſent miniſters, if he thought them guilty of the ſame faults. But, as he had obſerved, it was merely out of ſpleen and envy, that ſome perſons were for enquiring into the conduct of patriots, who had given ſignal proofs of their zeal for the public good, he was of opinion, that they ought to examine into the conduct both of the late and preſent miniſters, that ſo, by comparing one with the other, they might ſee, which had committed leſs errors'. However, the Whig lords purſued their point, and in particular took notice of the danger, both the queen's perſon and the Proteſtant Succeſſion were in, from the great number of outlawed Jacobites, who were permitted to come over from beyond ſea; and complained of the favour ſhewn to the Pretender's friends, in granting noli proſequi's to perſons (meaning Daniel de Foe among others) who were under proſecution for writing againſt the Proteſtant Succeſſion. They animadverted upon the debts of the navy being much increaſed, though nothing had been done at ſea for two or three years. The court-party having nothing to ſay to theſe particulars, it was moved and reſolved to addreſs the queen, that ſhe would order the proper officers to lay before the houſe, 'Firſt, An account of the debts and ſtate of the navy. Secondly, An account of noli proſequi's granted ſince her acceſſion to the throne. And, Thirdly, A liſt of perſons outlawed, attainted, or that had borne arms in the ſervice of her majeſty's, or the late king's enemies, who had got licences to return into Great-Britain, or other her majeſty's dominions, ſince the year 1688'. After this, upon a motion for adjourning, the Whig lords propoſed to adjourn only to the Monday following. But, the miniſtry being highly concerned to put a ſtop to ſuch enquiries, the lord-treaſurer, with a ſhew of devotion, repreſented, 'That the ſolemnity of the feſtival of Eaſter approaching, the next week ought, according to the primitive inſtitution, and the conſtant practice of the church of England, to be ſet apart for works of piety'; and therefore, moved to adjourn to the 31ſt of March. The treaſurer being ſeconded by the lord Trevor, the earl of Wharton ſaid, 'God forbid he ſhould oppoſe that noble lord, who had made ſo pious and religious a motion; but that he appealed to that venerable bench (pointing to the biſhops) whether humanity and charity did not require it at their hands, not to loſe one moment of time, in addreſſing her majeſty in behalf of the diſtreſſed Catalans, who were reduced to ſuch an extremity that the leaſt delay in procuring them relief, might prove their ruin for ever'. Then it was reſolved, without oppoſition, to preſent the addreſs; and the earl of Oxford's motion for adjourning to the 31ſt of March was carried in the affirmative. It is obſervable, the commons having, the day before, made an order for clearing their houſe of all ſtrangers, not excepting the peers, it was moved in the lords houſe to make the like order, without excepting the commons: But this was oppoſed by the duke of Argyle, who ſaid, 'It was for the honour of that auguſt aſſembly to ſhew, that they were better bred, and had more complaiſance than the commons'.

At this time the miniſtry, in order to allay the fears, which many entertained of a deſign between Great-Britain and France, to bring over the Pretender; cauſed a remarkable declaration, made ſome time before by the French ambaſſador at the Hague, to be publiſhed in the Poſt-Boy of the 18th of March, which was to this effect: 'It is not only in Holland, that falſe reports are ſpread of the king my maſter's equipping a fleet, with a deſign to ſupport the intereſts of the chevalier de St. George; but theſe falſe reports have alſo reached England. As it is eaſy to imagine for what end they have been invented, I am ordered by his majeſty, to acquaint you with the malicious deſign of them. They will ſoon vaniſh, being without foundation, and even the leaſt appearance of any. It is, however, neceſſary, that truth ſhould be known'.

This declaration, however, with the leaſt diſcerning paſſed only for a political amuſement: And indeed it was but a fond imagination in the Britiſh miniſters, to believe, that any verbal aſſurances and proteſtations were able to diſpel the jealouſies and apprehenſions, occaſioned by the daily removal of the firmeſt friends to the Proteſtant Succeſſion from public employments, and advancing in their ſtead, thoſe, whom they found inclined blindly to follow the queen's meaſures; which was now become the watch-word, and, as it were, the ſtandard of civil and military merit. Upon this rule, at a cabinet-council, it was reſolved to remove the duke of Argyle from all his places; to order the earl of Stair to diſpoſe of his regiment of Scots Royal dragoons; and to turn out ſeveral other inferior officers. Accordingly, a few days after, it was declared, that the command of the Scots troop of life-guards, of which the duke of Argyle was colonel and captain, was given to the young earl of Dundonald, a Scots peer (for which, however, the queen was ſaid to have paid the uſual price of ten thouſand pounds to the duke) that the earl of Peterborough was made governor of the iſland of Minorca, and the earl of Orkney, governor of Edinburgh caſtle, both in the room of the duke of Argyle; that the earl of Portmore had bought the earl of Stair's regiment for ſix thouſand pounds; that major-general Davenport was ordered to ſell his poſt of lieutenant of the firſt troop of life-guards to brigadier Panton; that major-general Holmes, major of the Cold-ſtream regiment of foot-guards, had leave to diſpoſe of his company to lieutenant-colonel Gibbons, late of colonel Kane's regiment of foot; that lieutenant-colonel Egerton, brother to the earl of Bridgewater, and lieutenant-colonel Sidney, brother to the earl of Leiceſter, were ordered to ſell their companies in the foot-guards, for the ſum of a thouſand pounds each, to the lieutenants-colonels Markham and Owen; and that lieutenant-colonel Oughton and lieutenant-colonel Paget were alſo ordered to diſpoſe of their companies. It was about the ſame time ſtrongly reported, that ſeveral other officers, who, being cloſeted, had demurred upon the queſtion, that was put to them, 'Whether they would ſerve the queen, without aſking queſtions'? were likewiſe to be turned out of their poſts; ſome of which were to be filled up by the creatures of the lord Bolingbroke, the principal adviſer and promoter of the new-modelling the army. One branch of this ſcheme was to break nine of the battalions in Ireland; to lay aſide ſeventy-two officers, who were thought improper inſtruments for the deſigns in hand; and to raiſe fifteen other battalions, that ſhould be ſure to obey all commands; and one of which was ſaid to be deſigned for the lord Poor, an Iriſh Roman Catholic peer, who had a long time ſerved in France. It was alſo generally reported, that either the earl of Angleſea, or colonel Owen, who ſoon after went over to Dublin, carried theſe orders to ſir Conſtantine Phipps. But whatever ground there was for ſuch a report, that part of the model never took place.

The lord Bolingbroke and his friends, who by this time had got the aſcendant over the lord-treaſurer in the cabinet-council, were the more haſty in their meaſures, both becauſe they began to deſpair of the queen's ſurviving the next ſummer, and becauſe they were not ignorant, that the Whigs, in concert with the court of Hanover, took all imaginable precautions to ſecure the Proteſtant Succeſſion. The queen being taken ill[b], thoſe who were moſt concerned in her life,

[b] Dr. Shadwell, in a letter to the duke of Shrewſbury, gives the following account of her illneſs:— "On the 11th of March, after the queen had ſunned herſelf awhile at the window, ſhe was ſeized with a chillneſs, vomiting, a pain in the leg, the pulſe very diſordered, and in every manner as two months puſhed on their ſchemes, knowing how precarious that life was; and, at the ſame time, the better to carry on their deſigns, gave out, that ſhe was in no manner of danger, being only troubled with a ſmall fit of the gout. But though, the better to conceal the true ſtate of her health, only Dr. Arbuthnot, who was devoted to their party, was for a long time admitted to ſee her leg; yet thoſe, who watched for the ſecurity of the Proteſtant Succeſſion, did not want intelligence of her dangerous condition, and took all poſſible meaſures to defeat any attempt, that ſhould be made to bring in the Pretender, at or before her death. As that caſe never happened, thoſe meaſures are for the moſt part a ſecret; but it may be obſerved, that about this time the Pretender's friends were not a little alarmed at a ſecret treaty, which was ſaid to be concluded between the elector of Brunſwick and the States-General; whereby the ſtates, in conſideration of a certain ſum, engaged to furniſh the elector with a certain number of ſhips and land forces (beſides their engagements as guarantees of the Succeſſion) to ſupport his claim to the crown of Great-Britain. Be this as it will, certain it is, that the court of Hanover did not rely on the fair promiſes, given them by the Britiſh miniſters, and which were manifeſtly contradicted by matters of fact. And as ſome of the Britiſh miniſters and generals were, at this juncture, very intent upon new-modelling the army; ſo on the other hand, the duke of Argyle, the generals Stanhope and Cadogan, and ſeveral other experienced commanders, were no leſs active, though with more caution, in keeping ſteady and preparing againſt all events, ſuch military men, as they knew to be well affected to the Proteſtant Succeſſion. General Stanhope, in particular, had ſeveral private conferences with the principal officers among the French refugees; who being a conſiderable body, and all zealous for the cauſe, no ſmall ſtreſs was laid on their aſſiſtance, as well as that of their countrymen. So, if things had been brought to extremities, excluſive of the interpoſition of foreign forces, the well-affected to the houſe of Hanover would have been equal, if not ſuperior to the Pretender's friends. This will appear more than probable, if we conſider, that in either houſe of parliament few were for altering the preſent ſettlement: That moſt of the merchants and monied men in the city of London (which, in all revolutions, has the greateſt influence over the reſt of the kingdom) were entirely devoted to the Proteſtant Succeſſion; and it is now known, that ſome of the principal of them had agreed with the generals Cadogan and Stanhope to exert their whole intereſt in the city, whenever any attempt ſhould be made upon the Succeſſion; and that meaſures were early concerted by the Kit-Cat club, with a major-general, who had a conſiderable poſt in the foot-guards, to ſeize the Tower, upon the firſt appearance of danger, and to ſecure in it ſuch perſons, as were juſtly ſuſpected to favour the Pretender [c]. And the late lord Onſlow uſed to ſay, that himſelf had been ſent over with an aſſociation ſigned by the moſt eminent of the Whigs to the duke of Marlborough, who did not think proper to give it the ſanction of his name; which was a great ſurprize to his old friends.

The parliament, according to their adjournment, met on the 31ſt of March. The chief debates were in the houſe of lords, concerning the Catalans, the Proteſtant Succeſſion, removal of the Pretender out of Lorrain, and the late treaties. The papers, which had been addreſſed for, being laid before the houſe, thoſe relating to the Catalans were read on the 2d of April. Then the earls of Wharton and Sunderland, the lords Hallifax, Cowper, and others, repreſented, 'That, the crown of Great-Britain having drawn in the Catalans to declare for the houſe of Auſtria, and engaged to ſupport them, thoſe engagements ought to have been made good'. To this the lord Bolingbroke anſwered, 'That the queen had uſed all her endeavours to procure to the Catalans the enjoyment of their antient liberties and privileges; but that, after all, the engagements ſhe was entered into, ſubſiſted no longer than while king Charles was in Spain; but that prince being advanced to the Imperial dignity, and having himſelf abandoned the Catalans, ſhe could do no more than interpoſe her good offices in their behalf, which ſhe had not been wanting to do'. To this it was replied, 'That God Almighty had put more effectual means into her majeſty's hands'. After ſome other ſpeeches, the lord Cowper moved for an addreſs to the queen, importing, 'That, her endeavours for preſerving to the Catalans the full enjoyment of their antient liberties, having proved ineffectual, their lordſhips made it their humble requeſt, that ſhe would continue her interpoſition in the moſt preſſing manner in their behalf'. None of the peers oppoſed this motion; only the lord-chancellor, in order to juſtify all that had been done by the miniſtry, ſaid, 'This addreſs would be more grateful to her majeſty, if the word ineffectual was left out, and if they ſhould only thankfully acknowledge her majeſty's endeavours in favour of the Catalans', which was agreed to. But, notwithſtanding this compliment, the addreſs being the next day preſented to the queen, 'ſhe thanked, indeed, the lords, for the ſatisfaction they expreſſed in the endeavours ſhe had uſed for ſecuring to the Catalans their juſt liberties; but then ſhe added, that, at the time ſhe concluded her peace with Spain, ſhe reſolved to continue her interpoſition upon every proper occaſion for obtaining thoſe liberties, and to prevent, if poſſible, the misfortunes, to which that people were expoſed by the conduct of thoſe more nearly concerned to help them'. This anſwer occaſioned ſome reflections: And indeed, it quickly appeared, that ſir James Wiſhart, who, about this time, was ſent with a ſtrong ſquadron of men of war, was rather inſtructed to aſſiſt king Philip in the reduction of Barcelona, than in relieving the diſtreſſed Catalans.

On April the 5th, the lords taking into conſideration the ſtate of the nation, ſeveral ſpeeches were made in relation to the dangers to which all Europe in general was left expoſed by the late treaties of peace, and which, in particular, threatened the Proteſtant Succeſſion. To this purpoſe the Whig lords mentioned the countenance and favour which were publickly ſhewn by thoſe in power to the friends of the Pretender; and his continuing in Lorrain [d]. The earl of Sunderland added, 'That, notwithſtanding the earneſt application made laſt ſeſſion by both houſes to her majeſty, to uſe her utmoſt endeavours to get him removed from thence, yet he was aſſured by baron Foſtner, the duke of Lorrain's miniſter, ſome weeks before his departure, that, to his certain knowledge, no inſtances had yet been made to his maſter for that purpoſe'. The lord Bolingbroke ſaid, 'He wondered baron Foſtner ſhould make ſuch a declaration, ſince he himſelf had made thoſe inſtances to the baron in the queen's name'. But the lord Hallifax confirmed what the earl of Sunderland had advanced, ſaying, 'Baron Foſtner had told him as much but four days before; ſo that the lord Bolingbroke muſt be miſtaken, at leaſt, in point of chronology'.

months before, except that the queen did not ſhiver; but the cold and chillneſs continued twelve hours, and was then ſucceeded by a very great heat, thirſt, and all the ſymptoms of a high fever, which laſted till the next morning. Some of her phyſicians were for adminiſtring the ſnake root; but Dr. Shadwell oppoſed it, by reaſon of the inflammatory fever, and eryſipelas; preſſed for temperate cordial medicines, to diſcharge the blood; and cupping, as well as other evacuations, to prevent too great a load of humours falling upon the leg. This he inſiſted on the next day, though the fever was off; apprehending the conſequence of that limb being too much loaded: And though, on Sunday the 14th, the queen eat a chicken with very good appetite; though all the other phyſicians thought matters ſo well, as not to need any preſcription; yet that very good appearance did not eaſe Dr. Shadwell of his fears, for what might happen to the leg, if the eryſipelas ſhould turn to an impoſthumation: which it did, according to his prognoſtic, not long after; and proved at laſt the immediate cauſe of the queen's death.

[c] This Boyer, the hiſtorian, had from the major-general's own mouth' whoſe name he had not liberty to reveal.

[d] Some time before the parliament met, the following letter, ſaid to be written by the duke of Lorrain, was handed about firſt in manuſcript and afterwards in print:

Madam,

'We could not be more ſurprized at the addreſſes of the Britiſh parliament laſt ſummer, than with the late remonſtrances of your majeſty's miniſter at Utrecht, in relation to the removal of the chevalier de St. George from the dominions of Lorrain. Before we would abſolutely comply with the requeſt of the moſt Chriſtian king in that affair, the profound reſpect we have for your quiet, made us apprehenſive of giving the leaſt uneaſineſs to your majeſty. But when we were aſſured, on the contrary, that this expedient would be highly agreeable to all ſides, as the only means to remove one of the chief obſtacles to the general peace of Europe, ſo much wanted and deſired: Proud of ſo great an honour, we could no longer refrain from opening our arms, to receive a prince, the moſt accompliſhed, the moſt virtuous, and moſt amiable of human race, who only wants to be ſeen to be admired, and known to be almoſt adored: Whoſe magnanimity, in his ſufferings, renders him worthy his high birth; beſides his other great and commendable qualities, which confeſs the royal blood that flows in his veins.

We therefore hope your majeſty, and the Britiſh nation, will not take in ill part, that we cannot comply with a demand ſo inconſiſtent with our own honour, and the laws of hoſpitality; that, after our protection once given, we ſhould voluntarily abandon, to the rage of his enemies, an innocent, diſtreſſed prince, who knows no crime, but being born the laſt heir male to that illuſtrious family, which, for ſeveral ages, has given ſo many great monarchs to the world (amongſt the reſt, your majeſty) of whoſe heroick virtues he is a happy imitator; and whoſe conſpicuous and great actions have reflected as much luſtre, as you have received from your noble and truly royal progenitors. That God Almighty would take your majeſty into his holy protection, is the ardent wiſh of,

Madam,

Your majeſty's, &c.

This letter, though, with different views, was diſperſed with equal induſtry by both parties, and, with other concurring circumſtances, greatly increaſed the fears and jealouſies of the well-affected to the Proteſtant Succeſſion,

The earl of Wharton having urged the dangers, which threatened the nation, and the Proteſtant Succeſſion from the mal-adminiſtration of affairs, a queſtion was propoſed, 'Whether the Proteſtant Succeſſion was in danger under the preſent adminiſtration'? The court lords, who had a mind to ſcreen the miniſtry under the queen's name, inſiſted, that the laſt words of the queſtion ſhould be, under her majeſty's adminiſtration. The Whig lords alledged, 'That the queen ought not to be mentioned in a queſtion, that did not at all concern her majeſty: For, by our conſtitution, the ſovereign can do no wrong; and, if any thing be done amiſs, the miniſters alone are accountable for it'. But it was urged, 'That the queen having, in her ſpeech from the throne, taken notice of the inſinuations, that the Proteſtant Succeſſion was in danger under her government; the queſtion ought to be taken in her majeſty's expreſſions about the ſame ſubject'. This being agreed to, the queſtion was warmly debated from two in the afternoon, till nine o'clock in the evening, when the Proteſtant Succeſſion was voted out of danger by a majority of twelve voices only, ſeventy-ſix againſt ſixty-four. The moſt remarkable circumſtance of this debate was, that the archbiſhop of York and the earl of Angleſea ſpoke and voted with the Whig lords, which added great ſtrength to that ſide; the archbiſhop drawing after him the whole bench of biſhops, three courtiers only excepted; and the other being followed by the earls of Abingdon and Jerſey, the lords Aſhburnham and Carteret, and ſome other temporal peers, who, like the lord Angleſea, had, upon moſt occaſions, voted with the court lords; ſo that the victory, now gained, was owing either to the Scots peers, or to the late creation. And it was the general opinion, that this ſeeming advantage was in reality a kind of defeat. The earl of Angleſea's ſpeech upon this occaſion was much taken notice of: He ſaid, among other things, 'That, when he came into the houſe, he thought indeed the Proteſtant Succeſſion to be ſtill in danger on the part of France, whoſe intereſt it was to reſtore the Pretender: But that, after he had heard what ſo many noble members of that auguſt aſſembly, perſons of undoubted honour and probity, had alledged againſt the miniſters, and no anſwer offered to confute it, either by the miniſters themſelves, or their friends, he could not but believe the Succeſſion to be in danger under ſuch an adminiſtration'. He afterwards endeavoured to clear himſelf, as to the ſhare he had in ſome late tranſactions: 'I own (ſaid he) I gave my aſſent to the ceſſation of arms, for which I take ſhame to myſelf, and aſk God, my country, and my conſcience pardon. But, however, this fault I did not commit, till that noble lord (turning towards the lord-treaſurer) had aſſured the council, that the peace would be glorious and advantageous both to her majeſty and her allies. Adding, that, as the honour of his ſovereign, and the good of his country, were the rule of his actions, ſo he had no reſpect of perſons; and if he found himſelf impoſed upon, he durſt purſue an evil miniſter, from the queen's cloſet to the Tower, and from the Tower to the ſcaffold. The lord-treaſurer, againſt whom this was levelled, ſaid, 'That the peace was as glorious and advantageous, as could be expected, conſidering the neceſſity of affairs, and the contradiction the queen's miniſters had met with, both at home and abroad'. Several lords replied, That no miniſters ever had it in their power to make ſo honourable and advantageous a peace, as the queen's miniſters had: And the duke of Argyle in particular added, 'That he had lately croſſed the kingdom of France, both in going to, and returning from Minorca. That it was indeed one of the fineſt countries in the univerſe, but that there were marks of a general deſolation in all the places through which he paſſed. That he had rode forty miles together without meeting a man fit to carry arms: That the reſt of the people were in the utmoſt miſery and want; and therefore he did not apprehend what neceſſity there was to conclude a peace ſo precipitately with a prince, whoſe dominions were ſo exhauſted of men, money, and proviſions. As to the queſtion now under debate, he ſaid, he firmly believed the Succeſſion in the electoral houſe of Hanover to be in danger from the preſent miniſters, whom he durſt charge with mal-adminiſtration, both within thoſe walls, and without: That he knew, and offered to prove, that the lord-treaſurer had yearly remitted four thouſand pounds to the Highland clans of Scotland, who were known to be entirely devoted to the Pretender, in order to keep them under diſcipline, and ready for any attempt: That, on the other hand, the new-modelling of the army, by diſbanding ſome regiments out of their turn, and by removing from their employments a vaſt number of officers, merely upon account of their known affection to the houſe of Hanover, were clear indications of the deſigns in hand: That it was a diſgrace to the nation, to ſee men, who had never looked an enemy in the face, advanced to the poſts of ſeveral brave officers, who, after they had often expoſed their lives for their country, were now ſtarving in priſon for debt, for want of their pay'. The lord-treaſurer, laying his hand upon his breaſt, ſaid, 'He had, on ſo many occaſions, given ſuch ſignal proofs of his affection to the Proteſtant Succeſſion, that he was ſure no member of that auguſt aſſembly did call it in queſtion. That he owned, he had remitted, for two or three years paſt, three thouſand eight hundred pounds to the Highland clans; but that he hoped the houſe would give him an opportunity to clear his conduct as to that point. And, as for the reformed officers, he had given orders, they ſhould forthwith be paid'. The lord Aſhburnham, who had lately been advanced to the command of a troop of life-guards, thinking himſelf reflected on by ſome expreſſions, which had dropped from the duke of Argyle, took that occaſion to ſay, 'That the queen had no better, nor a more loyal ſubject than himſelf; but that, at the ſame time, he was ready to ſpill every drop of his blood, and ſpend all his fortune, for the ſecurity of the Proteſtant Succeſſion'.

Though after ſome other ſpeeches, the Proteſtant Succeſſion was voted out of danger, as the court-party deſired, yet the lord Hallifax, in order to put their profeſſions of affection to the Proteſtant Succeſſor to the teſt, moved, 'That an addreſs be preſented to the queen, that ſhe would renew her inſtances for the ſpeedy removing the Pretender out of Lorrain; and that ſhe would, in conjunction with the ſtates-general, enter into the guaranty of the Proteſtant Succeſſion in the houſe of Hanover; and alſo with ſuch other princes, as ſhe ſhould think proper'. He was ſeconded by the earl of Wharton, who moved likewiſe, that, in the addreſs, 'Her majeſty might be deſired to iſſue out a proclamation, promiſing a reward to any perſon, who ſhould apprehend the Pretender, dead or alive': This motion was ſupported by the duke of Bolton, who alſo moved, 'That the reward might be ſuitable to the importance of that ſervice'. Nothing was ſaid in oppoſition to theſe motions; but, it being late, ſome members cried, Adjourn, adjourn. But, the other ſide calling for the queſtion, it was unanimouſly reſolved, that the addreſs ſhould be preſented. Before this debate came on, the lord North and Grey moved, that all the ſtrangers, who were in the houſe, ſhould withdraw; upon which the earl of Wharton deſired, that they might be permitted to ſtay; and he was ſeconded by the duke of Argyle. But, the lord, who made the motion, inſiſting upon it, all ſtrangers were obliged to withdraw, except baron Schutz, envoy from Hanover, whoſe ſtanding behind the throne among the peers ſons was connived at. It is very probable, he did not fail giving a full account of this day's tranſactions to his court; and that the earl of Angleſea was noted down in the liſt of perſons, whom by the act of ſettlement, the Proteſtant Succeſſor was empowered to appoint to have a ſhare in the regency, in caſe of a demiſe. But it was obſerved, that the ſame evening the earl ſupped with the lord Bolingbroke, and, two days after, appeared at the treaſurer's levee; from whence it was conjectured, they had found means to regain him by the promiſe of the government of Ireland.

When the addreſs againſt the Pretender was reported by the committee appointed to draw it, the lord North and Grey made a long ſpeech, 'wherein he endeavoured to ſhew the barbarity of ſetting a reward upon any body's head; which, he ſaid, was an encouraging of murder and aſſaſſination; and how repugnant ſuch a practice was to Chriſtianity, the law of nature, and the laws of all civilized nations'. To which purpoſe he quoted ſome paſſages out of Grotius, Puffendorf, and other civilians. He repreſented in particular, 'how inconſiſtent ſuch a proceeding was with the honour and dignity of ſo auguſt an aſſembly in a nation and government, famed for lenity and clemency'; and in concluſion ſaid, 'No man either had more reſpect and affection for the illuſtrious houſe of Hanover, or would do more to ſerve them, than himſelf: but that they muſt excuſe him, if he would not venture damnation for them'. He was ſupported by the lord Trevor, who ſaid, 'What that noble peer had ſpoke, was ſufficient to ſhew how inconſiſtent ſuch a proceeding was with Chriſtianity, and the civil law; and therefore he would confine himſelf to our own laws; and, if he knew or underſtood any thing of theſe, he was confident, they were no leſs oppoſite to ſuch proceedings than the civil law. He knew, he did not ſpeak there as a lawyer or judge, but as a peer. But he was ſo fully ſatisfied of our law diſcountenancing all ſuch proceedings, that, if ever any ſuch caſe ſhould come before him as a judge, he would think himſelf bound in juſtice, honour, and conſcience to condemn ſuch an action as murder; and therefore he hoped, the ſupreme court of judicature in England, and the moſt auguſt tribunal in the univerſe, would not make a precedent for encouraging aſſaſſination': Concluding, that it was ſufficient, and therefore he moved, 'Firſt, that the reward ſhould be for apprehending and bringing the Pretender to juſtice, in caſe he ſhould land, or attempt to land, either in Great-Britain or Ireland. Secondly, That her majeſty iſſue her royal proclamation, whenever, in her great wiſdom, ſhe ſhould judge it neceſſary'. The lords Cowper and Hallifax ſaid, 'that ſuch a proceeding, as repugnant as it might be to the precepts of Chriſtianity, was yet warranted by the practice of the old Romans, of the moſt civilized nations in Europe, and of our nation. For, without recurring to remoter inſtances, we had the example of king James the Second, who ſet a price on the head of his own nephew, the duke of Monmouth'. But theſe two lords were but weakly ſupported by their own party; and, the earl of Angleſea, and lords Aſhburnham, Carteret, and Orrery, who three days before, had left the court-party, having approved the lord Trevor's motion, and moſt of the biſhops, who were againſt ſuch an addreſs, being abſent from the houſe, theſe mitigations were, upon a diviſion carried by a majority of ten voices.

The ſame day, upon a motion made by the lord Hallifax, the lords reſolved to preſent another addreſs to the queen, 'That ſhe would iſſue out a proclamation againſt all jeſuits, popiſh prieſts, and biſhops; as alſo againſt all ſuch, as bore arms againſt the late king William and queen Mary, or her preſent majeſty'. Upon this occaſion, ſome ſevere reflections were made againſt thoſe perſons, who, being outlawed for adhering to the late king James and the Pretender, had the aſſurance, and were encouraged, not only to come over, but even to appear here with a public character. The earl of Angleſea ſaid, on this occaſion, 'That, for his own part, he was againſt widening our domeſtic diviſions by keeping up odious diſtinctions; and therefore, if they, who were born her majeſty's ſubjects, and had been in arms againſt their country, were ſenſible of their fault, and inclined to return to their bounden allegiance, they ought, in his opinion, to open the door for them to come in'. But the houſe had other thoughts of the matter, and the next day reſolved, '1. That no perſon, not included in the articles of Limerick, and who had borne arms in France or Spain, ſhould be capable of any employment civil or military. 2. That no perſon, who is a natural born ſubject of her majeſty, ſhould be capable of ſuſtaining the character of public miniſter from any foreign potentate'. Theſe reſolutions were made with a view to ſir Patrick Lawleſs, who, having been the Pretender's envoy at the court of Madrid, had come over with a credential letter from king Philip. But, upon the noiſe, which his being here made in both houſes of parliament, he thought fit to go to Holland.

As a reflection had been made againſt the treaſurer, for remitting yearly about four thouſand pounds to the clans of Scotland, as if that ſum were deſigned to keep in heart and diſcipline the Pretender's friends, the lord Townſhend moved for taking that affair into conſideration. The duke of Argyle repreſented, 'That, the Scots Highlanders being, for the moſt part, either rank Papiſts, or declared Jacobites, the giving them penſions was, in effect, keeping up popiſh ſeminaries, and fomenting rebellion'. In anſwer to this, the treaſurer alledged, 'That in this particular he had but followed the example of the late king William, who, after he had reduced the Highlanders, thought fit to allow yearly penſions to the heads of the clans, in order to keep them quiet; and, if the preſent miniſtry could be charged with any miſmanagement on that article, it was only for retrenching part of that huſh-money'. Nothing being alledged againſt this apology, the lord North and Grey made a motion for returning the treaſurer the thanks of the houſe for his good ſervices. But the lord Bolingbroke, to put it off, ſaid, 'He was perſuaded the treaſurer was contented with the teſtimony of his own conſcience, and deſired no farther ſatisfaction, than to have his conduct approved by that auguſt aſſembly'. Which was accordingly done. Upon this unſucceſsful attempt upon the treaſurer, the lord North and Grey ſaid, with an air of triumph, 'That, having, by this time, removed all fears and jealouſies about Popery and the Pretender, he hoped the enemies of the miniſtry would now ſpeedily produce all the objections they had againſt their conduct': And moved, that a day might be appointed for taking into conſideration the ſtate of the nation, with regard to the treaties of peace and commerce. He was ſeconded by the earl of Clarendon; and then the houſe adjourned to the 13th of April; but, the day before, the lord chancellor attended only by the Whig lords, preſented to the queen their addreſs againſt the Pretender[e], to which ſhe returned the following anſwer:

My lords,

'It would be a real ſtrengthening to the Succeſſion in the houſe of Hanover, as well as a ſupport to my government, that an end were put to thoſe groundleſs fears and jealouſies, which have been ſo induſtriouſly promoted.

'I do not, at this time, ſee any occaſion for ſuch a proclamation. Whenever I judge it to be neceſſary, I ſhall give my orders for having one iſſued.

'As to the other particulars of this addreſs, I will give proper directions therein'.

This anſwer revived the hopes of the Pretender's friends, who, before the warm ſpeeches againſt him in both houſes, were ſo elated and ſecure of protection, that, towards the end of March, an agent of king James's queen offered to file a bill in chancery, wherein he demanded, in her name, the ſum of ſix hundred, fifty thouſand pounds, due to her by the crown of England, for the dowry of fifty thouſand pounds per annum ſince the death of king James the ſecond. But, the agent having in the bill given her the title of queen-mother, the officer refuſed to file it; upon which the agent changed the title, and preſented in the name of 'the moſt illuſtrious princeſs Maria, relict of James the ſecond, king of England'. Though no notice was taken of this formal demand, yet, purſuant to a private agreement made in France by the lord Bolingbroke, about fifty thouſand pounds were remitted thither for her uſe.

The very day, the addreſs againſt the Pretender was preſented, an incident happened, which, as ſoon as known, threw the miniſters into the utmoſt confuſion. On the 10th of April, moſt of the Whig lords held a conſultation at the lord Hallifax's, to which baron Schutz, envoy from the elector of Hanover, was admitted. It was reſolved, purſuant either to the orders Schutz had received from his court, or to the diſcretionary power, which was lodged with ſome of theſe lords, that the envoy ſhould take the firſt opportunity to demand a writ for the electoral prince to ſit in the houſe of peers, as duke of Cambridge. Accordingly, on the 12th of April, baron Schutz made a viſit to the lord chancellor, and, among other civilities, acknowledged the affection he had ſhewn, on ſeveral occaſions, to the moſt ſerene electoral houſe of Hanover. The lord chancellor told him, he was extremely ſenſible of the honour he did him by his viſit and compliments; and deſired him to aſſure the elector, of his entire devotion to his ſervice; hoping his electoral highneſs gave no credit to the falſe reports, that were induſtriouſly ſpread abroad, in order to give him jealouſies of her majeſty's miniſters. The baron anſwered, he would not fail diſcharging ſo agreeable a commiſſion; but he had a favour to aſk of him in the name of the electoral prince, that his lordſhip would be pleaſed to make out a writ for his ſitting in the houſe of peers, as duke of Cambridge'. The lord-chancellor, ſurprized at this unexpected demand, told the baron, 'It was not uſual to make out writs for peers, who were out of the kingdom. However, he would forthwith apply to her majeſty for directions in this caſe'. The baron anſwered, 'He did not doubt, his lordſhip knew, and would perform the duty of his office. But, as to the objection of the duke of Cambridge's being out of the kingdom, he would aſſure him, his electoral highneſs had reſolved to come over very ſpeedily, and perhaps might be landed before the writ was made out'. Upon this, the baron Schutz taking his leave, the chancellor deſired him to remember, 'He did not refuſe his demand,

[e] The addreſs was as follows:

'We your majeſty's moſt dutiful and loyal ſubjects, the lords ſpiritual and temporal in parliament aſſembled, having a juſt and tender concern for your majeſty, and our country, and being encouraged by that zeal your majeſty has ſo often expreſſed from the throne, for the Proteſtant Succeſſion in the illuſtrious houſe of Hanover, do now preſume to renew our moſt humble application to your majeſty, upon a ſubject ſo agreeable to you, as this which is neareſt your own royal heart; and do humbly beſeech your majeſty, that, whenever your majeſty, in your great wiſdom, ſhall judge it neceſſary, you will be graciouſly pleaſed to iſſue your royal proclamation, promiſing a reward to any perſon, who ſhall apprehend and bring the Pretender to juſtice, in caſe he ſhall land, or attempt to land, either in Great-Britain, or Ireland, ſuitable to the importance of that ſervice, for the ſafety of your majeſty's perſon, and the ſecurity of the Proteſtant Succeſſion in the houſe of Hanover.

We alſo deſire leave to expreſs our very great concern, That your majeſty's inſtances, for removing the Pretender out of Lorrain, have not yet had their effect; and do humbly intreat your majeſty, that you will be graciouſly pleaſed to inſiſt upon, and renew your inſtances for the ſpeedy removing the Pretender out of Lorrain; and likewiſe, that your majeſty will be graciouſly pleaſed, in conjunction with the ſtates-general, to deſire the emperor to enter into the guaranty of the Proteſtant Succeſſion in the houſe of Hanover, and alſo all ſuch other princes, as your majeſty ſhall think proper.

but only thought proper to acquaint the queen with it; which he would do immediately'. To this the baron ſaid, 'He likewiſe deſired his lordſhip to remember, that he applied himſelf to him for the duke of Cambridge's writ'. The chancellor having the ſame evening acquainted the queen, and her chief miniſters, with theſe paſſages, a council was immediately called; and, having ſat from nine o'clock till after eleven, it was reſolved, That the lord chancellor ſhould make out a writ for the duke of Cambridge. This tranſaction, which, the next morning, was firſt whiſpered about in the court of requeſts, caſt a ſudden damp on the ſpirits of the open and ſecret friends of the Pretender. It was then a queſtion, whether baron Schutz had made that demand by expreſs direction from his maſter, or only by the advice of ſome Whig lords. But it is certain, the queen took ſo ill the baron's applying himſelf to the chancellor, before he acquainted her with his orders, that ſhe ſent the maſter of the ceremonies to forbid him the court. Two days after, a meſſenger was diſpatched to Mr. Thomas Harley, at the court of Hanover, with inſtructions relating to the new ſcene opened by baron Schutz; who, about a week after, thought fit to return to Hanover, having left with reſident Kreinnberg a letter to Mr. Bromley, telling him, 'That, having had the misfortune to incur her majeſty's diſpleaſure, and being thereby rendered incapable of ſerving his maſter any longer in this court, he thought it his duty to return home'. Kreinnberg delivered this letter to Mr. Secretary Bromley, who told him, 'That either he, or any other miniſter, whom the elector of Hanover would pleaſe to ſend over, would be well received by her majeſty'. This affair occaſioned various conjectures: And as Schutz's declaration of the duke of Cambridge's intention ſuddenly to come over alarmed the Pretender's adherents, ſo it raiſed the ſpirits of the well-affected to the houſe of Hanover. What was the ſenſe of the courtiers about the duke of Cambridge's coming over, and the preſent juncture of affairs, may be gathered from ſome remarkable paſſages in a pamphlet publiſhed about this time with the title of 'Hannibal not at our gates; or an inquiry into the grounds of our preſent fears of Popery and the Pretender': of which one of the principal writers of the Examiner was ſuſpected to be the author. In this pamphlet, it was, among other things, ironically inſinuated, 'That a certain gentleman was gone to Hanover to bamboozle'. And indeed it was the general opinion that Mr. Harley, who arrived at Hanover on the very day baron Schutz demanded the writ, was ſent only to amuſe that court with profeſſions of the treaſurer's and all his friends devotion to the electoral family; and (it is ſaid) as a proof of that devotion, with the very original of a letter, the queen had written with her own hand to the Pretender. But, as the ſubject of Mr. Harley's laſt embaſſy is ſtill a ſecret, no ſtreſs can be laid on the various conjectures it occaſioned. It may only be obſerved, he met with a cold reception at Hanover, and, making no long ſtay there, came back to London on the 25th of May. It may likewiſe be remarked, that, upon the firſt ſurprize of baron Schutz demanding the writ for the duke of Cambridge, the lord Paget, who was named envoy extraordinary to the court of Hanover, he declined that employment in ſo critical a juncture; and the earl of Clarendon was afterwards appointed.

The lord chancellor having, on the 13th of April, reported to the houſe of peers the queen's anſwer to the addreſs againſt the Pretender, ſome expreſſions in it did not pleaſe the Whig lords, who moved for another addreſs to return her majeſty thanks for her anſwer; and containing the grounds and reaſons of their former addreſs. The court-lords, foreſeeing that, if ſuch an addreſs was carried, the prevailing party might advance to more vigorous reſolutions, ſtrenuouſly inſiſted not to enter into ungrateful particulars, but to confine themſelves to expreſſions in the queen's anſwer. An order for ſuch an addreſs being offered, the duke of Leeds moved, that at the cloſe of it, where mention was made of the 'fears and jealouſies univerſally ſpread, the words [and induſtriouſly] might be added': which, after a debate of four hours, wherein the biſhop of Sarum made a long ſpeech, was carried only by the majority of two proxies, the votes in the houſe being equal, ſixty-one on each ſide. This victory of the courtiers was by their antagoniſts treated as little better than a defeat. And it is certain, that the Whig lords had that day carried their point, had it not been for the accidental loſs of four votes: The duke of Rutland being then at Newmarket with a proxy in his pocket; the duke of Grafton, being ſent for home to his ducheſs then in labour with her firſt child; and the earl of Gainſborough, being taken ſo ill that very morning, that he could not ſign his proxy. It was alſo remarkable, that, of ſixteen biſhops then in the houſe, two only, Rocheſter and Durham, voted with the court: That the new biſhops of London and Briſtol, who were thought blindly devoted to the miniſtry, joined with the Whigs; as did alſo the earl of Angleſea; which was undoubtedly owing to baron Schutz's demanding a writ for the duke of Cambridge, which viſibly gave life and weight to the Whig-party. However, the reſolution being laid before the queen, ſhe only anſwered, 'She thanked them for their addreſs; and that ſhe took very kindly the aſſurances they gave'.

On the 14th of April, a motion was made for taking into conſideration the treaties of peace and commerce; and ſome ſpeeches were made on both ſides, after which the debate was adjourned to the 16th. That day the Whig lords being apprehenſive, that, if any debate aroſe about the Spaniſh treaty, the other party would propoſe an addreſs to the queen, approving of that treaty, which they thought abſurd, they therefore agreed to ſay nothing againſt the treaty, that might draw them into a debate. The lord North and Grey ſtood up firſt, and ſaid 'If any lord had any objections againſt the Spaniſh treaty, he was ready to anſwer them; and ſo, in a challenging manner, went on for ſome time. After he had done, there was ſilence for a quarter of an hour; and then the earl of Clarendon ſaid, 'My lords, ſince no objection can be raiſed againſt the Spaniſh treaty, we ſhould addreſs her majeſty to return her our moſt humble thanks, for having, by a ſafe, honourable, and advantageous peace with Spain, delivered theſe nations from a long, conſuming land war; and to deſire her, notwithſtanding any obſtructions, that may be thrown in her way, to proceed to the ſettlement of Europe, according to the principles laid down in her moſt gracious ſpeech'. To this the lord Cowper anſwered, 'My lords, this is the moſt barefaced attempt, that ever was made by this or any other miniſtry, to ſecure themſelves, by endeavouring to get the ſanction of this houſe for themſelves. My lords, I have no objections againſt theſe treaties. Are the miniſters themſelves jealous, that their actions ſtand in need of the ſanction of this houſe? Elſe why this endeavour at an addreſs, to make their act the act of the houſe? The lord, that ſpoke firſt, acting like a ſoldier, would, by ſkirmiſhing, have drawn on a general engagement; but the troops are too well diſciplined to fall into an ambuſcade of his laying. But I cannot remove my finger from the original of our misfortunes, 'the ceſſation of arms'. We were then told, that if a blow had been ſtruck, it would have ruined the peace. Would to God it had ruined this peace'. To ſupport this, the lord Halifax ſaid, 'What was laſt mentioned, my lords, makes me riſe into the higheſt reſentment of the vile uſage given my lord duke of Ormond; a lord, for whom I have the moſt profound reſpect. My lord Ormond went over into Flanders with a true Engliſh heart, which, my lords, is the beſt in the world, with a deſire to do his country all the ſervice his great ability capacitated him to do. Therefore, it muſt be inconceiveable, the horrible anguiſh it muſt give his noble and generous heart to receive ſuch ſhocking orders, reſtraining the noble ardour of the ſoldiers, fluſhed with former victories, and hopes of ſtill greater'. The earl of Nottingham ſaid, 'My lords, I never knew the like addreſs to this ever offered at but once, in the caſe of the duke of Suffolk, who, in Henry the ſeventh's days, had made a treaty, for which he thought it convenient to get the ſanction of this houſe by an addreſs, and got ſeven lords made at one time to carry the vote. Yet he was called to an account afterwards for the treaty, notwithſtanding the addreſs. I ſay no more of the man, becauſe he came to an untimely end'. The biſhop of Saliſbury likewiſe ſaid, 'My lords, I do not underſtand what law or reaſon can be given, to impower one ally to diſengage himſelf from his other allies, unleſs in a proper manner and time he acquaints them, he has done his ultimus conatus; [utmoſt effort] and that to proceed further would be a certa pernicies [certain ruin] That we had not come to our ultimus conatus is plain, ſince in the year of the ceſſation of arms, and the year following, wherein nothing was done, we made as great efforts as the former, when we did ſo many glorious things; and to proceed further, in all human probability, it would have been certain pernicies to our then enemy the French'. The biſhop of London, who had been one of the plenipotentiaries at Utrecht, anſwered, 'My lords, at the ceſſation of arms, our caſe was the very caſe in point, which the biſhop of Sarum puts, for we had then come to our ultimus conatus, and, for aught we know, to proceed further would have been certa pernicies'. The earl of Wharton replied, 'I did deſign to have ſaid a great deal to-day, but I find it anticipated by the lords, who have ſpoken before me. Only I muſt ſay what I learn by ſitting here, that the carrying this vote is the ultimus conatus of the miniſtry; and, if they do not carry it, it will be to them certa pernicies. Good, my lords, gratify my curioſity, to let me ſee what certa pernicies will be'. Some other Whig lords maintained, that there was no abſolute neceſſity of making a peace, the nation having given almoſt as much money for theſe three years paſt, as during any three years of the war; and, as for the pretended advantages, gained by the treaty with Spain, it was plain there were no more than what had been ſtipulated before by the treaty of the year 1667. They alſo complained of the method, in which the negotiation of peace had been carried on, and of our giving up the intereſts of the emperor, the king of Portugal, and of the Catalans. But after a warm debate, that laſted till nine o'clock in the evening, it was reſolved by a majority of eighty-two votes againſt ſixty-nine, to preſent an addreſs, to acknowledge, 'her majeſty's goodneſs to her people, in delivering them by a ſafe, honourable, and advantageous peace with France and Spain, from the burthen of a conſuming land war, unequally carried on, and become, at laſt, impracticable; and to intreat her majeſty to purſue ſuch meaſures, as ſhe ſhould judge neceſſary for compleating the ſettlement of Europe on the principles laid down in her majeſty's ſpeech'. An addreſs to that purpoſe was the next day agreed to, and ſent down to the commons for their concurrence.

In the mean time, to prepare the commons to give their approbation to the conduct of the miniſtry, in concluding their treaties with France and Spain, ſeveral papers were laid before the houſe: particularly a report, with obſervations from the commiſſioners of public accounts, ſetting forth the abuſes and miſmanagements in clothing the army, in diſpoſing the off-reckonings of regiments, and in other inſtances. Then, to give a view how heavy the war was become to England, and how inſupportable the continuance of it would have proved, there was added, 'a ſtate of the expence of the late war' for twelve years, which, with the ſupply of 2,776,228 l. granted this ſeſſion, amounted to above ſixty-eight millions and a half. But the moſt remarkable paper of all was an account of the ſtate of the ſeveral treaties of peace, between the queen and her allies, and France and Spain, with the obſtructions ſhe had met with, in her endeavours to make the ſame univerſal and compleat; and of what was done relating to the Catalans.

This account (ſuppoſed to be drawn up by the lord Bolingbroke, in order to remove the objections againſt the late treaties, particularly, the giving up the intereſts of the king of Portugal and of the Catalans) was ſo varniſhed over with gloſſes and popular pretences, that many members, who were willing to believe what was ſaid, and had no opportunity or inclination to be better informed, were perſuaded of the truth of it, and induced to ſide with the miniſtry in all the debates about the Succeſſion and treaties[f].

On the 15th of April, a motion was made in a committee of the whole houſe, by ſir Edward Knatchbull, and the queſtion put, 'Whether the Proteſtant Succeſſion in the houſe of Hanover be in danger under her majeſty's government?' Mr. Secretary Bromley endeavoured to prove, it was not, by repreſenting what the queen had done for ſecuring that ſucceſſion, and removing the Pretender from Lorrain. He was anſwered by Mr. Walpole, who, with great ſpirit, ſhewed the Proteſtant Succeſſion to be in danger, not from her majeſty, but from the dubious conduct of ſome perſons in high ſtations; and therefore inſiſted, that the queen might not be mentioned in the queſtion. Mr. Campion, having ſpoken in vindication of the miniſtry, was anſwered by the earl of Hertford. The lord Hinchinbroke expreſſed likewiſe his fears of the Proteſtant Succeſſion being in danger, from the encouragement that was given to the Pretender's friends, and particularly, in North-Britain, which he had an opportunity to obſerve, when he was there with the regiment, in which he had a troop. After ſome other ſpeeches, the court-party, being apprehenſive, the queſtion would go againſt them, endeavoured to drop it, by moving, that Mr. Freeman, chairman of the committee, ſhould leave the chair. Upon this, ſir Thomas Hanmer, the ſpeaker, made a memorable ſpeech, importing, 'That he was ſorry to ſee that endeavours were uſed to wave that queſtion, and ſtop their mouths; but he was of opinion, this was the proper, and perhaps the only time for patriots to ſpeak. That a great deal of pains were taken to ſcreen ſome perſons; and, in order to that, to make them overlook the dangers that threatened the queen, the nation, and the Proteſtant Succeſſion. That, for his own part, he had all the honour and reſpect imaginable for her majeſty's miniſters; but that he owed ſtill more to his country than to any miniſter. That, in this debate, ſo much had been ſaid to prove the Succeſſion to be in danger, and ſo little to make out the contrary, that he could not but believe the firſt'. He concluded with taking notice of 'Sir Patrick Lawleſs being ſuffered to come over, and admitted to an audience of her majeſty'. This ſpeech had a great influence on the unbiaſſed and unprejudiced members; but nevertheleſs, after a long and warm debate, it was reſolved, by a majority of two hundred and fifty-ſix voices againſt two hundred and eight, 'Firſt, That it was the opinion of this committee, that the Proteſtant Succeſſion in the houſe of Hanover was in no danger under her majeſty's government. Secondly, That the houſe be moved, for an addreſs to return the thanks of the houſe to her majeſty, for the inſtances ſhe had uſed for the removal of the Pretender from the dominions of the duke of Lorrain; and to beſeech her to renew her inſtances for his ſpeedy removal from thence'.

[f] The ſubſtance of this account was as follows: The author began with artfully ſuggeſting, 'That her majeſty looked upon the peace between Spain and Portugal to be as good as concluded: That, in the mean while, her majeſty had taken the moſt effectual care of the intereſts of the king of Portugal, having given to that prince, on the 18th of Auguſt 1713, of her own motion, a new guaranty, whereby the queen obliged herſelf to ſecure the reſtitution, even by force of arms, if that ſhould become neceſſary, of any thing, which might be taken from Portugal, before the concluſion of the peace; to procure to that crown the colony of the Sacrament, or, in lieu thereof, ſuch an equivalent, as the king of Portugal himſelf ſhould be contented to accept: To obtain ſatisfaction to the Portugueſe, for what they claim to be due to them on account of their aſſiento, or contract with the crown of Spain; and to ſet on foot, after the peace, an amicable negotiation, for accommodating the differences, which had ariſen, concerning ſeveral eſtates ſituated in Portugal, and claimed by ſubjects of Portugal, reſiding in Spain: and concerning thoſe Spaniſh ſhips, which were, about the beginning of the war, ſeized by the Portugueſe. That on theſe principles the earl of Strafford made a ſolemn declaration to the miniſters of Spain in February laſt, when he exchanged with them the inſtruments of ratification of the treaties between her majeſty and the Catholic king. That the peace, which the queen then ratified, did not diſpenſe with the obligations, which ſhe lay under to the king of Portugal, as well by her guaranty lately granted, as by her defenſive alliance made in 1703'. As to the Catalans, it was alledged, 'That the landing of the earl of Peterborough in Catalonia, and her majeſty's entering into that part of the war, were in conſequence of the ſolicitations of the Catalans, and other Spaniards, affected to the houſe of Auſtria; and that all the engagements, which ſhe gave to theſe people, went no farther than the obtaining from king Charles the third a confirmation of their rights and privileges: And although her majeſty offered, at that time, to give a guaranty for the ſame, and to enter into a treaty with that people; yet it did not appear, that ſuch a guaranty was ever given, or that ſuch a treaty was ever made. That notwithſtanding the treatment the queen had received from the emperor, and the juſt provocation ſhe had to leave him to ſtruggle with the conſequences of his own meaſures; yet, at the end of the year 1713, her majeſty ſet a negotiation on foot for the evacuation of Catalonia, and the neutrality of Italy. That her majeſty's aim, by the firſt part of this treaty, was, to ſecure the return of the emperor, and of the Imperial troops; and, ſince ſhe could no longer ſupport the Catalans by her arms, to provide for them by the terms of peace. That her majeſty's aim, in the ſecond part, was to leave as little room as poſſible for France, or Spain, to attack his Imperial majeſty, when the treaties between her majeſty and the ſtates-general ſhould be concluded with the moſt Chriſtian king. That the queen conſidered, that theſe treaties, and the barrier of the ſtates, would ſecure the ten provinces of the Netherlands from any invaſion; and, by this convention for a neutrality in Italy, the emperor's territories in that country were likewiſe covered; ſo that by the care, which her majeſty took, ſince he was determined to run the riſk of continuing ſingle in the war, he would lie open in no frontier but that of the Rhine, where, by the ſame means, he would be able conſiderably to increaſe his ſtrength, as well with draughts out of Italy, as with the Germans, and other forces, which were to be tranſported from Spain. That it was no ſooner than the end of January, 1712-13, that, by the good offices of her majeſty's miniſters at Utrecht, the Imperial and French plenipotentiaries were brought to meet upon this negotiation; and, in the mean time, her majeſty endeavoured to induce the Catholic king to facilitate this matter as much as poſſible, and particularly on the head of the privileges of the Catalans, in which the miniſters of France concurred with the greateſt earneſtneſs. But that it ſoon appeared, that his Catholic majeſty, who ſaw the advantage which the conduct of the Imperial court gave him, would hardly be prevailed upon to grant any thing more than a general act of oblivion, and a reſtitution of honours and eſtates. That on the 14th of March, N. S. 1713, the convention for the neutrality of Italy, and the evacuation of Catalonia was executed, and the article concerning the privileges of the Catalans left undetermined; a right being reſerved to her majeſty to inſiſt, whenever the emperor ſhould treat of peace, that thoſe privileges ſhould be preſerved to them; and the moſt Chriſtian king declaring, that he would concur with the queen to the ſame end. That, in May, 1713, the treaty of peace between her majeſty and the Catholic king was ſigned proviſionally here, and in July definitively at Utrecht; whereby there was not only an abſolute amneſty, with a full poſſeſſion of all their eſtates and honours, but alſo the privileges of the Caſtilians granted to the Catalans; which article was, at leaſt in this reſpect, conſiderable, that the people of Catalonia are thereby entitled to hold any employments in the Weſt-Indies, or to trade directly thither, in as full and ample a manner, as the people of Caſtile, from which they were formerly as much excluded as any foreign nation whatever. That the preſervation of their antient privileges was neither granted nor directly refuſed by this article; ſo that the queen, either when the peace ſhould come to be treated between their Imperial and Catholic majeſties, or on another favourable occaſion, which might offer itſelf, was at liberty to renew her application upon this head. That in the mean time it was certain, that the refuſal of the people of this principality, as well as the iſland of Majorca, to ſubmit to the Catholic king, when, in purſuance of the treaty of neutrality, theſe countries were evacuated by the emperor's forces, and their obſtinate reſiſtance, ſince that time, muſt, have rendered the obtaining of their privileges ſtill more difficult than it was. In

When theſe reſolutions were reported the next day to the houſe, there aroſe a debate, in which Mr. Walpole, Mr. Lechmere, and general Stanhope, made very ſtrong ſpeeches. Mr. Walpole, among other things, applauded the public ſpirit, which the ſpeaker had ſhewn the day before; but added, He deſpaired of ſeeing truth and juſtice prevail, ſince, notwithſtanding the weight of a perſon of his known integrity, merit, and eloquence, the majority of votes had carried it againſt reaſon and argument'. General Stanhope endeavoured to prove the Proteſtant Succeſſion to be in danger by this ſingle but forcible induction, 'That as it was univerſally acknowledged, it had been the French king's intention, ſo it was ſtill his intereſt, and he had it now, more than ever, in his power to reſtore the Pretender'. However, it was carried without a diviſion, that the Proteſtant Succeſſion was out of danger, and that an addreſs of thanks ſhould be preſented to the queen. To which addreſs ſhe anſwered, that ſhe would renew her inſtances for the removal of the Pretender out of Lorrain.

The lords having ſent (as hath been ſaid) a meſſage to the commons for their concurrence, in an addreſs of thanks for the treaties of peace and commerce with France and Spain, the meſſage was taken into conſideration on the 22d of April, and a warm debate aroſe. The moſt material objections were raiſed by Mr. Ward, an eminent merchant, to the treaties of commerce, in which many eſſential points, particularly the duties on ſeveral ſorts of goods and merchandize, were left looſe and undetermined, and therefore liable to arbitrary explanations. Mr. Auditor Foley having anſwered him, he was replied to by Mr. Horace Walpole, who was ſupported by ſir Peter King. Mr Aiſlabie, who had, ſome time before, left the court-party, and was therefore removed from his place of one of the lords of the admiralty, ſpoke, on this occaſion, with great vehemence againſt the miniſters, for having made ſo precarious a peace. They were anſwered by Mr. Campion; and the leading men among the Whigs plainly perceiving, from the noiſe and laughter of their antagoniſts, that they were ſure of a majority, gave up the conteſt, and did not think fit to inſiſt on a diviſion, which would but expoſe their weakneſs. So it was reſolved to agree with the lords in the following addreſs, which was preſented, the 24th of April, by both houſes to the queen:

Moſt gracious ſovereign,

'WE your majeſty's moſt dutiful and loyal ſubjects, the lords ſpiritual and temporal, and commons, in parliament aſſembled, beg leave to expreſs the juſt ſenſe, which we have of your majeſty's goodneſs to your people, in delivering them, by a ſafe, honourable, and advantageous peace with France and Spain, from the heavy burthen of a conſuming land war, unequally carried on, and become at laſt impracticable. And we do moſt earneſtly intreat your majeſty, that you will be pleaſed, with the ſame ſteadineſs, notwithſtanding all the obſtructions, which have been, or may be, thrown in your way, to purſue ſuch meaſures, as you ſhall judge neceſſary for compleating the ſettlement of Europe, on the principles, laid down by your majeſty in your moſt gracious ſpeech from the throne'.

To which the queen returned this anſwer:

My lords and gentlemen,

'The ſtate of public affairs in Europe, as well as the neceſſities of my own kingdom, obliged me to enter into a negotiation of peace; and, notwithſtanding all obſtructions and difficulties, I have, by the bleſſing of God, brought it to a happy concluſion.

ſhort, that, if the antient privileges of theſe people, in their full extent were not obtained, it muſt be attributed to thoſe, who rendered it impracticable to treat effectually for them, before the withdrawing of the queen's forces out of Catalonia; and, if their condition was become ſince more deſperate, thoſe only were to anſwer for it, who had encouraged them not to ſubmit a ſecond time to their prince, with the hopes of relief, which they, who gave ſuch hopes, muſt have known themſelves in no condition of making good'. As to the treaty with France, after a long detail of the negotiation, upon the overtures made by that crown in April 1711, it was alledged, 'That by the conferences held with Monſieur Buys here, by the accounts, which came from abroad, and by the repreſentations, which ſome of the allies made to her majeſty, it appeared undeniably evident, not only that the war was become, on the preſent foot, abſolutely impracticable, but alſo that no alteration could be attempted, either in the method of carrying it on, or in the views, towards which it was directed, without diſſolving at once the confederacy; and that the diſpute was in fact, not whether a peace, by which Spain and the Indies would be left to Philip, ſhould be made, but who ſhould have the making of it? That the real annual expence of this kingdom amounted to more than ſeven millions; whereas we were not in a condition effectually to raiſe near ſix millions in the courſe of a year; from hence it follows, that, if this proportion had been continued, about nine millions would have been the true charge of a ſecond war, and about eleven millions that of a third. But this was the ſtate of our affairs, whilſt the houſe of Auſtria contributed nothing but one regiment to the war of Spain, little to that of Italy, had but few forces, and thoſe entirely unactive, on the Rhine; and ſent none into the Netherlands, except ſuch, as thoſe harraſſed provinces were obliged to maintain, and were thereby rendered unable to furniſh troops, or make the neceſſary proviſions for the operations of the army; both which they might otherwiſe have done, and both which they did in an eminent degree, whilſt they were under the government of the preſent king of Spain. That the ſtates-general bore a conſiderable burthen; but, as they had, from the year 1708, ſent no ſupplies of any kind, either to Portugal, or to Catalonia, and had drawn themſelves almoſt entirely out of the Spaniſh war; as they furniſhed, in no proportion, their quota for the ſea-ſervice; as they had reduced their joint contributions with the queen, in all payments, to one third of the whole; and as they were very backward in anſwering even this ſhare of expence; ſo the load of Great-Britain came, upon their account, as well as upon the emperor's, to be vaſtly increaſed. As to the reſt of the allies, all the troops, which they furniſhed, were maintained by the queen and the ſtates, except a few, and thoſe almoſt wholly employed in covering their own frontiers. That, in this ſituation of affairs, her majeſty declared to the Imperialiſts, and to the Dutch, that if they would not allow France to have given ſufficient grounds for opening the conferences; if they were deſirous to carry on the war, and determined to accept of no terms of peace, inferior to thoſe, which had been formerly demanded and refuſed; ſhe was, on her part, ready to concur with them. But that, in juſtice to herſelf and to them, ſhe thought herſelf bound to let them know, that ſhe could no longer bear ſo diſproportionate a burthen: That it was evident, that the common effort muſt be ſtill greater than it was; or that there would remain no proſpect of arriving at the ends, which they propoſed; and that for theſe reaſons it would be incumbent upon them, if the war continued, to increaſe their expences, whilſt the queen reduced her's. That the miniſters of the ſtates general were very candid and open upon this head: Monſieur Buys aſſerted, that his maſters had done their utmoſt already; and could be obliged to no more: Many of the others had, on ſeveral occaſions, declared their country unable to ſupport the charge they were at another ſummer; and the penſionary himſelf, in a deputation of the ſtates, appointed to attend the earl of Strafford, in October 1711, declared, that it was impoſſible to think of continuing the war another year. That what from the emperor, and what from the princes of the North, we ſhould be in the utmoſt danger, ſhould we attempt to do it; and finally, that there were traitors to their country, who were againſt the peace'. That many inſtances might be produced to ſhew, that there was at leaſt as little reaſon to expect from the houſe of Auſtria, as from the ſtates-general, a greater effort than they had hitherto made. That the Imperial miniſters confeſſed, that their maſter expected the queen ſhould furniſh all the money; and that the utmoſt he could do, would be to ſend troops at her expence; in the ſame breath avowing the emperor's intention to break the negotiation of peace, and to continue the war, till Spain was conquered; the entire monarchy whereof he expected. That upon the death of the late emperor Joſeph, in the beginning of the year 1711, the eyes, not only of the princes of the empire, but of all the confederates, and of her majeſty, in the firſt place, were immediately fixed on his brother. And this event occaſioned a great alteration in the councils of Europe, and gave a new turn to the ſentiments of many princes. That there was reaſon to believe, that the miniſters of Vienna themſelves began to cool in the project of recovering Spain and the Indies. They ſeemed to intend nothing more, than to get the preſent emperor into Germany, and to ſecure the poſſeſſion of Italy to themſelves. That, in Holland, a partition of the Spaniſh monarchy ſeemed almoſt the general ſcheme; and the conduct of that republic, as well as the confeſſion of its miniſters, ſhewed, that the project of driving Philip out of Spain was looked upon there to be a pure chimera. That her majeſty had been acquainted, that ſome of the princes of the empire thought it a point, which deſerved the moſt ſerious reflection, whether they ſhould ſuffer the Imperial and Spaniſh crowns to be united on the ſame head; and whether it might not be proper, in the capitulation of the empire, to inſiſt on the ſeparating of them. That other members of the grand alliance, and thoſe the only two, with whom her majeſty had entered into any formal engagement, for recovering the entire Spaniſh monarchy, repreſented upon the ſame occaſion againſt placing this crown on the emperor's head. And it was urged by one of the moſt conſiderable princes in the alliance, that the principle, upon which he engaged in the war, was now altered; and that, inſtead of fighting to procure the Spaniſh monarchy to the houſe of Auſtria, his intereſt, and even his ſafety, required, that he ſhould fight to prevent it. That the caſe therefore ſtood thus; The preſent Emperor, even after his brother's death, and his own election, would content himſelf with nothing leſs, than the whole Spaniſh monarchy, and inſiſted, that the war ſhould be proſecuted in this view. Of the other allies, ſome looked on this proſpect as chimerical, others as dangerous: From whence it follows, that to keep the grand alliance united in this principle was impracticable; and it muſt be allowed, that to have many different intereſts, and to have formed a ſyſtem intirely new, in the midſt of the war, was an experiment too hazardous to be attempted. That in this ſituation of affairs no time was to be loſt. The Queen knew very well, that attempts to open a treaty with France ſeparately from her were made by thoſe, who clamoured the loudeſt againſt her meaſures; and the preſent emperor had thought fit, on board one of her majeſty's ſhips, and by her own miniſters, to ſend her a meſſage of the ſame nature. She therefore inſiſted with the Imperialiſts, and with the Dutch, that ſhe would be at ſome certainty, and that they ſhould comply with her in the meaſures either of war or peace. The war being become impracticable, as was ſhewn before, the author of the account relates what obſtructions there were to the carrying on a treaty of peace. That the principle, and only avowed diſpute between her majeſty and the ſtates at this time, concerned the method of carrying a Negotiation forward. That, the ſtates pretended, that a fair opportunity would be given to the miniſters of France to divide the confederates, if they were ſuffered to meet together in a general congreſs before the eſſential articles of peace were ſettled by ſpecific preliminaries. That the uſe, which had been made of this method on a former occaſion, to evade the concluding of any peace, when, according to the confeſſion of the Dutch miniſters themſelves, the difference, on which the allies and France broke off, did not deſerve the life of a ſingle ſoldier, gave no great encouragement to purſue the ſame again: Beſides which, as the queen would not take upon her to ſettle the intereſts of others, neither would ſhe ſuffer others to determine thoſe of her own kingdoms: And if all the confederates were to aſſemble, in order to adjuſt a preliminary treaty, the objection made by the ſtates returned upon them. That, in December 1711, the ſtates concurred with her majeſty in fixing the place and time of the treaty: And, if nothing had happened to revive the ſpirits of thoſe, who were bent againſt the peace, it is highly probable, by the little time which it coſt to conclude moſt of the treaties, after the conferances that had been interupted, were reſumed at Utrecht, and the allies proceeded in earneſt to negotiate, that the

'I eſteem this addreſs as the united voice of my affectionate and loyal ſubjects; and I return you all the heartieſt thanks, which can be given by a ſovereign, who deſires nothing more, than to ſee her people ſafe and flouriſhing[g]'.

Thus the miniſters obtained a parliamentary ſanction to their late meaſures, and by that means thought themſelves ſecure from any future enquiries.

In the mean time, notwithſtanding the proceedings and addreſſes of both houſes againſt the Pretender, his friends, depending on a ſuperior power, ſtill endeavoured to promote his intereſt with great induſtry. To this purpoſe, a letter written by Mr. Leſley, a famous nonjuring clergyman, from Barleduc in Lorrain, the Pretender's reſidence, to a member of parliament in London, was openly handed about, containing a particular account of the ſtate of affairs, and what obſervations Mr. Leſley had made ſince his coming thither[h].

About the ſame time, both parties being in ſuſpenſe, upon the hopes or fears of the coming over of the duke of Cambridge, the authors of the Examiner plainly enough diſcovered the perplexity ſome of the miniſters were in at that juncture. On the other hand, Mr. Toland publiſhed the reaſons and neceſſity of the duke of Cambridge's coming and reſiding in Great-Britain; the laſt of which reaſons was, 'That the prince's coming over would bring to the teſt ſome great perſons, who were reported to act on perfidious and dangerous principles to the Hanover family'. But neither the queen nor her miniſters were willing to put things upon that iſſue; for, upon a report, that the princeſs Sophia intended to deſire the queen's approbation for the duke of Cambridge's coming into England, her majeſty, with the advice of her cabinet-council, wrote to that princeſs the following letter:

Madam, ſiſter, aunt,

'Since the right of Succeſſion to my kingdoms has been declared to belong to you and your family, there have always been diſaffected perſons, who, by particular views of their own intereſt, have entered into meaſures to fix a prince of your blood in my dominions, even whilſt I am yet living. I never thought, till now, that this project would have gone ſo far, as to have made the leaſt impreſſion on your mind. But, as I have lately perceived by public rumours, which are induſtriouſly ſpread, that your electoral highneſs is come into this ſentiment, it is of importance, with reſpect to the ſucceſſion of your family, that I ſhould tell you, ſuch a proceeding will infallibly draw along with it ſome conſequences, that will be dangerous to that ſucceſſion itſelf, which is not ſecure any other ways, than as the prince, who actually wears the crown, maintains her authority and prerogative. There are here (ſuch is our misfortune) a great many people, ſeditiouſly diſpoſed. So I leave you to judge what tumults they may be able to raiſe, if they ſhould have a pretext to begin a commotion. I perſuade myſelf, therefore, you will never concent, that the leaſt thing ſhould be done, that may diſturb the repoſe of me or my ſubjects.

Open yourſelf to me with the ſame freedom I do to you, and propoſe whatever you think may contribute to the ſecurity of the ſucceſſion, I will come into it with zeal, provided that it do not derogate from my dignity, which I am reſolved to maintain. I am, with a great deal of affection &c.'

St. James, May 19, 1714.

ſuperſcribed,

To my ſiſter and aunt electreſs dowager of Brunſwick and Lunenberg.

The Queen, at the ſame time, wrote a letter to the duke of Cambridge to this effect:

Couſin,

'An accident, which has happened in my lord Paget's family, having hindred him from ſetting forward ſo ſoon as he thought to have done, I cannot defer any longer letting you know my thoughts with reſpect to the deſign you have of coming into my kingdoms. As the opening of this matter ought to have been firſt to me; ſo I expected you would not have given ear to it, without knowing my thoughts about it. However, this is what I owe to my own dignity, the friendſhip I have for you, and the electoral houſe, to which you belong; and the true deſire I have, that it may ſucceed to my kingdoms. And this requires of me, that I ſhould tell you, that nothing can be more dangerous to the tranquillity of my dominions, and the right of ſucceſſion in your line, and conſequently more diſagreable to me, than ſuch a proceeding at this juncture.'

I am,

with a great deal of friendſhip, your very affectionate couſin,

St. James's May 19 1714. Anne R.

The lord treaſurer, who began now to be ſenſible of the aſcendant lord Bolingbroke had over him at court, thought it his beſt way to ſecure a retreat behind the proteſtant ſucceſſion, which the other was undermining with more precipitation than before. For, the queen having never recovered her fit at Chriſtmas, it was thought proper to haſten the meaſures that were taken to defeat the proteſtant ſucceſſion. The treaſurers who was no ſtranger to theſe proceeding, though he was not concerned in them, wrote alſo a letter to the elector of Brunſwick:

May it pleaſe your royal highneſs,

'Though I expect Mr Harley every moment in return from your court, and thereby ſhall have another opportunity of doing myſelf the honour to preſent your royal highneſs with my moſt humble duty, and the aſſurance of my utmoſt ſervice; yet I cannot ſlip this occaſion of the queen's meſſenger attending your royal highneſs with her majeſty's letter, to lay myſelf at your feet. I have no enemy, that knows me, who is not juſt enough to allow me, to be inviolably devoted to your ſucceſſion, nothing coming in competition with that, becauſe I know I pleaſe the queen, when I am zealous for the ſervice of your ſerene houſe. I hope, therefore, I ſhall find credit with your royal highneſs, when I humbly lay my ſincere opinion before you. The queen is moſt hartily for your ſucceſſion. If there be any thing, which may render it more ſecure, which is conſiſtent with her majeſty's ſafety, it will be acompliſhed. It is not the eager deſires of ſome, nor what flows from the advice of others, whoſe diſcontents perhaps animate their zeal, can balance the ſecurity you have in the queen's friendſhip, and the dutiful affection of all her faithful ſubjects; for, as I am ſure your royal highneſs's great wiſdom would not chuſe to rule by a party, ſo you will not let their narrow meaſures be the ſtandard of your government. I doubt not, but the accident, that happened about the writ, may be improved, to increaſe the moſt perfect friendſhip between the queen and your moſt ſerene family. I will ſtudy to do every thing to demonſtrate the profound veneration and reſpect, wherewith I am, &c.

Oxford.

treaties of all the confederates with France might have been finiſhed, before the ſeaſon of opening the campaign in 1712: But that, before Monſiur Buys returned into Holland, or the confederates could begin, the efforts were renewed with the greateſt vigour, to break off the negotiations; the cry againſt a peace, by which Spain and the Indies ſhould be left to any branch of the houſe of Bourbon, became louder than ever; and letters and memorials were not only delivered, but printed; and appeals made againſt her majeſty's proceedings to all Europe, and even to her own ſubjects. That, on theſe encouragements, the good diſpoſitions towards peace received a check: and ſome of thoſe, who had owned themſelves againſt the proſecution of the war, to recover the whole Spaniſh monarchy to the houſe of Auſtria, joined now, under this very pretence, to break the meaſures of peace. That the treatment which her majeſty met with at this time, will appear in the cleareſt light from this circumſtance: The miniſters of the ſtates general propoſed to her majeſty's ſervants, that, conſidering the difficulties, which the queen lay under, how impoſſible it was to recover by war, or by treaty, the Spaniſh monarchy from king Phillip, and how impoſſible he apprehended it to be for her majeſty to carry on any negotiation, by which this monarchy ſhould be left to Philip, he was ready (to extricate her majeſty from this dilemma, and to ſcreen her miniſters in carrying on the work, which they had begun) in the name of his maſters, to preſent a memorial, by which the point of obtaining Spain and the Indies ſhould be given up; provided he might be aſſured, that the Dutch ſhould have an equal ſhare with her majeſty's ſubjects in the aſſiento, which contract, he ſuppoſed, it was ſtipulated ſhould be made with Great-Britain. That from the cauſes, and by the ſteps abovementioned, was the diviſion among the allies arived to the higheſt pitch, at the opening of the conferences in January 1711-12, when the ſtricteſt union amongſt them was more than ever neceſſary, and when the whole fruit of thoſe ſucceſſes, wherewith God had bleſſed their cauſe, in the courſe of the war, depended on it. That they ſent their ſeveral plenipotentiaries to Utrecht; but it was very apparent, that moſt of them acted on that maxim, which one of them profeſſed, that giving into the meaſures of peace was the ſureſt way to continue the war. They flattered themſelves, that, the Imperial miniſters, in conjunction with thoſe of Britain, having, two years before, baffled the deſigns of Holland to make peace, it would be, as eaſy for the miniſters of the empire, in conjunction with thoſe of the ſtates general, to render fruitleſs, at this time all her majeſty's endeavours to the ſame end. And that, after this, it would not appear ſurprizing, if the utmoſt dexterity was exerted to delay the entering on buſineſs at Utrecht, and to wait for the events of the campaign. Concluding, that, from this ſtate of the ſeveral treaties between her majeſty, her allies, and France and Spain, the reſonableneſs of all the ſteps her majeſty had taken, and thoſe deſigns, which had been purſued at firſt, to wreſt the negotiation out of her hands, and ſince to unravel all that had been done, and to throw us into confuſion, would ſufficiently appear.'

This account made a great impreſſion upon the generality of the members; yet the weight of it will be eaſily taken off, by comparing it with the original papers relating to thoſe tranſactions, which were afterwards inſerted in the report of the committee of ſecrecy.

There was another letter from the queen to the elector of Brunſwick, but written in a ſtyle ſo unbecoming the one and the other, that the perſons, to whom theſe letters were tranſmitted, did not think fit to give copies of it; but, upon a report induſtriouſly ſpread by the pretender's agents, that the duke of Cambridge might have came over, if the elector his father would have let him, but, that the elector did not think the crown of Great Britain worth accepting, the copies of the other three letters were diſperſed in print. This gave ſo great offence to the miniſters, that the publiſher and the perſon who ſent him the letters were ſeized by lord Bolingbroke's warrant, and bound over to appear at the queen's-bench.

The princeſs Sophia, now in the 84th year of her age, was much affected by theſe letters, and on the 28th of May, the day after the receipt, being ſeized as ſhe was walking in the gardens at Herenhauſen with a fit of the apoplexy, died in the arms of the electoral princeſs (the late queen Caroline) and the counteſs of Pickenburgh, who were talking with her, before any other perſon could come to her aſſiſtance. This princeſs was fourth and youngeſt daughter of Frederick, king of Bohemia, and Elizabeth of England, only daughter of king James the firſt; and was born at the Hague, the 3d of October, 1630: So ſhe was eighty three years, eight months, and five days old at her death. In the year 1658, ſhe was married to Erneſt Auguſtus, duke of Brunſwick and Lunenberg, (fourth and youngeſt ſon to George duke of Lunenburg-Zell) who, in 1662, ſucceeded count Francis of Wirtenberg, in the biſhopric of Oſnaburg: In 1680, on the death of his eldeſt brother, John Frederic duke of Hanover, Erneſt Auguſtus ſucceeded him alſo in that dignity; and, in the year 1692, he received the inveſtiture of the electoral dignity of Brunſwick Lunenburg. This prince died on the 23d of January 1698, having had by the princeſs Sophia, ſix ſons, George Lewis, Frederic Auguſtus, Maximilian William, Charles Philip, Chriſtian, and Erneſt Auguſtus, and one daughter, Sophia Dorothy, who, in the year 1684, became the ſecond wife of Frederic the third, king of Pruſſia. The princeſs Sophia had a very ſtrong healthy conſtitution, and was endowed with great abilities natural and acquired. She was perfect miſtreſs of the low Dutch, German, Engliſh, French, and Italian languages, and had a genius equally turned for converſation or buſineſs, which rendered her not only the ornament and delight of her court, but qualified her to manage and ſupport the higheſt intereſts. The greatneſs of her ſoul bore proportion to her birth, and the ſtation, which ſhe filled; but with all was tempered with ſo much ſweetneſs and affability, that the duty of thoſe below her became their pleaſure. No one ever gave liberties with a better choice, or could act without reſerve to greater advantage. She behaved in both parts to admiration, as a daughter of England, and as a mother of Germany. Her wit was ſprightly, curious, and ſurprizing; her judgment ſolid and penetrating, founded upon the nobleſt maxims from reading and ſtudy, explained by obſervation and experience. Nothing could exceed the beauties and advantages of her converſation, but by her letters; both were eaſy, entertaining, and uſeful. She had a fund of happineſs within herſelf, which gave a reliſh to her retirements: But her care in government and œconomy ſhewed the juſt ſenſe ſhe had of being born for the good of others. Her piety was exemplary without affectation; her ſentiments of religion juſt and noble, neither perplexed with doubts, nor enſlaved by ſuperſtition. The neighbourhood of the Jeſuits ſerved only to confirm her in the opinion ſhe had of the impoſtures and corruptions of their church and order. But, though bred up in the reformed religion, according to the Calvinian diſcipline, yet ſhe ever had a great eſteem for the liturgy and conſtitution of the church of England. She hated every thing, that was ſour, malicious, or illnatured to ſuch a degree, that none could be more ſedulous to oppoſe, or more active to ſuppreſs, every little quarrel and party, that grew up, where ſhe had any influence.

Baron Bothmar arrived at London on the 25th of June, with the character of envoy extraordinary from the elector of Hanover, and, in a private audience of the queen, notified the death of the princeſs Sophia; upon which an order was made in council for mourning, and for praying for the elector of Brunſwick, in the liturgy of the church of England.

In the conſultation held by the miniſtry, after the demand of the duke of Cambridge's writ, wherein it was debated, whether the queen ſhould invite over that duke? The lord treaſurer, the lord chancelor, the lord privy ſeal, and another privy councellor, were for it; but the lord Bollingbroke having oppoſed it, and carried the negative, reſolved to puſh his point, and to uſe all poſſible means to defeat the proteſtant ſucceſſion. With that view he is ſaid to have broke all meaſures with the treaſurer, and united himſelf more cloſely with the high church party. As the farther diſcouragement and even ruin of the diſſenters was thought neceſſary for accompliſhing this ſcheme, it was begun with the famous Schiſm-bill. A motion for it, on the 12th of May, by Sir William Wyndham, was introduced, by reading the 8th, 9th, 10th, and 11th ſection of the act of Uniformity, paſſed after the reſtoration, by which, above two thouſand miniſters were turned out of their livings. The motion being approved, a bill was ordered to be brought in, to prevent the growth of Schiſm, and for the further ſecurity of the church of England as by law eſtabliſhed[g]. On the other hand, in order to ſtrengthen the Jacobite party in Scotland, a motion was made for a bill, to inveſt the Scots biſhops revenues and rents in the queen, to be applied to the ſupport of the epiſcopal clergy. To render this bill ineffectual, it was propoſed by the whigs, that theſe revenues ſhould be applied to ſuch only of the epiſcopal clergy, as ſhould pray for the queen and the princeſs Sophia in expreſs words. As the court party could not well oppoſe this addition, and as the reſuming of the epiſcopal revenues (which had been forfeited at the Revolution, and given to the miniſters of the kirk of Scotland) would have been attended with great difficulties, the bill was ſuffered to drop. It was, however, reſolved to finiſh the ſchiſm-bill. When this bill was ingroſſed and read the third time in order to be paſſed, there aroſe a long and warm debate. Mr Hampden, Mr Robert Walpole, general Stanhope, Mr Lechmere, Sir Joſeph Jekyll, and Sir Peter King, exerted their eloquence in oppoſing it, repreſenting in general. 'That it looked more like a decree of Julian the apoſtate, than a law enacted by a proteſtant parliament, ſince it tended to raiſe as great a perſecution againſt our proteſtant brethren as either the primitive chriſtians ever ſuffered from the heathen emperors, or the proteſtants from popery and the inquiſition.' Mr Stanhope ſhewed, in particular, the ill conſequences of this law, as it would of courſe occaſion foreign education; which, on the one hand, would drain the kingdom of great ſums of money; and, which was ſtill worſe, fills the tender minds of young men with prejudices againſt their own country. He illuſtrated and ſtrengthened his argument by the example of the Engliſh popiſh ſeminaries abroad, which, he ſaid, were ſo pernicious to Great Britain, that, inſtead of making new laws to encourage foreign education, he could wiſh thoſe al-

[g] Though the queen eſteemed this adreſs, as the united voice of her loyal ſubjects, yet the lords in their firſt addreſs to king George I. ſaid it is by no means to be imputed to the nation in general: And the commons, in leſs than a year afterwards: 'We are ſenſibly touched not only with the diſappointment, but with the reproach brought upon the nation by the unjuſtifiable concluſion of a war, which was carried on at ſo vaſt an expence, and was attended with ſuch unparelled ſucceſſes: But, as that diſhonour cannot in juſtice be imputed to the whole nation, ſo we firmly hope, and believe, that, through your majeſty's great wiſdom, and the faithful endeavours of your commons, the reputation of theſe your kingdoms will, in due time, be vindicated and reſtored.'

[h] This letter is dated, April 23, 1714, and begins with a deſcription of the pretender's perſon and character; his graceful mien, magnanimity of ſpirit, devotion free from bigottry, aplication to buſineſs, ready apprehenſion, ſound judgement, and affability; ſo that none converſed with him, but what were charmed with his good ſenſe and ſweetneſs of temper.' Then, coming to the main deſign of this letter, Mr Leſley ſaid, that the chevalier expreſſed no reſentment at the cruel proceedings of the parliament, to leave him no place to flee unto. But that other men were aſtoniſhed, and ſaid, 'For what is all this rage? What has he done? Was it a crime in him to be born? If his birth was ſuperſtitions, it was a good reaſon indeed to bar his acceſſion to the throne, but none to perſecute him, or ſet a price on his head, as was propoſed in parliament, by a rich and powerful party, to encourage the aſſaſſination of him. He added, 'That, ſince ſo much depended on his birth why was it not inquired into? That the prince of Orange promiſed it in his firſt declaration, and referred it to be examined in parliament: but, this not having been done either by parliament, court of Judicature, or any other authority whatever, it afforded an infalliable demonſtration of the truth of his birth; ſince by the laws of God and man, every child, that is owned by both parents, is to be received as ſuch, unleſs evident proof be made to the contrary. That it was very obvious, why former parliaments, and in a former reign, would not enter into the examination of his birth, becauſe they knew the truth of it and that no proof could be made againſt it. But the falſe rumours and ſuppoſitions, which were induſtriouſly ſpread abroad concerning it, to make way for the prince of Orange more eaſily to aſcend the throne (having ſerved their turn) were laid aſide, like ſcaffolding, when a houſe is built. That he hoped it was reſerved for this parliament, to make a full examination, and to ſet the nation at reſt upon this material point; if not, the birth of this prince was infallibly confirmed. That there was no danger herein to his ſiſter, who now reigned; for none could doubt but he would be very well pleaſed to make ſuch a compremiſe with her, that ſhe might hold the crown during her life, provided his ſucceſſion after her were ſettled; and give all the ſecurity for this that could be deſired, even to put his perſon into her hands, if ſhe thought fit. And that would unite both their intereſts, and render her reign more ſecure and comfortable to her, than it was or could otherwiſe be. That, if we were afraid of a popiſh ſucceſſor, why did we make the next ſucceſſor a papiſt? For it was they did it, who baniſhed him, when an infant, into a popiſh country, and paſſed an act of attainder againſt him, if he ſhould return to be inſtructed in our religion; and had ſent to all the proteſtant courts in Europe not to admit him, or to drive him hence, if he ſhould come, and had excluded him from the crown without any reſerve for him, though he ſhould become a proteſtant; and at the ſame time declared openly, they would not ready in force againſt papiſts were mitigated; and that they ſhould be allowed a certain number of ſchools. The chief advocates for the bill were Mr ſecretary Bromley, ſir William Wyndham, Mr Hungerford, and Mr Collier. Mr Bromley, maintained, 'The diſcenters were equally dangerous both to church and ſtate. However, if the members, who ſpoke in their behalf, would have this bill drop, he would readily conſent to it, provided another bill were brought in, to incapacitate them either to ſit in that houſe, or to vote in elections of members of parliament.' Mr Walpole anſwered this ſpeech with great force; after which Mr Hungerford recapitulated, and, in his uſual ludicrous way, faintly laboured to confute what had been offered by the whig members.

Mr Collier, who brought up the rear, did ſtill worſe. This man, formerly an attorney, had, by a wife, got the directorſhip of the play houſe in drury lane; and afterwards, by his intruding aſſurance, the acquaintance and intimacy of the lord Bolingbroke. At whoſe earneſt requeſt, Mr Collier, though ſcarce worth thirty pounds a year, was, by the duke of Beaufort's intereſt, brought into the houſe of commons, where he took this ſolemn occaſion to ſignalize his zeal for the cauſe he was to ſerve. With this intention he ſeconded Mr Hungerford, and, in order to expoſe the deſſenters, he deſired leave to read to the houſe a collection of abſurdities and impious expreſſions, which he pretended to have taken from their writings. After reading part of this impertinent legend, he fell on a paſſage extracted from the nonſenſical rhapſodies of the late Mr Hickeringill, miniſter at Colcheſter, wherein Mr Collier ſaid, he averred, That our bleſſed Saviour was a ſon of a W——. At theſe ſhocking expreſſions, Mr Bromley interrupted him, ſaying, Such impious words ought not to be repeated in that aſſembly. On the other hand, ſome other members obſerved, That Mr Hickeringill was not a diſſenting teacher, but a miniſter of the church of England: And that he was known to be crack-brain'd; and therefore his extravagancies and blaſphemies proved nothing againſt any ſet of men, much leſs againſt the diſſenters. Mr Lechmere ſpoke againſt the bill with great vehemence; and among other things took notice, 'That the indulgence granted to proteſtant diſſenters, ſince the revolution, had been ſo far from hurting the church, that it had rather enlarged it's pale; and it was notorious, that ſome perſons (meaning the Treaſurer, the Chancelor, and the lord Bolingbroke) who had been bred among Schiſmatics, were, or, at leaſt, pretended to be the ſtrongeſt ſupports of the eſtabliſhed church.' Several other ſpeeches were made for and againſt the bill; which was carried by a majority of two hundred and thirty-ſeven voices, againſt one hundred and twenty-ſix; and ſir William Wyndham, chancellor of the exchequer, who brought it into the houſe, and promoted it with all his power, was ordered to carry it to the lords.

The public were divided in their opinions whether the lord-treaſurer was for or againſt this bill. It is ſaid [1] that the ſchiſm-bill was caſtrated by him, and that he took out the moſt malicious and perſecuting part, which had been formed by Atterbury, Bolingbroke, and Wyndham. However this be the lord Harley, his ſon, Mr Thomas Harley his couſin (lately returned from Hanover) and all his friends, except his brother the auditor voted for the bill.

When the bill was read the firſt time in the houſe of peers, the lord Bolingbroke ſaid, 'It was a bill of the laſt importance, ſince it concerned the ſecurity of the church of England, the beſt and firmeſt ſupport of the monarchy; both which all good men, and, in particular, that auguſt aſſembly, who derive their luſtre from, and are neareſt the throne, ought to have moſt at heart: And therefore he moved, that it ſhould be read a ſecond time.' The lord Cowper ſaid, 'No man was more ready than himſelf to do every thing, that ſhould appear neceſſary to attain the ſeeming intention of this bill, the preventing the growth of ſchiſm, and the further ſecuring the church of England. But the enacting part would be ſo far from anſwering the title of it, that, in his opinion, it would have a quite contrary effect, and prove equally pernicious to church and ſtate.' He ſpoke on theſe two heads near half an hour, and, among other things, repreſented, 'That inſtead of preventing ſchiſm, and inlarging the pale of the church, this bill tended to introduce ignorance, and its inſeparable attendants, ſuperſtition and irreligion.' To this purpoſe, he took notice, 'That in many country-towns, reading, writing and grammar-ſchools were chiefly ſupported by the diſſenters; not only for the inſtruction and benefit of their own children, but likewiſe of thoſe of poor churchmen; ſo that the ſuppreſſing of thoſe ſchools would, in ſome places, ſuppreſs the reading the holy ſcriptures.' On the other hand, he obſerved. 'That this bill ſtruck at the antient rights and prerogative of the houſe of peers; which, by the conſtitution, is the ſupreme court of Judicature, and the dernier reſort in all cauſes; whereas, by this bill, the Juſtices of the peace were impowered finally to hear and determine the offences againſt the ſame. My lords, added he, I would rather enlarge, than abridge the power of Juſtices of the peace, were it but to encourage gentlemen to take upon them an office ſo troubleſome, and at the ſame time ſo unprofitable, unleſs it be perhaps in the county of Middleſex. But, my lords, I ſhall never conſent to give up the birth-right and ancient privileges of this auguſt aſſembly, of which I have the honour to be a member.'

The earl of Wharton, in his ironical way, ſaid, 'He was agreeably ſurprized to ſee, that ſome men of pleaſure were, on a ſudden, become ſo religious, as to ſet up for patrons of the church. But he could not but wonder, that perſons, who had been educated in diſſenting accademies, whom he could point at, and whoſe tutors he could name, ſhould appear the moſt forward in ſuppreſſing them. That this was but an indifferent return for the benefit the public had received from thoſe ſchools, which had bred thoſe great men, who had made ſo glorious a peace, and treaties, that executed themſelves; who had obtained ſo great advantages for our commerce, and who had paid the public debts, without any further charge to the nation. So that he could ſee no reaſon there was to ſuppreſs thoſe accademies, unleſs it were an apprehenſion, that they might ſtill produce greater genius's, that ſhould drown the merits and abilities of thoſe great men. My lords, continued he, to be ſerious, it is no leſs melancholy than ſurprizing, that, at a time, when the court of France proſecutes the deſign that they have long ſince laid to extirpate our holy religion; when, not only ſecret practices are uſed to impoſe a popiſh pretender on theſe realms, but men publickly inliſted for his ſervice; it is melancholy and ſurprizing, I ſay, that, at this very time, a bill ſhould be brought in, which cannot but tend to divide Proteſtants; and conſequently to weaken their intereſt, and haſten their ruin. But then the wonder will ceaſe, if we conſider what madmen were the contrivers and promoters of this bill.' He excepted in particular, againſt the word Schiſm, with which the frontiſpiece of the bill was ſet off, and ſaid, 'It was ſomewhat ſtrange, they ſhould call Schiſm in England what is the eſtabliſhed religion in Scotland; and therefore, if the lords, who repreſented the Nobility of that part of Great-Britain, were for this bill, he hoped, that, in order to be even with us, and conſiſtent with themſelves, they would move for the bringing in another bill, to prevent the growth of Schiſm in that, which was legally eſtabliſhed, and whoſe principles are true to monarchy, and ſafe for government. That, for the ſatisfaction of the Church of England, and his own reſtoration, he thought himſelf obliged to do every thing, that was conſiſtent with conſience and honour. That, as an inſtance of his good intentions, he had ſent for Mr Leſley to officiate to the proteſtants in his family; had cauſed a room to be fitted up in his own houſe for a Chappel for them; and had taken out of their congregation his preſent ſecretary of ſtate and chief miniſter.' And, in order to prejudice the people againſt the Proteſtant ſucceſſion, Mr Leſley ſubjoined, 'That the avowed doctrine of the illuſtrious houſe of Hanover was conſubſtantiation; which was as erroneous, and as contrary to the doctrine of the Church of England, as tranſubſtantiation: and yet no proviſion has been made, that, when they ſhould come into Great-Britain, they ſhould be of the communion of the Church of England.'

believe him, if he ſhould profeſs it: Which things were ſo irrational, that they had no tolerable foundation to ſtand upon. That the britiſh Nation had no reaſon to be afraid of the Chevalier's introducing Popery and Slavery, ſince he had neither foreign forces nor Alliances; and, if he were upon the throne, he muſt be perfectly in the hands of his people. That, as to religion, he had promiſed to hear, in due time and place, what could be ſaid on that ſubject; which was all that could be expected. But that, whatever ſhould be the iſſue of his hearing, as to his own private judgment, the Church of England might be no leſs ſecure; for it was his fixed perſuaſion, that the ſecurity of the crown and Church of England was, next under God, in their mutual ſupport of each other. And becauſe the greateſt hurt any king of England can do to the Church of England is putting bad biſhops upon her this being a corrupting the fountain; therefore, to avoid all jealouſies, he was willing, during his reign, ſo far to wave his prerogative in the nomination of biſhops, deans, and other eccleſiaſtical preferments in the gift of the crown, that five biſhops ſhould be appointed, of which the archbiſhop of Canterbury, for the time being, always to be one; who, upon any vacancy, might name three perſons to him, of whom he would chooſe one. And the Church of England, as by law eſtabliſhed, ſhould be ſecured in the ſole poſſeſſion, not only of all the Churches, but of the Univerſities, and even Schools. And, as a further mark of his favour, he remitted, during his time, the tenths and firſt-fruits payable by the Biſhops and Clergy to the Crown. That he had informed himſelf of paſt miſcarriages, and knew well the difference between the office of a king and a miſſionary. That therefore he would concern himſelf with no man's religion, but was reſolved to defend their own country.' He ſaid alſo, on another occaſion (for he ſpoke more than once) 'That both in this bill, and in the ſpeeches of thoſe, who declared for it, ſeveral laws were recited and alledged but that there was a law, that had not yet been mentioned. I expected, added he, that venerable bench (turning to the Biſhops) would have put us in mind of it; but, ſince they are pleaſed to be ſilent in this debate, I will myſelf tell them, that it is the law of the goſpel, To do to others as we would be done unto'

[1] Sir William Wyndham, Mr Cholmondley, ſir John Stonehouſe, ſir Arthur Kay, Mr Campion, Mr Gore, Mr Aldworth, Mr ſecretary Bromley, lord Downe, Mr Finch, Mr Windſor, Sir William Whitlock, and Dr Paſke were ordered to prepare and bring in the bill. Whilſt this was doing, it was reſolved to addreſs the queen for a copy of the inſtructions given to the earl of Strafford, with relation to the declarations made by him on the part of her majeſty, to the miniſters of the ſeveral Allies who had any troops in her majeſty's pay before the ceſſation of arms. This addreſs was voted with intention to prepare the way for reſuſing to pay the arrears of 65,022l. 8s. 8d. due to the elector of Hanover's troops, which had been lately demanded, by the electoral highneſs's miniſter.

The earls of Abingdon and Angleſea ſpoke afterwards for the bill; and Angleſea ſaid, among other things, 'That the Diſſenters were equally dangerous both to Church and State: That they were irreconcileable enemies to the eſtabliſhed Church, which they had ſufficiently manifeſted in the late king James the ſecond's reign, when, in order to obtain a toleration, they joined themſelves with the Papiſts; and that they had rendered themſelves unworthy of the indulgence the Church of England granted them at the Revolution, by endeavouring to engroſs the education of youth; for which purpoſe they had ſet up ſchools and accademies in moſt cities and towns in the kingdom, to the great detriment of the univerſities, and danger of the eſtabliſhed Church.'

The lord Hallifax ſpoke on the other ſide, and urged, 'That the bringing in of this bill was injurious to the queen; and he could not believe, her majeſty would ever give her royal aſſent to ſuch a law, after the ſolemn declaration ſhe had made from the throne, that ſhe would inviolably maintain the toleration, which this bill viſibly ſtruck at. That her majeſty made it the glory of her reign to follow the ſteps of queen Elizabeth, who had not only entertained and protected the reformed Walloons, who took ſanctuary in her dominions from the Spaniſh Inquiſition, but had likewiſe allowed them the public exerciſe of their religion, and cauſed a clauſe in their favour to be inſerted in the act of Uniformity. That, by that means, that wiſe and glorious queen had vaſtly increaſed the wealth of the realm, the Walloons having ſettled here the woolen manufactures, which are the beſt branch of the national trade. That the protection and encouragement the late king William and queen Mary, and her preſent majeſty, had given to the French refugees, had proved no leſs advantageous to Great-Britain: And therefore it would be a piece of barbarity to make an act. which ſhould debar many French Proteſtants of means of ſubſiſting, either by keeping public ſchools, or teaching in private families; eſpecially conſidering their hard uſage, the government not having for above three years paſt, paid them any part of the fifteen thouſand pounds per ann. allowed by parliament in the civil liſt, towards the maintenance of their miniſters and poor.' He concluded with taking notice of the fatal conſequences of perſecuting the deſſenters in king Charles the firſt reign, which kindled a furious and unnatural civil war, and ended in the total overthrow of church and ſtate, and in the king's parricide.'

The lord Townſhend ſpoke on the ſame ſide, and, among other arguments, repreſented the ill effect of perſecution in general. 'He ſaid, He had lived a long time in Holland, and had obſerved, that the wealth and ſtrength of that great and powerful commonwealth lay in the number of its inhabitants: And at the ſame time he was perſuaded, that, if the ſtates ſhould cauſe the ſchools of any one ſect, tolerated in the United Provinces, to be ſhut up, they would ſoon be as thin of people as Sweden or Spain, whereas they now ſwarm with inhabitants.'

The lord North and Grey, who ſpoke for the bill, maintained the general aſſertion of his party, That the Church was in danger from the growth of ſchiſmatics. The earl of Nottingham ſaid, 'He owned he had formerly been of opinion, that the occaſional conformity of diſſenters was dangerous to the eſtabliſhed Church; and therefore he ever promoted the bill to prevent it. But that, the Church having now that ſecurity, he believed her ſafe and out of danger; and therefore he thought himſelf in conſcience obliged to oppoſe ſo barbarous a law as this, which tended to deprive parents of their natural right of educating their own children. He added, He had obſerved both from hiſtory and his own experience, that all the perſecutions, that had been raiſed in England againſt ſchiſmatics, originally proceeded from, and tended to favouring popery.' He particularly excepted againſt that part of the bill, which enacts, That any perſon, who ſhould keep any public or private ſchool, or inſtruct any youth as Tutor, ſhould have a licence of the reſpective Archbiſhop or Biſhop of the place. &c. 'My lords ſaid he, I have many children; and I know not whether God Almighty will vouchſafe to let me live, to give them the education I could wiſh they had. Therefore, my lords, I own, I tremble, when I think, that a certain divine, who is hardly ſuſpected of being a chriſtian (meaning Dr Swift) is in a fair way of being a biſhop; and may one day give licences to thoſe who ſhall be intruſted with the inſtruction of youth.' Some other lords made ſpeeches for and againſt the bill. But the lord-treaſurer contented himſelf with ſaying, 'That he had not yet conſidered of it; but, when he had, he would vote according as it ſhould appear to him, to be either for the good or detriment of his country. And therefore he was for reading the bill a ſecond time;' which was agreed to without dividing, and put off to the 7th of June.

After this, the preſbyterians petitioned that they might be heard by their council againſt the bill; but their petition was rejected by a majority of ſeventy-two voices againſt ſixty-ſix. It was obſerved, on this occaſion, earl Powlet, the lord Foley, the lord Manſel, and ſome other friends of the lord-treaſurer, voted with the whig lords, for allowing the petition; and the lord-treaſurer himſelf was out of the houſe, that he might not be obliged to declare on either ſide; which ſtrengthened their opinion, who thought the bill levelled againſt him, with a view, that, if he voted for it, he would loſe the diſſenters and the whigs entirely; if he voted againſt it, he would loſe the queen.

On the day appointed, the lords read the ſchiſm-bill a ſecond time, and after a ſhort debate agreed, that a clauſe ſhould be inſerted in the bill in favour of the French proteſtant churches. Two days after, in a committee of the whole houſe of which the archbiſhop of York was chairman, the bill was examined paragraph by paragraph, from one in the afternoon till eight in the evening. The biſhop of London having ſuggeſted, 'That the diſſenters had made this bill neceſſary, by their endeavours to propagate their ſchiſm, and to draw the children of churchmen to their ſchools and academies,' the lord Hallifax anſwered, 'That what they did was with the knowledge and conſent of the parents, who, in many places, had not ſufficient means to educate their own children:' For which reaſon he moved, 'That, ſince this bill was occaſioned, as was ſuggeſted, by the diſſenters endeavouring to engroſs the education of the youth of both purſuaſions, they might be allowed ſchools to inſtruct their own children.' This motion, being formed into a queſtion, was debated for near three hours. The lords Cowper and Hallifax, the earl of Sunderland, and ſome other peers, made ſeveral ſpeeches for the affirmative. But the lord Bolingbroke, the earl of Abingdon, and the lord Chancellor, inſiſted on the negative, which was at laſt carried by ſixty-two votes againſt forty-eight. After this it was moved, that diſſenters might, at leaſt be ſuffered to have ſchool-miſtreſſes ro teach their children to read, which, after a debate of about half an hour, was carried without dividing; as was alſo a clauſe, 'That this act ſhould not extend to any perſon, who ſhould inſtruct youth in reading, writing, arithmetic, or any part of mathematical learning, that relates to navigation, or any mechanical art only.' Then was examined that part of the bill, whereby the conviction of offenders againſt this act was left to the juſtices of the peace; and, after a warm debate, it was carried by a majority of fifty-nine votes againſt fifty-four that the conviction ſhould be in the ordinary courſe of juſtice upon an information, preſentment, or indictment, in any of her majeſty's courts of record at Weſtminſter, or at the aſſizes, or before juſtices of oyer and terminer. The court, party finding, by this laſt diviſion, that they loſt conſiderable ground, and fearing, other amendments would be made which would render the bill altogether uſeleſs, moved, that the chairman leave the chair, in order to adjourn. But though the contrary party at firſt oppoſed it, yet, after ſome debate, upon the penalties to be inflicted on the offenders, both parties being equally tired, the houſe adjourned to the next day.

Accordingly, on the 16th of June, the lords reſumed the debate about the penalties, and fixed the ſame to three months impriſonment; after which it was moved and agreed, that perſons aggrieved might appeal from eccleſiaſtical cenſures, as in caſes of ordinary juriſdiction. A clauſe was afterwards propoſed and carried to exempt from the penalties of this act any tutor, who ſhall be employed by any nobleman or noblewoman, to teach in their families, provided ſuch Tutor do, in every reſpect, qualify himſelf according to this act, except only in that of taking a licence from the biſhop. The earl of Angleſea moved, that a clauſe might be inſerted, to extend this act to Ireland: which after ſome debate, was carried in the affirmative by the majority of one voice only. When the bill with theſe amendments was reported to the houſe by the archbiſhop of York, ſevere ſpeeches were made againſt the clauſe to extend this bill to Ireland; particularly by the duke of Shrewſbury, lord Lieutenant of that kingdom, who was juſt returned, from thence. But, the queſtion being put, it was carried by fifty-ſeven voices againſt fifty-one, that the clauſe ſhould ſtand. The next day, the bill was read the third time; and, after a ſmall debate, it was carried by ſeventy-ſeven votes againſt ſeventy-two, that it ſhould paſs [k].

When the bill thus amended was ſent to the Commoes, a ſhort debate aroſe. Mr Lechmere and Mr Walpole repreſented, 'That ſince the proteſtant diſſenters of Ireland were made liable to the penalties of this bill, it were but juſt either to inſert a clauſe in it, or to bring in another bill, to make them enjoy the benifit of the toleration act, paſſed in England in the laſt reign.' But ſir William Wyndham and Mr Campion ſaid, 'If leave were given to bring in ſuch a bill, they hoped they ſhould have leave alſo to bring in another, to incapacitate diſſenters from voting in elections for parliamentmen:' Upon which that matter dropped. On the other hand, general Stanhope propoſed, 'That the tutors in the families of members of the houſe of commons might be put on the ſame foot with thoſe, who taught in the families of a nobleman or noblewoman; it being reaſonable to ſuppoſe, that the members of that houſe, many of whom were of noble extraction, had as great a concern as the lords for the education of their children, and an equal right to take care of their inſtruction.' Several members of both parties were of Mr Stanhope's opinion. But Mr Hungerford repreſenting, 'That the leaſt amendment now made in the houſe might occaſion the loſs of the bill;' the promoters of it cauſed the queſtion to be put, and it was carried by a majority of one hundred and ſixty-eight votes againſt ninety-eight, that the commons agreed to the lords amendments. On the 25th of June, the ſchiſm-bill, with ſeveral others, received the royal aſſent by commiſſion. But it is obſervable, the very day it was to take place, the queen departed this life; which accident broke all the meaſures of thoſe, who had promoted that law, and rendered it in a manner ineffectual [l].

On the 5th of May the queen removed from St James's to her palace at Kenſington, in appearance pretty well in health; but, having the next day in the evening felt a ſhivering, her phyſicians thought fit, that ſhe ſhould immediately come back to St James's, where ſhe was, for ſome time, detained in her chamber by an impoſthumation in one of her legs. The duke of ſhrewſbury, having (as has been ſaid) early notice of the dangerous condition the queen was in, was very deſirous to be in England; though, on the other hand, he was unwilling to leave the government of Ireland in their hands, whom he knew enclined to favour the pretender's agents; who ſtill continued inliſting men for his ſervice [1] But, all things conſidered, he judged his preſence more neceſſary at London than in Dublin, and came over about the beginning of June. Finding thoſe about the queen jaring and disjointed, he reſolved to act a cautious part, and not ſide with either of the contending parties; but, as ſoon as a proper occaſion (which he judged could not be far off) offered itſelf, to put himſelf at the head of the well-affected to the proteſtant ſucceſſion, who indeed were no leſs ſtrengthened by his arrival at this critical juncture than the lord Bolingbroke's intereſt was weakened by the death of the duke of Beaufort, which happened ſome days before.

Towards the end of May, the marquis de Trivié, Ambaſſador from the new king of Sicily, made his public entry; but it was the 8th of June, before the queen was in a condition to admit him to a public audience. Two days after the queen, finding herſelf ſomething better, removed from St James's to Kenſington.

About this time, upon information given to the earl of Wharton, that two Iriſh officers, Hugh and William Kelly, were liſting men for the pretender in London and Weſtminſter, he carried his evidence to chief-juſtice Parker, upon whoſe warrant William Kelly was ſeized at Graveſend, with five men enliſted, as Hugh Kelly was a few days after at Deal, with a paſs from the earl o Middleton, ſecretary of ſtate to the pretender. This affair having made a great noiſe, the miniſters could not avoid taking notice of thoſe treaſonable practices; and a proclamation was publiſhed for apprehending the pretender, when ever he ſhould land, or attempt to land in Great Britain, and promiſing a reward of five thouſand pounds for that ſervice. The next day Mr Freeman having moved in the houſe of commons for an addreſs of thanks for the proclamation, he was ſeconded by Mr. Auditor Harley, and ſupported by the earl of Hertford, who added, 'That the five thouſand pounds mentioned in the queen's proclamation was too ſmall a recompence for ſo important a ſervice;' and therefore moved for an addition to the addreſs, 'That this houſe would chearfully aid and aſſiſt her majeſty, by granting the ſum of a hundred thouſand pounds, as a further reward to any, who ſhould perform ſo great a ſervice to her majeſty and her kingdoms.' This was oppoſed by Mr Bromley, ſir William Wyndham, and Mr Campion, who ſuggeſted, 'That the promiſing of a reward ſo far beyond what was mentioned in the queen's proclamation, would be a ſort of reflection on her majeſty.' But, this objection being exploded, the addreſs was unanimouſly carried, and, four days after, preſented by the whole houſe to the queen, who told them, 'That the hearty cocern they ſhewed in it for the proteſtant ſucceſſion was very agreeable to her, and that ſhe hoped, their concurrence would have the deſired effect in removing jealouſies, and quieting the minds of her good ſubjects.

The ſame day, the earl of Nottingham moved in the houſe of lords for an addreſs of thanks for the proclamation againſt the pretender, and was ſeconded by the lord Hallifax. The earl of Wharton, who likewiſe ſupported the motion, holding the queen's proclamation in his hand, moſt pathetically lamented her majeſty's owning, that her endeavours to remove the pretender from Lorrain had been ineffectual. 'Unhappy princeſs, ſaid he, how much is her condition altered! Will poſterity believe, that ſo great a queen, who had reduced the exorbitant power of France, given a king to Spain, and whoſe very miniſters have made the emperor and the ſtates-general to tremble, ſhould yet want power to make ſo petty, ſo inconſiderable a prince as the duke of Lorrain, comply with her juſt requeſt, of removing out of his dominions the pretender to her crown?' None of the peers ſpeaking againſt the earl of Nottingham's motion, it was unanimouſly carried, and the addreſs was, the next day, preſented to the queen, who told them, 'They might be aſſured, ſhe ſhould continue to do whatever ſhe judged neceſſary for the ſecuring our religion, the liberty of her people, and for putting an end to the vain hopes of the pretender.'

The lord Bolingbroke, being come into the houſe of peers, juſt after the addreſs was voted, appeared a little ſurprized at that reſolution, and ſaid, 'There was a more effectual way to ſecure the ſucceſſion in the houſe of Hanover.' Some [k] The following peers entered a proteſt againſt it, the dukes of Somerſet, Bolton, Grafton, Devonſhire, Schomberg, and Argyle; the marquis of Dorcheſter; the earls of Wharton, Sunderland, Dorſet, Carliſle, Orford, Derby, Lincoln, Nottingham, Radnor, and Torrington; the lords viſcounts Townſhend and Longueville; the lords Sommers, Hallifax, Cowper, Rockingham, Haverſham, Cornwallis, and Foley; and the biſhops of Ely, Bangor, St Aſaph, Landaff, and Lincoln.

The proteſt was in theſe terms:

'I. We cannot apprehend (as the bill recites) that great danger may enſue from the diſſenters to the church and ſtate:

Becauſe, 1. By law no diſſenter is capable of any ſtation, which can be ſuppoſed to render him dangerous.

2. And, ſince the ſeveral ſects of diſſenters differ from each other as much as they do from the eſtabliſhed church, they can never form of themſelves a national church; nor have they any temptation to ſet up and one ſect among them; for in that caſe, all, that the other ſects can expect, is only a toleration, which they already enjoy by the indulgence of the ſtate; and therefore it is their intereſt to ſupport the eſtabliſhed church againſt any other ſect, that would attempt to deſtroy it.

II. If, nevertheleſs, the diſſenters were dangerous, ſeverity is not ſo proper and effectual a method to reduce them to the church, as a charitable indulgence, as is manifeſt by experience, there having been more diſſenters reconſiled to the church ſince the act of toleration, than in all the time ſince the act of uniformity, to the time of the ſaid act of toleration; any there his ſcarce one conſiderable family in England in communion with the diſſenters. Severity may make them hypocrites, but not converts.

III. If ſeverity could be ſuppoſed ever to be of uſe, yet this is not a proper time for it, while we are threatened with much greater dangers to our church and nation, againſt which the proteſtant diſſenters have joined, and are ſtill willing to join with us in our defence; and therefore we ſhould not drive them from us, by inforcing the laws againſt them in a manner, which of all others, muſt moſt ſenſibly grieve them, viz. the education of their children; which reduces them to a neceſſity either of breeding them in a way they do not approve, or of leaving them without inſtruction.

IV. This muſt be the more grievous to the diſſenters, becauſe it was little expected from the members of the eſtabliſhed church, after ſo favourable an indulgence, as the act of toleration, and the repeated declarations and profeſſions from the throne and former parliaments, againſt all perſecution, which is the peculiar badge of the Roman church, which avows and practiſes this doctrine: And yet this has not been retaliated even upon the Papiſts, for all the laws made againſt them have been the effects and juſt puniſhment of treaſon and from time to time committed againſt the ſtate. But it is not pretended, that this bill is deſigned as a puniſhment of any crime, which the proteſtant diſſenters have been guilty of againſt the civil government, or that they are diſaffected to the proteſtant ſucceſſion, as by law eſtabliſhed; for in this their zeal is very conſpicuous.

V. In all the inſtances of making laws, or of a rigid execution of the laws againſt diſſenters, it is very remarkable, that the deſign was to weaken the church, and to drive them into one common intereſt with the papiſts, and to join them in meaſures tending to the deſtruction of it. This was the method ſuggeſted by popiſh counſels, to prepare them for the two ſucceſſive declarations in the time of king Charles II, and the following one iſſued out by king James II, to ruin all our civil and religious rights. And we cannot think, that the arts and contrivances of the papiſts, to ſubvert our church, are proper means to preſerve it, eſpecially at a time, when we are in more danger of popery than ever, by the deſigns of the pretender, ſupported by the mighty power of the french king, who is engaged to extirpate our religion, and by great numbers in this kingdom, who are profeſſedly in his intereſt.

members expreſſing their deſire, that he would offer it to the houſe, he propoſed a bill, to make it high treaſon to liſt or to be inliſted into the Pretender's ſervice. The lord Hallifax repreſented, 'That ſuch a bill was altogether needleſs, both the Pretender, and all his adherents, being already attained of high treaſon. However, he ſhould be glad ſuch a bill were brought in, becauſe, with ſome alterations, it might be made a very good one.' The bill was accordingly brought in, and, in a committee of the whole houſe, of which the lord Bolingbroke was chairman, the lords Hallifax, Townſhend, Cowper, Sommers, and Wharton, made it their buſineſs to ſhew, 'That the Pretender was inconſiderable of himſelf, and not to be feared, but ſo far forth as he was countenanced and protected by the French king, whoſe intereſt and conſtant deſign was to impoſe him upon theſe realms.' And therefore they moved, and it was agreed, That the title of the bill ſhould be, to prevent the liſting her majeſty's ſubjects to ſerve as ſoldiers, without her majeſty's licence; and that it ſhould be high-treaſon to liſt, or be liſted to ſerve any foreign prince, ſtate, or potentate, without a licence under the ſign manual of her majeſty, her heirs or ſucceſſors. The following proviſo was likewiſe agreed to, 'That no licence ſhould be effectual to exempt any perſon from the penalties of this act, who ſhould liſt, or cauſe to be liſted into the ſervice of the French king, until after the French king ſhould have diſbanded and diſmiſſed all the regiments, troops, or companies of ſoldiers, which he had in his ſervice, conſiſting of the natural-born ſubjects of Great-Britain: This act to continue in force for three years. With theſe amendments, the bill was ſent to the commons, who gave it their concurrence.

This, and other proviſions againſt the Pretender, ſeemed the more neceſſary, becauſe his friends were by this time grown to that height of aſſurance, as publicly to aſſert his right, and drink his health. To this purpoſe, above an hundred Iriſh papiſts had a feaſt at the ſun-tavern in the ſtrand where the lord Fingal was choſen ſteward, and all that came were admitted by a printed ticket, in which was the image of a pope, or papiſh ſaint, treading hereſy under foot.

On the ſecond of July, the lords took into conſideration the trade to Spain and the Weſt Indies; and the earl of Nottingham made it plainly appear, that by reaſon of the diſcouragements, to which that trade was ſubjected by the explanations of the third, fifth, and eight articles of the treaty of commerce between Great-Britain and Spain (which explanations were made at Madrid, after ſigning the treaty at Utrecht) it was impoſſible for our merchants to carry on that trade without certain loſs. This was confirmed by the teſtimony of ſir William Hodges, and about thirty more eminent merchants, who being called to the houſe, unanimouſly avered, that, unleſs the explanations of theſe three articles were reſcinded, they could not carry on their commerce without loſing twenty or twenty five per cent. It was obſerved, the treaſurer joined with the lords, who inſiſted on the hearing of the Spaniſh merchants; which was ſtrenuouſly oppoſed by the lord Bolingbroke. But, after a long debate, it was reſolved to addreſs the queen, for all the papers relating to the negotiation of the treaty of commerce with Spain; with the names of the perſons, who adviſed her Majeſty to that treaty. The queen ſent an anſwer, 'That, being given to underſtand, that the three explanatory articles of the treaty of commerce with Spain were not detrimental to the trade of her ſubjects, ſhe had conſented to their being ratified with the treaty.' The queen making no mention of the perſons, who had adviſed her to ratify thoſe explanatory articles, (which was the chief deſign of the addreſs) ſeveral members excepted againſt the anſwer as unſatisfactory. And, among the reſt, the earl of Wharton and the lord Hallifax repreſented, That, if ſo little regard was ſhewn to the addreſſes and applications of that auguſt aſſembly to the ſovereign, they had no buſineſs in that houſe;' and moved, that a repreſentation be made to her majeſty, to lay before her the inſuperable difficulties, that attended the Spaniſh trade on the foot of the late treaty; which was agreed to: It was alſo moved, That the houſe ſhould inſiſt on her majeſty's naming the perſons, who adviſed her to ratify the three explanatory articles. But the courtiers warded off that blow, which was chiefly levelled at the lord Bolingbroke, and his agent Arthur Moore. The next day the lords proceeded to the conſideration of the Spaniſh trade, and to the examination of the commiſſioners of trade and plantations. The earl of Wharton ſaid ironically, 'He did not doubt but one of thoſe gentlemen could make it appear, that the treaty of commerce with Spain was very advantageous:' Which was meant of Arthur Moore, who had the chief management of that affair, and who contradicted himſelf in his anſwers to ſeveral queſtions, aſked him by the lord Cowper about the three explanatory articles. This was aggravated by the confeſſion of the other commiſſioners, particularly of Mr Robert Monkton, who declared, Mr Moore only read curſorily to them the articles, without giving them time to examine the ſame. Beſides which, Mr Popple, their ſecretary, depoſed, that Mr Moore had ſhewn him a letter in French from Monſieur Orry, directed to Don Arturio Moro, importing in ſubſtance, 'That he muſt not expect the two thouſand Louis d'Ors per annum, that had been promiſed him, unleſs he got the three explanatory articles ratified.' Though the lords came to no reſolution about that affair, at a general court of the ſouth-ſea company, upon a full hearing of a complaint of captain Johnſon, it was reſolved, 'That Arthur Moore, while a director of this company, was privy to, and encouraged a deſign of carrying on a clandeſtine trade, to the prejudice of this corporation, contrary to his oath, and in breach of the truſt repoſed in him; and that, for ſuch his breach of truſt, he be declared incapable of being a director of, or having any other employment in this company.' This cenſure made a great noiſe, and was highly reſented by the lord Bolingbroke.

On the 8th of July the lords examined Mr Lowndes, ſecretary to the treaſury, and Mr Taylor, firſt clerk, concerning the aſſiento contract. They confeſſed, that they were only nominal aſſignees for the quarter part of the aſſiento contract reſerved for the queen, and that ſome perſons, to them unknown (but who were ſtrongly ſuſpected to be the lord Bolingbroke, the lady Maſham, and Mr Arthur Moore) were to have the benefit of it. The lord Cowper having repreſented, 'That the uncertainty and ſuſpence, in which the ſouth-ſea company had a long time been kept, whether her majeſty would retain to herſelf, or give to the company, the quarter part of the aſſiento contract, reſerved to her, had been the principal obſtruction to the company's carrying on that trade:' The earl of Wharton moved for an addreſs to the queen, to give to the ſouth-ſea company, not only that quarter part of the aſſiento contract, but alſo the ſeven and a half per cent. granted to Manaſſes Gilligan, and any other profits ariſing from that contract.' But, the queſtion being put, it was carried in the negative by fifty voices a-

VI. But, if the diſſenters ſhould not be provoked, by this ſeverity, to concur in the deſtruction of their country and the proteſtant religion, yet we may juſtly fear they may be driven by this bill from England to the great prejudice of our manufactures; for, as we gained them by the perſecution abroad, ſo we may loſe them by the like proceedings at home.

Laſtly, the miſeries, we apprehend here, are greatly inhanced by extending the bill to Ireland, where the conſequences of it may be fatal; for ſince the number of papiſts in that kingdom far exceeds the proteſtants of all denominations together; and that the diſſenters are to be treated as enemies, or, at leaſt, as perſons dangerous to that church and ſtate, who have always, in all times, joined, and ſtill would join, with the members of that church, againſt the common enemy of their religion; and ſince the army there is very much reduced, the proteſtants, thus unneceſſarily divided, ſeems to us to be expoſed to the danger of another maſſacre, and the proteſtant religion in danger of being extirpated.

And we may further fear, that the Scots in Britain, whoſe national church is preſbyterian, will not ſo heartily and zealouſly join with us in our defence, when they ſee thoſe of the ſame nation, ſame blood and ſame religion, ſo hardly treated by us.

And this will be ſtill more grievous to the proteſtant diſſenters in Ireland, becauſe, whilſt the popiſh prieſts are regiſtered, and ſo indulgent by law, as that they exerciſe their religion without moleſtation, the diſſenters are ſo far from enjoying the like toleration, that the laws by this bill are inforced againſt them.

[l] This act enjoines, That no perſon in Great-Britain, or Wales, ſhall keep any public or private ſchool, or ſeminary, or teach or inſtruct youth, as tutor or ſchoolmaſter, that has not firſt ſuperſcribed the declaration to conform to the church of England, and has obtained licence from the reſpective dioceſan, or ordinary of the place, or, upon failure of ſo doing, may be committed to priſon, without bail or mainprize. And that no ſuch licence ſhall be granted, before the party produces a certificate, of his having received the ſacrament, according to the communion of the church of England, in ſome pariſh-church, within a year before obtaining ſuch licence, and hath ſuperſcribed the oaths of allegiance and ſupremacy.

That if any perſon, having complied with theſe points, ſhall knowingly or willingly reſort to any conventicle, or be preſent in any aſſembly, where the queen is not prayed for, ſhould be liable to the penalty of this act, and from thenceforth be incapable to keep any ſchool, or ſeminary, or inſtruct any youth, as tutor or ſchoolmaſter. And if any perſon teaches any other catechiſm, than what is ſet forth in the common-prayer, his licence ſhall be thenceforth void, and he be liable to the penalties of the act; but no perſon to be puniſhed twice for the ſame fact. Any perſon convicted by this act, conforming to the church for one year, without having been preſent at any conventicle, ſhall be again capacitated. This act to be conſtrued to extend to Ireland.

[m] On the 14th of May, information being brought to the duke of Shrewſbury, that about one hundred and fifty men, liſted for the Pretender's ſervice, were at the hill of Hoath, near Dublin, waiting to go on ſhipboard for France, ſome conſtables, with a file of muſqueteers, were ſent thither, who took twenty-four of them, and brought them to Dublin, where they were committed to priſon, in order to be tried for high treaſon. On the 26th of June, John Reily, Alexander Bourk, and Martin Carrol, were executed for it at Stephen's-Green: And about the beginning of July, twenty-one perſons more were tried and condemned for the ſame crime.

gainſt forty three. After this, on the earl of Angleſea's motion, it was reſolved by fifty-ſix votes againſt forty, to preſent an addreſs, to return thanks for her majeſty's having ſo generouſly given, not only licences for two ſhips of five hundred tuns each, and the aſſiento contract; but alſo the quarter part, which ſhe was pleaſed at firſt to reſerve to herſelf; and that ſhe would be pleaſed, that ſuch other advantages, which were, or might be, veſted in her, might be diſpoſed of for the uſe of the public.' This day's debate took up the lords till nine o'clock in the evening; ſo they had no time, as ſome whig lords deſigned it, to proceed to the cenſure of Mr Moore.

The next day, the queen's anſwer to their addreſs was reported: 'That ſhe always had a great conſideration for the advice of the houſe: And as to the particulars deſired, ſhe would diſpoſe of them, as ſhe ſhould judge beſt for the ſervice.' The latter part of this anſwer was very ill reliſhed by the whig lords; and ſome members took occaſion to complain of the queen's ſilence in relation to the perſons, who adviſed her to ratify the three explanatory articles. But, the lottery bill being ready for the royal aſſent, the queen came that very day to the houſe of peers, and put an end to the ſeſſion with the following ſpeech to both houſes:

My lords and gentlemen,

'THE progreſs, which has been made in public buſineſs, and the ſeaſon of the year, render it both convenient and neceſſary, that I ſhould put an end to this ſeſſion.'

Gentlemen of the houſe of commons,

'I return you my hearty thanks for all your good ſervices to me and to your country, and particularly for the ſupplies you have given me, as well to defray the expences of the current year, as towards the diſcharge of the national debts. In our preſent circumſtances it could not be expected, that a full proviſion ſhould be made on both theſe heads. What you have granted ſhall be laid out with the beſt huſbandry, and to the greateſt advantage.'

My lords and gentlemen,

'I hope early in the winter to meet you again, and to find you in ſuch a temper, as is neceſſary for the real improvement of our commerce, and of all the other advantages of peace. My chief concern is to preſerve to you, and to your poſterity, our holy religion, and the liberty of my ſubjects, and to ſecure the preſent and future tranquillity of my kingdoms. But I muſt tell you plainly, that theſe deſirable ends can never be attained, unleſs you bring the ſame diſpoſitions on your parts; unleſs all groundleſs jealouſies, which create and foment diviſions amongſt you, be laid a ſide; and unleſs you ſhew the ſame regard for my juſt prerogative, and for the honour of my Government, as I have always expreſſed for the rights of my people.'

When the queen had ended her ſpeech, the parliament was prorogued to the 10th of Auguſt, but ſhe died before that day came.

Preſently after the riſing of the parliament, the diſcord among the miniſters came to an open rupture. The treaſurer, ever ſince he had received the ſtaff, had kept to himſelf the principal direction of domeſtic affairs, and the diſpoſal of moſt places of profit; and, by the credit and intereſt of his poſt, and favour with the queen, had procured advantageous alliances for his children, brought great riches into his family, and advanced all his relations [n], whilſt the conduct of foreign affairs lay on the lord Bolingbroke, who, as he was leſs circumſpect in the proſecution of bold meaſures than the treaſurer, had therefore the largeſt ſhare of the public odium, without any other advantage than the profits of his office, moſt of which he laviſhed away in riotous pleaſures. Being a man impatient of dependance, he had frequent warm expoſtulations with the treaſurer, who, thinking himſelf ſecure in the queen's favour, and in his intereſt with the parliament, diſregarded his complaints, by which the ſecretary was ſtill more enraged. Their private diſputes would often have ended in an open quarrel, had not the queen, aſſiſted by the chancellor and lady Maſham, as often reconciled them, or rather, had not their confederacy in the late meaſures made them ſuſpend their mutual hatred to conſult their common ſafety. But, as ſoon as the danger was over by the parliament's ſolemn approbation of the peace, it appeared there was an irreconcileable rivalſhip and enmity between them. Before this laſt ſtruggle, the treaſurer, either finding his intereſt declining at court, or deſpairing of the queen's life, and apprehending the conſequences of the late ſteps, bethought himſelf of a timely retreat; and, to that end, endeavoured to reconcile himſelf to the whigs. He tried to gain the friendſhip of the lord Cowper, who had the greateſt weight amongſt them; and, with that view, procured him to be choſen umpire between his ſon, the lord Harley, and the lord Pelham, in a controverſy about the inheritance of the late duke of Newcaſtle. But the lord Cowper contented himſelf with arbitrating the matter according to the ſtricteſt rules of equity, and with doing juſtice to the ſon, without eſpouſing the intereſt of the father. On the other hand, the treaſurer expected to be ſtrongly ſupported by the duke of Shrewſbury, who had maintained himſelf in the eſteem both of the ſovereign and of the public, and whoſe late behaviour in Ireland had endeared him to the well affected to the Hanover ſucceſſion. But the duke, juſtly reſenting the neglect of the miniſters, while he was at Dublin, was very much unconcerned about them, when he came to London, and rather inflamed than moderated their differences, by complaining to the queen of ſome orders, that had been ſent him, which he thought inconſiſtent with her majeſty's and the nation's ſervice. Notwithſtanding theſe diſappointments, the treaſurer formed a deſign of removing his competitor, as the beſt means to approve his affection to the proteſtant ſucceſſion, and therefore ſet Mr Robert Monkton againſt Mr Arthur Moore (the lord Bolingbroke's creature) who narrowly eſcaped a cenſure in the houſe of peers, in which the treaſurer hoped the ſecretary might have been involved. But, in this very inſtance, the treaſurer found he had loſt conſiderable ground at court, the queen having thought fit, at the lord Bolingbroke's deſire, to put a ſudden ſtop to that enquiry. And it appeared ſoon after, that, by his ſuperior intereſt with lady Maſham, by the aſſiſtance of the lord chancellor, by his humouring the queen's natural inclination, and boldly purſuing the meaſures ſhe had entered upon, the ſecretary entirely ruined his rival in her favour and confidence.

The treaſurer, in this ſituation of his affairs, wrote a letter to the queen, and with it ſent her an account of public affairs from Auguſt the 8th 1710, to June the 8th 1714; in which he endeavours to juſtify his own conduct, and expoſe the uneaſy, turbulent, and ambitious ſpirit of lord Bolingbroke. But this had not the intended effect upon the queen.

While the court was in this ferment, ſomething happened, which haſtened the treaſurer's diſgrace. Some pretend, the lord Bolingbroke had intelligence, and informed the queen of the treaſurer's inviting the duke of Marlborough to come over (for which purpoſe the duke was indeed arrived at Oſtend) and of his private conferences with ſeveral whig lords: Others, that he was ſuſpected of diſcovering the queen's councils to the court of Hanover, and even of putting them upon demanding a writ for the duke of Cambridge: Others again, that he was both againſt the ſcheme of new-modelling the army, and the project of a new offenſive and defenſive league between great-Britain, France, Spain, Sweden, and Sicily: And others, ſtill, that the queen was extremely angry at his preſuming to ſend orders to Ireland, without conſulting with her or the council; and that the duke of Shrewſbury inſiſted on his removal, which the duke of Marlborough had made a previous condition of his return to England. But a certain author (who writ in his vindication) plainly aſſerts, that his diſgrace was entirely owing to his attachment to the houſe of Hanover, whoſe ſucceſſion his enemies were reſolved to prevent [o]. However this be, on the 20th of July the chancellor, (who had retired into the country for a few days) was ſent for in haſt; and the next day was in cloſe conference with the queen and the lord Bolingbroke; after which it was generally reported, the treaſurer would be ſpeedily removed. It was ſaid at the ſame time that, to ſoften his fall, the queen deſigned to beſtow on him an annual penſion of five thouſand pounds for life, which the title of duke of Newcaſtle; and, upon his recommendation to give the title of earl of Clare to the lord Pelham. But, contrary to his own, and indeed the general expectation, when he came to court on the 27th of July, the ſtaff was taken from him, rather with mortifying, than agreeable circumſtances. It is certain, that ſevere reproaches paſſed, in the queen's hearing, between the falling miniſter and the lord chancellor, and the lady Maſham, whom the treaſurer had diſobliged ſome days before, by making a demur to a grant ſhe had obtained of fifteen hundred pounds a year; and whom he looked upon as acceſſary to his diſgrace. He told them, 'He had been ronged and abuſed by lies and miſrepreſentations; but he ſhould be revenged, and leave ſome people as low as he found them [p].' Theſe expoſtulations could not but ſhock the ſick queen, and give her uneaſy ſuſpicions of her being abuſed and deluded by one or two, if not by all three, of her principal miniſters. It is pretended, that in this agitation of thought, which opened her eyes, ſhe reſolved to reſign herſelf wholly to the conduct of the duke of Shrewſbury. But it can hardly be ſuppoſed, that, in her condition, ſhe was capable of forming a reſolution ſo inconſiſtent with her late meaſures. It is far more reaſonable to imagine that the lord Bolingbroke, having gained ſo great an aſcendant over her, was moſt likely to ſucceed the earl of Oxford in the management of affairs. This is certain, the very day, the treaſurer was removed, the lord Bolingbroke entertained at dinner the generals Stanhope, Cadogan, and Palmes, ſir William Wynham, Mr Craggs, and ſome other gentlemen; which meeting of men of ſuch oppoſite principles occaſioned various ſpeculations. The moſt probable conjecture was, that the lord Bolingbroke, conſidering he could not depend on the queen's precarious life to accompliſh his deſigns, and foreſeeing a ſtorm, he could not be able to weather, reſolved to ſtrike in with the whigs, and to invite over the duke of Marlborough; in which he had reaſon to expect better ſucceſs than his late rival, with whom the duke had vowed never to be reconciled. Some other particulars were at that time mentioned to corroborate theſe ſuggeſtions. But though the duke of Marlborough, after having been detained about a fortnight by contrary winds, did, at this very time, imbark at Oſtend for England; yet the true motive of his coming at this critical juncture is not certainly known. It appeared plainly, however, ſoon after, that, whatever were the lord Bolingbroke's thoughts and views at this time, the main deſign of the whigs was to inflame the animoſity between him and the earl of Oxford, as the readieſt way to ruin them both.

[n] His ſon, Edward lord Harley, married the only daughter of the late duke of Newcaſtle; who brought him a fortune of above 15000l. per annum. Elizabeth, his firſt daughter, was married to Peregrine Hyde Oſborne, marquis of Caermarthen, ſon and heir to the duke of Leeds: And Abigal, his ſecond daughter, was married to George baron Hay, viſcount Dupplin, ſon and heir to Thomas earl of Kinnoul, a Scotch peer.

[o] The treaſurer's enemies (ſays that author) thought they could not hurt him any way more with the queen, than by repreſenting him as inviolably attached to the proteſtant ſucceſſion. 'The party (ſays he) took hold of this article, as if they had a great advantage given them againſt the white-ſtaff, intimating, that it was a great affront to her, and an apparent carrying on his own game at the court of Hanover; accordingly, her majeſty was prejudiced by it, as if it had been a diſhonour to her.' white-ſtaff, p. 34.

The treaſurer's removal was ſo ſudden, and occaſioned ſuch confuſion, that no ſcheme was either formed or agreed on, to ſupply his place, and to fill up ſuch other vacancies, as muſt naturally attend his diſgrace. A cabinet council, or rather chamber conſultation, was indeed held in a hurry, the very night the earl of Oxford was removed, and ſeveral perſons were propoſed to manage the treaſury, which was deſigned to be put in commiſſion. Their number was to be five, of which ſir William Wyndham, as chancellor of the exchequer, was to be one; but the choice of the other four perplexed both the queen and her counſellors. It is ſaid, the perſons named were the lords Bolingbroke, Paget Lexington, Bathurſt, and Maſham; the biſhop of London; Mr Henry Boyle, and Mr Bridges; ſir John Packington, Mr Campion, Mr Hill, and ſome others. But, whether there were fewer or more in nomination, it is certain, no reſolution was taken as to the choice of any four, either in that firſt conſultation, or in the council held the next morning; ſeveral perſons, who had been propoſed, and ſpoken to, having declined to accept a precarious employment in ſuch a juncture. On the 29th of July, the cabinet-council was to have ſat on the ſame affair; but their meeting was deferred to the next day, by reaſon of the queen's indiſpoſition, which, ſhe was ſenſible, was occaſioned by the late quarrelling among her ſervants, having intimated to one of her Phyſicians, 'That ſhe ſhould not outlive it.'

It is certain, both the diſpute, to which ſhe was an earwitneſs, and the conſultation upon it, which laſted till near two o'clock in the morning, occaſioned ſuch a violent agitation of the queen's ſpirits, as could not but hinder, according to Dr Shadwell's opinion, the uſual diſcharge of the impoſthumation in her leg, ſo that the gouty humour, tranſlating itſelf upon the brain, was the immediate occaſion of her death.

On Thurſday morning, the queen finding herſelf indiſpoſed with a dozing heavineſs, and a ſhooting pain in her head her phyſicians judged proper, ſhe ſhould be cupped, which ſhe liked better than bleeding, and which, in the ſame ſymptoms, had often given her eaſe. The queen was now ſomething relieved by it; went to bed at the uſual hour; reſted pretty well till three o'clock on Friday morning, when ſhe waked, and finding ſomethnig heavy on her ſtomach, and reaching to vomit, ſhe brought up ſome matter, and then compoſed herſelf to ſleep. Towards ſeven o'clock ſhe waked again; and, finding herſelf pretty well, roſe from bed, and got her head combed. This done, towards eight ſhe went to look on the clock; and Mrs Danvers, one of the bed chamber women, taking notice, that ſhe fixed her eyes a long time upon it, aſked her, what ſhe ſaw in the clock more than ordinary? The queen anſwered her only with turning her head, and a dying look; at which Mrs Danvers being frighted, ſhe called for help The phyſicians judging, ſhe was ſeized with a fit of an apoplexy, cauſed her to be let blood; upon which ſhe came to herſelf again, and was pretty quiet till a little after nine, when ſhe was ſeized with a ſecond fit of heavineſs and dozing, which increaſed ſo much upon her, that for above an hour ſhe was ſpeechleſs and motionleſs. Thoſe about her judging, ſhe was either dead, or near expiring, the ducheſs of Ormond, one of the ladies of the bed chamber, then in waiting, ſent, with all ſpeed, a meſſenger to the duke her huſband, with this melancholy news, which being brought to the committee of council, then aſſembled at the cock pit, they immediately went to Kenſington. In the mean time the phyſicians thought fit to give the queen a vomit, which not having all the deſired effect, they adminiſtered another medicine, propoſed by Dr Mead; upon which ſhe recovered her ſpeech and ſenſes.

The dukes of Somerſet and Argyle, being informed of the queen's deſperate condition, inſtantly repaired to Kenſington, and, without being ſummoned, went into the council chamber, where the lord chancellor, the dukes of Shrewſbury and Ormond, the three ſecretaries of ſtate, the biſhop of London, and ſome others, were in a committee. It is eaſy to imagine, that ſome of them were ſurpriſed at their coming in, but, after they had acquainted the board with the reaſons which brought them thither, the duke of Shrewſbury returned them thanks for their readineſs to give the council their aſſiſtance in that critical juncture. Then they took their places, and moved, that the phyſicians might be examined, and ordered to give an account in writing of the queen's illneſs which they did. After this, one of the council repreſented, how neceſſary it was in caſe the queen died, that the place of lord-treaſurer ſhould be filled; to which the whole board aſſenting, the duke of Shrewſbury was propoſed, and unanimouſly approved, as the fitteſt perſon for that high truſt. Sir Richard Blackmore, Dr Shadwell, Dr Mead, and the other phyſicians, who were examined, having aſſured the council, that the queen was ſenſible, the chancellor, with the duke of Shrewſbury, and ſome other lords, were ordered to attend her, and lay before her the unanimous opinion of the council; upon which ſhe ſaid, 'They could not recommend a perſon ſhe liked better than the duke of Shrewſbury'; and, giving him the treaſurer's ſtaff, bid him uſe it for the good of her people. The duke would have returned the lord-chamberlain's ſtaff, but ſhe deſired, he ſhould keep them both; ſo the ſame perſon was at once poſſeſſed of three of the higheſt places of truſt, honour, and profit under the crown of Great-Britain, being lord-treaſurer, lord-chamberlain, and lord-lieutenant of Ireland. The duke's advancement to the poſt of lord-treaſurer immediately changed the face of affairs; baffled the lord Bolingbroke's ſcheme; alarmed the friends of the pretender; and revived the ſpirits of the well-affected to the Hanover ſucceſſion [r]. Upon the motion of the dukes of Somerſet and Argyle, it was agreed, that all privy-counſellors, in or about London, without diſtinction, ſhould attend; which the lord Sommers, and ſome other friends to the houſe of Hanover, did that very day.

About three o'clock in the afternoon, the queen relapſed

[p] 'He expoſed (ſays the author of the white-ſtaff) their new ſchemes, ridiculed their impolitic meaſures, and foretold them to what diſtreſſes they would reduce themſelves in a little time, putting them in mind of a debt they would owe to the national juſtice at laſt, and how unwilling they would be to pay it. He prophetically told them, they would be in a little while reduced to the primitive meanneſs and contempt in which he found them! That he had too long borne the reproaches which was due to their meaſures, which he had in vain perſuaded them againſt, and that it was time now that the world ſhould ſee, who were the enemies to the Britiſh Eſtabliſhment.

[q] It would take up another volume (ſays the author of the hiſtory of the white-ſtaff) to give an account how ſtruck they appeared at this ſurpriſing blow. What give away the ſtaff? ſaid they, after they had ſtood looking upon one another ſpeechleſs and confounded for ſome time, at a private aſſembly of all their confederates, which was held on this occaſion, where they gave vent to their paſſions, and broke out into all the extravagancies of rage and deſpair. 'The blaſt of hell, and the rage of a million of devils, be on this curſed ſtaff (ſaid the ſecretary, flinging the purſe to the ground) it is he that has ruined us.' 'Give away the ſtaff, ſaid the biſhop, by G—— I could not have believed ſhe durſt have done it? What can we do without it? We have but one way left, France and the lawful heir; it muſt and ſhall be done by G——.' Whither do I launch (ſays the author) this is a ſcene of ſuch conſequence, filled with ſuch a diſcovery of black deſigns, that it cannot be entered upon here, but muſt be refered to another occaſion. See hiſt. of the White-ſtaff.

into a lethargy or apoplectic fit, out of which ſhe hardly recovered by the application of the ſpirit of ſal ammoniac to her noſtrils. The phyſicians thought fit to apply bliſters; but, at the ſame time, acquainted the council, that the queen's life was in the utmoſt danger, and entirely depended on the effects of th laſt remedy.

In the mean time, the privy council took into conſideration the ſtate of the kingdom; and very ſevere reflections were made on the late adminiſtration, for leaving the maritime places, particularly the important town of Portſmouth unprovided with men and warlike ſtores, and conſequently incapable of defence, in caſe of a ſudden invaſion, which might be reaſonably apprehended, in caſe of the queen's death [r]. But, the preſent buſineſs not being to enquire into, but to mend faults, the council, with great prudence and diſpatch, provided for the ſecurity of the cities of London and Weſtminſter, of the maritime towns, and of Scotland and Ireland. Orders were immediately diſpatched to four regiments of horſe and dragoons quartered in remote counties, to march up to the villages near London, to keep the Jacobites and diſaffected in awe: And to ſeven of the ten battalions of Britiſh forces, to embark at Oſtend, and ſail for England with all poſſible ſpeed. An embargo was ordered on all ſhipping, and directions were given for fitting out as many men of war, as coul ſooneſt be got ready. By theſe orders the public tranquillity remained undiſturbed, and no conſternation appeared, but in the faces of the avowed partiſans of the Pretender.

The queen continued all night in a lethargic fit, which increaſed to ſuch a degree about ten o'clock on ſaturday morning, that all the phyſicians diſpaired of her life. Upon this the privy council ſent orders to the heralds at arms, and to a troop of life-guards, to be in a readineſs to mount, in order to proclaim the elector of Brunſwick Kign of Great-Britain. At the ſame time, they cauſed a letter to be written to his Electoral Highneſs, 'to acquaint him 'with the extreme danger the queen's life was in; with the meaſures they had taken to ſecure the crown to him; and to deſire him to repair, with all convenient ſpeed, to Holland, where a britiſh ſquadron, that was fitting out with all poſſible expedition, would attend him, and bring him over, in caſe of the queen's death.' This letter was that very morning ſent expreſs by Mr James Craggs, and with him orders were dipatched to the earl of Stratford, to deſire the ſtates-general to get ready to perform the guarantee of the proteſtant ſucceſſion, if need ſhould require.

Th s done, the privy council reſumed the conſideration of the ſtate of the ſea-port towns, and ordered a ſtrong reinforcement to be ſent down to Portſmouth; and rightly judging, that if the pretender's friends ſtirred any where in Great-Britain, it would be, moſt probably, in Scotland, they ordered major-general Whetham to repair thither, and aſſiſt major-general Wightman; and appointed the earl of Berkely to command the fleet. The queen gave ſome ſigns of life between twelve and one o'clock, and took ſome ſpoonfulls of broth. She continued in a lethargic codition till about ſix in the afternoon, when, her pulſe beating a little faſter and higher, thoſe about her began to entertain ſome hopes. But the bliſters not having had the deſired effect, ſhe expired on Sunday the 1ſt of Auguſt, a little after ſeven o'clock in the morn ng, having lived forty-nine years, five months, and ſix days, and reigned twelve years and five months, wanting ſeven days. She was not able, either to receive the ſacrement, which the biſhop of London was ready to adminiſter, or to ſign the draught of a will, whereby ſhe directed her burial to be in the ſame manner and place with her late royal Conſort; and in which ſhe left legacies to ſome of her ſervants.

Thus died queen Anne, whoſe character has already, in great meaſure, been deſcribed, but will more fully appear in the following remarks on the circumſtances and affairs of her reign.

No reign was ever more memorable than this for important events. Different accounts and numerous comments have diſguiſed and confounded many meterial particulars. But, notwithſtanding this, the true ſtate of affairs, and the real character of this princes, may, without much difficulty, be explained. No period of time afforded men more eminent for wiſdom and abilities, and more deſtinguiſhed by ſucceſſes equal to their merit. Had not ſuch circumſtances happened, Europe muſt have ſubmitted to an univerſal monarchy, which would not have endured any remains of civil or religious Liberty.

When the war was begun, nothing could be more menacing than our proſpects, The houſe of Bourbon deſpiſing all treaties, and moſt ſolemn engagements, without any difficulty or oppoſition ſeized territories more extenſive and conſiderable, than were ever gained by the moſt rapid conqueror, by the toils of a long life. All the powers of Europe were obliged, by the laws of prudence and ſelf defence, to oppoſe a monarch thus prepared for their deſtruction. Thoſe, at remoter diſtances, were eaſy and inſenſible; and ſome, who were nearly concerned, entered into the pernicious meaſures of France. The pride and opreſſion of the court of Vienna aggravated the evil, by giving occaſion to the inſurrection of thoſe ſubjects, of whoſe uſefulneſs and importance the preſent times have afforded full evidence.

The Turks remaining quiet during the whole war; the inſurrection in the Cevennes; and the victory at Hockſtedt, are inſtances of the moſt favourable incidents. When we review the caſe of thoſe brave and oppreſſed proteſtants, how can we forbear inquiring, why was not a deep and incurable wound then given to France in her vitals? Muſt we aſcribe our fatal neglect to bigotry, perfidy, to an averſion to all foreign churches, and to the natural operation of Tory principle? It is affirmed, it was only carried by one vote at the council-board, not to call them rebels in our gazette: And, willyour majeſty aſſiſt rebels? It is ſaid to have been the expoſtulation of a very grave nobleman with the queen's conſcience. While too many were averſe, others ſeem to have had no true ſenſe of importance of this in cident. Complaints have been likewiſe made of our being betrayed by our agents.

The wonderful and very ſeaſonable ſucceſs at Hockſtedt was properly perſued by our great general. But, how faulty was the houſe of Auſtria on their part? How much valuable time was waſted; and how feebly did they come prepared to the ſiege of Landau? Military preparations were neglected, and the vain pomp and ſhow of a king of the Romans chiefly regarded. Thus the troops were obliged to continue in the field till the beginning of winter, to their great detriment. The feebleneſs or ſlowneſs of the Germans, or the envy of their general, defeated the deſigns which were excellently formed of penetrating into France on its weakeſt ſide. A year's reſpite thus gained enabled the enemy to offer us battle. A complete and cheap victory was gained and followed with all deſirable conſequences. Time ſpent in the ſieges of this and the following years has been repreſented as the want of conduct, or ſomething worſe. But the importance of a barrier is evident to every honeſt and thinking man, When this ſecurity is neglected, the awe and terror it muſt produce will convince by facts far more effectual than the cleareſt reaſoning. The entering France, and leaving behind the numerous fortified towns of the new conqueſt, had any miſchance happened, would have been deemed an unpardonable want of precaution. To a ſecond attempt, by the way of Lorrain, there was nothing to give encouragement.

Our advantages in other parts were very conſiderable; particularly by diſappointments of the enemy in the ſieges of Gibraltar and Barcelona. But what account can be given of our misfortune and miſconduct, when a ſure, near, and eaſy method of poſſeſſing Spain was offered? What hindered lord Galaway's marching with proper expedition to Madrid? Had this been executed, all the courts and tribunals of the kingdom would have been ſecured. By diſpatches from thence the governments of America might have been gained. But in what terms ſhall we mention the delays of king Charles and the earl of Peterborough, after the flying retreat of king Philip and his army? Their behaviour, in all its parts, was a direct contradiction to all the dictates of prudence, intereſt, and glory. Had they immediately aſſembled the troops in Valencia and Catalonia, joined lord Galway, and marched directly to the Pyrenees, Philip muſt have been for ever excluded; and the great and good ends of the war would have been happily and ſpeedily accompliſhed. What a reverſe happened, has been related in its proper place.

The diſapointment before Toulon was almoſt equally affecting. Such a conqueſt would have been a moſt ſenſible wound to France. Had not the army been weakened by the great body of troops ſent to the conqueſt of Naples, the affair muſt have ſucceeded. Jeſuitical councils and French money are ſuppoſed to have influenced the court of Vienna. The reaſoning fatally urged was to this purpoſe: If the naval power of France is deſtroyed in the Mediterranean by taking Marſeilles and Toulon, the uncontroulable dominion of two maritime powers, which are proteſtants, will be intolerable. The prieſts of Italy and Spain trembled for Rome and the holy houſe. They had lively forebodings of ſomething worſe than the return of the days of Cromwell. As they had an aſſured proſpect of Spain, the perfect awe and ſubjection of the maritime part of that catholic kingdom to heretics came into conſideration: This, though known to Dr. Hare, was not inſerted in his excellent political tracts publiſhed in 1711 and 1712, for a very obvious reaſon; ſince it would have given aſſiſtance to the miniſters in their evil deſigns of infuſing into the nation ill-will and averſion to the houſe of Auſtria, and kind inclinations to that of Bourbon.

[r] Sir John Gibſon, deputy governor of Portſmouth, had, a little before ſent up to the ſecretary of ſtate an information he had received, of great preparations then making at Havre de Grace, for a embarkation of troops, which he apprehended to be in order to invade the kingdom, and bring in the pretender; And at the ſame time, he repreſented how unprovided he was, both with men and warlike ſtores, to defend that important place, in caſe of a ſudden attack; But no notice was taken either of his information, or repreſentation.

Not improving advantages and opportunities is matter of eaſy obſervation to all, who reflect on the ſeveral wars, of which we have accounts. In confederacies, wherein there are a variety of humours and oppoſite intereſts, ſuch misfortunes are in a great meaſure unavoidable. But, notwithſtanding the ſeveral eſcapes of the enemy, the duke of Marlborough's ſure and ſteady progreſs, and the damages then French ſuſtained in other places, reduced them to a ſtate of the utmoſt diſtreſs and terror. Their frontiers were impaired to ſuch a degree, that we had gained an eaſy and ſecure admiſſion into the open and defenceleſs parts of France, had his queen and country duly ſupported this great captain. The grand monarch would have been driven from his capital; his glory had received an indelible ſtain; and his vain and inſolent ſubjects a juſt mortification. Such advantages would have repaid all our toils and expences. He muſt have gladly compounded by recalling his grandſon from Spain. His forcible and fraudulent acquiſitions muſt have been ſurrendered; and ſure foundations laid for the laſting peace and ſafety of this part of the world. Clearer and more obvious truths appear no where in the hiſtories of any age or people; yet ſuch hath been the deluſion of party, that contrary repreſentations have gained an entire credit. The ſpeculative and practical propagators of them have been conſidered by a numerous party, as the beſt writers, and the wiſeſt and moſt worthy miniſters.

The temper, behaviour, and management of the queen, on whom ſo much depended, deſerves a particular and impartial conſideration. As both parties in their turns were greatly diſobliged and offended, no praiſes have been given her for perſonal ſteadineſs and wiſdom. In ſome ſermons indeed, parts and abilities have been aſcribed to her; but, were ſuch paſſages duly explained, the abilities would be found to belong only to her miniſters.

Great are the diſhonours, which have redounded to the ſacred order by the behaviour of thoſe princes, who have been moſt favoured with their eſteem. The effects of their zeal have not appeared in a warm and equal concern for the welfare of ſociety; but in aiding one party to oppoſe and ruin the other. Benevolence and compaſſion have been diſregarded; and wrath, clamour, and brutal qualities have been encouraged; and thoſe of the divine and human kind been greatly neglected.

There were two things, to which the inglorious part of this reign may be chiefly imputed; the queen's paſſion for favourites, and the prejudices of her education. To the ſecret influence of favourites was owing the diſgrace of her general, who, while he was ſteadily purſuing the intereſt of the public, was not only diſmiſſed and loaded with the heavieſt reproaches, but even proſecuted for what had been granted him by the queen's warrant under her own hand, and what was afterwards given to the duke of Ormond. By the ſame ſecret influence, the exchanging the able, honeſt, and ſucceſsful, for thoſe whoſe management proved them in all reſpects the reverſe, was eſteemed an important deliverance. Hence alſo it was, that the Miniſters had often ſuch put upon them as were their enemies, and the juſt averſion of thoſe on whoſe aſſiſtance they depended. This incommoded every Miniſtry, and was the cauſe of the queen's conſtant complaints of her being only a royal ſlave. In a word, paſſion for favourites ſeemed to have a greater effect upon her, than the impreſſions of ambition and glory: For otherwiſe, the moſt worthy deſigns had not been abandoned, when there was ſo near a proſpect of their accompliſhment.

The prejudices of the queen's education had alſo a great ſhare in ſullying the glory of her reign. It was her misfortune to be educated in ſuch times, and under ſuch perſons, as had given her wrong ideas of religion and the church, and infuſed into her, from her very infancy, ſtrong prejudices againſt the whigs, who were repreſented to her as enemies to the conſtitution in church and ſtate. Deliberate reviews are very uncommon, and eſpecially in thoſe who are at the height of power. This evil was therefore incurable, and had very ill conſequences. Hence, though the queen has been juſtly commended for her devout and regular attendance on the office of the church [f], and for ardent wiſhes for its proſperity, yet for want of true notions of religious liberty (which ſhe had never been taught) attempts were repeatedly made in the beginning of her reign, with her approbation, to diſcourage and diſtreſs the diſſenters. But theſe attempts were diſappointed by the moderation and juſtice, which then ſubſiſted in the houſe of lords. The concurrence of the treaſurer and general in thoſe meaſures hath been repreſented as an inſtance and moſt unſeaſonable expreſſion of their enmity to the true principles of liberty. But the immediate and preſſing motive of their behaviour was a neceſſity of complying with the inclinations of their royal miſtreſs. Had they refuſed, they would have given their rivals a very dangerous advantage. And, though we ſhould allow the fulleſt ſtrength to their old leaven, yet it muſt be ſuppoſed, if they had been at perfect liberty, their known prudence and policy would have reſtrained ſuch appearances of it at this time. For nothing could be more mortifying and offenſive to the Dutch, and all the reformed churches. Beſides, to begin ſuch a war with diſuniting meaſures at home would have been to the laſt degree abſurd.

Diſtreſſing and incapacitating were conſiſtent with the deſigns, the views, and the meaſures of the four laſt years of the queen's reign. All proteſtants abroad, as well as thoſe at home, who differed from the eſtabliſhment, were marked with infamy. A loud noiſe for the church filled all places, and prevented all attention to the calamity and deſtruction preparing for the ſtate. Depriving the diſſenters of the natural right of educating their children was the prelude to the diveſting of them of their moſt important privileges in ſociety. For their power of voting for members of parliament would have been taken away; and they would have been rendered equally incapable of being concerned in the choice of members of corporations.

How ſoon hath the ſenſe of ſuch a deliverance been loſt! Becauſe impracticable favours have not been granted, many of them, who dignify themſelves with the name of Conſiſtent proteſtants, and the true aſſerters of liberty in its full extent, have ſhewn themſelves extremely preverſe both in their words and actions; and in ſome places applied their wonderfully preſerved privileges and capacities for the ſervice of an intereſt, which had doomed them to deſtruction; in others, they have been indolent and unconcerned.

How the queen's zeal for the church operated in the affair of Dr Sacheverel, is but too well known. This zeal gave the enemies of the miniſtry advantages at court and in the country, beyond their moſt ſanguine expectations. To the mad ferment which was diffuſed through the kingdom, and which influenced the future elections, the eaſy ſucceſs of the new miniſtry may be juſtly aſcribed. For though they had been poſſeſſed of power; and though the nation was tired out with taxes; yet nothing but the operation of the noiſe and name of the church could have given them ſo ſecure a majority. This alone, after, ſuch affecting ſucceſſes, was capable of producing an inſenſibility of the advantages given the enemy, and of the diſtreſs, to which we moſt faithleſſly and inſolently reduced our allies. Our liberties, trade, and commerce could only by this means have been placed in ſo bad a ſituation.

An explanation of the real ſecret of the management of the new miniſtry, and of the impeaching parliament, hath not been attempted. Perhaps of this, as well as of ſome other particulars both at home and abroad, no full and exact account will ever be given. It hath been ſaid, that the treaſurer and his friends foreſaw and intended ſome of the conſequences. That the junto had often made remonſtrances and demands, both with reguard to perſons and things, in a manner diſagreeable to the prime miniſter, may be allowed, without ſuppoſing a wiſe man capable of ſo abſurd a ſcheme for his deliverance. Beſides, the combination between the then patriots and the tories was known to be ſo firm, as not to ſuffer him to entertain the leaſt hopes of making any impreſſion. From all appearances, we may conclude it to have been the effect of haſty unthinking zeal. Expreſs and parliamentary approbation was intended for the priciples, on which the revolution is founded. Something of this kind ſeemed neceſſary, becauſe, throughout this reign, revolution principles had been perpetually diſgraced and oppoſed from the preſs and the pulpit.

[f] She was ſo ſtrict an obſerver of forms, that once at Windſor ſhe reproved the miniſter for giving her the Sacrament before the other clergy then preſent had firſt received it." Coke, vol. III. 481.

[t] It is made a queſtion by ſome, whether the queen knew any thing of the deſign of bringing in the Pretender, notwithſtanding the ſtrong appearances of it. In 1708, when the attempt was made on Scotland, ſir George Bing had no inſtructions as to the perſon of the Pretender. When this particular was taken into conſideration, the council broke up in confuſion. For when ſome mentioned methods of diſpatch, the moving appearance of the queen's flowing tears prevented all farther deliberation. Lamberti ſays (Vol. VIII. p. 657.) that it was very evident, the queen of Great-Britain was extremely inclined to ſet the Pretender on her throne. This inclination firſt appeared on the death, of her ſon the duke of Glouceſter. For an expreſs being ſent by the queen (then princeſs of Denmark) to the court of St Germains, to notify the duke's death, the earl of Mancheſter, ambaſſador from king William to the court of France ſent his ſecretary Mr Chetwin to Loo, to inform the king of this proceeding. The reader may alſo ſee the extract Numb. I. annexed to the end of this reign concerning the Pretender's affair.

The heart of the queen was well known, and her ſecret affections and diſſatisfactions well underſtood. Therefore, during the trial of Dr Sacheverel, and immediately after, the principles of the revolution were vilified beyond meaſure; and the doctrines of ſlavery became matter of glory, as the peculiars of chriſtianity and the church. Addreſſes were graciouſly received, wherein, with the omiſſion only of his name, the pretender's title was expreſſly aſſerted; and, by evident implication, this was calling the poſſeſſor of the throne an Uſurper; language, which hath ever been unpardonable with every other prince. However this be, moſt certain it is, that thoſe who had expreſſed their readineſs to concur in the meaſures of the court, were regarded as well affected, and declarations and aſſurances in favour of the houſe of Hanover were conſidered only as a matter of neceſſity and form.

No one of our monarchs ever had greater advantages of doing good both at home and abroad, nor had any reign been diſtinguiſhed with ſuch glorious and important events. Germany ſaved from diſtruction; the imperial crown preſerved and fixed on the head of our ally; Flanders ſubdued; the exorbitant power of France reduced; the union of England and Scotland, are events for which the reign of queen Anne will be had in everlaſting remembrance. But by a diſhonourable peace, how fruitleſs were theſe important events rendered? How ſoon was the power of France reſtored to a condition of injuring, oppreſſing, and terrifying the world? And very probably, nothing but the queen's ſudden removal prevented the execution of thoſe ſchemes in favour of the pretender, which the peace-makers had laid, and for which due preparation had been made [t].

Had not the emperor and Catalans prolonged the war, Lewis XIV. ſome months before the queen's death would have ſent us his laſt legacy; for he would have been at perfect liberty to have aided thoſe here, who had prepared every thing for a ſecond reſtoration. Who can mention the Catalans, and forbear lamenting their ſevere and horrible uſage? We not only neglected their ſecurities and privileges, though they had been true to all their engagements, but aſſiſted in compleating their ruin [u]. The caſe of the Catalans ſeems to afford full proof, that the queen was deceived by her miniſtry, and kept in total ignorance of affairs; for if that had not been the caſe, ſhe muſt have had no inclination to truth and probity, and have been incapable to diſtinguiſh between right and wrong, in the ſtrongeſt inſtance, which connot well be ſuppoſed [w].

The domineering manner, in which we joined with France, in dictating terms to our allies; the faithleſs and inſolent manner of abandoning them; the injurious uſage of them in debates and reſolutions of parliament, and by miniſterial writers have given impreſſion greatly detrimental to all future negotiations, and fixed indelible infamy upon our nation.

Queen Anne, as to her perſon, was middle ſized, and well made, but not ſo majeſtic as her ſiſter queen Mary. Her hair dark brown; her complexion ſanguine and ruddy; her face round, rather comely than handſome; her features ſtrong and regular; and the only blemiſh in her face was owing to the defluxion ſhe had, when young, in her eyes which left a contraction in her upper-lids, and gave a cloudineſs to her countenance. Her bones were ſmall, and hands beautiful. She had a very good ear for muſic, and performed on the guitar, an inſtrument formerly much in vogue. Her voice was remarkably clear and harmonious, which particularly appeared, in the graceful delivery of her ſpeeches to the parliament. She was reckoned a pattern of conjugal affection, and a prudent indulgent mother. She was liberal, though an enemy to luxury and profuſeneſs. She was very reſerved; and, in all conditions of life, ſhe required a ſtrict attendance from all perſons in their reſpective ſtations, ſhe herſelf being nicely obſervant of all the decorums of a court.

The exerciſe ſhe principally loved was hunting, which ſhe practiſed in her chaiſe; but the gout increaſing upon her, and growing extremely unwieldy, ſhe diſuſed that and other [u] See the caſe of the Catalans, Numb. II, at the end of this reign.

[w] How groſſly the miniſtry impoſed on the queen, appears from ſeveral tranſactions, orders and directions given by the miniſters in the queen's name directly contrary to her ſentiments as expreſſed in her meſſages and ſpeeches to the parliament, concerning the terms of peace, which ſhe communicated to both houſes. The committee of ſecrecy examined this matter and compared the queen's declarations with the meaſures her miniſters preſumed to take in carrying on the negotiations. This they did in the following manner, in their report to the houſe of commons.

The firſt time that the queen made any mention of the peace to the parliament, was on December 11, 1711, at which time nothing had been concluded between England and France, but the ſpecial preliminaries that were ſigned by the earl of Dartmouth and Mr St John on the part of England, and Monſieur Meſnager, on the part of France, September 27, 1711, and the general preliminaries ſigned by Monſieur Meſnager only, which were ſent over by the earl of Strafford as the foundation of a general peace. After theſe preliminaries were ſigned, Mr St John had preſſed Monſieur de Torcy, that the king of France would explain himſelf with regard to the allies; begs that the queen may have ſome explication of his intentions in reſpect to the particular intereſt of the allies, and concludes with ſaying, if the Sieur Gaultier returns with theſe marks of confidence, you will ſee our parliament as much inclined to peace as ever it was to war.

Such explications as the king of France thought fit to make, are contained in the anſwer to the memorial brought by Monſieur Gaultier Nov. 18, 1711. Upon which her majeſty, at the opening of that ſeſſion, in laying before the parliament the ſtate of the treaty then on foot according to the advice and repreſentation made to her by her miniſters, ſaid, 'That notwithſtanding the arts of thoſe who delight in war, both place and time are appointed for opening the treaty of a general peace. Our allies, eſpecially the ſtates general, whoſe intereſt I look upon as inſeparable from my own, have, by their ready concurrence, expreſſed their confidence in me.' The queen thought the ſtates had readily concurred with her; but it muſt be remembered, that the ſtates had in the ſtrongeſt manner repreſented againſt the propoſition ſigned by Mr Meſnager, as too general and uncertain, not being a ſufficient foundation upon which a negotiation might be hazarded, they dreaded the fatal conſequences of opening the general conferences, before the articles offered by France were made ſpecific, and before they knew what they were to truſt to for their own barrier and their commerce. Theſe repreſentations were made in Holland to the earl of Strafford; and Mr Buys was ſent over into England to enforce them there.

But, inſtead of acquainting the queen with theſe repreſentations, or acting according to her majeſty's ſentiments, Mr St John, October 9, declares, 'Certain it is, that her majeſty is ſo far determined in her meaſures, that thoſe will deceive themſelves who may imagine by delay to brake them.' And October 29, 'The queen remains firm in her firſt reſolution of cauſing the conferences to be opened upon the articles ſigned by Monſieur Meſnager.' And November the 2d, 'The queen will not finally concert a plan for the proſecution of the war with the ſtates, until they join with her in agreeing to open the conferences of peace.' And November 15, lord Strafford ſays, 'He had not told them her majeſty's order to him was to declare, that ſhe ſhould look upon any delay as a refuſal to comply with her propoſitions' By theſe threats and extraordinary meaſures, the ſtates are compelled by the queen's miniſters, to conſent to open the conferences; when at the ſame time her majeſty was perſuaded, that they readily concurred in what had been propoſed to them. Her majeſty declares, 'She looks upon the intereſt of the ſtates-general to be inſeparable from her own.' Mr St John declares, 'That Britain had gone ſo much too far in weaving her intereſt into that of the continent, that it would prove no eaſy taſk to diſentangle them without tearing and rending.'

The queen ſays further, 'The princes and ſtates which have been engaged with us in this war being by treaties entitled to have their ſeveral intereſts ſecured at a peace, I will not only do my utmoſt to procure every one of them all reaſonable ſatisfaction, but I ſhall alſo unite with them in the ſtricteſt engagements for continuing the alliance, in order to render the general peace ſecure and laſting.' And in her meſſage of the 17th of January following, her majeſty again expreſſes 'The care ſhe intended to take of all her allies, and the ſtrict union in which ſhe propoſed to join with them.'

By theſe declarations it appears, her majeſty's own reſolution was to unite with the allies in the ſtricteſt engagements. But her miniſters had taken upon them, in the private propoſitions ſent over by Mr Prior, to inſert an article, 'That the ſecret ſhould be inviolably kept between England and France, till allowed to be devulged by the conſent of both parties. 'And although France, in the firſt propoſitions ſent over by Monſieur de Torcy, had offered to treat with England and Holland, either ſeperately or jointly, with the reſt of the allies, at the choice of England, the queens miniſters excluded the allies; and in the conference held with Monſieur Meſnager, 'They are much ſurprized to find that he had orders to inſiſt that the queen ſhould enter into particular engagements, upon divers articles, which depend not upon her, and which regard the intereſt of the allies: And they inſiſted that it was abſolutely neceſſary to remit the diſcuſſion of the particular intereſts of the allies to general conferences. And when Mr St John was preſſing Monſieur de Torcy to give them ſome explications of what was deſigned for the allies, he aſſures him, 'If the king would offer a plan of ſpecific preliminaries, the queen will never communicate it to her allies.' And upon another occaſion, he declares, 'This negotiation was begun and carried on upon a ſuppoſition, that the queen muſt deſiſt from many conditions which in rigour ſhe was obliged to procure for her allies.

In the meſſage of the 17th of January the queen declares. 'Her plenipotentiaries had begun, in purſuance of their inſtructions, to confert the moſt proper ways of procuring a juſt ſatisfaction to all in alliance with her, according to their treaties, and particularly with relation to Spain and the Indies.' And her majeſty had ſaid before, in anſwer to an addreſs from the houſe of lords, preſented the 11th of December 1711. I ſhould be ſorry any one could think I would not do my utmoſt to recover Spain and the Indies from the houſe of Bourbon.'

The committee did not doubt but her majeſty was determined to recover Spain from the houſe of Bourbon: But, that her miniſters had no ſuch thoughts, and did not in the leaſt endeavour it, appears in every part of the negotiation. In the firſt propoſition ſent over by Mr Prior, demands are made of the king of France, to be performed by the king of Spain, which the king of France was to engage for. And, as appears by an entry in lord Strafford's book, Mr Prior had orders to ſee if they had full powers from Spain. In the ſpecial preliminaries, an acceptation whereof was ſigned by the earl of Dartmouth and Mr St John September the 17th, 1711, it is ſaid expreſſly, The king promiſes in the name of the king of Spain his grandſon, and according to the powers which his majeſty has received from that prince, That port Mahon and Gibralrar ſhall remain to the Engliſh. Theſe ſteps had been taken by the queen's miniſters, even before her majeſty had made theſe declarations; which the committee cannot therefore but conclude her majeſty was informed of. And although the queens plenipotentiaries were obliged by their inſtructions to aſſiſt, That Spain and the diverſions, conducive to her health, which perhaps might have been longer preſerved had ſhe not eat ſo much, an unhappineſs derived to her not from her father who was abſtemious enough, but from her mother x.'

It was her unhappineſs not to be much acquainted with our Engliſh hiſtory, and the actions of her predeceſſors; whereas, queen Mary was extremely well verſed, not only in her own but the hiſtories of other countries.

Her reign may be called bloodleſs, not one perſon having been executed, at leaſt beheaded, for treaſon, during the whole courſe of it; which cannot be ſaid of any reign ſince the time of Edward I, who died in 1307.

Semper Eadem was the motto of queen Elizabeth, which queen Anne aſſumed upon her acceſſion to the throne; and which, had ſhe purſued with the ſame reſolution and ſteadineſs, ſhe might have exceeded her in glory and fame. But in one thing ſhe was very unlike queen Elizabeth whom ſhe propoſed for her pattern. Queen Elizabeth was very ſparing of her honours, and a man muſt have deſerved it, before he could obtain ſo much as a knighthood at her hands y: Whereas queen Anne made more peers of the realm at once, than the other did in a reign of forty-four years. Indeed, her, great grand-father king James, was the firſt that was laviſh in conferring honour, whoſe example was but too much followed by his deſcendants; ſo that queen Anne was not ſingular in that reſpect, except in creating ſo many together, for an end that will remain a blemiſh upon her adminiſtration, as long as hiſtory endures.

In queen Anne ended the line of the Stuarts: Their merit and demerit may be rightly ſtated, by conſidering what their regards or diſregards were to the welfare of Europe; to the union and ſtrengthening of the proteſtant intereſt; and to the quiet and proſperity of their ſubjects. In order to make up ſuch an account duly and accurately, many important materials are ſtill wanting.

There had been a new vault made on the ſouth ſide, and towards the eaſt end of Henry VII's chapel, to depoſit the body of king Charles II. in which that prince, queen Mary king William III, and prince George of Denmark, were laid. Here the remains of queen Anne were likewiſe depoſited, and there being no more room left, the vault is cloſed up with brickwork.

Weſt-Indies ſhould be allotted to any branch of the houſe of Bourbon; when the plenipotentiaries of France, on the 11th of February 1711-12, gave in their ſpecific explanations of the general preliminaries, ſigned by Mr. Meſnager; the king of France made his firſt offers in the name, and by virtue of powers from his grandſon king Philip, as king of Spain. On the 4th of March 1711-12, at a meeting of the miniſters of the allies at Utrecht, where they were to communicate to each other their reſpective demands, count Zinzendorf inſiſted, That the reſtitution of the whole Spaniſh monarchy ſhould be expreſly mentioned; upon which occaſion it appears, by a letter from the Engliſh miniſters of the 6th of March, That they were the only miniſters that did not make any mention at all of Spain, and that they were ſenſible of the diſadvantageous conſequences of being ſo; but being deſirous to take off this odium, they make a general declaration concerning the juſt and reaſonable ſatisfaction for the queen's allies, in conformity to their alliances; and humbly hope what was ſaid will not be found contrary to what has been hitherto declared.

All the attempts that the queen's miniſters ever made towards obtaining this great point, which her majeſty declares, ſhe ſhould be ſorry any one could think ſhe did not do her utmoſt to procure, was to demand aſſurance that the crowns of France and Spain ſhould never be united. The method of preventing this union was never mentioned by the queen's miniſters in order to be treated of, nor the ſenſe of France and Spain ever aſked upon it, till the latter end of March 1712.

In the ſame meſſage her majeſty further adds, 'The world will now ſee how groundleſs thoſe reports are which have been ſpread by men of evil intentions, to ſerve the worſt deſigns, as if a ſeparate peace had been treated for which there has not been the leaſt colour given.'

In this declaration, her majeſty is adviſed by her miniſters, in order to clear them from the juſt ſuſpicions which all the world had conceived of the ſeparate meaſures they were engaged in, not only to declare there had not been the leaſt colour given for ſuch jealouſies, but to brand all that entertain ſuch apprehenſions, with the character of men of evil intentions, that had the worſt deſigns to ſerve. But that moſt juſt cauſe had been given for theſe reports, is ſufficiently evident from what was juſt now obſerved. The miniſtry had inſiſted that the ſecret ſhould be inviolably kept between England and France, excluſive of all the allies. A ſeparate negotiation between England and France had been carried on by papers ſent backward and forward, and much time ſpent therein, as is ſaid in lord Strafford's inſtructions. Mr Prior had been ſent into France, and Mr Meſnager had been in England, and not the leaſt communication was given for five months together to any of the allies of theſe tranſactions, which were depending from April 1711, to September following, from the time that the firſt propoſals ſigned by Monſieur de Torcy were ſent to the ſtates, till the ſeven general preliminaries ſigned by Mr Meſnager, were communicated to them. When theſe general preliminaries were ſigned, which were ſent over as a foundation to open the general conferences, a ſet of ſpecial preliminaries between England and France was ſigned on both parts, which were concealed, publicly diſowned, and never appeared till this enquiry; and all theſe tranſactions had paſſed, however diſguiſed to her majeſty, before the time that her miniſters adviſed the queen to impoſe ſo groſſly upon the nation, as to declare in parliament that there had not been the leaſt colour given for theſe ſurmiſes.

Her majeſty is adviſed here to declare, That to report that a ſeparate peace had been treated, proceeded from evil intentions, and to ſerve the worſt deſigns But the committee obſerves, That after this declaration of the queen, her miniſters propoſed to France, agreed with France, and ſent poſitive and repeated orders to the queen's plenipotentiaries, not only to treat, but to conclude a ſeparate peace with France. On the 20th of June 1712. Mr St John acquaints Monſieur de Torcy, the queen will make no difficulty to conclude immediately a ſeparate peace with France, leaving the allies a time wherein they may have liberty to ſubmit to ſuch conditions, as ſhall be agreed upon between the queen and the moſt chriſtian king. In anſwer to this, Monſieur de Torcy tells Mr St John upon condition the queen does immediately make a ſeparate peace, and keep no meaſures with her allies, the king has determined to ſend his orders to permit the Engliſh troops to enter into Dunkirk. On the 12th of July, 1712. Mr St John thinks the queen in a condition not to loſe a moment's time in concluding with the miniſters of France the convention for a general ſuſpenſion of arms both by ſea and land, and even the treaty of peace between Britain and France. And on the 4th of Auguſt, 1712. Monſieur de Torcy acquaints Mr St John, That the king conſented to the duke of Savoy's having Sicily upon certain conditions; wherein one expreſs condition is, That a peace be concluded between England and France, Spain, and Savoy. And at laſt, when the treaty drew near to a concluſion, and almoſt all the allies were ready to ſign, on the 20th of February, 1712-13. poſitive orders are ſent to the Britiſh plenipotentiaries to conclude and ſign with France; and on the 28th, lord Bolingbroke repeats his orders to the Britiſh plenipotentiaries to conclude and ſign with France: And acquaints them, 'The duke of Shrewſbury had declared, that their lordſhips had orders, in caſe the French complied, as they now have actually done, to ſign her majeſty's peace with France without further delay; and that his grace had alſo declared, That in this caſe, her majeſty would open the parliament by telling them that ſhe had made a peace with France: Theſe two conſiderations, his lordſhip ſays, were perhaps the moſt prevalent inducement to the French court to come roundly into her majeſty's propoſitions.'

The committee cloſe this head with repeating a paſſage from one of lord Bolingbroke's letters to Mr Prior, wherein he ſays, 'If ſuch overtures as theſe were not inſtantly accepted, our ſeparate peace would, ſitting this parliament, be addreſſed for, made, approved, and the cauſe of France for once become popular in Great-Britain.'

On the 6th of June 1712, the queen ſays, 'I am now come to let you know upon what terms a general peace may be made.'

On the ſame day, lord Bolingbroke acquaints Monſieur de Torcy, 'That though the king of France had not anſwered the queen's demands, according to expectation, the queen would not defer going that day to parliament, and making all the declarations that were neceſſary to render the nation unanimouſly inclined to the peace.'

The queen ſays, 'The difficulties had been increaſed by other obſtructions artfully contrived to hinder this great and good work.' Whereas it is notorious, that the miniſters had received but the day before, the account that king Philip had conſented to make the renunciation, upon which account only the queen's ſpeaking to the parliament had been deferred.

The queen ſays, 'I have not omitted any thing which might procure to all our allies what is due to them by treaties, and what is neceſſary for their ſecurity.'

Lord Bolingbroke, on the very ſame day, in his letter to Monſieur de Torcy, ſays, 'lord Strafford is going back to Utrecht, and the inſtructions he is to carry will put the queen's plenipotentiaries in a condition to keep no longer thoſe meaſures to which they have hitherto been obliged to ſubmit; but from henceforth they may openly join with thoſe of France, and give law to them, who will not ſubmit to juſt and reaſonable conditions.'

The queen ſays, 'Nothing has moved me from ſteadily purſuing, in the firſt place, the true intereſt of my own kingdoms.'

Lord Bolingbroke juſt before, on the 24th of May, had propoſed to Monſieur de Torcy, 'That the queen being much more intent upon the general peace, than any particular advantages, commiſſaries ſhould be appointed to ſettle, after the peace, ſuch points relating to trade, as required a longer diſcuſſion than the preſent criſis would admit.'

The queen ſays, 'That to prevent the union of the two crowns, ſhe would not be contented with what was ſpeculative, but inſiſted upon ſomething ſolid:' Although Monſieur de Torcy had before declared to the queen's miniſters, 'That to accept of this expident which they propoſed, would be to build upon a ſandy foundation.'

The queen ſays, 'The nature of the propoſals for a renunciation is ſuch that it executes itſelf; and that France and Spain are thereby more effectually divided than ever.' But Monſieur de Torcy had before aſſured the queen's miniſters, 'That this renunciation would be null and void by the fundamental laws of France; and they would deceive themſelves, who accepted of it as an expedient to prevent the union of the two crowns.'

The queen ſays, 'Proviſion is made, that the ſame privileges and advantages as ſhall be granted to any other nation by France, ſhall be granted in like manner to us.' But it appears, by a letter of lord Bolingbroke's in January following, to the duke of Shrewſbury, 'That France refuſed to let our trade ſtand upon the foot of Gens amiciſſima; declared the tariff of 1664, which was granted to the Dutch, except the four ſpecies, was too beneficial for us; and refuſed to grant it, untill another tariff ſhould be made in Great-Britain exactly conformable to that of 1664, whereby our duties would be reduced as theirs are in France by that tariff.'

As to our commerce with France, the queen ſays here, June 6, 1712, 'It was in a method of being ſettled.' And Mr Prior ſays of it in May following, near a twelvemonth after, 'We had like to have made an Athanaſian buſineſs of it at Utrecht, by that explanation of our own way of underſtanding our own commerce. Their letters to you, full of ſurmiſes and doubts, that all was unhinged; and their letters to us again, that explanations, however made, were only to ſave appearances, and ſignify nothing: This Melange, I ſay, and my endeavouring to underſtand it, had like to make me run mad, if the duke of Shrewſbury's extreme good ſenſe, and Monſ. de Torcy's not only honeſt, but right underſtanding, had not redreſſed us.'

The queen ſays, 'The French conſented to deliver up Newfoundland and Placentia.' But it muſt be remembered, that in the preliminaries ſigned in September preceding, the French had reſerved to themſelves a liberty of taking and drying fiſh in Newfoundland.

The queen ſays, 'An abſolute ceſſion was to be made of Nova Scotia, or Acadia.' But cape Breton, which was always underſtood to be, and is ſo declared by the queen's inſtructions to the duke of Shrewſbury, to be part of Nova Scotia, is expreſly given up to France.

The queen ſays, 'The trade to Spain and the Weſt-Indies may in general be ſettled, as it was in the time of the late king of Spain, Charles the ſecond.' But when the project of the treaty of commerce came from Madrid, lord Bolingbroke ſays of it, 'They had ſent a blind, lame, miſſhapen, indigeſted monſter, inſtead of that fair offspring, which we had reaſon to expect from our candour.'

If all the other parts of this ſpeech be ſtrictly examined, it will be found that the miniſtry did ſo groſſly deceive the queen, in order to impoſe upon the parliament by her authority, that there is ſcarce a paragraph that does not contain ſome unfair, or at leaſt equivocal repreſentation of the ſtate of the negotiations. And when the queen was adviſed by her miniſters to make this communication to parliament, as the terms upon which a general peace might be made, it is very evident, they had no aſſurances that France would make good what they prevailed upon the queen to declare in ſo ſolemn and public a manner.

[x] This ſeems to confute the ſcandalous report of the queen's drinking ſpirituous liquors, which was told with ſo much aſſurance, that many who loved and eſteemed her gave in to it, whereas one of her hiſtorians affirms it for a truth, that ſhe abhorred all ſtrong waters. The French continuator of Rapin gives credit to the common report, and ſays, ſhe accuſtomed herſelf to it out of compliſance to the prince her huſband.

[y] It is well known how angry queen Elizabeth was with the earl of Eſſex, for making ſo many knights at the taking of Cadiz.

The End of the Reign of Queen ANNE.

London: Engravd for Harrison's Edition of Rapin.

G. Kneller Pinx.t — Goldar Sculp.

The R.t Hon.ble the Countess of Ranelagh

Publ.d as the Act directs. Oct.r 1706.

BRITISH
13 JY60
MUSEUM

EXTRACTS and PAPERS relating to the History of queen ANNE.

I. The proceedings about the Pretender, as reported by the committee of ſecrecy, June 1715.

THE committee begin with obſerving, that abbot Gaultier, though he did not appear to have any public character, reſided in England during the greateſt part of the negotiation for peace; and, upon extraordinary occaſions, was often ſent backward and forward. But the ſhare, he had in the more public tranſactions, was not his only buſineſs. It was evident, ſome negotiations, which required more than ordinary privacy, were verbally tranſacted; and, upon all ſuch occaſions, abbot Gaultier was the perſon, to whom the French and Engliſh miniſters mutually refered each other. And as of neceſſity nothing could be a greater ſecret, than all matters relating to the pretender, this province was particularly allotted to abbot Gaultier, that through his hands, and under his conveyance, by French couriers, going continually betwixt France and England, ſuch practices might be carried on with great ſafety, which, in any other manner, had been too dangerous an undertaking.

The firſt time, that any ſecret negotiation is expreſly referred to abbot Gaultier, is found in a letter of Mr ſecretary St John, of March 4, 1711-12, wherein he tells Monſieur de Torcy, 'he had deferred writing to him of late, till he might write with certainty, till the neceſſary diſpoſitions were made among our people at home, and till the queen had taken the only reſolution, which could bring us, in a ſhort time, to a good and ſolid peace. I have now the ſatisfaction to tell you, that this reſolution is taken; and that Mr Harley will carry with him this night, or to-morrow morning, the final inſtructions of the queen to her plenipotentiaries. I refer myſelf to Mr Gaultier, to explain to you more at large the ſubject of this gentleman's commiſſion, and what the queen hopes his moſt chriſtian majeſty will do to co-operate with her.'

The committee of ſecrecy obſerved that ſeveral letters and papers were wanting, which, by the circumſtances of time and matters then depending, appeared to be of moment and conſequence; it was not to be expected, that thoſe, who had been ſo careful to ſuppreſs matters of leſs importance, would leave behind them any tranſactions, that might tend openly and directly to favour and ſupport the cauſe of the pretender. But there were ſtill left ſeveral paſſages, which are a plain indication of the tenderneſs and regard, with which the cauſe and perſon of the pretender were treated, as often as mentioned, and which the committee thought fit to bring together in one view, as follows:

There is a paper, that was left in lord Bolingbroke's cloſet, dated at Verſailles the 24th of September 1711, indorſed, as other office-papers uſually are. It gives an account, that the Pope's Nuncio had, in his laſt audience of the king of France, made the following declaration: 'That the court of Rome being fully informed, that France was endeavouring to procure a peace upon the moſt advantageous terms, that was poſſible; and being perſuaded, that if the peace ſhould be made, England would not ſuffer, that the king of France ſhould permit the prince of Wales to continue in his realms; the court of Rome offers to the king of France, to give this prince an aſylum at Rome, or in any other part of the eccleſiaſtic dominions.' To which the king of France returned in anſwer, 'That an aſylum for the prince of Wales would be no obſtacle to the peace: That if, the Allies did truly deſire to make a peace, he would except of any reaſonable propoſitions they ſhould make; and in this caſe an article for the prince of Wales would be inſerted in the treaty.'

June 7, 1712, the biſhop of Briſtol, giving an account to lord Bolingbroke of ſome diſcourſe he had with ſome of the miniſters of the Allies, ſays, 'Monſieur Conſbruck, one of the emperor's Plenipotentiaries, kept alſo within the terms of decency, ſave only, that he took it for granted, that one great end of all this management on our part was to bring in the pretender; which apprehenſion one of the miniſters of the ſtates lately owned in private diſcourſe, to have been the fundamental reaſon of all their conduct of late.'

It is well known, what great ſtreſs and weight was laid upon the removal of the pretender out of the dominions of France. This was what all the nation, with great juſtice, expected, and what the queen declared was taken care of, as an additional ſecurity to the proteſtant Succeſſion. But his removing out of France, and being permitted to reſide in Lorrain, was not only a great ſurprize to all the nation, but was received with ſuch juſt indignation, That the parliament addreſſed the queen upon this occaſion, 'That ſhe would inſiſt upon his removal from Lorrain; that reſidence being equally or more dangerous to Great-Britain, than his abode in France.' Her Majeſty's anſwer, that ſhe would repeat her inſtances, occaſioned in the houſe of lords a becoming reſentment, that the duke of Lorrain ſhould preſume to receive and entertain the pretender to her majeſty's crown, in defiance to her majeſty's application to the contrary. But it now appears in what manner the removal of the pretender out of France was tranſacted and ſettled; and that his reſiding in Lorrain was not only with the approbation, but even by the direction and appointment of the Engliſh miniſtry. Mr St John, in his letter to Monſieur de Torcy, of the 24th of May, 1712, O. S. when he ſent over the conditions, upon which her majeſty would make thoſe important and deciſive declarations to parliament, concludes that letter with ſaying, 'He hopes, that, with the general repoſe, we ſhall ſee revived, in a few weeks, a good underſtanding between two nations, which may become, to each other, the moſt uſeful friends, for the ſame reaſons they have been the moſt formidable enemies. The queen commands me to tell you, that ſhe hopes, when you ſend an anſwer to this letter, we ſhall have an account, that the chevalier has begun his journey.' In anſwer to this, Monſieur de Torcy ſays to lord Bolingbroke, on the 10th of June, 'You may aſſure the queen, that the chevalier is ready to depart at a moment's warning, if he did but know where he was to go, and in what place he might be in ſafety. I own to you, that I know no prince, who is willing to receive him, for fear of diſpleaſing the queen or other powers. It will be abſolutely neceſſary, that there ſhould be ſome explanation upon this ſubject, which I deſire you to make to me by the abbot Gaultier, if you do not judge it proper to do it yourſelf.'

Mr ſecretary St John, on the 6th of June 1712, O. S. writes a public letter, in anſwer to the ſeveral points contained in Monſieur de Torcy's laſt letter; but, in that letter, takes no notice at all of the chevalier. But the day after, June the 7th, 1712, he writes a private letter, as he calls it himſelf, to Monſieur de Torcy, and concludes it with ſaying, 'The abbot Gaultier will write to you upon the ſubject of the chevalier.' There were two copies of this private letter, one delivered by lord Bolingbroke, the other entered in lord Strafford's book: And, in the copy of this letter given by lord Bolingbroke, this paſſage, 'That abbot Gaultier ſhall write about the chevalier, is omitted by his lordſhip.

On the 22d of June 1712, N. S. Monſieur de Torcy writes two letters to lord Bolingbroke. In the public letter nothing is ſaid of the pretender: The private letter concludes with ſaying, 'I have the honour to ſend you a letter under the king's hand for her Britannic majeſty; and I refer you to what the abbot Gaultier ſhall ſay to you about the departure of the chevalier.

On the 21ſt of Auguſt 1712, lord Bolingbroke being then in France, to give the finiſhing ſtroke to all matters of conſequence, that were undetermined, in his diſpatch to the earl of Dartmouth, giving an account of his proceedings at the court of France, ſays, 'The chevalier has fixed his departure for the firſt of next month, N. S. They propoſe, that he ſhall retire to Bar, and they intend to write to the duke of Lorrain, to aſk of the emperor, and other princes, a ſecurity for his perſon during his reſidence in that place.'

But on the 28 of December 1712, N. S. it appears, that the chavalier was ſtill in France; upon which account Mr Prior writes thus to lord Bolingbroke: 'Another point, upon which this court is very ſollicitous, is, that the chevalier remaining in any town of France obſtructs the ſigning the peace; yet he cannot go to Lorrain, till the emperor's paſſports will ſecure him there. Your lordſhip, by the peruſal of the papers, will ſee the ſtate of that caſe, and I have only to add upon this ſubject, that the court of France expreſſes an impoſſibility on their ſide to do more than they have done; and hopes we ſhould have intereſt enough with the emperor, to obtain ſuch paſſports from him, as may ſecure, as well the perſon, who is to go into Lorrain, as the duke of Lorrain, who is to receive him.'

Mr Prior, on the 29th, writes to the ſame effect to the lord-treaſurer, and, ſays, 'The monarch is a good deal troubled upon this head, leſt the young man ſhould fall into the hands of Huſſars or Barbarians. And Monſieur d'Aumont has, I preſume, orders to ſpeak to our miniſtry upon it. As to the dowry, I ſhall not only be dunned to death, but hanged; for the dowager ſends meſſages to me, which you in England do not think it extreamely lawful to receive. But, if it is to be paid, pray let it be done in an handſome manner, that may ſhew the charity of the queen, and the generoſity of her lord-treaſurer.'

The papers, referred to in Mr Prior's letter, contain an account of what the duke of Lorrain had done at the deſire of the king of France, to obtain from the Allies the neceſſary ſafeguard for the Chevalier. He ſays, that underſtanding, that the queen of great-Britain had already granted her ſafeguard or protection to the chevalier de St George, he believed they had no more to do, but to apply to the emperor, and to the ſtates-general.

By this account it is evident, that Abbot Gaultier was the perſon intruſted to manage the affairs of the pretender, with whom ſuch practices were verbally to be tranſacted, as the Britiſh miniſters did not think proper to commit to writing. It appears, that the place, to which he was to go, becauſe nobody would receive him at the hazard of the queen's diſpleaſure, and where he might remain in ſafty, was to be preſcribed from England: That this was not fixed and determined till lord Bolingbroke went into France: And, if his lordſhip's inſtructions are conſidered, it will be hard to find in them any thing of that importance and ſecrecy, as to require his going in perſon to ſettle it. His lordſhip gives an account from thence, that the pretender was to go to bar; and this is acquieſced in here, without the leaſt objection made. The miniſtry are told by Mr Prior, that the court of France hopes, by our intereſt, ſuch paſſports would be procured, as might ſecure his perſon. And, in the paper ſent to France from the duke of Lorrain, it is aſſerted, that the queen of great Britain had already granted her protection to the pretender.

But, November 6, 1713, lord Bolingbroke writes to Mr Prior, and ſays, 'Her majeſty having repeated to the duke of Lorrain the inſtances, which, you know, have been ſo often made to the moſt chriſtian king, for removing of the pretender to her crown out of his dominions, I am directed to acquaint you there-with, that you may ſpeak to the miniſter of Lorrain, and to any other miniſter, whom you ſhall think proper; and let them know it is abſolutely inconſiſtent with the amity and good correſpondence, that is between the queen and their maſters, to receive into their dominions, or to protect a perſon, who diſputes her majeſty's moſt undoubted title, and thereby endeavours to diſturb the peace and quiet of her kingdoms. That you may be able to ſhew them, that this is the collective ſenſe of the whole nation, as well as the queen's command to you, I herewith ſend you the addreſſes of both houſes of parliament.' This can be underſtood as no more than a bare compliance with the addreſſes of parliament. And how little reſentment and indignation was conceived againſt the duke of Lorrain, for this indignity offered to her majeſty, appears from a letter written by lord Bolingbroke to Mr Prior, November 10, within four days after his laſt-mentioned letter upon the ſubject of the pretender, 'This letter, ſays he, will be delivered to you by baron de Forſtner, who has been twice at our court, with the character of envoy from the duke of Lorrain, and who is extremely well with your friends on this ſide of the water, that I make no doubt, but that he will be a welcome acquaintance to you. I muſt, at the ſame time, recommend the intereſt of the duke of Lorrain his maſter to your care. You know, ſir, how little that prince has yet felt the good effects of what was ſtipulated for him at Ryſwick. You know, ſir, how juſtly he prtends to an equivalent from this emperor for the Montſerrat. In a word, you are enough apprized of his wants, of his expectatoins, and of her majeſty's earneſt deſire, if by any means ſhe can, to contribute to the eaſe and to the advantage of a prince, who deſerves much better uſage than he has on many occaſions met with.

There were ſeveral other letters, that were wrote after the addreſs of parliament, to preſs the removal of the pretender from Lorrain: But, after what has been ſaid, it is needleſs to obſerve, what little effect was to be expected from ſuch repreſentations made in the ſeveral courts of Europe, which were known to be contrary to the ſenſe and intention of the court of great-Britain. And, if any further demonſtration was wanting to ſhew their true ſpirit and inclination, it may be obſerved, that the addreſſes in parliament were made in July 1713, and the firſt letter, that lord Bolingbroke wrote in purſuance of thoſe addreſſes, was the 6th of November, which was four months after the addreſſes were preſented to the queen.

It will not be improper to inſert here an extract of a memorial, touching the demolition of the ſluices of Dunkirk, delivered by Monſieur de Torcy to lord Bolingbroke, at Paris, in Auguſt 1712. 'It is not our buſineſs now to examine, whether the queen of England, and the Engliſh nation, were in the right to demand the demolition of the fortifications, and the filling up the harbour of Dunkirk. That is a thing reſolved and agreed upon. It may perhaps come to paſs, in the courſe of this affair, for reaſons eaſily to be foreſeen, that England ſhall repent having demanded the demolition of a place, and the deſtruction of an harbour, which might be of great uſe in conjunctures, which perhaps are not very remote. 'The committee of ſecrecy did not take upon them to explain, what conjunctures France had in view, and which they thought not very remote, when Dunkirk might be of particular ſervice; but they thought proper to conclude that part of their report with obſerving, That the pretender did, immediately upon the demiſe of queen Anne, publiſh a declaration, which the duke of Lorrain acknowledged in his letter of the 6th of December 1714, that he received from the pretender himſelf, wherein is this remarkable paſſage: 'Yet contrary to our expectations, upon the death of the princeſs our ſiſter (of whoſe good intention towards us we could not for ſome time paſt well doubt; and this was the reaſon we ſat ſtill, expecting the good effects thereof, which were unfortunately prevented by her deplorable death) we found, that our people, inſtead of taking this opportunity of retrieving the honour and true intereſt of their country, by doing us and themſelves juſtice, had immediately proclaimed for their king a foreign prince, to our prejudice, contrary to the fundamental and inconteſtable laws of hereditary right, which their pretended acts of ſettlement can never abrogate.' Thus ſtood the pretender's affairs at the death of queen Anne.

II. The caſe of the Catalans, as repreſented in the report of the committee of ſecrecy June 1715.

AFTER ſeveral unſucceſsful attempts by way of Portugal, and the deſign upon Candiz, to ſettle king Charles on the throne of ſpain; and that the confederate fleet had appeared before Barcelona in 1704, without the deſired ſucceſs; her majeſty, in the beginning of the year 1705, ſent Mr Crowe as her miniſter to Genoa, with private inſtructions, to the following effect: 'That her majeſty being informed, that the people of Catalonia were inclined to caſt off the yoke impoſed upon them by the French; and by withdrawing themſelves from the power of the duke of Anjou, to return to the obedience of the houſe of Auſtria, was deſirous to maintain and improve that good diſpoſition in them; and, to induce them to put the ſame ſpeedily in execution, had made choice of him to carry on ſo great a work, for the advantage of her ſervice, and the good of the common cauſe. He is therefore ordered to repair to Genoa, Leghorn, or other ſuch neutral country or place, as he ſhould judge moſt proper for carrying on her majeſty's ſervice in this particular; and to treat with the Catalans, or any other people of Spain, about their coming into the intereſt of Charles the Third of Spain, and joining with her majeſty and her allies. For that purpoſe he is to inform himſelf, what number of forces they will raiſe, and what they expect ſhall be ſent to aſſiſt them. If any of the nobility inſiſt upon a ſome of money to be advanced to them, he muſt aſſure them, he does not doubt but he ſhall be impowered to remit to them whatſoever is neceſſary and reaſonable for their ſupport, as ſoon as they are actually in the field. That he ſhall give the Catalans, or other Spaniards, aſſurances of her majeſty's utmoſt endeavours to procure the eſtabliſhmeut of all ſuch rights and immunities, as they have formerly enjoyed under the houſe of Auſtria. That ſhe has, for their ſatisfaction, ſent to king Charles the third for powers for confirming the ſame to them; and that ſhe is willing, if they inſiſt on it, to give her guaranty, that it ſhall be done.'

Mr Crowe had alſo a commiſſion of the ſame date with his inſtructions, to treat with the catalans upon the terms before mentioned, upon this expreſs condition on their ſide, that they ſhould acknowledge and receive king Charles as lawful king of Spain, and utterly renounce the houſe of Bourbon.

He had, with this, credential letters signed by the queen, directed to the nobility, magistrates, and all officers, civil and military, of Catalonia, desiring them to depend upon the promises he should make them in her name.

The earl of Peterborough and sir Cloudesly Shovel, by their instructions, dated May 1, 1705, are likewise ordered to use their endeavours to induce the Catalans to join with them in their undertakings; and, to animate that people, to prosecute their liberty with more vigour, they are impowered to assure them of the queen's support, and to promise them, in the queen's name, that she will secure them a confirmation of their rights and privileges from the king of Spain, that they may be settled on a lasting foundation to them and their posterities. But, lest persuasions alone should not prevail, they are ordered, in case the Catalans make no suitable return to these kind offers, to annoy the towns on the coast of Spain, and to reduce them by force.

In conformity to these instructions, a declaration was drawn here, and delivered by Mr secretary Harley to the earl of Peterborough, for him to publish in Spain, full of assurances, in the queen's name, of support, and of their liberties on the one hand, and threats on the other; which declaration he, on his arrival in Spain, did accordingly publish.

The success of that expedition is well known. King Charles, in his letter to the queen, of October 22, 1705, gives an account of it, and what it was owing to, namely, 'The assurances of your majesty's generous protection, upon which my subjects of Catalonia expose their lives and fortunes.'

No want of fidelity or zeal for the common cause during a long war, which abounded with extraordinary turns of fortune, was ever objected to these people. On the contrary, they received to the last the applauses of the Allies, and assurances repeated to them by every general and minister, who was sent from Great-Britain to that country, that they should never be abandoned.

When the queen entered into separate measures of peace, lord Lexington was sent ambassador to Spain; at which time, considering the circumstances of king Philip's affairs, and the obligations he had then received from the queen, the Catalan privileges, if plainly demanded and insisted upon, could not have been refused; and without it, could never be expected to be granted to a people so remarkably zealous for the common cause.

But his instructions, instead of directing him to insist upon this, as a condition of the queen's coming into the peace, order him only to represent to the court of Spain, that it is no less for the king's interest, than for the queen's honour, that a general amnesty, without exception, be granted to all Spaniards, who have adhered to the house of Austria, and, in a particular manner, to the Catalans, with regard to their persons, estates, dignities, and privileges.

These instructions, though very defective, were not complied with; for lord Lexington, in the 11th article of his paper, which is called demands, delivered to the court of Spain, upon his arrival there he expresses himself thus: 'That the queen prays his catholic majesty, that a general amnesty, without exception, be granted;' but leaves out the words in his instructions, with regard to their persons, estates, dignities, and privileges.

The kings' answer was, 'That the general amnesty, relating entirely to the general peace, was not proper for the present treaty; and therefore he leaves it to be then treated of: That his majesty will make use of his great clemency, provided the queen will contribute to the safety, to the repose, and to the interests of so many faithful subjects, who, according to their duty, had followed his righteous cause in Flanders, and in all the parts of Italy; and that an express article be inserted in the peace, wherein it shall be declared That all subjects, who have done their duty, by adhering to his catholic majesty, shall be established in their estates and honours, of what nature so ever they be, which they enjoyed, when they were under his obedience; and that they may mortgage, exchange, or sell, at their pleasure; and that they shall have full liberty to continue in the service of their king; and that neither, upon this pretext, or any other whatsoever, they shall receive the least prejudice, or the least harm in their estates and honours, or any molestation whatever; and that any municipal law to the contrary (if there be any such) shall be made void by the treaty of peace.'

Lord Lexington transmits this answer to England, which, though containing a direct refusal at present of what was desired, and only general assurances of clemency from the king, on conditions, that could not possibly be expected to be complied with; yet his lordship, in his letter to lord Dartmouth, writes word, That the 11th article (which is this about the Catalans) was agreed to; and thinks, what they desire is but justice; and then goes on, 'Thus, my lord, I have finished my negotiation in the best manner, I could, and hope it will be to her majesty's satisfaction.'

No dissatisfaction was shewn by the ministry in England, either with this manner of negotiating, or the fruitlessness of it; but the lord Lexington is ordered to proceed in the business, both as it was an act of humanity, which every one, to the utmost of their power, ought to promote; and that the interest of the king of Spain was most nearly concerned by that means, to get the Germans out of the country.

Hereupon another memorial for an amnesty is presented: The motive used to induce the king to grant it, is his own interest, and to remove the Germans, without any notice taken of the queen's honour being concerned in the affair.

The king answered, 'That the Catalans had deserved little from him: That they were now reduced to a small extent of ground, by the withdrawing of the troops of Britain and Portugal: That his troops, and those of the king, his grandfather, were entering into their country by three several ways: Therefore, more in complaisance to the queen, than for the arguments, that had been offered, he was willing to grant his pardon to those Catalans, who acknowledged his clemency, and repenting them of their error, should submit to his dominion and vassalage within a time to be prefixed.'

Count Zinzendorf, in the project for evacuating Catalonia, insisted upon the preserving the people their privileges. But the king of Spain refused it, and would only grant them an amnesty and pardon.

Lord Dartmouth, in his letters both to the marquis de Monteleone and lord Lexington, says, 'He cannot express the queen's surprize to hear, that the privileges of the Catalans were not intended to be preserved to them by the court of Spain: That these privileges were necessarily included in the meaning of a general amnesty already granted. And this was an affair, wherein the queen's honor was extremely concerned, and that she was obliged by motives of conscience not to depart from it.' lord Lexington is hereupon ordered to insist again upon it in the strongest manner imaginable; that when the king of Spain is convinced of her majesty's steadiness, and the firmness of her resolution to adhere to this demand, no doubt he will yield to what has been so solemnly promised, and is in itself so reasonable. That the marquis de Monteleone, being restrained by his instructions from treating upon this point, the negotiating of it must entirely lie upon lord Lexington.

Accordingly, his lordship presents another memorial for a general amnesty, with the confirmation of all their privileges. The amnesty, he says, was granted; but the privileges entirely refused, and in such a positive stile, as he never met with, but in demanding a track of ground about Gibraltar.

In another letter to lord Dartmouth, speaking of the many denials he met with in Spain, he says, 'Things are not here upon the same foot, as they were before the suspension; for the king told me these words, We know, that the peace is as necessary for you as for us, and that you will not break it off for a trifle.'

It may seem, at first sight, unaccountable how the queen's endeavours could fail of success, when she declared her conscience was concerned in this matter; and that though she desired a peace, she would not act inconsistently with honour and justice to obtain it.

The first fatal step to the ruin of the Catalans was the orders sent lord Lexington (contrary to his first instructions) upon his arrival at Madrid, to acknowledge Philip as king of Spain, in a private audience, before any one article of peace or commerce was settled, which put him in a condition of refusing this, and whatever else he should think fit.

The manner how Spain gained this important point, appears to be as follows: lord Dartmouth had acquainted Mr Prior, that lord Lexington was not to acknowledge Philip king of Spain, till he had agreed to the demands his lordship was to make in the queen's name. However, lord Dartmouth thinks it convenient, that the sentiments of the French court should be known upon this matter as soon as possible.

This method of proceeding with Spain was very much disliked in France; and Mr Prior writes lord Dartmouth a very elaborate letter, full of Monsieur de Tocy's reasons, to induce the English ministry to recede from that point, and concludes with this remarkable one, 'That the whole treaty being eventual, this acknowledgement of Philip as king of Spain, would fall, as the other points, unless the conditions were made good, and the peace agreed and ratified.'

Hereupon the lord Bolingbroke determines this matter in favour of Spain, by imputing the former directions to lord Dartmouth's mistaking the queen's meaning, and writes Mr

Prior word, that he was equally ſurprized and vexed to find, by the uncouth way of explaining the queen's ſenſe, that Mr Prior had been led to imagine, it was intended lord Lexington ſhould make any difficulty of acknowledging the king of Spain as ſuch. 'The proceeding this way, by acknowledging the king in the firſt place, ſays his lordſhip, ſeems natural, civil, and unexceptionable; but any other ſcheme is abſurd and inconſiſtent with all the reſt of our proceedings:' And he then concludes, 'For God's ſake, dear Matt, hide the nakedneſs of thy country, and give the beſt turn thy fertile brain will furniſh thee with, to the blunders of thy countrymen, who are not much better Politicians, than the French are poets.'

Lord Dartmouth, it ſeems, thought fit to acquieſce, and, the ſame day that this letter was writ, diſpatched orders to lord Lexington, to acknowledge king Philip in the firſt place, notwithſtanding his former inſtructions to the contrary.

But to return to the Catalans: The miniſters did not ſhew that zeal for the queen's honour, as might be expected, but plainly gave up this matter. Lord Bolingbroke, in his letter to the queen's plenipotentiaries at Utrecht, tells them, 'It is not for the intereſt of England to preſerve the Catalans liberties; and likewiſe begs leave to make an obſervation to them, that the Catalan privileges are the power of the purſe and ſword; but that the Caſtilian privileges, which the king of Spain will give them (in exchange for the Catalan) are the liberty of trading and reſorting to the Weſt-Indies and a capacity of holding thoſe beneficial employments the king has to beſtow in America, which, ſays his lordſhip, are of infinitely greater value to thoſe, who intend to live in a due ſubjection to authority.'

Lord Lexington alſo, inſtead of ſupporting the catalan privileges, treated the people as rebels; and to induce Spain to make peace with Portugal, puts Monſieur Orry in mind of the neceſſity Spain is in of withdrawing their troops from Andaluſia, in order to end the rebellion of the Catalans.

When the convention was forced upon the emperor for evacuating Catalonia, the Imperial Miniſters at Utrecht inſiſted upon the preſerving, by that treaty, the privileges of Catalonia, Majorca, and Yvica. But France and her confederates inſiſting, that this matter ſhould be referred to the peace, the imperial miniſters at laſt acquieſced, upon the queen of Great-Britain's declaring again, 'That ſhe would interpoſe her good offices in the moſt effectual manner, to obtain the privileges of Catalonia, Majorca, and Yvica:' And the French king engaged, at the ſame time, to join his endeavours for that purpoſe. Hereupon, the negotiation in Spain was kept up, till our treaty of peace with that crown was ripe, by which the Catalan liberties were to be abandoned. This lord Lexington ſigned, contenting himſelf with proteſting againſt that article at the ſame time he ſigned it, as he had writ word before he intended to do; and therefore the queen was entirely at liberty to reject it. Notwithſtanding the king of Spain's former refuſal, lord Lexington is again directed to inſiſt upon the Catalan privileges, and is again told, That the queen thought herſelf obliged by the ſtrongeſt ties, thoſe of honour and conſcience, to inſiſt upon it for a people, whom the neceſſity of the war had obliged her to draw into her intereſt. His lordſhip had ſigned the treaty with Spain before theſe orders to preſent another memorial arrived. He thereupon acquaints the marquis de Bedmar, that he was ſorry he was obliged to do any thing, which he knew was againſt the king's ſentiments, but having received expreſs orders, he muſt follow his duty, and preſents the following memorial:

'The under-written miniſter of the queen of Great-Britain, in purſuance of the ſtrict orders he received the laſt poſt, is obliged moſt humbly to renew the inſtances he has ſo frequently made to your majeſty in favour of the Catalans. The queen orders him to repreſent, that ſhe has nothing more at heart, than to obtain for theſe people the ſame privileges they formerly enjoyed, which ſhe thinks herſelf obliged to do by the two ſtrongeſt motives, that are poſſible, honour and conſcience, that ſhe may not leave a nation, which the misfortune of war obliged her to draw into her intereſt, in a worſe condition than ſhe found them. She hopes, that after all the pains ſhe has taken for procuring a ſolid and laſting peace to Europe, your majeſty will not leave her with the grief of having been the occaſion of the loſs of the privileges of that people; but rather, that in reſpect to the ſtrict friendſhip, which with God's bleſſing is ſo near being eſtabliſhed between your majeſties, as well as the Union ſo neceſſary to the intereſts of both nations, your majeſty will not make any difficulty any longer to grant this favor to her majeſty, which ſhe has ſo much at heart.'

The marquis de Bedmar's anſwer to this memorial was, That this point about the Catalans having been debated in the treaty lately concluded, and ſigned in this court by his excellency and himſelf, which his excellency will own and may be pleaſed to acknowledge, the king does not ſee, that any thing farther is to be done in the matter.

This treaty was ſent to England, and ratified by the queen. Lord Dartmouth ſays, in his letter to lord Lexington, that lord Bolingbroke had the principal ſhare in the negotiation; and that the article of the Catalans was put in as ſoft terms, as was conſiſtent with the queen's honour to allow.

The terms of the treaty are, That the Catalans ſhall have the ſame privileges as the king's beſt beloved ſubjects the Caſtilians enjoy.

When the king of Spain had received this convincing proof of our miniſtry's attachment to his intereſts, and that the ties of the queen's honor and conſcience were of no force with them, when oppoſed to his deſires, he takes a further ſtep, and directly propoſes to lord Lexington, that the queen would aſſiſt him with ſhips to block up Barcelona. His lordſhip's anſwer was That they was afraid this propoſal would meet with this difficulty, That her majeſty would be very unwilling to lend her ſhips to exterminate a people that had taken up arms, in a great meaſure, at the inſtigation of her miniſters: And that ſhe would think ſhe had done enough to gratify the king, in not inſiſting upon the preſerving for them their antient liberties, without helping to deſtroy them. But the regard the miniſtry had to this requeſt of the king, will afterwards appear.

The French ambaſſador and the princeſs de Urſins, propoſed to lord Lexington, (and the night before he left Madrid, the king ſent for him, and engaged him) to write a letter, concerted with him, and approved by the king, to the regency of Barcelona, adviſing them to ſubmit themſelves to their king. His lordſhip aſſures them of his conſtant endeavours to do the beſt he could for them: That God had not permitted him to do more than he had done: That if they would take their reſolutions ſoon, before he was out of Spain, he would write for them in the manner they ſhould deſire: And concludes his letter with new aſſurances of his concern for their intereſt.

To make this appear the more friendly to them, he tells them, he had intruſted the Conſul Alicant to get this letter conveyed to them, upon ſome pretence or other; though a duplicate of it was alſo ſent to the count of Lecheraine, one of the king of Spain's generals, before the town, with direction to have it ſent in as by a deſerter, without his knowledge.

Mr Burch, his lordſhip's ſecretary, amongſt other reaſons, gives this for the writing this letter, That if the Catalans had a mind to accommodate, the queen would have the mediation: And if they had not that then the court of Spain would ſee, that her majeſty would be always ready to ſerve them.

But this artifice to induce the Catalans to abandon their defence, in hopes of his lordſhip's good offices, had no effect upon men determined to die for the liberty of their country. Nothing but force could extort that from them; and therefore ſir Patrick Lawleſs, in September 1713, preſents a memorial to the ſame effect, with what was propoſed the month before to lord Lexington in Spain, ſetting forth, that the Catalans and Majorcans had not ſubmitted themſelves to the king's obedience, and interrupted all commerce and correſpondence in the Mediterranean; and ſubmits it to the conſideration of the queen, not only as guarantee of the treaty of evacuation, but as it concerned the intereſts of Great-Britain; and therefore his catholic majeſty hopes the queen will order a ſquadron of her ſhips to reduce his ſubjects to their obedience; and thereby compleat the tranquillity of Spain, and of the Mediterranean commerce.

As ſoon as the ſeaſon of the year would permit, a fleet is accordingly fitted out for the Mediterranean, under the command of ſir James Wiſhart, whoſe firſt inſtructions bear date the 28th of February, and the additional 18th of March 1713-14; by which he is ordered to enforce a ſtrict obedience to the treaty of evacuation in all its parts, upon any complaints of the queen's ſubjects, of interrupting of commerce or depredations by the veſſels of Catalonia, Majorca, Sardinia, Naples, and other places, to demand reſtitution; and, in caſe of a refuſal, to make repriſals: To repair with the fleet before Barcelonia, then beſieged by the enemy, and demand immediate payment of the value of the queen's ſtores in the town, or a ſufficient ſecurity for payment in ſome reaſonable time: To take care to time his arrival before the town, according to the advices from lord Bingley, then deſigned to be ſent to Spain: By the ſtrongeſt repreſentations to induce the regency of Barcelona to accept of the terms, that be obtained for them: To take all the neceſſary meaſures, purſuant to the queen's intentions, to put an end to the confuſions that now reign in thoſe parts: And all proper methods of perſuaſion to induce the inhabitants of Majorca to ſubmit to the terms that ſhall be offered them and in caſe of refuſal, to employ his ſquadron in countenancing and aſſiſting all attempts, which may be made for reducing them to a due obedience.

It may be obſerved here,

1. That although the queen had engaged herſelf by the treaty of evacuation, to employ her good offices in the moſt effectual manner, to obtain the Catalans their liberties; yet inſtead thereof, the moſt effectual methods were uſed to the contrary; and Mr Prior acquainted Monſieur de Torcy, that the queen was aſſured, the Catalans would ſubmit upon the terms before offered by the king of Spain, without ſo much as mentioning their ancient privileges any more.

2. That the French king, who had put himſelf under the ſame obligation as the queen by that treaty, after this account from Mr Prior of the queen's ſentiments, thought fit alſo not to aſk for their privileges; Mr de Torcy alſo alledging, that the king had little intereſt with the court of Spain.

3. That Britain was under the ſame engagements by that treaty, to ſupport the privileges of Majorca, as thoſe of Catalonia, at the time ſir James Wiſhart had direct orders to attack them.

4. That when thoſe rigorous meaſures were forming againſt the Catalans, lord Bolingbroke writes word to Mr Prior, 'That by what we obſerve in the Catalan agent here, of whom we have never taken the leaſt notice as a public man, it is pretty plain, that a reaſonable accommodation might be made, as he expreſſes it, with that turbulent people.' What was called turbulency in the Catalans, may appear by their anſwer to the duke of Popoli, the king of Spain's general, who ſummoned them to ſurrender. They told him, they would die rather than be ſlaves; but if their antient liberties were confirmed to them, they would open their gates and receive him with all gladneſs.

The houſe of lords expreſſed their concern in a public manner for the miſeries of the Catalans; and by their addreſs to the queen, April 3, 1714, made it their moſt humble and earneſt requeſt to her majeſty, 'That ſhe would be graciouſly pleaſed to continue her interpoſition in the moſt preſſing manner, that the Catalans may have the full enjoyment of their juſt and ancient privileges continued to them.' Her majeſty's anſwer was, 'That at the time ſhe concluded her peace with Spain, ſhe reſolved to uſe her interpoſition upon every occaſion, for obtaining thoſe liberties, and to prevent if poſſible, the misfortunes to which that people are expoſed by the conduct of thoſe more nearly concerned to help them.'

Hereupon, for form's ſake, and to allay the indignation conceived againſt the miniſtry by the people in general, who compaſſionated the calamities of thoſe who fought for liberty; the demand of the Catalan privileges is again put down in lord Bingley's inſtruction, who was before ordered to go to Spain, but was never ſent. So that the only favour obtained from the miniſtry by this earneſt addreſs of the houſe of lords in behalf of the Catalans, was an intimation ſent by lord Bolingbroke to the admiral, not to appear before Barcelona, nor to attack the Majorcians, till he ſhould hear from lord Bingley, and receive directions from England: And alſo a letter from his lordſhip to Mr Grimaldo, above two months after the addreſs, though the town was inveſted at the time of making it, wherein he makes a kind and friendly complaint, as he terms it, that the Catalan privileges had not been yet granted them, nor any reaſonable terms offered, which they muſt either have accepted, or forfeited the queen's compaſſion, and that of the whole world.

The admiral had alſo his ſcruples, whether his orders, couched in ambiguous terms, would juſtify him in attacking Barcelona. He therefore writes to lord Bolingbroke and lord Bingly upon it, and ſubmits it to lord Bingley's conſideration, whether the Catalans might not refuſe conditions, that may be moſt advantageous, if they find he is not to act by force; and deſires that his orders to act before Barcelona, either by force or otherwiſe, may be very plain and clear; aſſuring him, that he will moſt punctually obey thoſe already given him, and ſuch as he ſhall hereafter receive.

When ſir James Wiſhart arrived at Cadiz, he gave the governor a liſt of the ſhips under his command for the Mediterranean ſervice, who ſent it immediately to Madrid: But though ſeveral meſſages came from court to the governor during the admiral's ſtay there, no one compliment was made him, to ſignify his arrival was welcome, or any queſtion aſked about what ſervices he was to perform; which a little ſurprized him: That as ſoon as they had an account at Madrid of his arrival at Cadiz, Mr Orry was diſpatched to Catalonia with full power to treat with the Catalans: 'So that, ſays he, it would appear, that though the king of Spain has all the advantages of the queen's ſhips, as much as if they were actually before Barcelona, by repreſenting to thoſe people, which they very well knew, our arrival in thoſe parts, and how far we are on our way to the Mediterranean; yet the king would not ſeem to owe the ſucceſs of ſuch agreement to the queen and her ſhips, but to France only.'

But this negotiation of Mr Orry failing of ſucceſs, by the Catalans refuſing to ſubmit, without having their liberties granted them, obliged the court of Spain to take more notice, than otherwiſe they were inclined to do, of the admiral, who, from Alicant, writes to lord Bingley, then expected at Madrid, That he had received a very civil letter from Mr Grimaldo, who ſent him the king's orders for exempting the proviſions for the fleet from paying any duty. He tells him, That this exemption was uſually granted to the admiral himſelf, that commanded; but, being a trifle, he ſubmits it to his lordſhip's better judgement, whether the granting him this might not be a means to prevent any thing that might be intended by the court of Madrid more to his advantage; and leaves it to his lordſhips conſideration, what may be moſt for his intereſt at that place; and hopes, by his friendſhip, to find ſome marks of favour from thence, in regard to his expence in this expedition, ſo much intended for their ſervice, and for which he has no allowance from home but his pay, which will not defray half his charges.

In another letter of ſir James Wiſhart to lord Bingley, he acquaints his lordſhip, that though he had formerly deſired him to move the king of Spain, that the grant of exemption of duties for proviſions for the fleet might be made to himſelf; yet, upon farther conſideration of the matter, which is but of ſmall moment, and may appear greater at the court of Spain and England than really it is, he deſires his excellency not to take any notice of it, but let it ſtand as it does; and deſires his countenance and aſſiſtance upon any other occaſion, that the court of Madrid might take to expreſs their good will to him. Nor was it long before the admiral gave the court of Spain more particular proofs, that he was not unworthy of their expected favours.

After Barcelona had been inveſted a conſiderable time by the Spaniards, and reduced to great difficulties for want of proviſions, the French king, though engaged with the queen by the treaty of evacuation, to employ his good offices in the moſt effectual manner, in favour of the Catalan liberties thought fit to ſend his troops againſt them, commanded by Marſhal Berwick, who opened the trenches before Barcelona the 1ſt of July, O. S. 1714. And, on the 8th of the ſame month, ſir James Wiſhart, in the queen's name, writ them a threatening letter, directed to the deputies, and others, who poſſeſſed the government there, telling them, that complaints had been made of their diſturbing the commerce of the queen's ſubjects; and that they had inſolently preſumed to take, carry up, and plunder their ſhips, and uſed the men in a barbarous manner: He had therefore thought fit to ſend captain Gordon with two men of war, to repreſent to them theſe unwarantable and preſumptious proceedings; and by the queen's command demands immediate ſatisfaction for the ſame, and the puniſhment of the officers of the ſhips with the utmoſt ſeverity. If this be not punctually complied with he leaves it to themſelves to judge what the conſequences may be.

The deputies returned anſwer, 'That only one of thoſe veſſels, mentioned in captain Gordon's memorial was taken by them into Barcelona, being laden with ſalt, for which they paid the price immediately to the captain of it. That being beſieged, they thought they might do ſo with juſtice, and by the law of nations: That they were ſo far from living like pirates, as their enemies ſuggeſted, in order to diſtreſs them, by preventing any one's coming with proviſions for their relief: That what Engliſh veſſels had entered their ports with proviſions, had been well treated, and had freely ſold their merchandize, and at a higher price, than they could have got any where elſe: That they had paid them with their beſt ſort of money, and to all their ſatisfactions: That they had that day publiſhed an order, forbidding, upon pain of death, any of their ſhips to moleſt any Engliſh, even though they were going with proviſions to the enemy. They hoped his excellency will be ſatisfied with their conduct, which is conformable to the rights of people, that are beſieged; aſſuring him, that when they know any of their ſhips, either with commiſſion, or without, that ſhall have cauſed the leaſt damage to any Engliſh, they will not only immediately inflict a rigorous puniſhment, but repair all the damage, deſiring to live in the good correſpondance they have had with this noble and generous nation, with the utmoſt deference for the queen, and ready to obey his excellency's orders with all affection and reſpect.'

The government of Barcelona, in their extremity, writ another letter to the admiral, dated July 23, ſetting forth, 'That his excellency very well knew, that the engagement Catalonia entered into to receive Charles the third for their king, was founded on the protection of the high Allies, but moſt particularly of England, without which they were not capable of undertaking ſo great an enterprize. That they had, for ſeven years together, endeavoured to ſerve the Engliſh nation in every thing it was poſſible for them to do, by contributing troops and conſiderable ſums of money without intereſt. And though they had pleaſed themſelves with the thoughts of the happineſs to be always ſubjects of Charles III, yet by the ordinary change, to which humane affairs are liable, they now ſee the troops of the duke of Anjou, aided by the French, maſters of all the principality, except Barcelona and Cardona, committing through the whole the moſt execrable hoſtilities, burnings, and plunderings, without ſparing the effuſion of innocent blood, and without diſtinction of age or ſex. That for a year together the enemy's army had oppreſſed Barcelona by ſea and land, making them continually ſuffer the calamity of ſo long a blockade, during which time the enemies have thrown fourteen thouſand bombs into the town; which have ruined the greateſt part of the houſes: That now they expect to be attacked in form, and that in twenty four hours the town will be battered in breach. They cannot expreſs their affliction, to ſee the danger of the inhabitants expoſed to be victims of that cruelty, with which the enemy threatens to treat them. Having no comfort left, they fly to the queen of Great Britain, beſeeching her protection by the incloſed letter to Don Dalmaſes, their envoy at London; and, in the mean time, till an anſwer can come, they beſeech his excellency, from their ſouls, to mediate with the French troops, who oppreſſed them, for a ſuſpenſion of arms, ſince the congreſs at Baden, now ſitting, to conclude of a general peace, may ſtill determine this affair: They doubt not, that his mediation will be able to procure them this relief, ſince his ſquadron is ſuperior to that of the enemy. They ſee no other remedy in nature for their misfortunes; and therefore hope his excellency will not refuſe them: That if Catalonia has merited any thing by its ſervices' and by its conjunction with the Engliſh nation, this is the time to receive the fruits of it: That it is worthy of his excellency to comfort the afflicted, and not to deny them this favour in their great neceſſity.

How the admiral was affected with this letter, appears by one of his to lord Bingley, dated Aug. 7, 1714, wherin he acquaints him, 'That Mr Grimaldo had ſignified to him from the king of Spain, that all the king's ſhips of war being employed before Barcelona, his majeſty could not ſend any of them to meet his flota then coming home; and therefore deſired the admiral to ſend three of his upon that ſervice;' which was accordingly complied with. Of this he had acquainted lord Bolingbroke, and hoped to meet with her majeſty's approbation.

The Catalans thus abandoned and given up to their enemies, contrary to faith and honour, were not, however, wanting to their own defence; but appealing to heaven, and hanging up at the high alter the queen's ſolemn declaration to protect them, underwent the utmoſt miſeries of a ſiege; during which multitudes periſhed by famine and the ſword, many were afterwards executed, and many perſons of figure were diſperſed about the Spaniſh dominions in dungeons.

III. The Lord Oxford's Letter to the Queen, June 9, 1714.

May it pleaſe your majeſty,

I preſume, in obedience to your royal command, to lay before your majeſty a ſtate of your affairs. Though I have very much contracted it from the draught I made, and the vouchers from whence it is taken, yet I find it ſwell under my pen in tranſcribing, being willing to put every thing before your majeſty in the cleareſt light my poor underſtanding can attain to. It was neceſſary to lay it before your majeſty in the ſeries of time, from the beginning to this preſent time; and when that is compleatly laid before you it remains only for me to beg God to direct your majeſty.

And as to myſelf, do with me what you pleaſe; place me either as a figure, or a cypher; diſplace me or replace me, as that beſt ſerves your majeſty's occaſions, you ſhall ever find me, with the utmoſt devotion, and without any reſerve,

Madam,

Your moſt dutiful, moſt faithful, moſt humble, moſt obedient ſubject, and unworthy ſervant,

Oxford.

A brief account of public affairs, ſince Aug. 8, 1710, to this preſent 8th of June, 1714. To which is added, the ſtate of affairs abroad as they relate to this kingdom; with ſome humble propoſals for ſecuring the future tranquillity of her majeſty's reign, and the ſafety of her kingdoms.

Her majeſty, on the 8th of Auguſt 1710, was pleaſed to alter her treaſury and two days after, in a new commiſſion, Robert Harley, by her majeſty's great favour, was made chancellor of the exchequer.

The ſtate of affairs at home and abroad are freſh in every one's memory.

The condition of the treaſury at that time was laid before her majeſty in a large repreſentation.

I beg leave to touch ſome few heads: The army was in the field, no money in the treaſury; none of the remitters would contract again; the bank had refuſed to lend a hundred thouſand pounds to lord Godolphin, on very good ſecurity; the navy, and other branches of ſervice, eleven millions in debt, which enhanſed the price of every thing proportionable; the civil liſt in debt about ſix hundred thouſand pounds; and the yearly income too little for the current certain expence, by the loweſt computation, one hundred twenty-four thouſand, four hundred ninety-five pounds, two ſhillings and four-pence.

In a few days this new commiſſion made proviſion for paying the army, by the greateſt remittance that had ever been known: Though the oppoſition from every office, which was full of perſons who were enemies to the change made by the queen, was very ſtrong, and very troubleſome and vexatius: And ſuch was the ſituation of affairs, that nothing but great patience could ever have overcome theſe difficulties; it being impoſſible, as well as unavoidable, to make removes, but by degrees.

As ſoon as it was poſſible (and notwithſtanding the clamours then raiſed, it was the only proper time) a new parliament is called.

Its firſt meeting was November 27, 1710. Robert Harley had prepared the funds ready (before the parliament met, as he had done every ſeſſion to this day) not only for the current ſervice of the year, both by ſea and land, but alſo for eaſing the nation of above nine millions of debt. This was thought ſo chimerical, when Robert Harley did begin to open it, that it was treated with ridicule, until he ſhowed how practicable it was. It is true, this gave great reputation abroad, and enabled to treat advantageouſly of a peace. It raiſed ſinking credit at home; but, at the ſame time, as it drew envy upon Harley from ſome, and the rage of others, ſo it gave offence to ſome of his fellow-ſervants, who told him plainly, that he ought to have told his ſecret, and if he would not get money himſelf, he ought to have let his friends ſhare a hundred thouſand pounds, which would not have been felt, or found out, in ſo vaſt a ſum as nine or ten millions.

To this principle was owing the ſetting on foot at this time the unhappy voyage to Canada; to all which meetings Harley avoiding coming, and gave lord Rocheſter his reaſons; and after he deſired his lordſhip to be a means to the queen, to hinder that expedition, but it happened to be too late. But lady Maſham knows how much Harley was concerned at it, though he did not know the true ſpring of that voyage, which will appear after in this paper.

The beginning of February 1710-11, there began to be a diviſion among thoſe called tories in the houſe, and Mr ſecretary St John thought it convenient to be liſting a ſeparate party for himſelf.

To prevent this, lord Rocheſter and Harley deſired to have a meeting, and to cool ſuch raſh attempts; and it was contrived Mr ſecretary St John ſhould invite us to dinner (which was the laſt time he ever invited Robert Harley, being now above three years) were was the duke of Shrewſbury, earl Poulet, lord Rocheſter, and others; and lord Rocheſter took the pains to calm the ſpirit of diviſion and ambition.

Harley was at this time ſeized by a violent fever; and on his firſt coming abroad, March 8, met with a misfortune which confined him many weeks. The tranſactions during that time, are too public, as well as too black, for Harley to remember or to mention.

In the end of May, 1711, the queen, out of her abounded goodneſs, was pleaſed to confer undeſerved honours on Robert Harley; and, on the 29th of the ſame month, was pleaſed to put the treaſurer's ſtaff into his hands: A poſt ſo much above Harley's abilities to ſtruggle with, that he had nothing but integrity and duty to reccommend him to her majeſty's choice; ſo he muſt have recourſe to her majeſty's tranſcendent goodneſs and mercy to pardon all his faults and failings, both of omiſſion and commiſſion, during the whole courſe of his ſervice,

But to return and reſume the thread of this diſcourſe. The 4th of June 1711, three days after the treaſurer was ſworn, he was ſurprized with a demand of twenty eight thouſand thirty-ſix pounds and five ſhillings, for arms and merchandize, ſaid to be ſent to Canada. When the treaſurer ſcrupled this, Mr ſecretary St John and Mr Moore came to him with much paſſion upon this affair; and about a fortnight after, the ſecretary of ſtate ſignified the queen's poſitive pleaſure to have that money paid: And accordingly her majeſty ſigned a warrant, June 21, and the treaſurer not being able then, with all his precaution, to diſcover further light, the money was paid, July 4, 1711.

Since the return from that expedition, the ſecret is diſcovered, and the treaſurer's ſuſpicion juſtified: For the public was cheated of above twenty thouſand pounds.

There is reaſon to be more particular upon this head, becauſe it is one of the things never to be forgiven the treaſurer; and lord-chancellor told him more to that purpoſe, that they told him no government was worth ſerving, that would not let them make thoſe advantages, and get ſuch jobbs.

One thing more is craved leave to be added, That the treaſurer was forced to uſe all his ſkill and credit to keep the houſe of commons from examining this affair laſt parliament.

June the 12, 1712, the firſt ſeſſion of laſt parliament ended.

From this time, to the beginning of the next ſeſſion, the treaſurer's hands were full of negotiating the peace in all courts abroad; and beſides the ordinary and neceſſary duty of his office at home, he had frequent occaſions of calming the quarrels and grudges Mr ſecretary had ſometimes againſt lord Dartmouth, ſometimes againſt lady Maſham, and ſometimes againſt the treaſurer himſelf.

The ſecond ſeſſion of the laſt parliament began December the 7th, 1711.

This was attend-d with great difficulties and dangers, as well from the practices of the diſcontented here, as the deſigns carried on by Mr Buys, Prince Eugene, and Bothmar; in which deſigns concurred the emperor, and other ſtates and princes who gained by the war.

This put her majeſty under a ſort of neceſſity to preſerve the whole, and to make a method which had been uſed, to to create ſome new peers.

So many have been brought formerly out of the houſe of commons, of thoſe who uſed to manage public affairs, it was propoſed to Mr ſecretary, That if he would be contented to ſtay in the houſe of commons that ſeſſions, her majeſty would have the goodneſs to create him a peer, and that he ſhould not looſe his rank.

The ſecond ſeſſion ended the 21ſt of June, 1712, and notwithſtanding Bothmar's memorial, and all other attacks both from abroad and at home, ſupplies were provided, and every thing relating to the public put upon a good foot, and the Malecontents began to deſpair, as appeared by the duke of Marlborough's retiring abroad, and other particulars.

After the ſeſſion was ended, the queen, as ſhe had promiſed, ordered a warrant for Mr ſecretary St John to be a Viſcount: This happened to put him in the utmoſt rage againſt the treaſurer, lady Maſham, and without ſparing the greateſt.

It did avail very little to tell him how much he had got in place; for had he been created with the other lords, it would have fallen to his ſhare to have come next after lord Trevor: but the treaſurer, with great patience, bore all the ſtorm, of which lord Maſham was often a witneſs of the outrageous ſpeeches; and Mr. Moore very lately told the treaſurer, that lord Bolingbroke ſaid very lately to him, that he owed him a revenge upon that head.

This diſcontent continued, until there happened an opportunity of ſending him to France; of which there was not much occaſion: but it was hoped, that this would have put him in good humour; which it did, until in October 1712, there were knights of the garter made.

This created a new diſturbance, which is too well remembered, and breaks out now very often in outrageous expreſſions publicly againſt all then made.

In November, on the death of duke Hamilton, he was much againſt duke Shrewſbury's going, for reaſons very plain, which then were in negociation: for before the laſt ſeſſion of that parliament began, a new model was framed, or a ſcheme of miniſtry; which how they afterwards came to fall out, will appear in its due place.

The third and laſt ſeſſion began April the 9th. 1713; which was as ſoon as the peace was concluded, and could be proclaimed.

It is not decent to take notice, that during this whole negociation, the treaſurer was obliged, by his own hand, and his own charge, to correſpond in all the courts concerned in the negociation; and very often he had the good luck to ſet right ſeveral miſtakes, and to obtain ſome things very little expected: but the only merit of this belongs to her majeſty, the credit of whoſe favour brought it about, and gave power to the treaſurer to act with ſucceſs.

During this ſeſſion, the lords of the cabinet, and others, met every ſaturday at the treaſurer's, in order to carry on the queen's buſineſs, as they had done the year before on thurſdays. Many offers were made, and repeated by the treaſurer, in order to attack former offenders, and quiet the minds of the gentlemen, and of the church-party; and the only reaſon for this failing, was, becauſe of the project laid for their new ſcheme, and putting themſelves at the head, as they called it of the church-party.

This being the laſt ſeſſion of parliament, and ſome gentlemen fearing their elections, and ſome for other reaſons, dropt the bill of commerce.

The treaſurer ſaw this opportunity, and immediately took it, and prevailed with ſir Thomas Hanmer, and others, to come into the payment of the civil liſt debts, incurred before the change of the treaſury, though the preſent treaſurer, was railed at, and maligned; which he choſe to bear patiently, rather than own the true reaſon, that there was no money to do it with, which would have ruined all at once.

This ſtep of paying the debts, put the male-contented into the utmoſt rage, which they did very publicly expreſs in both houſes.

This laſt ſeſſion of that parliament, and the third ſince the change of the miniſtry, ended July the 16th. 1713.

The peace with France being over, and it growing neceſſary to put her majeſty's affairs into a further and more ſettled regulation, and to eaſe the treaſurer of the burthen, as well as envy, of ſuch a bulk of buſineſs: Her majeſty was pleaſed to approve of the ſcheme of the duke of Ormond's ſtaying here to attend the army affairs, which was neceſſary at the time of diſbanding; duke Shrewſbury to go to Ireland, upon his return from France; lord Findlater to be chancellor of Scotland; lord Mar third ſecretary; lord Dartmouth privy-ſeal, and Mr Bromley ſecretary of ſtate, and ſir William Wyndham chancellor of the exchequer. I am ſure the queen very well remembers the rage this cauſed, as perfectly defeating their ſcheme, and ſhewing that her majeſty would put her affairs upon a ſolid foot: The lord chancellor ſaid it was againſt law, and to this day will not treat lord Findlater with decency; and lord Mar has met with many ill treatments, as well as Mr ſecretary Bromley.

But that the treaſurer might leave them without excuſe, and make her majeſty's affairs, if poſſible, eaſy with and to thoſe in her ſervice; as ſoon as he was recovered enough to write, he wrote a large letter to lord Bolingbroke, containing his ſcheme of the queen's affairs, and what was neceſſary for lord Bolingbroke to do, as belonging only to his province. This letter was dated July the 25th, 1713, and was anſwered July the 27th, by lord Bolingbroke; the copy was ſhown to lady Maſham, who came to viſit the treaſurer then confined to his chamber; and then ſhe thought it a very good one, and what was proper for the occaſion. I believe the whole would be of uſe to give light to her majeſty into the ground and foundation of the follies and madneſs which have ſince appeared; the whole is ready for her majeſty's peruſal when ſhe pleaſes.

In this letter the treaſurer gives an account to lord Bolingbroke of the occaſions, or rather the pretences, for giving diſturbance to the queen's ſervants. He propoſes the remedy, and what was requiſite to be done by him as ſecretary in his own province, and alſo aſſurance of the treaſurer's assistance to the utmost, and of his desire to consult with him (lord Bollingbroke) how to unite the rest of our friends.

Being then sick, the treasurer took the liberty to put lord Bolingbroke in mind of the several particulars which then required dispatch, and were solely belonging to his province, without any other interposition than that of taking your majesty's direction.

Amongst others, that of a circular letter upon the addresses of both houses, relating to the pretender.

This was not done in three months. His lordship wrote word it was done July the 27th.

In the same letter the treasurer proposed, that (according to the treaty of peace) care should be taken of the following particulars, viz. Newfoundland, Hudson's-Bay, Acadia, St Christopher's, Assiento, and other things contained in the treaties of commerce.

These particulars the treasurer thought to have been executed, until within a few weeks he heard the contrary by accident, and that the time in the several treaties was elapsed. Upon this, the treasurer on Wednesday, June the 2d, told Mr Moore of this, and that every body would be liable to blame who are in the queen's service. Thursday, June the 3d, 1714, lord Bollingbroke writes to the treasurer a letter, which begins thus:

'Mr Moore has been this morning with me, and has put into my hands a paper, which he calls, I think not improperly, a charge upon me.'

This paper contains the neglect above mentioned in the treasurer's letter, of July the 25th, 1713, and yet those faults are now charged upon the treasurer.

From this account it is observable, that the earl of Oxford took to himself the credit of corresponding with his own hand, and at his own charge, in all the courts concerned in the negotiations of peace, and that very often he had the good luck to set right several mistakes, and obtained some things little expected: That he boasted of his laying hold of a seasonable opportunity in parliament, upon rejecting the bill of commerce, to prevail with members of the house of commons to come into the payment of the civil list debts; and also charged several persons, then in high stations, with corruption, and embezzlement of the public money; and recommended himself to the queen, by having used all his skill and credit to keep the house of commons from examining into the same. The committee of secrecy having received information, that large sums of money had been directed for special services relating to the war, by signs manual, and warrants upon the same, countersigned by the earl, which sums were afterwards paid to his order, the committee thought it incumbent upon them to lay before the house copies of these signs manual and warants, and orders thereupon, together with extracts from the register of the exchequer, by which it appeared, that these large sums issued for the service of the war, were received and applied to the earl's private use.

IV. A letter from the states general to ; the queen of Great-Britain, &c. dated Hague, June 5. 1712, N. S.

Madam.

After all the proofs which your majesty has given during the course of your glorious reign, of your great zeal for the public good, and of your adherence to the common cause of the high allies; after so many marks you have had the goodness to give us, of your tender affection, and of your friendship to our republic; and after the repeated assurances you have given us, and that very lately too, of your intentions, that your troops should act against the common enemy, until the war was concluded by a general peace: It is impossible we should not be surprised and afflicted by two declarations we have lately received, one after another, in the name of your majesty; the first by the duke of Ormond your general, that 'He could undertake nothing without new orders from you;' the other by the bishop of Bristol, your plenipotentiary to the congress at Utrecht, 'That your majesty perceiving that we did not answer as we ought, the proposals which you had made us, and that we would not act in concert with your ministers on the subject of peace, you would take your measures apart: And that you did not look upon yourself to be now under any obligation whatever, with respect to us.'

As soon as we had notice of those declarations, we sent orders to our minister, who has the honour to reside at your majesty's court, to represent to you the reasons of our surprize, and the consequences of those declarations; and to request you with that respect which we always had, and which we shall for ever entertain for your royal person, that you would give other orders to the duke of Ormond, that he may act with all possible vigour, according to the exigency of the war; and that your majesty would have the goodness to entertain other sentiments of us, than those which the bishop of Bristol had declared to our plenipotentiaries at Utrecht.

But the more we consider those declarations, the more important we find them, and the more we apprehend their consequences: Therefore we could not forbear applying ourselves by this letter directly to your majesty, hoping that you will consider it, as we promise ourselves you will both from your great prudence and wisdom, and from your so much famed zeal for the public welfare; particularly from your useful friendship and affection for us and our republic.

We protest before all things, that as we ever had a true friendship, as well as the highest respect for your majesty, and a sincere affection to all your interests, with an earnest desire to live in a perfect good understanding and union with you; we have still the same sentiments, and shall always preserve them, wishing for nothing more than to be able to give your majesty the most convincing proofs of it.

After this, we pray your majesty to consider, according to your great penetration, whether we have not just ground to be surprized, when we see a stop put, by an order in your majesty's name, without our knowledge, to the operations of the confederate army, the finest and strongest which perhaps has been in the field during the whole course of the war, and provided with all necessaries to act with vigour; and this, after they had marched, according to the resolution taken in concert with your majesty's general, almost up to the enemy, with a great superiority, both as to the number and goodness of troops, and animated with a noble courage and zeal to acquit themselves bravely; so that in all human appearance, and with the divine assistance, which we have experienced so visibly on so many other occasions, we should have been able, either by battle or sieges, to gain great advantages over the enemy, to have bettered the affairs of the allies, and to facilitate the negotiations of peace.

We flatter ourselves indeed with the hopes, which the duke of Ormond has given us, That in a few days he expects other orders; but in the mean time, we are sorry to see one of the finest opportunities lost, being uncertain whether we shall have another so favourable, since the enemy have time given them to fortify themselves, and take their precautions, while the army of the allies lies still without action; and, consuming the forage all round, deprive themselves of the means of subsisting for time to come, in those places where, by concert, the operations of the campaign were designed; which may make such enterprizes impossible hereafter, as were practicable now, and consequently render the whole campaign unsuccessful, to the inestimable prejudice of the common cause of the high allies.

Certainly when we consider the army as it really is, composed of the troops of your majesty and the other allies, joined together by common concert, to act for the greatest advantage and furtherance of the common cause, and the assurances which your majesty had given us by your letters, by your ministers, and last of all, by your general the duke of Ormond, of 'your intentions that your troops should be ordered to act with their usual vigour,' as well as the engagements into which your majesty is entered, not only with respect to us, but also separately and jointly with us, in respect to the other allies; it is very difficult for us to conjecture and conceive, how an order so prejudicial to the common cause, given so suddenly, without our knowledge, and undoubtedly too without the knowledge of the other allies, can agree and consist with the nature of an alliance, and with those assurances and engagements just now mentioned. For though, according to the declaration of the bishop of Bristol, your majesty holds yourself to be disengaged from every obligation with regard to us, it is plain that the matter now in question is not our particular interest or advantage, but that of all the allies, who will suffer by the prejudice, which an ornament so little expected must needs bring to the common cause.

But, Madam, we cannot forbear telling your majesty, that the declaration made by the bishop of Bristol, at Utrecht has no less surprized us, than that of the duke of Ormond in the army. It appears to us so extraordinary, that we know not how to reconcile it with the great goodness and kindness which your majesty has always honoured us with; and not being able to conceive how such a sudden change could happen, with respect to us, we are not only surprized, but afflicted at it. We have carefully examined our conduct, and find nothing in it, that can have given ground to that dissatisfaction which your majesty expresses with us, by this declaration.

From the very first day that your majesty ascended the throne, we testified all the deference that you could desire from a state in friendship and alliance with you. We carefully sought after your amity and affection, and considering the happy effects which a good inteligence, harmony, and union between your majesty and us, and the two nations, might produce, and have really produced, and the advantage which resulted from thence to both, as well as to the common cause of all the allies, we made it our business heartily to cultivate them, and more and more to gain your majesty's confidence, and to conform ourselves to your sentiments as much as possibly we could.

We think that we gave a signal proof of this, particularly with regard to the negotiations of peace; since not only after we were informed of the conferences formerly held in England upon this subject, we did expect that your majesty would give us an account of them; having this firm confidence in your friendship for our republic, and in your zeal for the good of the common cause, that nothing would be done to prejudice us, nor the other allies: But also when your majesty communicated to us the preliminary articles signed by M. Mesnager in England, and when you proposed to us the calling, and holding a congress for a general peace, and required of us to grant for this end necessary passports for the enemies ministers, we consented to it, though we had many reasons, which to us seemed very well grounded, not to enter into such a treaty without a better foundation, or at least without the concurrence of the other allies; but we preferred your majesty's sentiments to our own, in order to give you a new proof of our deference.

We did no less, with respect to the difficulties which were started on the subject of the treaty of mutual guaranty for the succession of the protestant line to your majesty's kingdoms, and for our barrier; a treaty of such importance to the two nations, that we look upon it as the strongest tie that could be thought on to unite for ever the hearts and interests of both, concluded after the maturest deliberation, and ratified on both sides in the most authentic form: For though we might have stood to the treaty as it was, yet we entered into a negotiation upon those difficulties, and particularly on the point of the assiento, concerning which, we gave our plenipotentiaries such instructions, that we no longer doubted but all the difficulties would have been adjusted to mutual content, and that we should thereby have entirely regained your majesty's confidence; and the rather, because, in the first place, when the meeting of a congress for a general peace was in hand, your majesty declared to us by your ambassador, 'That you desired no more than our concurrence in that single point, and this only mark of our confidence, and that then you would give us strong and real proofs of your affection towards us, and of your upright intentions, with respect to the common cause of all the allies;' and that afterwards, when the difficulties about the succession and the barrier were raised, your majesty did likewise assure us, that if we would remit something upon the most essential points, and particularly about the affair of the assiento, it would be the true way to re-establish a mutual confidence; which being once restored, your majesty would take particularly to heart the interests of this state, and act in conjunction with us in the whole negotiation, to obtain an honourable, good, and sure peace.

But we find ourselves very much out in our expectation, since at the very same time, when we made the greatest advances towards your majesty, and that we did verily believe we should come to an agreement about the points in difference, we see the earl of Stafford gone, without finishing that affair; we see the army stoped in the beginning of its career; and we hear a declaration, by which your majesty looks upon yourself to be disengaged from all obligations with us; for which the reasons alledged are, 'That we have not answered as we ought, the advances which your majesty made towards us, and that we would not act in concert with your ministers about the peace.'

If your majesty will be pleased to look with a favourable and equitable eye upon our conduct, we flatter ourselves, and have a firm confidence, that you will find nothing in it which can give you such disadvantageous ideas and thoughts of us; but that you will rather find, that we have performed and do still perform all that we are bound to, as good and faithful allies; and particularly to your majesty.

What we have said already, might perhaps be sufficient to persuade you of it; but we must add, that having always esteemed your majesty's affection, and a good harmony betwixt the two nations, as one of the strongest supports of our state, and of the protestant religion, and as one of the most effectual methods to maintain and advance our common interests, and those of the whole confederacy; and this sincere opinion being firmly imprinted on our hearts, we were never backward to communicate and consult in all confidence with your majesty and your ministers, upon the affairs of peace, according to the foundations laid down in the grand alliance and other treaties. We declare, that we have always been inclinable and ready to do it; and are so still, as far as we can, without prejudice to the other allies, and without departing from, or acting against, the engagements, treaties, and alliances which we have entered into.

But, Madam, all the proposals hitherto made to us upon that subject, were couched in very general terms, without communicating to us the result of the negotiations betwixt your majesty's ministers and those of France, nor even your majesty's thoughts about the subject, which we ought to have concerted together. It is true, that in some of the last conferences, your majesty's ministers demanded to know whether ours, were furnished with a full power, and authorized to draw up a plan for the peace; but it had been just, before such a thing was demanded of us, That they should have communicated the result of the negotiations, so long treated of betwixt your majesty's ministers and those of the enemy; or, at least, they should have told us your majesty's thoughts.

Had that plan related only to your majesty's interest and ours, we should perhaps have been in the wrong not to have forthwith come into it, though even in that case the affair could not have been without its difficulties, since the least notice of it which should have come to the enemy, must have been very prejudicial: but as the plan in question concerned the interest of all the allies, and almost all Europe, we had very strong apprehensions, that as the particular negotiations betwixt your majesty's ministers and those of France, and the readiness with which we consented to the congress at Utrecht, and to the giving of passports to the enemy's ministers, had already occasioned abundance of suspicions, and much uneasiness to his imperial majesty, and the other allies: we say, we apprehended, that his imperial majesty, and the other allies coming to know (which would have been very difficult to conceal from them) the concert betwixt your majesty's ministers and ours, for a plan of peace, and that before the ministers of France had given a specific answer to the demands of the allies, their suspicions and uneasiness would have increased, and that way of proceeding might have given them ground to entertain prejudicial thoughts, as if it had been the intention of your majesty and us, to abandon the grand alliance and the common cause, or at least that we alone took upon us to determine the fate of all the other allies; by which his imperial majesty and the other confederates might have been pushed on to seperate measures, and to take such steps as would be no ways agreeable to your majesty's interest.

We thought these reasons strong enough to justify our conduct to your majesty on this head; and if we did not enter with all the readiness which you might have wished for, into the concert proposed, we hope, that at most, your majesty will look upon our backwardness, only as an excess of prudence, or of scruple, and not in the least as a want of confidence in your majesty; while the allies might have considered it as a departing from the treaties, and particularly from the eighth article of the grand alliance. We also hope that your majesty, for the reasons here alledged, will lay aside those hard thoughts of us, as if we had not answered as we ought, the advances which your majesty made towards us, and that we would not act in concert with your ministers, upon the subject of the peace. But, Madam, though your majesty should not acquiesce in our reasons (of which however we cannot doubt) we pray your majesty to consider, whether that be sufficient for your majesty to think, that you are disengaged from all obligations with respect to us.

Had we acted againſt, and contravened the engagements and treaties which we had the honour to conclude with your majeſty, we might have expected from your goodneſs and juſtice, that you would have repreſented thoſe contraventions to us, and not have looked upon yourſelf to be diſengaged, till ſuch time as we had refuſed to give all neceſſary redreſs. But, as we did no ways engage to enter with your majeſty into a concert to draw up a plan of peace, without the participation of the other members of the grand alliance, the backwardneſs we have ſhewn upon that head, cannot be looked upon as a contravention of our engagements, and therefore cannot ſerve to diſengage your majeſty from your's, with reſpect to us, ſince we are verily perſuaded, that we have fully anſwered all our treaties, and all our alliances, both with your majeſty, and with the high allies in general; and that we have done more in this preſent war, than could in juſtice and equity have been expected from us. All the difference betwixt your majeſty and us in this point, is no more, if rightly conſidered, than a diſparity of ſentiments.

In truth, madam, if for ſuch a cauſe betwixt potentates, allied and united together by the ſtrongeſt and ſtricteſt ties of alliance, intereſt, and religion, any one of thoſe potentates could quit all their engagements, and diſengage themſelves from all their obligations, there is no tie ſo ſtrong, which may not be broke at any time; and we know of no engagements that could be relied on, in time to come.

We aſſure ourſelves, that when your majeſty conſiders the conſequences, you will not perſiſt in the declaration which the biſhop of Briſtol has made: we beſeech you, with all the reſpect, and all the earneſtneſs of which we are capable, that you would not; and alſo that you would be pleaſed to revoke the order given to the duke of Ormond, if it be not revoked already; and that you would authorize him to act according to occurrences, and as the exigency of the war, and the advancement of the common cauſe ſhall require.

We alſo requeſt you, madam, to communicate to us the reſult of the conferences betwixt your miniſters and thoſe of the enemy, or at leaſt your thoughts upon the peace, and we will endeavour to give your majeſty all imaginable proofs of our deference for your ſentiments, and of our ſincere deſire to preſerve your valuable friendſhip as much as we can, without acting contrary to the faith of the engagements into which we have entered, by treaties and alliances with your majeſty, and other potentates.

We are firmly perſwaded, that it is not your majeſty's intention in any manner to break them, ſince you have always been of the ſame opinion with us and the other allies, that a good union betwixt the allies, not only during the preſent war, but alſo after the peace ſhall be concluded, is, and always will be the moſt ſolid, and even the only method to preſerve the liberty and independency of all together, and of manner, by victories and great events, which will render every one in particular, againſt the great power of France.

We expect alſo, that after having given ſuch great and ſignal proofs of your wiſdom, of your firmneſs, and of your zeal for the ſupport of the common cauſe, your majeſty will not now take ſuch reſolutions as may be prejudicial to us and to the other allies; but that, in order to obtain an honourable, ſure, and general peace, you will purſue the ſame methods, and keep to the ſame maxims which you formerly held and which Almighty God hath bleſſed in ſo remarkable a the glory of your majeſty's reign immortal [z].

[z] To theſe papers it may be proper to add extracts of the treaties to Utrecht.

I. Between Great-Britain and France.

I. Perpetual peace and true friendſhip.

II. Ceſſation of all hoſtilities.

III. All offences, damages, &c. ſhall be buried in oblivion.

IV. The moſt chriſtian king acknowledges the limitation of the ſucceſſion to the kingdom of Great-Britain, in the proteſtant line, and on the faith, word, and honour of a king, declares, he and his heirs ſhall accept and approve the ſame for ever; and promiſes, that no one beſides the queen and her ſucceſſors, according to the ſaid limitation, ſhall ever, by him or his ſucceſſors be acknowledged king or queen of Great-Britain; and that he and his heirs will take all poſſible care, that the perſon, who, ſince the deceaſe of king James, did take upon him the title of king of Great-Britain, ſhall not, at any time hereafter, return into the kingdom of France, or any the dominions thereof.

V. The moſt chriſtian king promiſes, for himſelf and heirs, that they will at no time diſturb the queen of Great-Britain, her heirs and ſucceſſors of the proteſtant line, nor give any aid, favour, or council, directly or indirectly, by land or ſea, in money, arms, ammunition, ſtores, ſhips, ſoldiers, or any other way, to any perſon who ſhould oppoſe the proteſtant ſucceſſion.

VI. The union of France and Spain being the chief foundation of the war, it is provided and ſettled by renunciations, that theſe kingdoms ſhall never be joined in one*. The moſt chriſtian king engages that he will not endeavour to obtain any uſage of navigation and trade to Spain and the Spaniſh Indies, than what was practiſed in the reign of Charles II. of Spain, or than what ſhall be granted to other nations.

VII. Free navigation and commerce, as before the war, and as agreed by the treaty of commerce this day made between the two nations.

VIII. That the ordinary diſtribution of juſtice be opened, ſo that the ſubjects of both ſides may ſue for, and obtain their rights, according to the laws of each kingdom.

IX. The moſt chriſtian king ſhall take care, that the fortifications of Dunkirk, towards the ſea, be razed within two months; and thoſe towards the land within three months, and the harbour be filled up, and the ſluices or moles levelled at the king's expence; and that the fortifications, harbours and moles be never repaired again. All which, however, ſhall not begin to be ruined, till every thing is put into his hands which is to be given him inſtead thereof, or an equivalent.

X. Hudſon's Bay ſhall be reſtored to the queen of Great-Britain.

XI. All damages to the Hudſon's Bay company, by depredations of the French in time of peace, ſhall be ſatisfied, according to the eſtimates of commiſſaries to be named at the requiſition of each party. The ſame concerning the damages laſt year in the iſland of Montſerrat, and concerning the things complained of by the French, relating to Nevis, and caſtle of Gambia.

XII. The iſland of St. Chriſtopher, all Nova Scotia or Acadia, Port Royal or Annapolis, ſhall be delivered to the Engliſh, and the French excluded from all kind of fiſhing in the ſeas, bays, or other places on the coaſts of Nova Scotia; that is, on thoſe lying towards the eaſt, within thirty leagues, beginning from Sable-Iſland, and thence ſtretching along towards the South-Weſt.

XIII. Newfoundland, and the adjacent iſlands ſhall belong wholly to Britain; and the town and fortreſs of Placentia ſhall be delivered up within ſeven months. Only it ſhall be allowed to the French to catch fiſh, and dry them on land from cape Bonaviſta, round northward to Point-Riche. But the iſland of Cape Bretan, as alſo all others, both in the mouth of the river, and gulph of St. Laurence, ſhall belong to the French.

XIV. A year ſhall be allowed to the French to remove and carry off their effects, from the places to be yielded up by this treaty, and the free exercise of their religion, to thoſe that are willing to remain there.

XV. The French of Canada ſhall give no moleſtation to the five Nations of Indians, ſubject to Britain: and the Engliſh ſhall behave peaceably to the Americans, friends of France, and on both ſides they ſhall enjoy full liberty of going and coming on account of trade.

XVI. All letters of repriſal and marque ſhall be recalled, and none granted hereafter, but upon plain proof of a denial, or wrongful delay of juſtice; and unleſs the petition of him, who deſires the letters of repriſal, be ſhown to the miniſter of that prince, againſt whoſe ſubjects the letters are demanded, that he, within four months or ſooner, may make enquiry, or, procure ſatisfaction. But in caſe of no miniſter, the letters are not to be granted till after four months, from the day the petition was exhibited to the prince, againſt whoſe ſubjects the letters are deſired, or to his privy-council.

XVII. The conditions of the ſuſpenſion of arms, made the 11th day of Auguſt laſt, relating to ſhips, merchandizes, and other effects, taken on either ſide, ſhall be truly executed.

XVIII. But in caſe through inadvertancy or imprudence, any thing ſhould be committed by any ſubject, whereby any article of this treaty hath not its effect, this peace ſhall not be interrupted or broken; but that ſubject alone ſhall be anſwerable for his own fact.

XIX. In caſe of a future war, ſix months from the day of the rupture ſhall be allowed to the ſubjects of each nation, to remove all their effects, and retire themſelves where they pleaſe.

XX. Juſt and reaſonable ſatisfaction ſhall be given to all the queen's allies, in thoſe matters which they have a right to demand from France.

XXI. The moſt chriſtian king will, in friendſhip to the queen, grant, in his treaty with the empire, all things concerning religion, to be ſettled according to the treaties of Weſtphalia.

XXII. Juſtice ſhall be done to the family of Hamilton, concerning the dukedom of Chatelaraut, to the duke of Richmond, concerning ſuch requeſts as he has to make in France, and to Charles Douglas, concerning certain lands, and to others.

XXIII. All priſoners taken during the war, ſhall be ſet at liberty without diſtinction or ranſom.

XXIV. All the conditions of the peace made this day, between the kings of France and Portugal, are confirmed by this treaty, and the queen of Great-Britain takes upon herſelf to be guarantee.

XXV. The peace made this day between France and Savoy, is particularly included in this treaty, her majeſty of Great-Britain expreſly declaring, ſhe will be bound by the ſtipulations of ſecurity and guarantee promiſed therein, as well as by thoſe, ſhe has formerly taken upon herſelf.

XXVI. Sweden, Tuſcany, Genoa, and Parma, are in the beſt manner included in this treaty, XXVII. Their majeſties have alſo been pleaſed to comprehend in this treaty the Hans-Towns, namely Lubeck, Bremen, and Hamburg, and the city of Dantzick, with this effect, that as ſoon as the general peace ſhall be concluded, the Hans-Towns, and the city of Dantzick, may for the future, as common friends, enjoy the antient advantages which they have heretofore had in the buſineſs of trade, either by treaties, or by old cuſtom.

XXVIII. Thoſe ſhall be comprehended in this preſent treaty of peace who ſhall be named by common conſent, on the one part, and on the other before the exchange of the ratifications, or within ſix months after.

XXIX. Laſtly, ſolemn ratifications for this preſent treaty, and made in due form, ſhall be exhibited on both ſides at Utrecht, and mutually and duly exchanged within the ſpace of four weeks, to be computed from the day of the ſigning, or ſooner if poſſible.

XXX. In witneſs whereof, We the underwritten ambaſſador extraordinary, and plenipotentiaries of the queen of Great-Britain, and of the moſt

* In this article are included, I. The French king's letters patents which admit the renunciations of the king of Spain, and thoſe of the dukes of Berry and Orleans. II. The king of Spain's renunciation. III. The duke of Berry's renunciation. IV. The duke of Orleans's renunciation. V. The French king's letters patent of December 1700.

chriſtian king, have put our ſeals to theſe preſent inſtruments, ſubſcribed with our own hands, at Utrecht the 31ſt day of March and 11th of April in the year 1713.

(L. S.) Joh. Briſtol. C. P. S.
(L. S.) Strafford.
(L. S.) Huxelles.
(L. S.) Meſnager.

II. Between Great-Britain and Spain.

I. Perpetual peace and true friendſhip.

II. Againſt the union of the kingdoms of Spain and France, as in the VIth article of the treaty with France.

III. A general amneſty on both ſides.

IV. All priſoners to be freed without ranſom.

V. and VI. Concerning the acknowledging and promiſing not to diſturb the proteſtant ſucceſſion, as in the IVth and Vth articles of the treaty with France.

VII. That the ordinary diſtribution of Juſtice be reſtored.

VIII. That there be a free uſe of navigation and commerce, as it was in the reign of Charles II. of Spain, and alſo according to the treaties of commerce which are now, or will forthwith be made at Madrid. And whereas it is by common conſent, eſtabliſhed as a fundamental rule, that the exerciſe of navigation and commerce to the Spaniſh Weſt-Indies, ſhall be as in the time of the ſaid Charles II, that therefore this rule may be obſerved inviolably, it is eſpecially agreed, that no licence ſhall at any time be given to the French, or any other nation, to introduce Negroes, goods, merchandizes, or any things whatſoever into the Spaniſh American dominions, except what may be agreed by the treaty of commerce aforeſaid, and the privileges granted in the aſſiento de Negroes, mentioned in the XIIth article, except alſo what the catholic king or his ſucceſſors ſhall promiſe by any contract, after the aſſiento de Negroes is determined. It is further agreed, that none of the Spaniſh dominions in America ſhall ever be alienated from the crown of Spain, to the French or other nation. On the contrary, the queen of Great-Britain will endeavour and aſſiſt the Spaniards, that the antient limits of their American dominions be ſettled, as in the time of Charles II.

IX. The ſubjects of each kingdom ſhall, in all countries, have at leaſt the ſame privileges as to duties, or cuſtoms, and ſhall have the like favour in all things, as the ſubjects of France, or any nation they favoured, do or ſhall hereafter enjoy.

X. Gibraltar is given up to the crown of Great-Britain: But (to prevent abuſes by importing any goods) without any territorial juriſdiction, and without any open communication by land with the country round about. Proviſions, however, and other neceſſaries in time of ſcarcity, may be bought with money for the uſe of the garriſon and ſhips in the harbour. No leave ſhall be given to Jews or Moors to reſide there, nor ſhelter to any Mooriſh ſhips of war, whereby the communication between Spain and Ceuta may be obſtructed, or the coaſts of Spain infeſted. The free exerciſe of their religion ſhall be granted to the catholic inhabitants: and in caſe the town of Gibraltar ſhall hereafter be granted or ſold, Spain ſhall have the preference of having the ſame.

XI. The iſland of Minorca, with all its towns and caſtles, particularly Port-Mahon, is alſo yielded to the crown of Great-Briton. No refuge to be given to Mooriſh ſhips, but only on account of traffic. In caſe of alienation, the crown of Spain to have the preference. The inhabitants to enjoy their religion, eſtates, and honours; and thoſe that retire, to ſell their eſtates.

XII. The catholic king grants to the South-Sea company, with excluſion of all others, the contract for introducing Negroes into his American dominions, commonly called el Pacto del Aſſiento de Negroes, for the ſpace of thirty years, beginning from the 1ſt of May 1713, with the ſame conditions enjoyed by the French, together with tracks of land on the river of Plata, ſufficient for the ſubſiſtance of thoſe who are in the ſervice of the company, and of their Negroes. The ſhips of the company may alſo come cloſe to land; but a Spaniſh officer ſhall be appointed to take care that nothing be done, contrary to his maſter's intereſts, and all belonging to the company ſhall be ſubject to the inſpection of the officer, as to matters relating to the tracks of land, and diſputes to be refered to the governor of Buenos Ayres. The contract of the Aſſiento concluded at Madrid, the 26th of March 1713. with all its conditions, not contrary to this article, is deemed as part of this treaty

XIII. At the earneſt deſire of the queen of Great-Britain, that the Catalonians ſhould not only obtain a full and perpetual oblivion of all that was done in the late war, and enjoy all their eſtates and honours, the catholic king hereby grants the deſired amneſty, and all the privileges which the Caſtilians enjoy, or may hereafter enjoy.

XIV. As Sicily is by this treaty yielded to the duke of Savoy, the queen of Great-Britain will take care, that in default of heirs-male, the poſſeſſion of Sicily ſhall revert to the crown of Spain, and not be alienated on any pretence whatſoever, unleſs to the catholic king.

XV. All treaties heretofore concluded between the two crowns are hereby confirmed, as far as they are not contrary to thoſe treaties lately made and ſigned. And as the Guipuſcoans pretend to certain rights of fiſhing at Newfoundland, it is agreed, that all ſuch privileges as they and other people of Spain are able to claim by right, ſhall be allowed them.

XVI, XVII, and XVIII. The ſame as XVIIth, XVIIIth, and XIXth. of the treaty with France.

XIX. The kings, princes, and ſtates, mentioned in the following articles, and all others nominated on either ſide by common conſent, before the ratifications are exchanged, or within ſix months after, ſhall be included in this treaty.

XX. Whatſoever ſhall be contained in a treaty between Spain and Portugal, with the approbation of Great-Britain, ſhall be deemed an eſſential part of this treaty.

XXI. The treaty of peace this day made between Spain and Savoy, is included in this treaty, the queen of Great-Britain declaring, ſhe will be obliged by the terms of promiſe and guarantee therein made.

XXII. Sweden, Tuſcany, and Parma, ſhall be included in this treaty.

XXIII. And alſo the republic of Venice, for the ſake of the neutrality they have obſerved, and the many acts of humanity performed by them.

XXIV. And the republic of Genoa, on the ſame accounts.

XXV. The city of Dantzick ſhall alſo be included.

XXVI. Solemn ratifications of this treaty ſhall be exchanged on both ſides, within ſix weeks or ſooner.

In witneſs whereof the ambaſſadors and plenipotentiaries ſigned and ſealed this preſent treaty at Utrecht, the one on the 2d and the other on the 13th day of July, 1713.

(L. S.) Joh. Briſtol. C. P. S.
(L. S.) Strafford.
(L. S.) Duc de Oſſuna.
(L. S.) El Marque de Montaleone.

Seperate Articles.

I. Since his catholic majeſty is ſteadfaſtly reſolved, and does ſolemnly promiſe by theſe preſents, that he will not conſent to any further alienation of countries, provinces, or lands belonging to the crown of Spain, the queen of Great-Britain does likewiſe promiſe, that ſhe will perſiſt in thoſe meaſures, by which ſhe has taken care, that none of the parties in war ſhall require or obtain of his catholic majeſty, that any farther part of the Spaniſh monarchy be torn from it. And when it ſhall ſeem to the queen of Great-Britain to be for the common benefit, the king of Spain does give his conſent, that a new treaty be entered into between Great-Britain, Spain, and Portugal.

II. The queen of Great-Britain obliges herſelf to procure forthwith the lady Urſini to be put into poſſeſſion of the dutchy of Limburg, or other countries in the Netherlands, which ſhall produce an annual clear revenue of 30,000l. Scudos, according to the diploma granted by his catholic majeſty to that princeſs, the 28th day of September, 1711. *

* This princeſs having quitted her rank and perogatives at the court of Rome, was made firſt lady of the bed-chamber to the queen of Spain, whom ſhe met at Nice in Provence, and conducted into Spain. Afterwards, when the regency of Spain was truſted to the queen, at the king's going to command his armies in Italy, the princeſs Urſini aſſiſted her with her care and counſel. She likewiſe took upon her the care of the education of the prince of Aſturias. Theſe are the reaſons alledged by the king, for his granting her the territory of Limburg, and obliging the queen of Great-Britain to procure it for her.

15 JY 60

THE

INDEX

To TINDAL's CONTINUATION of RAPIN's HISTORY of ENGLAND.

VOL. I.

N. B. The numbers expreſſed by figures refer to the pages; K. ſtands for King, D. for Duke, &c.

A.

ABDICATION: debates about it, 20
Aberdeen, earl of, William Gordon, brought priſoner to London, 537
Abington, earl of, Montague Bertie, his motion in the debate about the union, 495, 496
Abington, earl of, Montague-Venable Bertie, made juſtice in eyre, and his counteſs one of the ladies of the bedchamber, 616
Abjuration of K. James II. bill for it, 86
Accounts, public, examined into, 621
Acts for ſuſpending the habeas corpus act, 32, of toleration, 35, for declaring the rights and liberties of the ſubject, and ſettling the ſucceſſion to the crown, 39 and 284, of ſettlement in Ireland, repealed, 58, for relief of the proteſtant Iriſh clergy, 66, of indemnity, 87, for raiſing the ſubſidy in 1691, 106, for abrogating the oath of ſupremacy in Ireland, &c. 126, for recognition of their majeſties title to the crown of Ireland, 142, for encouragement of proteſtant ſtrangers to ſettle in that kingdom, ibid. to prevent frauds by clandeſtine mortgages, 154, to prevent malicious informations in the crown-office, ibid. to erect a company in Scotland trading to Africa and the Eaſt-Indies, 183, in favour of the epiſcopal clergy in Scotland, 185, for regulating trials in caſes of high-treaſon, 197, for remedying the ill ſtate of the coin, 198, 216, to enforce the ſigning of the aſſociation, 209, for attainting ſir John Fenwick, 224, and all concerned in the conſpiracy, ibid. for ſettling the African company, 240, againſt papiſts, 260, for renewing the Eaſt-India company, 240, for the proteſtant ſucceſſion, 284, &c. for attainting the pretender, 319, act that the ſolemn affirmation of the quakers ſhall be accepted inſtead of an oath, 322, for the union of England and Scotland, 349, act of commiſſion for a treaty between England and Scotland, 438, &c. for regency, 455, the act which declared the Scots aliens, repealed, 456, for ratifying and approving the treaty of union, 488, for cofirming the union, 496. for ſettling the manner of election of the ſixteen peers in Scotland, 489
Act for improving the union of the two kingdoms, 76, for naturaliſing all foreign proteſtants, 73, for the South-ſea trade, 133
Addiſon, Joſeph, his letter to the E. of Mancheſter, about the affair of the Ruſſian embaſſador, 69, made ſecretary to the lieutenant of Ireland, 70, has a hand in the Criſis, 704, aſſiſts R. Steel at his trial, 710
Addreſſes to K. James II. 15
Addreſs of both houſes to K. William, promiſing aſſiſtance for the reduction of Ireland, 38, of the houſe of commons for a war with France, 60, for removing French papiſts, ibid. from the lords to put the iſles of Wight, Jerſey, Guernſey, &c. in a poſture of defence, 64, for removing the marquiſſes of Caermarthen and Halifax, 65, from the convocation, 74, to Q. Mary, from the city of London, 93, from the tinners in Cornwall, 94, from Middleſex, ibid. from both houſes to the king and queen, 105, 124, of advice from the lords to the king, 151, upon the ſtate of Ireland, 152, addreſſes to the king on the queen's death, 172, about the Scottiſh Eaſt-India company, 182, about a grant made to the E. of Portland, 201, of both houſes on the diſcovery of the aſſaſſination plot, 207, againſt profaneneſs and immorality, 242, againſt the woollen manufactory in Ireland, 243, for diſbanding the army, 251, about the Dutch guards, ibid. againſt the papiſts and jacobites, 252, about the navy, ibid. from Scotland, about the affair of Darien, 263, of the commons againſt the partition treaty, 287, of the lords complaining of the ſame, 290, of the commons deſiring the king to remove the lords Somers, Orford, and Halifax, from his preſence and councils, 295, counter-addreſs of the lords, ibid. addreſſes to the city of London, and other parts of the kingdom, upon the proclaiming of the pretender in France 315, from the lords and commons upon that occaſion, 317, 318, from the commons to the king, that he would deſire the allies to increaſe their quotas of land-forces, and provide for the half-pay officers in the firſt place, 320, from the convocation to the king, 335, addreſs of condolance to Q. Anne from the biſhops and clergy in London, from the diſſenters, and from counties, cities, &c. 344, of the commons about the princeſs Sophia, 350, concerning biſhop Lloyd, 365, of the lords, ibid. on the ill managers of the funds, 371, of the commons on account of the plot in Scotland, 399, their addreſs upon the lords appointing a ſelect committee, 401, from the parliament of Scotland, 412, 413, from the houſe of lords in England about Scotland, 427, from the commons, to deſire that the allies might furniſh their complete quota's, 429, about the ſucceſſion of Scotland in the houſe of Hanover, and for promoting the union, 454, addreſs from both houſes, concerning the endeavours uſed for creating jealouſies between the Dutch and us, 457, of both houſes concerning the danger of the church, 460, of thanks from the commons to the queen, for her tender regard to the privileges of their houſe, ibid. draught of an addreſs from the upper houſe of convocation, 463, another form drawn up by the lower houſe, ibid. of Scotland againſt the union, 488, congratulatory addreſſes upon the union, 498, from the French refugees to the queen in favour of their brethren perſecuted in France, ibid.
Addreſs from the lords about the admiralty, 524, from the commons for the relief of the Scotch merchants, ibid. from both houſes, not to make peace without the reſtitution of all Spain, 526, of the commons about the number of Engliſh forces in Spain and Portugal, at the time of the battle of Almanza, 530, 531, the ſame addreſs renewed, ibid. their addreſs of thanks to the queen, for taking meaſures to reſtore the affairs in Spain, ibid. addreſs of the lords and commons, upon the news of the pretender's intended deſcent in Scotland, 532, another of the commons thereupon, 533, and of the lords, ibid. of condolence upon the death of prince George, 563, for demoliſhing of Dunkirk, 569, to the queen for marrying again, ibid. about dr. Sacheverell's trial, 610, of both houſes to order the duke of Marlborough into Holland, 611, againſt the offers of France, 651, addreſs of thanks by the commons about the peace, 263, of the city of London, and other places, 665, addreſſes on account of the peace, debates about them, 690, 691, &c. of thanks from the commons for the treaties of peace and commerce, 695, for having the pretender removed out of Lorrain, 696, 714, againſt the public ſpirit of the whigs, 708, about the Spaniſh trade, 723, about the Aſſiento contract, ibid.

Admiralty, a motion made in the houſe of commons, to adviſe his majeſty to make ſuch commiſſioners of the admiralty, as were of known experience in maritime affairs, 150, the ſtate of it enquired into by the houſe of lords, 429
Advocates, faculty of, the pretender's medal ſent to them, 630
Aeth taken by the French, 229, by the allies, 474, a deſcription of that place, ibid.
African company of Scotland, 183
African trade regulated, 240
Aghrim, battle of, 116
Aileſbury-men; five of them bring an action againſt the conſtable of that corporation, 430
Aiſlabie, John, ſpeaks againſt the bill for confirming the treaty of commerce, 695, leaves the court party, and is removed for being one of the lords of the admiralty, 717, ſpeaks againſt the peace, ibid.
Alexander VIII. pope, choſen, 69
Algiers; the peace between that regency and England renewed, 389
Alicant caſtle ſurrenders, 583
Alliance, offenſive and defenſive concluded between the emperor and the ſtates-general, 68, between England, Holland, and Denmark, 308, 309, between France and Portugal, 310, between the emperor, England, and Holland, 311
Almanara, battle of, 604
Almanza, battle of, 502, &c. Engliſh regiments there, ibid. 617 and 618
Almirante of Caſtile, propoſes that archduke Charles ſhould be made K. of Spain, 394
Altena, burnt by the Swedes, 688
Ambaſſadors, bill for preſerving their privileges, 569
Ambrun taken by the D. of Savoy, 141
Anabaptiſts, account of them, 33, 71, 332
Anjou, D. of. See Philip V. K. of Spain.
Angleſea, Arthur Annefley, E. of, votes with the whig lords, 713, and again with the court lords, 715, ſet down for one of the regency, 714, ſups with Bollingbroke, ibid. promiſed the government of Ireland, ibid. joins with the whigs, 715, ſpeaks for the ſchiſm-bill, 721, moves to have that bill extended to Ireland, ibid.
Anandale, William Johnſtoun, marquis of, takes upon him the government of Scotland, 42, in a plot againſt K. William, 82, &c. made preſident of the council in Scotland, 377, and knight of the thiſtle, 383, made ſecretary of ſtate, 436, preſſes the ſettling of the ſucceſſion, ibid. preſents a memorial to the parliament, ibid. made preſident of the council, 441, careſſed by the cavaliers, ibid. was againſt the union, 484
Q. Anne, her acceſſion to the crown, 340, the prince of Hanover comes over to make his addreſſes to her, ibid. is married to prince George of Denmark, ibid. their iſſue, ibid. makes the lady Churchill her great favourite, ibid. her father's endeavours to pervert her to popery, 341, withdraws from court, and goes to Nottingham, after the prince of Orange's landing, ibid. great coolneſs between her and K. William and Q. Mary, ibid. was prejudited againſt the whigs, 342, her ſpeech to the privy-council, ibid. her agreeable manner in pronouncing her ſpeeches, 343, forms her miniſtry, and admits many tories, 347, her letter to the ſtates of Holland, 344, her civil liſt ſettled, 346, declares war againſt France, 347, orders the princeſs Sophia's name to be put into the public prayers, 349, recommends to the parliament the union of England and Scotland, ibid. a pretended deſign to exclude her from the ſucceſſion, ibid. refuſes to receive an addreſs from the duke of Hamilton, and other lords in Scotland, 354, reſolves to maintain the ſeſſion of the parliament there, ibid. appoints commiſſioners to treat about an union between England and Scotland, ibid. makes an order againſt ſelling of offices in her houſehold, 363, goes to Bath, &c. ibid. dines at Guildhall in London, 365, goes in ſtate to St. Paul's on the thankſgiving-day for the victory of Vigo, ibid. deſires ſome proviſion for her huſband prince George, ibid. touches for the evil, 375, the K. of Spain, (Charles III.) has an interview with her at Windſor, 396, her ſentiments about the occaſional conformity-bill, 397, endeavoured to diſſuade the parliament from bringing it in again, ibid. her ſpeech on the account of the plot in Scotland, 399, her anſwer to the lords addreſs about ſettling the crown of Scotland in the houſe of Hanover, 404, gives the firſt-fruits and tenths to the clergy, 406, preſſed by the E. of Nottingham to diſmiſs the dukes of Somerſet and Devonſhire from her cabinet-council, 409, is deſirous of having the ſucceſſion ſettled in Scotland, 410, her anſwer to the commons about the Aileſbury men, 431, her anſwer to the repreſentation of the lords upon the ſame ſubject, 432, her letter to the parliament of Scotland, 436, another letter of her's, appointing the lord archbiſhop Campbel to have the place and vote of high-treaſurer, ibid. amazed at the tories propoſal, of bringing over the next ſucceſſor, 455, her anſwer to the addreſs about the danger of the church, 460, another about the privileges of the houſe of commons, ibid. her letter to the archbiſhop of Canterbury about the convocation, 463, goes to the meeting of the commiſſioners for the union of the two kingdoms, and makes ſpeeches to them, 467, the articles of the union are repreſented to her, ibid. &c. her ſpeech of thanks to them, 468, inclined to pacific meaſures, 490, mr. Harley in her confidence, 491, her ſpeech concerning the union, 492, another at paſſing the bill for enacting it, 496, revives the parliament, and declares her pleaſure for holding the firſt parliament of Great-Britain, 498, was againſt the E. of Sunderland's being made ſecretary of ſtate, 499, forms a project jointly with the ſtates-general and the D. of Savoy to invade Provence, 513, her letter to the emperor about the conqueſt of Naples, ibid. takes mrs. Maſham and mr. Harley into her utmoſt confidence, at which the ducheſs of Marlborough is extremely uneaſy, 519, 520, the ducheſs's letters to her majeſty upon that occaſion, ibid. is made jealous of the duke of Marlborough's too great power, ibid. the L. Godolphin threatens to quit her ſervice if mr. Harley continued in her confidence, ibid. her ſpeech to her firſt Britiſh parliament, 521, diſpleaſed with the lords addreſs about the admiralty, 524, uneaſy at the D. of Marlborough's offering to reſign, 531, remarkable variations in her ſpeeches, 533, 534, a letter from her to the D. of Marlborough, 538, another to him after the victory of Oudenard, 561, does not come to parliament, but grants a commiſſion to ſeveral lords to repreſent her, 562, her anſwer to the commons addreſs for marrying again, 569, ratifies the preliminaries of peace, 577, books written againſt her title, 588, biſhop Burnet ſpeaks to her with great freedom about the pretender, 596, begins a change in her miniſtry, ibid. 597, &c. her anſwer to the addreſſes about dr. Sacheverell's trial, 610, writes to the D. of Marlborough to give the E. of Eſſex's regiment to J. Hill, ibid. deſiſts from her undertaking, ibid. communicates to the E. of Godolphin her reſolution of making the E. of Shrewſbury lord-chamberlain, 612, the ducheſs of Marlborough waits upon her majeſty for the laſt time, 612, the queen diſmiſſes the E. of Godolphin from his employments, 613, delighted with the alteration ſhe had made in the miniſtry, 614, tells the D. of Marlborough he was not to expect the thanks of both houſes, as uſual, 617, her name expoſed to cover all the negotiations of the peace, 633, mr. Meſnager had a private converſation with her, and ſpeaks to her in favour of the ptetender, 634, the elector of Hanover's memorial ſhewn to her, 635, ſhe cloſets the D. of Marlborough and ſeveral other lords, 636, diſmiſſes the D. of Marlborough from all his employments, 639, her proclamation for ſuppreſſing the Mohocks, 647, acknowledged queen by the K. of France, 650, her anſwer to the lords addreſs againſt the offers of France, 651, communicates the plan of peace to the parliament, 661, her anſwer to the commons addreſs of thanks upon that occation, 665, and to the lords addreſs, ibid. her new plan of peace, 683, 684, tries to prevent the electorate prince of Saxony's turning papiſt, 684, her anſwer to the letter of the ſtates-general, 685, ratifies the treaty of peace and commerce, 690, cauſes ſeveral French proteſtants to be releaſed from the gallies, 700, is ill, 704, dr. Shadwell's account of her illneſs, ibid. and 705, has a fit of the gout, ibid. the proteſtants write a letter to her, concerning the clauſe in the fourth article of the treaty of Ryſwick, ibid. taken ill again, 711, her anſwer to the lord's addreſs in behalf of the Hanoverian ſucceſſion, and for removing the pretender out of Lorrain, 714, her letter to the princeſs Sophia, 718, again indiſpoſed, 722, an impoſthumation, ibid. her anſwer to the addreſs about the Spaniſh trade, 723, and about the Aſſiento, 724, extremely ſhocked at the quarrel between her miniſters, 725, her laſt illneſs, ibid. conſtitutes the D. of Shrewſbury lord-treaſurer, ibid. dies, 726, not able to receive the ſacrament nor ſign her will, ibid. her character, ibid. a ſtrict obſerver of forms, 727, queſtioned whether ſhe knew any thing of the deſign of bringing in the pretender. 728. impoſed upon by her miniſtry, ibid.

Anſpach, Carolina, princeſs of, is courted by K. Charles III. but refuſes to embrace popery, 519, is married to the electoral prince of Brunſwick, and becomes Q. of Great-Britain, ibid.
Antinomians, 327, &c.
Antwerp reduced by the allies, 473
Argyle, Archibald Campbel, E. of, account of him, 42, commiſſioner from the convention to K. William, 50, made duke, 274, is head of the preſbyterians in Scotland, 378, made high-commiſſioner, 428, created baron of Chatham, and earl of Greenwich, 458, is preſent at the battle of Oudenarde, 542, takes poſſeſſion of Ghent, 554, the battle of Malplaquet, 580, his ſpeech at dr. Sachaverell's trial, 593, objects againſt the D. of Marlborough's being thanked by the houſe of lords, 616, called from the ſervice in Flanders, and appointed to command the Engliſh forces in Spain, 627, had acted in conſtant oppoſition to the D. of Marlborough, ibid. goes through the Hague without viſiting that duke, 628, does not receive the expected remittances, ibid. borrows 10,000l. on his own credit, ibid. complains of his not being ſupported, ibid. returns to England, and is ſilent, ibid. ſpeaks againſt the reſumption of K. William's grants, 647, excuſes the orders given to the D. of Ormond, not to fight, 658, oppoſes the malt-tax in Scotland, 693, reflected on in the public ſpirit of the whigs, 708, breaks all meaſures with the miniſtry, ibid. removed from all his places, 711, his account of the diſtreſſed condition of France, 713, repairs to council, 725
Arminius and Arminians, 325, 326, &c.
Army; the agents of the army oppreſs the common ſoldiers 174, 175, the king orders the officers of the army to examine all informations and complaints, ibid. conſultations about the ſtanding army, 236, papers for and againſt a ſtanding army, ibid. the commons reſolve to pay off and diſband the army, 238, liſt of the army, ibid. reduced to ten thouſand men, ibid. the confederate army, their bravery at the battle of Ramillies, 741, &c. defeat the French at Oudenarde, 542, demoliſhes the French lines, and raiſes contributions as far as Arras, and plunders Picardy, 546
Arran, James Hamilton, earl of, endeavours to reſtore K. James III. 32, ſent to the Tower, ibid. his propoſal to the Scotch lords aſſembled at London, 44
Aſgill, John, his abſurd notions, 331, ſpeaks againſt the bill for farther preventing the growth of popery, 461, expelled the houſe of commons for a book of his, 524
Aſhburnham, John lord, made deputy-warden of the Cinque-Ports, and colonel of the firſt troop of horſe-guards, 698, votes with the whig lords, 713, and again with the court, 714, reflected on by the D. of Argyle, 713
Aſhby and White, their caſe, 404
Aſhby, ſir John, his conduct at la Hogue fight, 132, examined before the houſe of commons, 144
Aſhley, lord, unable to proceed in his ſpeech in the houſe of commons, 197. See E. of Shafteſbury.
Aſhton enters into a plot to reſtore king James, 109, ſeized, ibid, tried, condemned, and executed, 111, 112, his dying ſpeech, ibid.
Aſſaſſination plot, 129, &c. and 202
Aſſociation ſigned by the commons, 208, and by the lords, ibid. and all over England, 209, an act to enforce the ſigning of it, ibid, ſigned in Scotland, 215
Athanaſian Creed, 72
Athlone, ſummoned, 96, beſieged, 115, and taken, ibid.
Athlone, E. of. See Ginckle.
Athol, John Murray, marquis of, created duke, 383, made knight of the thiſtle, ibid. a letter from the pretender directed to him, 398, the conſpiracy in Scotland ſaid to be a contrivance to ruin him, 402, his memorial hereupon, ibid. lord-privy-ſeal for Scotland, his ſpeech in his own vindication about the plot, 439, his proteſt againſt the Scots being declared aliens, 440, letter ſent to him by the pretender, 484, is againſt the union, 485, was for violent meaſures, ibid. engaged deeply in the pretender's intereſt and receives letters from him, 536, ſworn of the privy-council, 690
Atterbury, Francis, his letter to a convocation man, 333, his character, ibid. his letter reprinted with additions, 334, approved of, 337, choſen prolocutor of the convocation, 623, draws up a repreſentation, 624, thought that a prorogation put an end to all matters not finiſhed, 653, made biſhop of Rocheſter, and dean of Weſtminſter, 698
Augſburg: the elector of Bavaria endeavours to ſeize it, 393, deſcription of that city, ibid. taken by the elector of Bavaria, 394, the czar complains of him, 498
Auguſtine, St. his doctrine made by our reformers the ſtandard of religion, 326
Auguſtine, fort St. in North America, attacked by the Engliſh, 376
Auguſtus K. of Poland, engaged in a war with the K. of Sweden, 355, defeated by that king, 360, is depoſed, 396, retires into Saxony, ibid. cauſes the two princes Sobieſki to be taken priſoners, ibid. his Saxon dominions are invaded by the K. of Sweden, 481, makes a peace with that king, ibid. reſigns Poland and Lithuania, ibid. ſerves as volunteer at the ſiege of Liſle, 547, pretends that the reſignation of the crown of Poland was extorted from him, 584
Auguſtus king of Poland, his forces aſſiſt the czar, 609
Auſtin, Robert, made one of the commiſſioners of the admiralty, 154
Auxiliaries in Britiſh pay, retained by the ſtates, 666, refuſe to march with the D. of Ormond, 668, their pay and ſubſidies from England taken from them, 670
Ayleſbury, Thomas Bruce, E. of, proclamation for apprehending him, 94, concerned in the aſſaſſination plot, 202, goes to France, and has a ſecret conference with K. Lewis, ibid. committed to the Tower, 211, releaſed upon bail, 227

B.

Baden, prince Lewis of, his bravery in Hungary, 123, and in Germany, 157, comes to England, 164, commands on the Rhine, which he paſſes, and takes a great booty, 168, commands the Imperialiſts, 194, takes Eberenburg, 235, inveſts Landau, 357, 358, defeats the French at the battle of Fridlinguen, 359, hinders the elector of Bavaria from ſeizing Augſburg, 393, ſends the D. of Marlborough an expreſs with intercepted letters, 414, it is agreed that he and the duke ſhould command each day alternately, ibid. wounded at the battle of Schellenberg, 415, jealous of the D. of Marlborough's ſucceſs, 418, and 442, promiſed to join him, but failed him, ibid. ſuſpected of favouring the French, ibid. the emperor ſends to expoſtulate the matter with him, 445, publiſhes thereupon a manifeſto, ibid. forces the French lines at Hagenau, ibid. nothing however conſiderable done by him, ibid. the emperor Joſeph diſſatisfied with him, ibid. dies, 501
Baden, a congreſs there, 706
Baker, major, bravely defends Londenderry, 54
Bangor, biſhop of. See Hoadley.
Bank erected, 165, complaints againſt it, 174, 800,000 l. engrafted upon it, 217, bank-notes, ibid. land-bank, 209, fails, 217, great demand upon it, 535
Barcelona beſieged by the allies, 448, &c. ſurrenders, 449, beſieged by king Philip, who raiſes the ſiege, 474
Barrier-Treaty with the States, 645, complained of, ibid. condemned by the houſe of commons, 646, a new one propoſed, 683, ſigned, 684
Barſello, a deſcription of it, 393, taken by the French, ibid.
Baſville, monſieur de, intendant of Languedoc, 388
Bathurſt, Allen, created a baron, 641
Battle of Boyne, 90, of Aghrim, 116, of la Hogue, 130, of Steenkirk, 136, of Landen, 155, of Marſaglia, 157, of Scardingen, 390, of Schellenberg, 414, of Hochſtet, 416, of Ramillies, 471, of Turin, 478, of Kaliſh, 481, 502, &c. of Oudenard, 542, of Blareignes, or Malplaquet, 580, of Almanara, 604, of Saragoza, 607, of Villaviciosa, 608
Bavaria, Maximilian elector of, commands the Imperialiſts, 104, made governor of Flanders, 123, puts that country in a good ſtate, 134, left commander in chief there, 142, commands an army in the Netherlands, 186, at the ſiege of Namur, 187, his bravery, 193, was to have Spain, &c. by the partition-treaty, 247, has ſeveral negotiations with the emperor, 355, declares for France, ibid. and 358, ſurpriſes Ulm, ibid. defeated by count Stirum, 391, defeats the Imperialiſts, ibid. takes Ratiſbon, 390, marches into Tirol, and takes Inſpruck, 393, driven out by the boors, ibid. takes Augſburg, 394, the D. of Marlborough enters into a treaty with him, but the elector refuſes to ſign it, 415, ſupriſes Dieſt, 444, appointed to command on the Rhine inſtead of the Netherlands, 539, gains ſome intereſt in that country by his profuſeneſs and popular behaviour, 541, beſieges Bruſſels, and raiſes the ſiege, 551, gives out hopes of a peace, 571, propoſal from France to reſtore him to his dominions, and to give him Sardinia and Sicily, 675, 678, comes to Paris and has a conference with L. Bolingbroke, 675, Sardinia to be given to him, 684, renounces the Spaniſh Netherlands, 691

Baxter, Richard, his reformed liturgy, 329, refuſes the ſee of Hereford, 330
Beaufort, Henry Somerſet, duke of, his ſaying to the queen, 613, ſworn a privy-counſellor, 616, appointed captain of the band of gentlemen penſioners, 641, moves for an addreſs of thanks about the peace, 690, inſtalled knight of the garter, 700, dies, 722
Bedford, earl of, created marquis of Taviſtock, and D. of Bedford, 165
Bentinck, William, a great favourite of K. William, made groom of the ſtole, and privy-purſe, 29, created baron of Cirenceſter, viſcount of Woodſtock, and E. of Portland, 33. See Portland.
Berkley, James, earl of, appointed to command the fleet, 726
Berwick, James Fitz-James, D. of, ſails from Ireland into France with king James, 91, 96, returns, and is left commander of the French forces in Ireland, 100, taken priſoner at the battle of Landen, 156, takes Segura, Salvaterra, and many other places in Portugal, 424, defeats a body of the Dutch, paſſes the Tagus, and inveſts Portalegre, ibid. defeats the allies at Almanza, 502, &c. plunders the neighbourhood of Saluſſus, 679
Bethune, deſcription of it, 608, taken, ibid.
Beveridge, dr. William, is offered the biſhopric of Bath and Wells, which he declines, 113, one of the promoters of the ſociety for reformation of manners, 241, made biſhop of St. Aſaph, 435, dies, 538
Bill for excluding placemen from ſitting in parliament, 148, 372, 596, 620, for limiting their number, 708, 709, for aſcertaining the fees of officers of juſtice rejected, 148, touching the free and impartial proceedings in parliament, ibid. paſſes both houſes, but the king refuſes it, 163, for frequent calling and meeting of parliaments, 151, rejected, 163, paſſed at laſt, 172, for continuing the parliament notwithſtanding the king's death, 208, to prevent the publiſhing of any news without licence, 227, for diſbanding the army, 250, preliminaries of the bill of ſucceſſion, 284, that bill paſſed, 285, for the union of England and Scotland, 349, againſt occaſional conformity, 368, 397, that no perſons be choſen members of parliament but ſuch as have a ſufficient real eſtate, 373, to prevent occaſional conformity, 424, for an union with Scotland, 427, for the naturalization of the French proteſtants, 432, 433, ſelf-denying bill, 433, for a regency, intitled a bill for the better ſecurity of her majeſty's perſon and government, and of the ſucceſſion to the crown of England, 455, for further preventing the growth of popery, 461, for correcting ſome of the proceedings of the common law and chancery, 462, for enacting the union, 496, for a general naturalization of all proteſtants, 564, about privileges of ambaſſadors, 569, to repeal the naturalization act, 619, for building fifty new churches in and about London, 624, to give the electoral prince of Hanover, as D. of Cambridge, the precedence of all peers, 639, 643, for a toleration of the epiſcopal clergy in Scotland, 646, for making good the 8th and 9th articles of the treaty of commerce, 692, rejected, 694
Births, marriages, and burials, a tax on them, 169
Biſhops, their votes taken away, 10, excuſe themſelves from cauſing K. James II. declaration to be read in all churches, 17, tried for the ſame, and acquitted, ibid. excuſe themſelves from declaring under their hands their abhorrence of the prince of Orange's invaſion, 18, ſeveral of them refuſe to take the oaths, 32, move for a bill of toleration, and another of comprehenſion, 33, 70, biſhops of Gloceſter, Ely, Norwich, Bath and Wells, and Peterborough, ſuſpended, 70, letter from the biſhops in Scotland to K. James, 41, their proceedings in the convention there, 44, nonjuring a ſevere pamphlet againſt them, 94, diſown what was therein aſſerted, 95, are in a plot, ibid. neglect the concerns of the church, 113, the biſhops looked upon by many of the clergy as betrayers of the rights of the church, 334, blame upon the loſs of the occaſional conformity bill 369, conteſt between them and the lower houſe of convocation, 374, their behaviour upon the occaſional conformity bill being brought in again, 398, diſputes between them and the lower-houſe of convocation, 408
Blackall, Ofspring, made biſhop of Exeter, 521
Blenheim, a deſcription of that place, and battle near it, 415, the ſtandards and colours taken there hung up in Weſtminſter-hall, 428
Blenheim-Houſe, 429
Blount, Charles, his book to prove K. William and Q. Mary conquerors, burnt, 150
Bolingbroke, L. viſcount. See St. John.
Bolton, Charles Paulet, D. of, dies, 255, his odd character, ibid.
Bonne beſieged by the allies, 389, taken, ibid. a deſcription of it, ibid.
Bonneval, monſieur de, invades Ferrara, and takes ſeveral places belonging to the pope, 558, 559
Booth, George, lord de la Mere, afterwards earl of Warrington, made chancellor of the exchequer, 30, his character, ibid. proteſts againſt rejecting the clauſe for taking away the ſacramental teſt, 33, infuſes jealouſies of the king into the whigs, 38, diſmiſſed from his employments, 84
Boroughs, ſmall, the rotten part of our conſtitution, 316
Bothmar, baron de, publiſhes the elector of Hanover's memorial, 635, cauſes a clauſe relating to the regency to be rectified, 700
Boufflers, marſhal de, his proceedings in Flanders, 186, &c. throws himſelf into Namur, 287, &c. arreſted by way of repriſal, and releaſed again, 194, paſſes the Maes, 355, tries to ſurpriſe Nimeguen, 356, ſent to beſiege Liege, 391, diſgraced, 392
Boyle, Robert, founds his lecture, 155
Boyle, Henry, ſecretary of ſtate, 560, his ſpeeches, &c. at the trial of dr. Sacheverell, 590, removed from his place of ſecretary of ſtate, 613
Brandenburgh, Frederick, elector of, enters into a league againſt Sweden, 265, expects the title of king, 266
Bribery, proceedings in parliament againſt it, 174
Briſac taken by the French, 359, old Briſac taken alſo by them, 393, a deſcription of it, ibid.
Bromley, William, one of the managers of the occaſional conformity bill, 368, 397, brings in the bill to prevent occaſional conformity, and his ſpeech upon it, 425, his ſpeech on the debate about the danger of the church, 460, his ſpeeches, &c. at the trial of dr. Sacheverell, 592, 592, choſen ſpeaker of the houſe of commons, 613 made ſecretary of ſtate, 700, promotes the ſchiſm bill, 725
Brown, dr. chairman of the committee of convocation, 388, made biſhop of Cork, ibid. writes and preaches againſt drinking to the memory of K. William, ibid.
Bruges, a deſcription of that place, 540, ſurpriſed by the French, 541, abandoned by them, 554
Bruſſels, a deſcription of that city, 540, ſurpriſed by the French, 541, abandoned by them, 554
Buckinghamſhire, John, Sheffield, D. of removed from the office of privy-ſeal, 435, ſeconds the motion for inviting the princeſs Sophia over, 455, his ſpeech about the union, 492, ſpeaks in behalf of dr. Sacheverell, 593, 594, &c. made lord-ſteward, 614, moſt verſed in parliamentary proceedings, 637
Bull, George, made biſhop of St. David's, 434
Burgundy, Lewis, D. of, dies, 648, his character, 649
Burnet, Gilbert, made biſhop of Saliſbury, 30, is againſt the laity being put into the commiſſion for a comprehenſion, 36, concerned in the bill of ſucceſſion to the crown, 39, writes a paſtoral letter, 40, is againſt the inquiry into the murder of the E. of Eſſex, 64, diſcovers a plot againſt the king, 79, his letter to mr. Johnſton, 105, his paſtoral letter burnt, 150, his reaſons for ſir John Fenwick's attainder, 223, does him ſome ſervice, 224, made preceptor to the D. of Gloceſter, 246, addreſs for removing him from that poſt, 257, publiſhes his expoſition of the thirty-nine articles, ibid. which is cenſured in convocation, 337, his method of inſtructing the D. of Gloceſter, 264, is one of the commiſſioners for diſpoſing of the church preferments, 333, one of the managers againſt the occaſional conformity bill, 389, cenſured for it, ibid. inſtrumental in obtaining the firſt-fruits and tenths, 406, reflected upon the lower houſe of convocation, 434, propoſes the firſt model of the act of regency, 455, his ſpeech about the danger of the church, 459, chairman of the committee in the debates about the union, 492, reports the reſolutions of the ſame, 495, ſpeaks in favour of the bill for naturalizing proteſtant foreigners, 565, his notions upon the acts of treaſons in Scotland, 567, dr. Sacheverell reflects upon him, 589, threatened by the mob, 592, his ſpeech at dr. Sacheverell's trial, 593, &c. ſpeaks to the queen with great freedom againſt the pretender, 596, the queen ſpeaks to him about the peace, 636, his ſpeech about the peace, 695, his preface to his paſtoral care complained of in parliament, 711, makes a long ſpeech, 715, his ſpeech about the peace with Spain, ibid.

Byng, George, made rear admiral of the red, 374, goes into the Mediterranean, 387, at the taking of Gibralter, 420, made vice-admiral of the blue, 429, ſails towards Dunkirk, to defeat the pretender's deſigned expedition to Scotland, 532, comes bac into the Downs, and ſails towards the coaſt of France, ibid. purſues the French fleet, and comes near the Firth of Edinburgh, 534, his two letters, ibid. thanked by the houſe of commons, 535, one of the lords of the admiralty, 614, made admiral of the white, 631

C.

Cabal, 13, diſſolved, 14
Cabinet council appointed for Q. Mary, 92, detrimental to the public for affairs paſſing through the cabinet council, 145
Cadiz, attac of the Engliſh upon that place, 361
Cadogan, major-general, gives the queen information of the pretender's deſigns againſt Scotland, 532, ſends ſome regiments from abroad upon that occaſion, ibid. his bravery at the battle of Oudenard, 542, 543, at the battle of Wynendale, 549, forces the French lines, 602, removed from being lieutenant of the Tower, 641, receives the duke of Marlborough with great reſpect at his landing at Oſtend, for which he is diſmiſſed, 683, takes meaſures to ſecure the proteſtant ſucceſſion, 712
Campaign in Flanders, 68, 102, 120, 166, 510, 538, 615, in Germany, 68, 414, &c. 559, in Italy, 122, in Italy and Provence, 511, in Italy, 544, on the Rhine, 123, 168, 213, 582, 604, in Catalonia, 213, 446, in Portugal, 421, 609, in Piedmont and Dauphiné, 582, 604
Cape-Breton yielded up to the French by the Engliſh, 686, left to the French by the treaty of Utrecht, 691
Carmarthen, marquis of. See Oſborne Thomas,
Carpenter, general, in Spain, 555, at the battle of Almanara, 604, ſent to ford over the Ebro, 605, his good advice not followed, 607, taken priſoner at Brihuega, ibid.
Carteret, John lord, votes with the whig lords, 113
Carthagena in America taken by Pointis, 229
Caſtlemain, Roger Palmer E. of, impeached, 75, excepted out of the Indemnity, 87
Catalans very kind to the Engliſh troops, 627, forſaken by the Engliſh, 680, amneſty for them, 686, reſolved to defend their liberty, 704, are to have a full pardon 707, their caſe taken into conſideration by the houſe of lords, 712, &c. reflection on their condition, 728, their caſe reported by the committee of ſecrecy, 732
Catalonia, affairs there, 194, 213
Ceſſation of arms propoſed, 666, proclaimed, 670, prolonged, 684
Cevennois riſe in arms, 388, the Engliſh fleet attempts in vain to aſſiſt them, 389, ſuffer much, and are not relieved, 335, enter into a treaty with the French general, ibid.
Charles II. See Spain, K. of.
Charles XI. K. of Sweden, mediator, 227, dies, 228
Charles XII. K. of Sweden, mediator, 229. See Sweden.
Charles, archduke of Auſtria, proclaimed K. of Spain, 389, ſeveral Spaniards declare for him, ibid. lands in England, 396, his character, 397, is beſieged in Barcelona, 475, delays going to Madrid, which is a great injury to him, 475, comes to Taragona, and thence to Saragoſſa, and is acknowledged by the kingdoms of Valencia and Arragon, ibid. comes up near Madrid, ibid. joins the E. of Galway, and advances againſt K. Philip, 476, concludes a treaty of commerce with England, 505, but ratifies it with reluctance, 506, courts the princeſs of Anſpach, who refuſes to change her religion, and he marries the princeſs of Wolfenbuttel, 517, the pope acknowledges him, 558, the French offer to give him Spain and the Weſt-Indies, 572, &c. comes to Madrid, 606, no care is taken by the allies to ſupport him, 607, his affairs are in a bad ſituation, 608, is elected emperor, 626. See emperor.
Cholmondely, Hugh E. of, objects againſt the ratification of the treaties of peace and commerce, 690, removed from the place of treaſurer of the houſehold, ibid.
Church of England ſaid to be in danger, 452, memorial of the church of England, ibid. danger of the church enquired into by the houſe of lords, 458, &c. proteſts about it, 459, 460
Churchill, lord John, made a privy-counſellor, 28, and gentleman of the king's bedchamber, ibid. created E. of Marlborough, 33, acts in Flanders, 70. See Marlborough.
Civil Liſt, 36, 37
Clarendon, Henry Hyde E. of, in great credit in Ireland, 52, aſpires to the poſt of lord-lieutenant, ibid. diſcontented, ibid. ſpreads ſlanders againſt K. William, 71, enters into a plot to reſtore K. James, 109, committed to the Tower and releaſed 113, the earl's hiſtory publiſhed, 375, appointed envoy extraordinary to Hanover, 715, his ſpeeches, ibid.
Clergy, adhere to the divine rights of monarchy, and lineal ſucceſſion, and to the diſtinction of a king de jure and de facto, 22, it is propoſed in parliament to excuſe them from taking the oaths to K. William, 34, but they are at length obliged to take them before Auguſt 1, 1689, ibid. ſhew their hatred to the diſſenters, 35, epiſcopal clergy in Scotland zealous for K. James, which proves the ruin of epiſcopacy in that kingdom, 41, &c. proteſtant clergy in Ireland, deſign to ſuppreſs them, 59, clergy in England take the oaths to K. William with reſervations and diſtinctions, 71, excepted out of the abjuration bill, 86, the clergy in England give offence by their behaviour about the oaths, 142, ſign the aſſociation, 209, diviſions among them, encourage profaneneſs, 242, ſome of them againſt a toleration, ibid. complain of the convocation's not ſitting, 333, hoped to recover many privileges by the help of mr. Atterbury's book, 334, uſed to grant their own ſubſidies apart, ibid. taxed by the houſe of commons ever ſince the year 1665, ibid. and 335, promote the notion of the church's being in danger, 452
Coin, the loſs the nation ſuffered by re-coining the money, 212, proceedings of the commons about it, 216, 217
Collier, Jeremy, gives abſolution to ſir John Freind, and ſir William Perkins, 211, vindicates that practice, ibid. his ſhort view of the ſtage, 253
Commerce, treaty of, between England and France, 684, regected by the parliament, ibid. between the emperor and Spain, 436
Commiſſion for reviewing the liturgy and the commiſſioners names, 71, 72, eccleſiaſtical commiſſion for diſpoſing of church preferments, 333
Commiſſioners to treat of an union between England and Scotland 354, 465, &c. they meet, ibid.
Committee of both houſes to adviſe K. William, 147, 152
Commons, houſe of, will not agree to excuſe the clergy from taking the oaths, 34, preſent an addreſs of thanks to the king, for his having diſcharged chimney-money, 37, addreſs to the king for a war with France, 60, ſettle upon the king the hereditary exciſe for life, and grant him the cuſtoms for four years, 85, 86, vote a ſupply of four millions, 106, another of above three millions, 125, one of above five millions, 147, &c. of five millions and a half, 162, &c. of almoſt five millions, 169, their repreſentation to the king upon his refuſing to paſs the place-bill, 163, their proceedings againſt Pauncefort, and others guilty of bribery, 174, &c. debates in that houſe about re-coining the money, 197, their proceedings about the coin, 316, 317, bent upon diſbanding the forces, and grant a ſupply for that purpoſe, 250, their addreſs of thanks to the king upon diſbanding the army, 251, the king's meſſage to them about the Dutch guards, and their addreſs thereupon, ibid. many hard things ſaid in that houſe againſt the court and the king, 252, find fault with the partition treaty, 305, vote 40,000 ſailors, and the ſame number of ſoldiers, 319, vote that it is the undoubted right of the people to petition, 320, preſent an addreſs to the queen on the ill-management of the funds, 371, diſputes between them and the houſe of lords, in the caſe of Aſhby and White, 404, &c. ſhew a great neglect in all that related to the fleet, 406, loſe much of their reputation, 408, their proceedings about the five Ayleſbury men, 430, &c. motion for excluding penſioners and placemen from the houſe of commons, 456, debates about the danger of the church, 459, their reſolutions for making the union more compleat, 524, and about the trade to Portugal, Italy, and Spain, ibid. enquire ſtrictly into the E. of Galway's conduct at the battle of Almanza, 530, their reſolution for the preſervation of public credit, 535, their partiality in judging of conteſted elections, 563, great debates about the peers of Scotland's eldeſt ſons, ibid. impeach dr. Sacheverell, 589, their managers at his trial, 594, &c. take into conſideration the management of the war, and find ſome abuſes in the victualling, 619, enquire into the affair of the Palatines, ibid. grant 1,500,000l. for the ſervice in Spain, 627, reject in their addreſs of thanks a clauſe that had been inſerted in the lords addreſs, 638, form ſeveral reſolutions injurious to the ſtates, 645, and condemn the barrier treaty, ibid. debates there about the negotiation of peace, 659, order

Bp. Fleetwood's preface to be burnt, 664, their reſolution againſt the letter from the ſtates, 665, and about the queen's care for the proteſtant ſucceſſion, ibid. they ſtigmatize thoſe that delighted in war, 691, vote the proteſtant ſucceſſion to be in no danger, 716
Compr.chenſion, bill for it, 35, why miſcarried, 36, attempted again, 71
Compton, Henry, biſhop of London, made privy-counſellor, 28, and dean of the royal chapel, 29, crowns K. William and Q. Mary, 33, his ſpeech in the convocation, 73, twice diſappointed of the ſee of Canterbury, 337, oppoſes the court, ibid. had the education of the princeſs (afterwards Q. Anne) 340, marries her to the prince of Denmark, ibid. helps to convey her from the court to Nottingham, 341, his ſpeech about the danger of the church, 459, his death and character, 700
Conſpiracy in Scotland, 398, the papers relating to it laid before the houſe of lords, 401, endeavours uſed to ſtifle it, ibid. account of that conſpiracy, 403, the lords vote about it, 404
Convention turned into a parliament, 30, the convention in Scotland meets, 44, proceeding therein, 45, &c. the lawfulneſs of it, 46, their acts for the ſecurity of the nation, 47, ſend relief to Ireland, ibid. their anſwer to K. William's letter, ibid. publiſh a proclamation againſt K. James, 49
Convocation meets, and their proceedings, 73, &c. their addreſs to the king, ibid. books about it, 333, regularly called by K. William, but always prorogued, 334, is allowed to ſit, ibid. pretended they had a right to ſit whenever the parliament ſate, ibid. and that they had no need of a licence to enter upon debates, ibid. diſputes between the lower-houſe and the archbiſhop about adjourning, 335, report of the lower-houſe, ibid. their power as to cenſuring of books, 336, whether diſſolved by the king's death, 338, their proceedings in 1702, 374, &c. their petition to the queen, 375, ſit again, their proceedings, 407, &c. meet again, and preſent a repreſentation, 408, remarks upon it, ibid. a new one meets, 462, difference between the two houſes, 463, meet again, 500, ſpeak againſt the union, and name a committee to conſider of the preſent danger of the church, ibid. prorogued, ibid. order a repreſentation to be made to the biſhops, ibid. the lower-houſe continues ſitting after the prorogation, ibid. and prepares a proteſtation againſt the archbiſhop, ibid. the prolocutor abſents himſelf, for which he is declared contumacious, ibid. the convocation opened, 623, the queen's licence for the ſitting of it, ibid. their repreſentation to the queen, 624, has a juriſdiction, and may proceed in caſe of hereſy, ibid. whether the queen's licence to it ſubſiſted after a prorogation by a royal writ, 653, meets again, 707
Cooke, ſir Thomas, governor of the Eaſt-India company, proceedings of the commons againſt him, 176, committed to the Tower, and a bill brought in againſt him, ibid. act to indemnify him, 177, examined before the commons, ibid. act for impriſoning him, 180
Corruption, an univerſal one complained of, 147
Cottonian library, 462
Cowper, William, made lord-keeper, 453, his character, ibid. diſcourages the great number of private bills, 462, his proceedings and ſpeeches about the union of the two kingdoms, 466, &c. preſents the articles of union to the queen, 467, is created baron of Wingham, 491, declared lord high-chancellor, 499, his ſpeech to the parliament, 562, ſpeaks at dr. Sacheverell's tryal, 591, delivers up the grea-ſeal, 613, ſpeaks againſt the reſumption of K. William's grants, 635, his ſpeech about the peace, 658, 663, repreſents the dangers that threatened the proteſtant ſucceſſion, 710, his ſpeech about the Catalans, 712
Court of conſcience erected in Briſtol, Gloceſter, and Newcaſtle, 65, court of the marches of Wales aboliſhed, ibid.
Craggs, James, ſent to the Tower, 174, concerned in clothing the army, ibid. examined in the houſe of commons about the Eaſt-India company, 179, act for impriſoning him, 180, ſpeaks againſt the Aſſiento trade, 707, ſent to K. George with a letter, 726
Crawford, William Lindſay E. of, appointed to preſide in the parliament of Scotland, 50 againſt the epiſcopal clergy, 70, his character, ibid. and 79
Credit, the public, reſtored, 217, very high, 461, the commons care for preſerving it, 335
Crew, Nathaniel, biſhop of Durham, takes the oaths, 75, excepted out of the indemnity, 87
Cromarty, George Mackenſie E. of, ſecretary of ſtate for Scotland, 410, his ſpeech, 411, is made juſtice-general, 413
Czar, Peter I. travels to Holland and England, 231, his character, ibid. ſucceſsful againſt the Tartars, 235, defeated at Narva, 282, over-runs Poland, 507, preſſes the Poles to chuſe another king, ibid. tries to make a peace with the K. of Sweden, ibid. reduces Livonia to his obedience, 609, the grand ſeignior declares war againſt him, ibid. has an engagement with the Turks, and concludes a peace with them, 628, the K. of Sweden endeavours to ſtir up the Turks againſt him, 688, makes himſelf maſter of Finland, ibid.
Czarina. See Catharine.

D

Dalrymple, John, made joint-ſecretary of ſtate for Scotland, 119, undertakes to bring the jacobites into the king's ſervice, ibid. created lord Stair, 127
Dalrymple, ſir David, frames a bill to diſcharge the clans of Scotland from their vaſſalage, 533, lord-advocate of Scotland, ordered to enquire into the affair of the pretender's medal, 631, removed, ibid.
Danby, E. of. See Oſborne, Thomas.
Danes refuſe to ſtir from their quarters till their arrears were paid, 470, join the allies, ibid.
Darien; account of that ſettlement, 183, 219, 253, miſcarries, ibid. the French king complains, and the K. of Spain preſents a memorial againſt it, 254, great diſcontent upon the loſs of it, 255, 262
Dartmouth, William Legg, lord, made ſecretary of ſtate, 612, created viſcount Lewiſham, and earl of Dartmouth, 631, made lord privy-ſeal, 700
Davenant, dr. Charles, ſome of his books cenſured, 351, appointed ſecretary to the Engliſh commiſſioners for the union, 355, his eſſays upon peace at home, and war abroad, 397
D'Aumont, D. of, appointed embaſſador extraordinary to England, 680, comes to England, 683, his character, ibid. inſulted, and his houſe burnt, 698, the pretender thought to be with him, ibid. preſents a memorial againſt mr. Dubourdieu, an eminent French preacher ibid. makes his public entry, 699, leaves England, 700
Dauphin, an attempt to carry him off, 517, he dies, 621, two other Dauphins died, 648
Dawes, ſir William, biſhop of Cheſter, ſpeaks againſt the bill for naturalizing proteſtant foreigners. 565
De Foe, Daniel, his ſhorteſt way with the diſſenters, 369
De la Mere, lord. See Booth, George.
Deleval, ſir Ralph, preſides at the court-martial which tried the E. of Torrington, 96, examined in the houſe of commons about a letter from the E. of Nottingham, 126, made one of the commiſſioners of the admiralty, 153
Dendermonde, deſcribed, 474, taken by the allies, ibid.
Denmark, George pr. of, created baron of Oakingham, E. of Kendal, and D. of Cumberland, 33, attends K. William in Ireland, 88, is married to the princeſs Anne, 340, their iſſue, ibid. prejudiced againſt the whigs, 342, is declared generaliſſimo of all the queen's forces by ſea and land, 223, made lord high-admiral, 347, a bill for ſettling a proviſion upon him, if he ſurvived the queen, 365, 366, proteſts againſt it, ibid. is for the occaſional conformity bill, 369, underſtood ſea-affairs very little, and was impoſed upon, 387, negligent in the management of the admiralty, 429, declared high-admiral, 499, his council in the affairs of the admiralty, ibid. they manage badly, 516, engages in mr. Harley's party, 520, great complaints againſt his council 523, is thanked by the houſe of commons for his diligence in fitting out a fleet, when Scotland was threatened with an invaſion, 535, dies, 561, his character, ibid.
Denmark, Anne princeſs of, 50,000l. a year ſettled upon her, 37, 80, K. William and Q. Mary uneaſy at her requiring a proviſion, ibid. motion for her maintenance cauſes the E. of Marlborough's diſgrace, 128, Q. Mary, falls out with her becauſe ſhe would not diſmiſs the counteſs of Marlborough, 129, retires to Sion-houſe, ibid. not admitted to ſee her ſiſter, Q. Mary on her death-bed, 171, the king reconciled to her, ibid. not put at the head of the lords-juſtices, 181. See Q. Anne.
Denmark, Frederick IV. K. of, travels through the courts of Germany and Italy, 584, it is given out that he intended to change his religion, ibid. attacs Sweden, ibid. and 609, invades Pomerania, 628, takes Sweden, and reduces the duchy of Bremen, 688, exacts 300,000l. of the the city of Hamburgh, ibid. defeated by the Swede, ibid.
Deſcent, one in France intended, 310, one deſigned by the pretender, in Scotland, 532

Devonſhire, William Cavendiſh E. of, made lord-ſteward of the houſehold, 29, and knight of the garter, 33, his caſe taken into conſideration by the parliament, 62, &c. created marquis of Hartington, and D. of Devonſhire, 165, made one of the lords-juſtices, 181, made lord-ſteward, 347, is for declaring war againſt France, ibid. againſt the occaſional conformity bill, 369, 398, has a meeting with ſome of the eminent members of the houſe of commons, 521, removed from being lord-ſteward, 613, his ſpeech on occaſion of the D. of Ormond's refuſing to fight, 658

Deynſe and Dixmuyde ſurrender, 149, their garriſon treacherouſly detained by the French, 191

Diſſenters, K. William endeavours to have them admitted into civil employments, 33, their ſtate at the revolution, ibid. K. William's great indulgence to them creates jealouſies of him, 71, blackened after K. William's death, 367, complaint from the lower-houſe of convocation, for their teachers adminiſtring private baptiſm, 434, ſchiſm-bill againſt them, 719, &c. motion to allow them ſchools to teach their own children, 721

Doddington, George, ſecretary to the Engliſh commiſſioners for the union between England and Scotland, 465, made one of the lords commiſſioners of the admiralty, 584

Dodwell, Henry, account of him, 653

Dolben, John, complains to the houſe of commons of dr. Sacheverell's ſermons, 589, carries up his impeachment, 590

Dorſet, Charles Sackville E. of, lord-chamberlain, made one of the lords-juſtices, 670, reſigns his office of chamberlain, 714, his character, ibid.

Dorſet, Lionel Cranfield Sackville, D. of, made conſtable of Dover, and warden of the Cinque-Ports, 562, removed, 698

Doway beſieged and retaken, 602, &c. account of that place, 603

Drake, James, againſt the partition treaty, 289, his hiſtory of the laſt parliament, 304, 306, cenſured, 351

Duncomb, Charles, receiver-general of the exciſe, ſent to the Tower for falſe indorſements on exchequer-bills, 241, purchaſed the manor of Hemſley, ibid.

Dundee, viſcount, acts for K. James in Scotland, 44, &c. raiſes a rebellion, 47, &c. defeats Mackay, but is ſlain, 51, his character, ibid.

Dunkirk, addreſs for demoliſhing it, 569, the French offer to demoliſh it, 575, 576, 596, is to be demoliſhed, 620, 651, the Engliſh take poſſeſſion of it, 670, &c. an equivalent for the demolition of it, 691, 695, Tugghe preſents a petition for preſerving that harbour, 699, mr. Steele's reflection on that petition, ibid. Dunkirk demoliſhed, but a new canal made at Mardyke, 700, Steele's motion about it, 709, and mr. Walpole's, 710, de Torcy's letter about it, 732

Dutch, their charges for K. William's expedition into England repaid, 38, 600,000l. granted them, 65, treaties with them, 61, 68, are thought to be too much favoured by K. William, 124, 138, the ſervice of their fleet at la Hogue, 131, 132, Dutch guards; the king's uneaſineſs at diſbanding of them, 250, his meſſage about them, 251, motion for obliging them to leave off trading with France, 458, the bravery of their cavalry at the battle of Ramillies, 471

E.

Eaſt-India company, 124, king's meſſage to the commons about it, 144, proceedings of the houſe of commons, upon their affairs, 145, &c. obtains a new charter, 163, their affairs examined by the houſe of commons, 175, &c. a new Eaſt-India company erected, 239, petition of the old Eaſt-India company to the houſe of commons, 252, the old and new bribe the members of parliament, 282, do not like the proceedings of the houſe of commons, 302, 303, theſe two companies come to an agreement, 320

Eaſt-India company in Scotland, 183, 200, gives a great alarm to that in England, 183, proceedings in the parliament of Scotland about it, 200, they lay open their grievances before the parliament of Scotland, 246, &c.

Eckeron, battle of, 392, deſcription of that place, ibid.

Edict of Nantes revoked 27

Edingburgh-Caſtle kept by the D. of Gordon, 47, &c. ſurrenders, 51

Emperor, Leopold, reſolves to be maſter of Tranſylvania, 123, led on by propheſies, and hates hereſy and France, ibid. declares againſt the partition treaty, 267, &c. alliance between him, England and Holland, 310, declares war againſt France and Spain, 348, 358, diſorders in his court, 394, reduced to the laſt extremities, implores Q. Anne's protection, 413, his ill conduct with regard to Hungary, 422, dies 445, his character, ibid.

Emperor, Joſeph, ſucceeds his father, his character, 445, 500,000l. lent to him upon a branch of his revenue in Sileſia, 461, bent upon the reduction of Hungary, 478, recalls his troops from the Upper Rhine, ibid. makes a treaty for evacuating the Milaneſe, without the participation of his allies, 501, conquers Naples alſo without their conſent, 511, &c. the K. of France endeavours to unite the princes and ſtates of Italy in a league againſt him, 557, difference between him and the pope, ibid. his troops ſeize Comachio, and other places poſſeſſed by the pope, ibid. interpoſes by his embaſſador in favour of the D. of Marlborough, and the miniſtry, 613, dies, 621

Emperor, Charles VI. elected and crowned, 626, writes a circular letter to the electors, upon the receipt of the preliminaries of peace, 635, and another letter to the ſtates, ibid. ſends prince Eugene to England, 642, ſends his plenipotentiaries to the congreſs at Utrecht, 649, makes preparations for the campaign, 653, the number of men he offered to furniſh in divers places, 667, offers to contribute towards the ſubſiſtance of the auxiliary troops, 674, &c. diſpoſed to promote a general peace, 685, his miniſters are againſt ſigning the treaty of Utrecht, 690, his miniſters had conferences at Radſtadt with the French king's, 705, reſolves to conclude his treaty with France, without the intervention of the maritime powers, 706

England to furniſh 20,000 men for the general war againſt France, 108, in great danger from the French for want of intelligence, 144, a great corruption throughout England, 142

Engliſh army very ſickly in Ireland, 88, defeats the Iriſh, ſee Boyne. Engliſh fleet has an engagement with the French near Beachy, and is worſted, 92, Engliſh miniſtry act without union, 158, blamed for the ill ſucceſs at ſea, ibid. and 159, Engliſh fleets bombards Dieppe, Havre de Grace, &c. 166, Engliſh nation highly inflamed at the K. of France's proclaiming the pretender, 315, very eager for the war with France, 320, their ſucceſs in America, 377, attac Fort St. Auguſtin and Guadalupe, ibid. defeat the French at Ramillies, 471, defeated at Almanza, 501, &c. ſeveral battalions ſurrender themſelves, 504, the reſt retire to Xativa and Alcira, ibid. the Engliſh alarm the coaſt of Normandy, 548, the Engliſh troops not ſuffered to march through any of the towns garriſoned by Dutch, in their way to Dunkirk, 603, 671, thoſe in Spain called home, 680

Epiſcopacy aboliſhed in Scotland, 41, 49, 146, &c. epiſcopal clergy in Scotland deprived, 70, &c. See clergy and Scotland.

Epiſcopal clergy in Scotland encouraged by Q. Anne, and preſent an addreſs to her, 377, the epiſcopal party had the majority in the parliament there, 378

Eſſex, Arthur Capel, E. of, committee to enquire into his death, 63

Eſſex, Algernoon Capel, E. of, ſworn a privy-councellor, 562

Eugene, prince, of Savoy, goes to Vienna to ſollicit ſuccours, 120, commands the imperial troops, 214, defeats the Turks at Zenta, 235, marches into Italy, paſſes the Mincio, and routs the French near Carpi, 309, his attempt upon Cremona, takes marſhal Villeroy priſoner there, 310, defeats the French at the battle of Luzzara, 360, viſits the duke of Marlborough, and concerts meaſures with him, 414, commands a ſeparate army upon the Rhine, 415, his ſaying about the Engliſh forces, ibid. at the battle of Hochſtet, 416, 10,000 men taken into the pay of England and Holland, to reenforce his army, 445, has a weak army in Italy, ill provided and ill paid, 446, has an engagement with the D. of Vendoſme, ibid. money borrowed in England for his uſe, 461, marches to the relief of Turin, 478, joins the D. of Savoy, and defeats the French, 479, commands the imperial army at the ſiege of Toulon, 513, he and the D. of Marlborough act with perfect unanimity, 541, his bravery at the battle of Oudenard, 542, 543, lays ſiege to Liſle, 546, wounded, 548, Q. Anne and the ſtates-general deſire that he may be ſent to Spain to command in chief, 554, comes to Holland upon propoſals of peace made by France, 573, chuſes to ſerve in Flanders with the D. of Marlborough, 578, wounded at the battle of Malplaquet, 581, inveſts Doway, 602, concerts at Franckfort the neceſſary meaſures with the elector of Mentz, 625, comes to England, 642, receives an account of the D. of Marlborough's diſgrace, ibid. conducted to Leiceſter-houſe, ibid. the whigs glad, and the jacobites diſpleaſed at his coming, ibid. ſcandalous reflections in the Poſt-Boy on his mother, ibid. his compliment on the D. of Marlborough, 643, in the note, ſaid the D. of Marlborough was always ſucceſful, 644, preſents a memorial about the emperor's conduct in the war, 647, loſes his nephew, ibid. returns to the Hague, ibid. the ſtates give him the ſupreme command of their army, 653, beſieges Queſnoy, 657, detaches troops to make an irruption into France, 667, refuſes to give over the ſiege of Queſnoy, 668, reſolves to attac Landrecy, 670, his memorial to the D. of Ormond 671, his lines at Denain forced by the French, 672, marches to the relief of Doway, 673

Exchange, bills of, drawn from Genoa for Spain proteſted, 615

Exchequer bills, 218, falſe indorſements on them enquired into by the commons, 241, their currency, 461

Eyre, Robert, made ſollicitor-general, 562, adviſes only the impriſoning Sacheverel, and burning his ſermon, 589, made one of the juſtices of the Queen's-bench, and knighted, 614

F.

Faction, one in the church and ſtate ſet up, 36

Fagel, one of the Dutch generals, 414, commands the Dutch auxiliaries in Portugal, 421, upon no good terms with the Portugueſe generals nor D. Schomberg, ibid. made Velt-marſhal-general of the Portugueſe forces, ibid. his ſleeve taken off by a cannon-ball, 446, recalled, ibid. the not taking of Badajox aſcribed to him, ibid.

Falkland, Anthony Cary, lord viſcount, ſworn of the privy-council, 128, made one of the commiſſioners of the admiralty, 153, accuſation againſt him by the admirals, 162

Fenwick, ſir John, engaged in the aſſaſſination-plot, 202, gets troops ready, 203, 204, ſeized, 218, his letter to his lady, ibid. ſets up a counter-plot, ibid, examined by the houſe of commons, 219, bill for attainting him, ibid. names of the members of the houſe of commons that were for and againſt attainting him, 222, beheaded, 224

Ferguſon, Robert, enters into a plot againſt K. William 79, 85, ſeized, 88, writes in defence of the Yorkſhire plotters, 173, offers to make diſcoveries about the plot in Scotland, 399, diſcovers an intention of placing the pretender on the throne after the queen's death, ibid. and 403, the lords offended with his papers, 404

Finch, Daniel L. ſpeaks in behalf of R. Steele, 709

Findlater, James Ogilvy E. of, againſt the malt-tax being extended to Scotland, 694, made chancellor of Scotland, 700, choſen one of the ſixteen peers, 704

Firſt-Fruits, and Tenths given by the queen for the augmentation of ſmall livings 158, an account of them ibid. biſhop Burnet inſtrumental in that, 159, ſir John Holland and ſir Joſeph Jekyll were for taking them quite away, but ſir Chriſtopher Muſgrave, &c. were for continuing them, ibid.

Fitton —— a zealous papiſt, chancellor of Ireland, 52, 59, his character, ibid.

Flanders; campaigns there, 102, 119, 134

Flanders, if loſt, Holland and England in danger, 124, the houſe of commons againſt ſending forces thither, 146

Fleet; the Engliſh cannot bring the French to a general engagement, 119, enquiries into the conduct of our fleets, 125, &c. 144, K. James endeavours to corrupt ſome of the commanders of our fleet, 130, 131, miſcarriages of the fleet enquired into by parliament, 161, the French fleet avoids an engagement with the Engliſh, and goes into the Mediterranean, 165, the miſcarriages of the fleet enquired into, 226, their proceedings much cenſured, 230, the Engliſh fleet bombards Copenhagen, 265, deſtroys the French fleet and galleons at Vigo, 362, great complaints about the management of it, 388, the French fleet beaten by the Engliſh near Malaga, 420, the Engliſh fleet goes to the relief of Barcelona, 475, keeps in the Mediterranean, and blocs up the French in Toulon, 476, takes Alicant, ibid. a fleet prepared with great expedition, upon the news of the pretender's intended deſcent in Scotland, 533

Fleetwood, William, biſhop of St. Aſaph, his preface to his four ſermons burnt, 664, his letter to biſhop Burnet, ibid. the queen called him her biſhop, 665

Foley, Thomas, appointed auditor of the impreſt, 711, ſeconds a motion made by mr. Hungerford againſt R. Steele, 709, another motion of his, ibid.

Forces; foreign forces in England, debate about them, 148

France, K. of. See Lewis XIV.

France; war declared againſt her by the diet of Ratiſbone, Holland, Spain, Brandenburgh, &c. 59, and by England, 60, concerts meaſures with the jacobites to reſtore K. James, 92, reſolution of the congreſs at the Hague to employ 222,000 men againſt France, 108, famine in France, 159, tries to obtain a peace, ibid. and 167, makes a ſeparate peace with the D. of Savoy, 213, endeavours to ſet the prince of Conti on the throne of Poland, 229, tries in vain to reſettle the trade with England, 246, her intrigues to ſecure the crown of Spain, 249, great rejoicings there upon the news of K. William's death, 345, reduced to ſtraits, 433, court of France makes propoſals for a peace, 481, their offers rejected, ibid. they apply to the pope, ibid. ſuffers greatly by the froſt, in 1709, 570, reduced to great extremities, particularly by the general decline of the public credit, 571, &c. renunciation of the crown of France by the king of Spain, 659, the allies make an irruption into France, 667, peace ſigned between England and France, 689, the diſtreſſed condition of that kingdom, 713, 727

Freeman, Samuel, dean of Peterborough, proteſts againſt the irregularities of the lower-houſe of convocation, 463,

Freind, ſir John, engaged in the Lancaſhire plot, 421, and in the aſſaſſination-plot 202, had a commiſſion from K. James, 203, tried and executed, 210, abſolved by Jer. Collier, &c. 211

Freind, dr. his account of the E. of Peterborough's conduct in Spain, 447, &c.

French attac the Spaniſh Netherlands, 26, ſurpriſe Courtray and Dixmuyden, and beſiege and take Luxemburg, 27, invade Germany, and take Philipſburg, ibid. land in Ireland, and aſſiſt K. James, 53, annoy our trade, 68, their fleet enters the channel, and engage the Engliſh near Beachy, 92, &c. remains maſters at ſea, 93, burn Tinmouth, 94, endeavour to intercept the Turkiſh fleet, 119, loſe ſeveral officers of diſtinction at Steenkirk, 136, ſurpriſe the D. of Wirtemberg in his camp, but are beaten by the landgrave of Heſſe-Caſſel, 139, gain the battle of Landen, 155, take Heidelberg, and commit great barbarities in the Palatinate, 157, endeavour to raiſe commotions in England on account of the coin, 196, their plot to invade England, 202, offer to make peace with England, Holland, &c. 212, reſolve to make peace, 227, their preliminaries ibid. and ſee Ryſwick. Slow in diſbanding their army, 236, they bribe ſome of our members of parliament, 282, involve us in contentions at home, 288, their inſolent behaviour towards the Spaniards, 309, corrupt moſt courts, 310, try to engage the Turks in a new war with the emperor, 360, encourage the troubles in Poland, 394, their lines forced by the D. of Marlborough, 442, and at Haguenau by prince Lewis of Baden, 444, take Nice, 446, defeated at the battle of Ramillies, 471, &c. beſiege Turin, 477, &c. defeated at the battle of Turin, 478, &c. make a deſcent on Nevis and St. Chriſtopher, 498, their great ſucceſs on the Upper Rhine, 506, lay ſeveral places under contribution 507, retire with great precipitation before the D. of Marlborough, and cannot be brought to an engagement, 510, 511, their fiſheries in North-America damaged by captain Underwood, 516, the French deſign to recover by ſurpriſe and treachery, the places they had loſt in the Netherlands, 540, take Ghent and Bruges, 541, defeated at the battle of Oudenarda, 543, ſet on foot negotiations for a peace, 571, &c. their inſincere offers, 575, &c. defeated at the battle of Malplaquet, 580, &c. make new overtures for a peace, 585, 596, 631. See peace: they inſert the E. of Sunderland's removal in their Gazette, 613, their lines ſurpriſed by the D. of Marlborough, 626, their expedition to Braſil, and unſucceſful attempt on the Leward-Iſlands, 628, 629, their propoſals at Utrecht rejected with indignation by the allies, 649, &c. defeat the allies at Denain, and take Marchiennes, Doway, Queſnoy, and Bouchain, 672, &c.

French proteſtants encouraged to come into England, 60, refugees petition the houſe of commons and the king for relief, 129

G.

Galleons; ſome Spaniſh ones deſtroyed, 559

Galloway taken, 117

Galway, —— de Ruvigny E. of, K. William's general, and envoy into Savoy 213, made one of the lords-juſtices in Ireland, 227, grant of lands to him there, 259, appointed commander of the Engliſh forces in Portugal, 422, his exploits there, 446, loſes his right hand, 447, his proceedings and conqueſts in Spain, 475, &c. takes Alcantara, ibid. is joined by all the troops both Engliſh and Dutch, 502, his narrative, ibid. is defeated at the battle of Almanza, 504, wounded, ibid. watches the D. of Orleans's motions, 505, that duke makes him ſome propoſals, in order to his being made K. of Spain, ibid. attempts the relief of Lerida, ibid. his liſt of the forces at the battle of Almanza, 539, his conduct ſeverely examined by the houſe of commons, ibid. his bravery at the battle of Caya, where he has a horſe ſhot under him, 583, orders forces to Catalonia, 584, returns home, 609, is removed from being commander in Portugal, 114, blamed for the miſcarriages in the war in Spain, 617, 618, was for an offenſive war, ibid. examined in the houſe of lords about it, ibid. blamed for the loſs of the battle of Almanza, and cenſured for giving the precedence to the Portugueſe in Spain, 619

Garrard, ſir Samuel, deſires dr. Sacheverell to print his ſermon, 589, diſowns it, 590

Garroway, mr. his ſpeech in the houſe of commons, 65

Gaultier, abbot, makes overtures for a peace between England and France, 631, employed to convey count Tallard's letters between Paris and Nottingham, ibid. mr. St. John and mr. Harley had private meetings with him, ibid. betrays count Gallas, and is made an abbot, 635, his negotiations at London, 652, &c. comes from London to Utrecht, ibid. promoted the pretender's intereſt, ibid. his memorial about the renunciation, 659, goes to Paris along with the L. Bolingbroke, 675, ſwears falſly, 676, returns to London, ibid. employed to tranſact the pretender's affairs in England, 731, 732

George Lewis, prince of Hanover, afterwards K. George I. comes and makes his addreſſes to the Lady Anne, 340, a report of K. William's intending to get him declared his immediate ſucceſſor, 350, 351, reaſons for inviting him over, ibid. diſarms the D. of Wolfenbuttle, 355, inſtalled knight of the garter, 374, does not readily come into the peace of Utrecht, 690, concludes a treaty with the ſtates-general, 712, a writ demanded for him to ſit in the houſe of peers as D. of Cambridge, 714, a rumour of his intention to come over to England, ibid. reaſons and neceſſity of his coming and reſiding in Great-Britain, 718, orders given to the heralds, &c. to be ready to proclaim him on the queen's demiſe, 725

Gertruydenberg; negotiations for a peace there, 597, 600, a motion to examine them, 658

Ghent; a deſcription of that place, 540, ſurpriſed by the French, 541, by the confederates, 554, the Britiſh troops make themſelves maſters of it, and of Bruges, 672, and refuſe to admit any Dutch troops, 681

Gibraltar taken by the Engliſh, 420, beſieged in vain by the Spaniards and French, 422, &c. 446, yielded to England, 707

Gifford, Charles, publiſhes a letter from ſir Rowland Gwynne to the E. of Stamford, for which he is fined, 456, &c.

Ginckle, lieutenant-general, at the battle of Boyne, 90, at the ſiege of Limerick, 97, left commander of the army in Ireland, 99, commander in chief, 115, is created E. of Athlone, and has lands granted him in Ireland, 119, is thanked by the houſe of commons, ibid. preſident of the court-martial to try Grandval, 137, general of the Dutch horſe, 186, inveſts Namur, 187, 191, 192, burns the French magazine at Givet, 212, commands a Dutch army, 356, repulſes the French, ibid, was inclined to cautious but feeble counſels, 357

Gironne taken by the French, 167, 603

Glouceſter, William D. of, his houſehold ſettled, 246, dies, 264

Godolphin, Sidney lord, made one of the lords of the treaſury, 32, his character, ibid. made firſt commiſſioner of the treaſury, 107, 165, 281, removed, 320, is made lord high-treaſurer, 346, is for the occaſional conformity-bill, 569, but thought it unſeaſonable, 398, is for ſtriking the flags in the ports of Portugal, ibid, his proceedings reconciled many to him, ibid. is for ſettling the ſucceſſion in Scotland, 410, reflected upon for permitting the act of ſecurity in Scotland to paſs, 412, &c. attacked by the tories, and preſerved by the whigs, ibid. is againſt tacking the occaſional conformity-bill to the land-tax bill, 425, his ſpeech in anſwer to the E. of Rocheſter's, againſt the exportation of coin, 426, K. Charles writes a letter to him, 449, declares himſelf in favour of the whigs, 453, the tories very angry with him, 455, is againſt adjourning the parliament of Scotland, and orders the union to be compleated, 489, created viſcount Rialton, and earl Godolphin, 491, his ſpeech in the debate about the union, ibid. exerts himſelf in the affair of the union, 497, threatened to be impeached, ibid. appointed lord high-treaſurer of Great-Britain, 499, mr. Harley begins to act againſt him, 519, and to create jealouſies of him in the whigs, 519, threatens to quit the queen's ſervice, if mr. Harley had ſo much intereſt with her majeſty, 520, promiſes that preferments ſhould be beſtowed on men well principled, 521, backs the motion for encouraging trade to the Weſt-Indies, 522, refuſes to ſerve any longer, if mr. Harley was not removed, 531, the queen not much concerned at it, ibid. it was part of mr. Harley's ſcheme to remove him, ibid. offers the Bank a conſiderable ſum of money to preſerve its credit, 531, the whigs jealous of him, 564, adheres to the Scotch miniſters, and ſupports them, 565, deſcribed in Sacheverell's ſermon under the the name Volpone, 589, ſpeaks to the queen about her recommendation of Hill, 610, the queen's letter to him about the D. of Shrewſbury being made lord-chamberlain, 611, his letter to her majeſty upon that point, 612, diſmiſſed from the office of lord-treaſurer, 613, his death and character, 682

Gordon, George D. of, governor of Edinburgh-caſtle, 46, refuſes to deliver it up to K. William, ibid. amuſes the convention, 47, yields up Edinburgh-caſtle, 51

Gordon, ducheſs of, ſends the faculty of advocates a medal of the pretender, 63

Gower, colonel, the commons adviſe the king to remove him, 147, 148, continued, 151

Grafton, Henry Fitz-Roy, D. of, at the ſiege of Cork, 99, killed, ibid.

Graham, Richard, one of the wicked ſollicitors employed in the reigns of K. Charles II. and James II. 64, 75, excepted out of the indemnity, 87

Grandaval, mr. Bartholomew de Liniere de, enters into a plot to aſſaſſinate K. William, 137, &c. executed, 139

Grants; bill to examine thoſe made ſince the revolution, 586

Granville, George, made ſecretary at war in the room of R. Walpole, 614, created baron Lanſdown, 641

Gregg, William, his treaſonable correſpondence with France, 527, a committee of lords appointed to examine him, ibid. tried and condemned, 528, executed, 529, his dying ſpeech ſaid to have been drawn up by mr. Harley, ibid.

Griffin, Edward, lord, proceedings againſt him, 76

Guernſey, Heneage Finch E. of, his ſpeech in the debates about the union, 495, urges to have the ſtate of the nation taken into conſideration, 522, ſpeaks in dr. Sacheverell's behalf, 594, ibid. &c.

Guernſey, Heneage Finch lord, his ſpeech in parliament, 636

Guiſcard, marquis de, account of him and his project for a deſcent into France, 479, &c. examined about it, ibid. expected to have found a great ſupport in mr. St. John, 620, being diſappointed he correſponds with the court of France, ibid. apprehended, ſtabs mr. Harley, and dies of his wounds, 621

Guy, Henry, ſecretary of the treaſury, turned out of his place, and ſent to the Tower for bribery, 174, concerned in corrupting the members of the houſe of commons, 178

Gwynne, ſir Rowland, removed from the place of treaſurer of their majeſties chamber, 126, examined before the council, for words reflecting on lord viſcount Sidney, ibid. and 127

Gwyn, Francis, one of the committee for inſpecting the books of the chamberlain of London; &c. 175

H.

Haddington, John Hamilton, E. of, was for the union, 485

Haguenau, the French lines forced there, 444, taken by the confederates, 445, a deſcription of that place, ibid.

Halliſax, George Saville marquis of, made lord privy-ſeal, 28, 29, hated both by whigs and tories, ibid. addreſs to remove him from the king's preſence and councils, 65, quits the office of ſpeaker of the houſe of lords, 75, reſigns the privy-ſeal, 76, 77, joins with the tories, ibid. oppoſes the court, 150

Halliſax, Charles Mountague marquis of, left out of the privy-council, 347, one of the managers againſt the occaſional conformity bill, 369, his ſpeech about the danger of the church, 458, cauſes the public records and offices to be put into good order, and moves that the queen ſhould buy the Cottonian library, 462, his ſpeeches about the union, 491, 494, &c. moves for a committee to receive propoſals for encouraging the trade to the Weſt-Indies, 522, his ſpeech in relation to the affairs of Spain, 525, his ſpeeches at dr. Sacheverell's trial, 594, &c. ſpeaks againſt the reſumption of K. William's grants, 647, moves for an addreſs againſt the offers of France, 650, complains of the D. of Ormond's refuſing to fight, 657

Hallifax, Charles Mountague lord, has a hand in the Britiſh merchant, 693, his ſpeech about the union, 695, repreſented the danger threatening the proteſtant ſucceſſion, 710, his ſpeech about the Catalans, 712, moves to have the pretender removed out of Lorraine, 713, a conſultation at his houſe, 714
Hamilton, William Douglas, or Hamilton D. of, preſident at the Scottiſh lords meeting in London, 44, choſen preſident of the convention in Scotland, ibid. his character, 49, appointed high commiſſioner, ibid.
Hamilton, James Hamilton D. of, was for calling a new parliament in Scotland, 353, 354, ſets up for patron of the epiſcopal clergy, 377, the conſpiracy in Scotland ſaid to be a contrivance to ruin him, 399, his part in it, 403, keeps a correſpondence with the court at St. Germain, 410, preſents a reſolve in parliament for a treaty with England, 411, his motion for limitations of government, ibid. declares he ſhould be one of the firſt to draw his ſword againſt a popiſh ſucceſſor, 412, is at the head of the cavaliers, 436, preſents againſt a reſolve for a previous treaty with England, 437, moves for enacting limitations, 438, makes a ſpeech in his own vindication about the plot, 439, preſents a clauſe about the union, 440, deſerts the cavaliers, ibid. letters ſent to him from the pretender, 483, 484, was againſt the union, 485, his debates about it, ibid. &c. propoſes the renewing of the motion for ſettling the crown on the houſe of Hanover, 488, encouraged the tumults againſt the union, ibid. does not oppoſe it at laſt, and makes his terms with the court, 489, how far he went into the pretender's intereſt, 535, 536, choſen one of the ſixteen peers, 537, artfully ſaves himſelf and his friends, ibid. ſets himſelf in oppoſition to the D. of Queenſberry's power, 564, created D. of Brandon, but a caveat is entered againſt his patent, 631, 638, his patent examined, ibid. made maſter of the ordnance, and appointed embaſſador extraordinary to France, 680, killed in a duel, 681
Hamilton, lieutenant-general, ſent over to command in Ireland, 52, diſappoints K. William's expectations, and joins with his enemies, ibid. routs the proteſtants in Ireland, 54, taken priſoner at the battle of the Boyne, 90
Hampden, Richard, made privy-counſellor, 28, and one of the commiſſioners of the treaſury, 30, moves for a further ſupply, 65, made chancellor of the exchequer, 85, his ſpeech about the negotiation of peace, 648, moves for the allies to guarantee the proteſtant ſucceſſion, 665
Hampden, John, moves for an addreſs for a war with France, 60, account of his proſecution and fine, 76, concerned in the D. of Monmouth's affair, ibid. his character and ſpeech, ibid. his ſpeech againſt the miniſtry, 77
Hanmer, ſir Thomas, ſpeaks for the treaty of commerce, 692, cauſes the bill for approving it to miſcarry, 695, moves for an addreſs of thanks for the treaties of peace and commerce, ibid. choſen ſpeaker of the houſe of commons, 706, his ſpeech about the danger of the proteſtant ſucceſſion, 716
Hanover, houſe of, put into the ſucceſſion to the crown, 39, raiſed to the electoral dignity, 141, deſigned for the throne of England, 265, Hanover ſucceſſion, ſee Succeſſion. Pretended deſign to bring them in before the princeſs of Denmark, 319
Hanover, George elector of, commands the Imperial army, and beats the French, 507, adviſes the court of England to ſend the D. of Marlborough to the K. of Sweden, ibid. commands again in the empire, 558, acknowledged elector of Brunſwick Lunenburg, 559, commands on the Rhine, 582, his memorial, 635, his ſucceſſion ſecured at the treaty of Utrecht, 661, offers to maintain, at his own expence, half of the troops he had in the ſervice of Great-Britain, 674, refuſes to come into the Britiſh meaſures, 679
Hanover, George Auguſtus electoral prince of, his great bravery at the battle of Oudenarde, 543
Harcourt, Simon, carries up to the houſe of lords an impeachment againſt the lords Sommers, Orford, and Hallifax, 294, reports the lord Haverſham's ſpeech, 299
Harcourt, ſir Simon, made a privy-counſellor, 347, and ſollicitor-general, 352, draws up artfully the bill for enacting the union, 496, made attorney-general, 499, tries to engage the tories in the queen's intereſt, 521, reſigns his place, 531, is counſel for dr. Sacheverell, 591, made attorney-general, 614, and lord-chancellor, ibid. complained againſt by the E. of Rocheſter, 616, his ſpeech to the E. of Oxford when ſworn lord-treaſurer, 621, created baron of Stanton-Harcourt, 631, author of the Advice to the October Club, 641, declared lord high-chancellor, 690, rectifies a miſtake concerning the regency, 700
Hare, dr. Francis, his letter about the management of the war, 481, his pamphlet intituled, The Allies, &c. defended, 515, his Thankſgiving-ſermon, 540, 552, his book intituled, Negotiations for a Treaty of Peace, &c. 571, his Letters to a Tory Member, 581, 585, 587, 599, vindicates the barrier-treaty, 645
Harley, Robert, one of the commiſſioners of the public accounts, 107, his character, 155, brings in the bill for frequent parliaments, 169, was for the land-bank, 209, is againſt ſir John Fenwick's bill of attainder, 223, choſen ſpeaker, 282, his character, ibid. moves for the ſettling of ſome conditions of government, before the bill of ſucceſſion paſſed, 285, makes the E. of Rocheſter more ſubmiſſive, 311, choſen ſpeaker again, 317 and 363, made ſecretary of ſtate, 409, in the queen's confidence, 491, was for pacific meaſures, ibid. gains great credit with the queen, and begins to ſet up for himſelf, without the lord-treaſurer, 519, aſſiſted in that by mrs. Maſham, 520, created jealouſies in the whigs of the D. of Marlborough and L. Godolphin, 519, tries to engage the chief of the tories in the queen's intereſt, 521, was for having the parliament to be an old one, ibid. Gregg's affair does him a great prejudice, 529, reſigns his place as ſecretary of ſtate, 531, the D. of Marlborough and L. Godolphin refuſe to ſerve, if he continued any longer in that poſt, ibid. part of his new ſcheme was to remove the L. Godolphin, ibid. his intrigues with the queen, 562, &c. his ſpeeches at dr. Sacheverell's trial, 596, &c. cabals with mrs. Maſham, 611, 612, made commiſſioner, chancellor, and under-treaſurer of the exchequer, 613, ſends agents in the city of London to raiſe money, 615, his deſigns, ibid. the tories are jealous of him, and form an oppoſition againſt him, 620, is ſtabbed by the marquis de Guiſchard, ibid. this attempt diſconcerts the party formed againſt him, ibid. becomes prime-miniſter, 621, created baron of Wigmore, and E. of Oxford and Mortimer, and made lord-treaſurer, ibid. had private aſſurances of advantages from Spain, when he formed the South-Sea project, 631, reſolves to make a peace, ibid. his ſpeech in parliament, 636, blamed by his friends for not diſplacing all the whigs, 641, his ſpeech about the reſumption of K. William's grants, 648, his ſpeech on the D. of Ormond's refuſing to fight, 658, miſunderſtanding between him and the L. Bolingbroke, 680, mr. Prior's letter to him, 687, concerned in giving up the fiſhery of Newfoundland, ibid. &c. orders the Britiſh plenipotentiaries to ſign a peace with France, 689, his oppoſition to the pretender's being removed out of Lorrain, 696, inſtalled knight of the garter, 700, hated both by whigs and tories, and upon ill terms with L. Bolingbroke, notwithſtanding which he brings his own ſcheme to bear, ibid. raiſes a million in two or three days, ibid. L. Bolingbroke, ſecretary Bromley, and ſir William Wyndham, gain the aſcendant over him, upon which he thinks of retiring, 704, endeavours to ſupport the Bank, 705, moves for a bill to make it treaſon to bring any foreign troops into the kingdom, 710, vindicates the peace, 713, and his paying a yearly ſum to the highlanders, ibid. his letter to the elector of Brunſwick, 718, doubtful whether he was for or againſt the ſchiſm-bill, which he had caſtrated, 720, kept to himſelf the principal direction of domeſtic affairs, and diſpoſal of places, and advanced his children, 661, endeavours to reconcile himſelf to the whigs, to gain L. Cowper's friendſhip, and to remove L. Bolingbroke, 724, his attachment to the houſe of Hanover the cauſe of his removal, ibid.
Haverſham, John Thompſon lord, words of his at a conference between the lords and commons excepted againſt, 298, 299, his anſwer to the commons, 303, one of the lords of the admiralty, 306, his ſpeech for inviting over the next ſucceſſor to the crown, 454, &c. moves that the miſcarriages of the laſt campaign, occaſioned by the allies, might be enquired into, 457
Haverſham, Maurice Thompſon E. of, his ſpeeches in the debates about the union, 493, 495, was an occaſional conformiſt, ibid. his ſpeech about the ſtate of the nation, 522, and the affairs of Spain, 525, his ſpeeches about the Scottiſh invaſion, 565, his account of it, 566, his ſpeeches at dr. Sacheverell's trial, 593, &c.
Havre de Grace bombarded, 166
Heathcote, ſir Gilbert, governor of the Bank, 613, endeavours uſed to put off his being choſen lord-mayor, but he is choſen notwithſtanding, 615, inſulted, ibid. ſworn in lord-mayor, but inſulted again, ibid. is againſt addreſſing the queen about the peace, 179

Heidelberg taken and burnt by the French, 157
Heinſius, penſionary, his ſpeech againſt a peace, 676
Herbert, Arthur, firſt commiſſioner of the admiralty, his character, 30, his engagement with the French at Bantry-Bay, 61, created E. of Torrington, 62, attempts to ſurpriſe Cork, 68
Herbert, Henry, made baron Herbert of Cherburg, 164
Heſſe Caſſel, Landgrave of, beats the French before Rhinefeld, 139, commands part of the German army, 156
High-church-men had a great confidence in the E. of Rocheſter, 307, complain of the convocation not ſetting, 334
High-treaſon; bill for regulating trials in caſes of high-treaſon, 125, 144 &c.
Hill, Abigail, account of her, and her father, and family, 519, raiſed by the ducheſs of Marlborough, ibid. married to mr. Maſham. See Maſham,
Hill, John, an account of him, 519, raiſed and taken care of by the ducheſs of Marlborough, ibid. the queen writes to the D. of Marlborough to give him a regiment, 610, gives him a penſion, and makes him a general, ibid. he commands the forces in the Canada expedition, 629, made lieutenant of the Tower, 641, is brigadier, and commands the forces that were to take poſſeſſion of Dunkirk, 670
Hoadley, Benjamin, his ſermon about reſiſtance, 459, his ſermon before the lord-mayor, 589, ſeveral books written againſt him, ibid. dr. Sacheverell reflects upon him, ibid. votes of the commons in his favour, 590, vindicates the revolution, ibid. the mob threaten to pull down his church and houſe, 592
Hochſtet, a deſcription of that place, and of the battle near it, 416
Holland; account of its government, 24, &c.
Holland, ſtates of, require all that had been declared rebels in England to depart their dominions, 255. See ſtates.
Holſtein, attacked by the Danes, 265
Holt, John, lord chief-juſtice, his arguments in the bankers caſe, 261, refuſes the great-ſeal, 262, ſworn of the privy-council, 562, his death and character, 593
Howe, John, made vice-chamberlain to Q. Mary, 29, moves for an addreſs to the king to remove the marquiſſes of Caermarthen, and Hallifax from his preſence and councils, 65
Hudſons-Bay left to the Engliſh, 691, 742
Hume, E. of, letters ſent to him by the pretender, 483, dies, 484
Hungary, a conſpiracy there, 310, the inhabitants oppreſſed, ibid. an inſurrection there, 394, mal-contents there make a great progreſs, 413, 422, miſuſed by the court of Vienna, 423, treaty with them, ibid. ſupported by France, ibid. routed, ibid. almoſt entirely ruined, 452
Huntingdon, Theophilus Haſtings E. of, proteſts againſt the ſucceſſion-bill, 286
Huy taken by the confederates, 167, and 392, a deſcription of it, ibid. taken by the French, 441, and by the allies, 442

I.

Jacobites concert meaſures with France for K. James's reſtoration, 92, keep out of the way for fear of being inſulted, 94, their leaders ſeized, ibid. their plot for reſtoring K. James, 109, an artifice of theirs in Scotland, to induce the king to diſguſt the Preſbyterians, 119, take the oaths, ibid. ſome reputed ſuch put into places, 124, enter into a plot for aſſaſſinating K. William, 129, grow outrageous, 142, induſtrious in their plots againſt the government, 168, make rejoicings on the pretended prince of Wales's birth-day, 182, endeavour to diſtreſs the government, 196, ſpecially on account of the coin, 198, and on the king's diſowning the act for the Scottiſh Eaſt-India company, 200, elevated at the thoughts of the aſſaſſination plot, 203, ready to take up arms, ibid. divided into compounders and non-compounders, 218, enraged at the K. of France's giving up K. James's intereſt, 234, addreſs of the commons againſt them, 252, aſſert that K. William was a papiſt, ibid. endeavour to make an advantage of the affair at Darien, 254, 263, buſy in Scotland, ibid. their hopes revive on the D. of Gloceſter's death, and the partition-treaty, 274, &c. flock into Scotland, 378, employed, which brings a jealouſy, 387, in the plot in Scotland, 398, their ſurmiſes with regard to the act of ſucceſſion in Scotland, 410, pretend the church was in danger, 452, are againſt the union, 485, ſome ſaid there was none in the nation, 519, 534, talk of a new invaſion, on Scotland and Ireland, 563, encouraged, 610, run to court, ibid. impudent in Scotland, 630, their deſign in preſenting the pretender's medal to the faculty of advocates, 631, buſy in England, ibid. publiſh an oath to an invader, &c. ibid. elated at the proſpect of a peace, and congratulated by the Dauphin upon it, 635
K. James II. offered to throw himſelf into the E. of Danby's hands, 29, the annual revenue of the crown during his reign, 37, lands in Ireland, 38, 54, letter of the biſhops in Scotland to him, 41, a letter from him to the convention in Scotland, 46, his violation of the fundamental laws and conſtitutions of Scotland, 48, &c. commiſſions from him brought to Scotland, whereupon the convention there puts out a proclamation againſt him, 49, his reception at the court of France, 53, reaſons for his not meeting with ſo much encouragement from France as he expected, ibid. the king of France lends him, however, troops and money, ibid. makes a ſecret treaty with him, 54, comes to Cork, and thence to Dublin, and publiſhes five proclamations, ibid. uſes the proteſtants very ill, ibid. comes before Londonderry, 53, goes to meet his parliament at Dublin, ibid. his ſpeech, 57, his declaration to the Iriſh, ibid. paſſes the bill of attainder in Ireland, 59, his proceedings againſt the univerſity of Dublin, ibid. ſome letters of his intercepted, 65, ſends a ſupply to his friends in Scotland, 81, a bill brought in for abjuring him, 86, a propoſal made for ſeizing him, 88, believed that K. William durſt not leave England, nor venture over to Ireland, ibid, marches from Dublin to join the reſt of his forces, 89, advances to the Boyne, ibid. calls a council of war, and reſolves to oppoſe the enemy's paſſing that river, ibid. orders a ſhip to be got ready at Waterford to ſecure his retreat, ibid. defeated at the battle of the Boyne, 90, retreats to Dublin, and makes a ſpeech to the magiſtrates, 91, embarks at Waterford, and returns to France, ibid. and 96, the braſs-money coined by him in Ireland is cried down, ibid. plot for reſtoring him, 109, his anſwer to the jacobites, who ſent to aſk his leave to take the oaths, 119, prepares for a deſcent into England, 129, his letter to ſeveral lords and others of his late privy-council, upon his queen's approaching delivery, ibid. ſends his declaration over to England, ibid. the perſons excepted therein, 130, at la Hogue, with an army ready to embark for England, 130, his ſorrowful letter to K. Lewis, upon the defeat of the French fleet at la Hogue, 134, had prepared a declaration, but makes another in a different ſtrain, 160, a propoſal made to him, that he ſhould reſign his title in favour of his ſon, ibid. he encourages, the aſſaſſination-plot, 203, grants the plotters a commiſſion, ibid. and 204, particularly one written with his own hand to ſir George Barclay, ibid. 206, 207, 210, the earl of Portland and marſhal Boufflers have a conference about the manner of diſpoſing of K. James, 233, his intereſt left unregarded at the peace of Ryſwick, ibid. whereupon he publiſhes a manifeſto, 234, &c. the K. of France refuſes to remove him, 245, none of the Engliſh noblemen in France will converſe with him, ibid. his letter, wherein he approved of aſſaſſinating Oliver Cromwell, 311, account of his behaviour the laſt years of his life, ibid. &c. his death and character, 313, buried privately, ibid. his iſſue by Anne Hyde, 340, deſired to have the diſpoſal of his ſecond daughter lady Anne, ibid. memoirs of him voted ſeditious by the houſe of commons in Ireland, 387, his queen-dowager files a bill in chancery for the arrears of her dowry, and has 50,000l. remitted to her, 227
James. See pretender.
Janſſen, ſir Theodore, writes againſt the treaty of commerce, 692, had a hand in the Britiſh Merchant, 693
Jefferies, George, lord-chancellor, his caſe reported, 64
Jekyll, ſir Joſeph, was for taking away the firſt-fruits and tenths, 406, one of the managers of dr. Sacheverell's trial, 590, ſpeaks in behalf of Bp. Fleetwood's Preface, 664, ſpeaks againſt the treaty of commerce, 204, and againſt the ſchiſm-bill, 233, his ſpeech in favour of the E. of Oxford, 275
Jennings, ſir John, at the engagement near Malaga, 420, made rear-admiral of the blue, 429, ſails to the relief of Barcelona, 446, made admiral, 584, arrives with a fleet before Barcelona, 628, fetches the Engliſh troops from Spain, 680
Jerſey, Guernſey, &c. the lords addreſs the king to put thoſe iſlands into a poſture of defence, 64
Jerſey, Edward Villiers E. of, ſent embaſſador extraordinary to France, 245, returns to England, 253, appointed ſecretary of ſtate, ibid. endeavours to diſpoſe K. William, to change his miniſtry, 261, ſent to demand the great-ſeal from L. Sommers, 262, is one of the plenipotentiaries at the ſecond partition-treaty, 264, made lord-chamberlain, ibid. not queſtioned for the ſhare he had in the partition-treaty, 293, his character, 324, made lord-chamberlain, 347, turned out, 409, his character, ibid. called upon by L. Sommers to vindicate K. William, 427 made lord privy-ſeal, 631, dies. ibid.

Jerſey, William Villiers E. of, votes with the whig lords, 713
Ilay, Archibald Campbell E. of, choſen one of the ſixteen peers, 691, his ſpeeches about the malt-tax, 694
Imperialiſts behave very ill, and do not join the D. of Marlborough, 441, &c. intrenched at Lauterburg, 444
Indemnity, act of, deſired by the king, 38, paſſed, 87, one proclaimed in Scotland, 378
Independents, an account of them, 33, 326, 327, are for a toleration, ibid.
Ingoldſby, colonel, commands the forces in the Canada expedition, 629, made one of the lords-juſtices of Ireland, 630
Inniſkillin, the inhabitants of that place take arms, 52, reſolve not to admit an Iriſh garriſon, 57, proclaim K. William and Q. Mary, ibid. defeat the Iriſh in ſeveral encounters, ibid. join the D. of Scomberg, 67, rout the Iriſh, ibid. their bravery, at the battle of the Boyne, 90
Innocent, XI. pope, dies, 70
Innocent, XII. pope, choſen, 122, the court of France, comes to an accommodation, with him, 140, 141, perſuades the king of Spain, to make a will in favour of the D. of Anjou, 272
Invaſion; the intended French invaſion, 202, of Scotland taken into conſideration by the houſe of lords, 565, and by the houſe of commons, 566
Inverneſs; the French propoſe landing there with the pretender, 535
Jones, Edward, Bp. of St. Aſaph, proſecuted for ſimony, 334
Joſeph. See emperor.
Ireland, K. James lands in that kingdom, 38, 54, proteſtants in Ireland oppreſſed, many of them fly into England, 52, the nobility and gentry of Ireland preſent an addreſs to K. William, praying him to take that kingdom into his protection, ibid. the miſcarriages in Ireland inquired into by the parliament, 64, money raiſed for the war there, 65, clergy of that kingdom, act for their relief, ibid. expedition for the reduction of Ireland, 66, he miſcarries in the management of the war, there examined by the houſe of commons, 77, ſtate of affairs before K. William's arrival there, 88, bill for ſale of the forfeited eſtates there, and for attainting thoſe who had been in the rebellion, 106, the army there oppreſs the country, and commit great outrages, 107, vacant biſhoprics filled up, ibid. continuation of the war there, 114, proceedings of the parliament in that kingdom, 142, the ſtate of that kingdom about forfeited eſtates, &c. examined by the Engliſh parliament, 152, addreſſes to the king upon that head, 153, parliament there, 161, great diſcontent in that kingdom, in which the natives were too much favoured, ibid. the government of it put into the hands of three lords-juſtices, ibid. ſtate of affairs there, and parliament, 185, 186, addreſs of the commons in England againſt the woollen manufacture in Ireland, 243, linen manufacture there recommended, ibid. the forces in that kingdom provided for by parliament, 253, new lords-juſtices of that kingdom appointed, ibid. forfeited eſtates there reſumed by the parliament, 258, proceedings of the truſtees for the ſale of thoſe eſtates, 310, two of them ordered to attend the houſe of commons in England, 319, great oppreſſions committed by them, and they are complained of to the houſe of commons, 320, a clauſe in a bill for ſending the abjuration to Ireland, and obliging all to take it, 370, great diſcontents in that kingdom, 383, diviſions between whig and tory, ibid. the truſtees for the forfeited eſtates much cenſured, 384, raiſe a ſchandal upon the Iriſh, as if they deſigned to make themſelves independent from England, ibid. &c. uneaſineſs there fomented by the E. of Rocheſter, and connived at by the D. of Ormond, 435, bill for improving the hempen and flaxen manufactures in Ireland, ibid. ſome forces ordered to march towards the north of that kingdom, 534, bill to prevent the growth of popery there, 587, convocation there, 588, the jacobites intereſt promoted there, 701, deſigns of new-modelling the army there, 711, the ſchiſm-bill extended to that kidgdom, 721
Judges in Scotland; debate concerning them, 51
Jura Populi Anglicani; ſome account of that book, 304
Juſtices appointed in the king's abſence, 181, their proceedings, 182
Juſtices of peace; bill for qualifying them, 260

K.

Kaliſh, battle of, 481
Keating, —— chief juſtice of Ireland, his ſpeech, 53, draws up an addreſs againſt repealing the act of ſettlement, 59
Kehl, Fort, taken by the French 389, a deſcription of it, ibid.
Kelly, Hugh and William, liſt in the pretender's ſervice, and are apprehended, 722
Ken, Thomas, Bp. of Bath and Wells, refuſes to take the oaths. 31
Kent, Henry de Grey E. of, made lord-chamberlain, 409, created viſcount Goderick, earl of Harold, and marquis of Kent, 491, his ſpeech in the debates about the union, 495, made a duke, 611, declines the employment, of embaſſador to Hanover, 706
Kentiſh petition, 303, the petitioners impriſoned, ibid. releaſed and entertained at Mercers-hall, 306, further votes againſt them, 198
Keyſerſewaert, put into the hands of the French, and beſieged by the allies, 320, beſieged by the elector Palatine, 356, a deſcription of it, ibid.
Kidd, William, employed againſt the pirates, turns pirate himſelf, 256, ſeiſed, 379, tampered with by ſome of the members of the houſe of commons, 294, &c. executed, ibid.
Kidnapping of ſoldiers, 153
King, ſir Peter, his ſpeeches againſt dr. Sacheverell, 589, &c. ſpeaks in behalf of Bp. Fleetwood, 664, ſpeaks againſt the treaty of commerce, 692, 695, 708, King's-evil, Q. Anne touches for it, 375, a new office for it, ibid.
Kingſton, Evelyn Pierpoint, E. of, created marquis of Dorcheſter, 491
Knocque, Fort, ſurpriſed by the allies, 185

L.

Lancaſhire-plot, 109, 125, 129, 172, the plotters tried, 173, bring their affair before the parliament, 174, votes of the commons about it, ibid.
Land-Bank erected, 209, fails, 216
Land-forces; debates in the houſe of commons about them, 146, eſtimates for their maintenance, 147
Landau; a deſcription of that place, 356, taken by the French, 393, beſieged and taken by the allies, 418, 419, by the French, 705
Landen, battle of, 155
Landrecy attacked by the allies, 668, 670,
Lanſdown, George Granville lord-viſcount, treaſurer of the houſehold, 700
Lauſun, count of, intended to command the troops ſent by France, into Ireland, 53, but does not go at laſt, ibid. K. James makes him knight of the garter, 54, adviſes K. James, at the battle of the Boyne, to retreat, 90, retires to France, 100
Law; bill for regulating proceedings at law, 462
Lay-Baptiſm, diſputes about it, 653
Leake, ſir John, commands a fleet, 421, ſent to relieve Gibraltar, 422, made vice-admiral of the white, 429, relieves Gibraltar a ſecond time, and deſtroys ſeveral of the enemy's ſhips, 446, ſails to the relief of Barcelona, 475, diſperſes a fleet of Tartans near Barcelona, 555, aſſiſts in the conqueſt of Minorca, 556, 557, made one of the lords commiſſioners of the admiralty, 584, carries to Dunkirk the Engliſh forces that were to take poſſeſſion of that place, 670
Lechmere, Nicholas, ſpeaks againſt the treaty of commerce, 692, ſeconds a motion of general Stanhope about the pretender, 697, had a hand in the Criſis, 704, finds fault with the lenity ſhewn to mr. Bedford, 705, affirms the proteſtant ſucceſſion to be in danger, 716, ſpeaks againſt the ſchiſm-bill, 720, &c. moves to have the toleration-bill extended to Ireland, 721
Leeds, Thomas Oſborne, marquis of Caermarthen, and D. of, accuſed of taking a bribe from the Eaſt-India company, 175, 177, 179, ſpeaks againſt the bill for obliging ſir Thomas Cooke to make a diſcovery, 177, motion for impeaching him, 179, his ſpeech in the houſe of lords, ibid. ſifted by mr. Lockhart with relation to the pretender, 484, his ſpeech at dr. Sacheverell's trial, 593
Leefdale, Frederick Aelbreyt baron of, ſent to Paris to diſcover the aſſaſſination-plot, 137, 138
Legion's humble addreſs to the lords, 409, proclamation againſt it, ibid.
Leinſter, Meinherdt Schomberg D. of, is appointed commander of the troops that were deſigned to make a deſcent in France, 134, the Engliſh forces under his command poſſeſs themſelves of Dixmuyde and Furnes, 138
Leopold. See emperor.

Leſlie, Charles, publiſhes a relation of the Glencoe buſineſs, 142, his account of the pretender, 718
Lewis XIV. K. of France, attacs the Spaniſh Netherlands, 26, reſolves to extripate the reformed religion in his dominions, ibid. dragoons the reformed, and repeals the edict of Nantes, ibid. declares war againſt the pope, ibid. invades Germany, ibid. ſends troops into Ireland, for K. James's uſe, 53, his private treaty with him, 54, promiſes to ſend a fleet to K. James's aſſiſtance to Ireland, 88, orders mr. de Tourville to fight the Engliſh, 131, 134, his ſaying about the Engliſh rejoicing for the victory at la Hogue, ibid. his letter of thanks to his army, for intrenching themſelves near the Scheld, 167, endeavours to reſtore K. James, 196, abandons him at the peace of Ryſwick, 233, will not remove him at a greater diſtance than St. Germains, 245, forms the project of ſecuring the crown of Spain to his grandſon the D. of Anjou, 247, 249, his behaviour about the partition-treaty, and the Spaniſh ſucceſſion, 272, &c. accepts the K. of Spain's will, though he feigned at the ſame time to be ready to obſerve the partition-treaty, 275, notifies to the ſtates of Holland his reſolution of accepting that will, 276, propoſals made to him by the court of England, for ſecuring the Netherlands, 287, his anſwer to thoſe propoſals, 288, reflected upon in the houſe of lords, 290, his letter and memorial to the ſtates, 307, &c. viſits K. James, 311, owns the pretender for K. of England, and cauſes him to be proclaimed, 313, 314, &c. preſſes all other princes to own him, ibid. his manifeſto for proclaiming him, ibid. rejoices at the news of K. William's death, 345, expreſſes great reſentment upon the Dutch declaring war againſt him, 349, declares war againſt the confederates, 356, arms part of the empire againſt the empire itſelf, 389, countenances a deſign of an inſurrection in Scotland, ibid. his letter to the D. of Savoy, 395, declares war againſt him, ibid. had penſioners at the courts of Denmark and Pruſſia, 470, ſends orders to Villeroy to fight the allies, ibid. had for his motto Nec pluribus impar, 475, makes advantageous offers to the D. of Savoy, ibid. and to the allies, 481, his letter to the pope, 482, and to Scotland, 483, his equery carried off, 517, reſolves ſend to the pretender to make a deſcent in Scotland, 532, goes to take leave of him, and preſents him with a fine ſword, ibid. writes a letter to the pope upon that expedition, ibid. and a circular letter to his miniſters in Rome, Switzerland, Geneva, &c. about the ſame, and boaſts of ſucceſs too ſoon, 535, endeavours to unite the princes and ſtates of Italy in a league againſt the emperor, 557, offers to come to a treaty of partition, by allowing Spain and the Weſt Indies to K. Charles, 571, 575, rejects the preliminaries of peace, 576, writes to the K. of Spain that he would never abandon him, 587, ſets on foot negotiations for a peace, 571, 585, 596, reſolves to ſupport his grandſon Philip K. of Spain, notwithſtanding he pretends the contrary, and ſends him reinforcements, 606, aims at making a ſeparate peace excluſive of Spain, 616, entertains L. Bollingbroke with great magnificence, 674, demands great reparations for an inſult offered to Monſieur Meſnager's ſervants, 676, a declaration of his miniſter at the Hague concerning the pretender, 711, his treachery, 726
Libellers; proclamation againſt them, 142
Liege, a deſcription of it, 358, taken by the allies, ibid. the French contrive to beſiege it, 391, beſieged by the French, and relieved by the D. of Marlborough, 441
Limburg taken by the allies, 393, deſcribed, ibid.
Limerick beſieged, 97, the ſiege raiſed, 99, beſieged a ſecond time, 117, ſurrenders, 118
Limerick, biſhop of, forms a committee, to take care of things at Dublin, 140
Lines of the French forced, 391, by the D. of Marlborogh 442, thoſe of Buhl forced by the French, 507
Linen manufacture in Ireland encouraged, 243, 386
Lintz taken by the French, 359
Liſle; deſcription of that place, 546, beſieged by the allies, ibid. a French officer wonderfully gets into that place during the ſiege, 547, the town ſurrenders, 550, the ſiege of the citadel proſecuted, 551, it capitulates, 552
Liturgy; a review of it, 71, &c. whence the liturgy of the church of England was taken, 326
Livonia taken by the czar, 609
Lloyd, William, biſhop of St. Aſaph, anſwers K. James's declaration, 130, biſhop of Litchfield and Coventry, adviſes Q. Mary to eſtabliſh a fund for preachers and ſchoolmaſters among the Vaudois, 141, his diſcourſe of God's ways, &c. complained of in parliament, 150
Lloyd, William, biſhop of Worceſter, complaint in the houſe of commons, and addreſs Q. Anne againſt him, 365, removed, ibid.
London, lord-mayor, &c. of, preſent an addreſs to Q. Mary, 93, and to K. William, 142, entertain K. William and Q. Mary, ibid. lieutenancy of London, debates in the houſe of commons about it, 151, changed, 164, the city condemns the violence and ſlowneſs of the houſe of commons, 302, inclined to draw up an addreſs againſt the parliament's proceedings, 305, their inſtructions to their members, 316, lieutenancy there changed, 614, the tories get the election of members there, 615, fifty new churches ordered to be built in and about London, 624
Londonderry takes arms, 52, beſieged, 54, a little boy brings two letters to the beſieged, 55, relieved, 56
Lonſdale, lord viſcount. See Lowther.
Lords, houſe of, ſign an aſſociation, 208, the names of ſuch as refuſed to ſign it, 209, debates in that houſe about ſir John Fenwick's attainder, 221, their addreſs of thanks to K. William upon diſbanding the army, 251, their addreſs on the king's ſpeech about the ſucceſſion, 281, find fault with the partition treaty, 288, adviſe the king to enter into leagues offenſive and defenſive with the emperor, 291, ſeveral meſſages between them and the houſe of commons about the trial of lord Sommers, Orford, &c. 297, their reſolutions previous to thoſe trials, 298, diſpute between them and the commons about ſome words of the L. Haverſham, 298, &c. their repreſentation on the caſe of the Aylesbury-men, 432, addreſs the queen to ſettle the D. of Malborough's honours on his poſterity, 482, examine the merchants complaint, 523, lay the whole matter before the queen in an addreſs, ibid. debates in that houſe about the affairs in Spain, and the management of the war there, 525, reſolve that no peace could be ſafe, if Spain and the Spaniſh Weſt-Indies were ſuffered to continue in the houſe of Bourbon, 526, debates about the elections of the ſixteen peers of Scotland, 564, votes againſt the miniſtry with relation to the war in Spain, 617, 618, proceedings in this houſe upon the queen's laying the plan of the peace before the parliament, 663, debates about the Catalans, the proteſtant ſucceſſion, removal of the pretender out of Lorrain, and the late treaties, 712, vote an addreſs againſt jeſuits, prieſts, and againſt all ſuch as bore arms againſt the late K. William, 714, move for a ſecond addreſs about the pretender, 715, take into conſideration the trade to Spain and the Weſt-Indies, 722
Lorrain, duke of, declares war againſt France, 167, poiſoned by means of that perfidious court, ibid. his character, ibid.
Lorrain reſtored to the D. of that name 213, 136
Lorrain, D. of, marries the D. of Orleans's daughter, 248
Lothian, William Ker marquis of preſents the draught of an act for a treaty between England and Scotland, 438, choſen one of the ſixteen peers, 537
Lotteries; bill againſt them, 153, encouraged, and money raiſed upon them, 263
Louvain taken by the allies, 473, deſcription of that town, ibid.
Louvois dies, 136, had entered into the plot for aſſaſſinating K. William, 137
Low-Countries, a ſudden revolution there, 446
Lowther, ſir John, reſigns his place of commiſſioner of the treaſury, 128, made one of the commiſſioners of the admiralty, 153, created baron Lowther, and viſcount Lonſdale, 212, made lord privy-ſeal, 253, raiſes the poſſe of Cumberland, 292
Ludlow, Edmund, comes to England, and is forced to return bac, 80
Lumley, Richard, created E. of Scarborough, 87
Lumley, Richard lord, makes a motion about removing the pretender out of Lorrain, 709, ſpeaks in favour of Richard Steele, 710
Lunt ——— diſcovers the Lancaſhire plot, 173, his depoſition, ibid. indicted for perjury, 174
Luteſtring company ſettled, 142, 241
Luxemburg, D. of, general of the French, 102, tries to ſurpriſe Bruſſels, 119, attacs the rear of the confederate army, 183, covers the ſiege of Namur, 134, had the direction of the plot for aſſaſſinating K. William, 137, commands in Flanders at the battle of Landen, 155, dies, 186

M.

Macclesfield, Charles Gerrard E. of, aſperced by the jacobites, 174, divorced from his counteſs, 242
Macdonalds of Glencoe, 183
Mackworth, ſir Humphry, the ſuppoſed author of the memoirs of the Church of England, 461, of the houſe of commons againſt him, 596

Madagaſcar, pirates there ſurppreſſed, 498
Madrid poſſeſſed by the allies, 475, they abandon it again, and K. Philip poſſeſſes himſelf of it, 476
Maintenon, madam de, in a plot to aſſaſſinate K. William, 137, cauſes the K. of Spain's will to be accepted by the French court, 275, her influence, 283, perſuades K. Lewis XIV. to acknowledge the pretender for K. of England, 313, the K. of France's coolneſs towards her, 87
Malago, engagement near it between the Engliſh and the French, 420
Malo, St. bombarded by the Engliſh, 164, 194
Malplaquet, battle of, 580
Malt-tax extended to Scotland, of which the Scots highly complain, 693
Mancheſter, Charles Montague, E. of, attends K. William to Ireland, 88, ſent embaſſador to Venice, 227, and to France, 253, ordered to leave the court of France, ibid. his letters to Torcy, ibid. made ſecretary of ſtate, 320
Mancheſter, Robert Montague, E. of, ſent embaſſador to Venice, 499, takes Vienna in his way, 511, letters to and from him about the reduction of Naples, ibid. &c. diſreſpect ſhewn to him at Venice, 537
Manreſſa; a deſcription of that place, 505
Manſel, ſir Thomas, made one of the commiſſioners of the treaſury, 613, created baron Manſel, 579
Mar, John Erſkine, E. of, preſents a reſolve to parliament, 436, and a draught of an act for a treaty with England, 438, made ſecretary of ſtate, 441, his ſpeech at Sacheverell's trial, 595, tries to get the place of ſecretary of ſtate for Scotland, 631, is againſt extending the malt-tax to Scotland, 694, made third ſecretary for that kingdom, 700
March, William Douglas E. of, made governor of Edinburgh-caſtle, 377
Marchmont, Alexander Hume E. of, commiſſioner in the parliament of Scotland, 246, chancellor of Scotland, 353, propoſes the ſettling the crown of that kingdom on the houſe of Hanover, 354, turned out, 377
Maria Tereſa's renunciation, 273,
Marion, Elias, one of the prophets, 526
Mariſchal, earl, letters ſent to him from the pretender, 483, &c. was againſt the union, 485
Malborough, John Churchill E. and afterwards D. of, takes Cork and Kingſale, 99, ſent by K. William into Flanders to prepare things againſt his arrival, 119, diſcontented, 124, diſgraced and turned out of all his poſts, 128, committed to the Tower, 131, 142, bailed, ibid. a plot againſt him, ibid. complains of his commitment to the houſe of lords, 144, the E. of Shrewſbury thought he was ungratefully and unjuſtly perſecuted, 150, reſtored to favour, made privy-counſellor, and governor to the D. of Glouceſter, 246, made general of the army abroad, 306, account of him, 341, 342, &c. K. James's great reſentment againſt him, ibid. writes a letter in the queen's name to the ſtates-general, 344, made knight of the garter, captain-general of the Engliſh forces both at home and abroad, and ſent embaſſador extraordinary and plenipotentiary to Holland, 345, his ſpeech to the ſtates, ibid. confirms the Dutch in their former reſolution, and ſettles ſome points with them, 346, agrees with the ſtates and the Imperial miniſter, that war ſhould be proclaimed againſt France, on the ſame day at Vienna, London, and the Hague, ibid. is reckoned a tory, 547, made maſter of the ordnance, 352, declared generaliſſimo of the confederate army, 357, takes ſeveral places, particularly Venlo, Raremond, and Liege, ibid. is taken by a French party, but gets out of their hands, 358, comes to London, and a committee of the commons wait upon him with the thanks of that houſe, 366, the queen creates him a duke and intends to grant him a penſion of 5000l. but it being diſagreeable to the commons ſhe drops it for the preſent, ibid. he is for the occaſional conformity bill, 369, loſes his only ſon, and goes to Flanders, 390, takes Bonne, 391, forces the French lines, 392, takes Huy and Limburg, 393, endeavours in vain to bring the French to an engagement, ibid. meets Charles K. of Spain at Duſſeldorp, who preſents him with a ſword, 375, returns to England, 396, ſets out again for Germany, 414, defeats the enemy at Schellenberg, ibid. defeats the French and Bavarians at Hochſtet, 416, &c. returns to England, 419, his victories levelled by the commons with thoſe of ſir George Rooke, 424, ſome lords take it ill that prince Eugene ſhould be named before him, 427, is complimented by the lord-keeper upon his coming to the houſe of lords, 428, a committee of the houſe of commons gives him alſo the thanks of that houſe, 428, his friends offended at the Oxford addreſs, ibid. the manor of Woodſtock and the hundred of Wooton ſettled upon him and his heirs, 429, concludes a treaty with Pruſſia, ibid. concerts meaſures for carrying on the war upon the Moſelle, 441, goes to Holland, and has conferences with ſeveral members of the ſtates, ibid. his progreſs into Germany, where he is not joined by the allies, ibid. raiſes the ſiege of Liege, and forces the French lines, 442, in danger of being killed, ibid, deſigns to attac the French, but is oppoſed by the Dutch generals, of which he complains to the ſtates, 443, goes to the Hague, and confers with the ſtates upon the orders he had received to go to Vienna, 444, goes to Vienna, and confers with the emperor, 445, comes bac to England, 446, his conduct arraigned by the L. Haverſham, 454, is thanked by the commons for his great ſervices, 460, defeats the French at Ramillies, 471, &c. is in danger of being killed or taken priſoner, 472, K. Charles writes to him, 475, the D. of Bavaria ſends propoſals to him for opening conferences for a peace, 481, his anſwer to them, ibid. a report ſpread that he found his account in continuing the war, and therefore would not be for peace, 482, returns to England, ibid. inveſted with the principality of Mildenheim, ibid. receives the thanks of both houſes of parliament, ibid. the lords addreſs the queen to ſettle his honours on his poſterity, which is done, ibid. Woodſtock manor and Blenheim-houſe ordered to go with the titles, ibid. five thouſand pounds per annum out of the poſt-office ſettled on him and his poſterity, ibid. the lord-keeper's ſpeech to him and his anſwer, 483, 484, the commons refuſe to confirm the grant made to him of the royal Meuſe, ibid. goes to the Hague, and has a conference with the deputies of the ſtates, 507, goes to Alt-Ranſtadt to the king of Sweden, ibid. follows the French army, but cannot bring them to an engagement, 510, goes to Germany, and confers with the electors of Hanover and Mentz, 511, returns to England, ibid. his letter to his ducheſs about mrs. Maſham, 520, complaints of his too great power, ibid. his ſpeech to ſhew the neceſſity of augmenting the forces in Flanders, 525, refuſes to ſerve the queen any longer, unleſs mr. Harley was removed, 531, offers the bank a conſiderable ſum of money to preſerve its credit, 535, appointed again commander in chief of the confederate forces in the Netherlands, 539, acts with great unanimity with prince Eugene, 541, his bravery at the battle of Oudenarde, 542, 543, his letter to the E. of Mancheſter about it, 545, covers the ſiege of Liſle, 546, prepares to give the enemy battle, but they retire, 547, ſtorms Liſle, 548, ſtops the elector of Bavaria's deſign againſt Bruſſels, for which purpoſe he paſſes the Scheld, and comes to that city, 551, &c. retakes Ghent, 554, the queen's letter to him after the battle of Oudenarde, and his anſwer, 561, his intereſt with her begins to decline, ibid. two pieces publiſhed againſt him, 568, thanked by the commons, with his anſwer to it from Bruſſels, ibid. comes to England, and is alſo thanked by the lords, ibid. ſent to the Hague upon propoſals of peace made by France, 573, convinces the ſtates of the treacherous deſigns of France in that offer, ibid. beſieges and takes Tournay, 578, 579, reſolves to beſiege Mons, ibid. defeats the French at the battle of Malplaquet, 580, &c. paſſes the Scarp, and forces the French lines, 602, the queen writes to him, to give the E. of Eſſex's regiment to J. Hill, 610, he deſires to be excuſed, and not being able to prevail retires to Windſor, ibid. great uneaſineſs in the nation on that account, ibid. he writes an expoſtulatory letter to the queen, ibid. the queen's anſwer, ibid. the parliament addreſſes the queen to ſend the duke into Holland, 611, he lives in friendſhip with the duke of Shrewſbury, ibid. writes a moving letter to the queen upon the E. of Sunderland's removal, 612, had not promoted the addreſs againſt mr. Maſham, ibid. motion in the houſe of lords to thank him dropped, 616, ſome officers turned out for drinking his health, ibid. he returns from Holland to England, and is received with acclamations, 617, is viſited by the new miniſtry, but does not receive the thanks of both houſes as uſual, ibid. deſired by the queen to live well with the new miniſtry; reſolves to be patient, in order to carry on the war; carries a ſurrender of all the ducheſs's places to the queen, and retires to Blenheim-houſe on the queen's birth-day, ibid. his account in the houſe of lords of the miniſtry's proceedings with regard to Spain, 618, is continued in the command of the Britiſh forces in Flanders, 625, no confidence between him and the new miniſtry, ibid. the queen's letter to the ſtates of Holland about him, ibid. he takes the field, ibid. amuſes the French and ſurpriſes their lines, 626, beſieges and takes Bouchain, ibid. and 627, returns to England, ibid. his ſpeech in the houſe of lords, 637, is turned out of all his employments, 639, his letter to the commiſſioners about the preſent from ſir Solomon de Medina, 640, the queen ſends him word of her intentions to reſume all his employments, ibid. his letter thereupon to her, ibid. he waits upon prince Eugene, 642, that prince's compliment on him, ibid. cenſured for having taken large ſums of money, 644, ordered to be proſecuted by the attorney-general, ibid. libels publiſhed againſt him, ibid. enquiries made into his conduct, but nothing material is found againſt him, ibid. prince Eugene ſaid he was always ſucceſsful, ibid. bears all inſults with patience, and prepares a vindication of himſelf, 645, his ſpeech on account of the D. of Ormond's being ordered not to fight, 657, ſends, E. Paulet a challenge for his reflecting ſpeech on him, 658, his ſpeech about the plan of peace, 663, two ſuits commenced againſt him, 683, leaves England, and goes to Aix le Chapelle, ibid. refuſes to ſign an aſſociation, 712, invited by the E. of Oxford to come over to England, 725, comes to Oſtend, ibid. embarks for England, ibid. had vowed never to be reconciled with the E. of Oxford, ibid

Marlborough, Sarah Jennings counteſs and ducheſs of, made one of the ladies of the bed-chamber to the princeſs Anne, and becomes her great favourite, 340, her character, ibid. and 341, perſuades the princeſs againſt conſenting to have the crown ſettled on K. William for life, ibid. appointed groom of the ſtole, and keeper of the privy-purſe, 346, endeavours to moderate Q. Anne's zeal for the tories, ibid. occaſions the removal of ſir Nathan Wright, 453, reconciles the whigs to the queen, 454, compared to Alice Piers, ibid. her account of J. Hill and mrs. Maſham, 519, her great uneaſineſs at that lady's great credit with the queen, and her letters thereupon, ibid. her letter to the queen, 562, &c. charged with being the cauſe of ſome diſagreeable votes paſſing in the houſe of commons againſt mrs. Maſham, 610, is told that the queen believed ſhe often ſpoke diſreſpectfully of her, 611, ſhe endeavours to vindicate herſelf in an audience ſhe had of the queen, ibid. writes to the queen upon the E. of Sunderland's removal, 612, the duke her huſband carries a ſurrender of all her places to the queen, 617

Marriages; act againſt marriages without licence or banns, 209

Marſaglia, battle of, 157

Marſeilles; a project to deſtroy that place, 511

Martin, Henry and David, had a hand in the Britiſh Merchant, 693

Mary, Q. proclaimed, 20, her houſehold ſettled, 28, uneaſy at the ſettlement required for her ſiſter the princeſs of Denmark, 37, 80, an act paſſed to inveſt her with the adminiſtration of affairs during the king's abſence, 87, ſhews great tenderneſs for her father's perſon, 88, her behaviour was very exemplary, and ſhe read much, but did not meddle with public affairs, 92, was very charitable, ibid. takes upon her the adminiſtration of affairs, and has the right way of pleaſing England, ibid. becomes univerſally beloved and admired, ibid. puts out two proclamations againſt the papiſts, ibid. though much afraid of a deſcent from France, ſhe conceals her own apprehenſions, and inſpires her ſubjects with reſolution, 93, puts out a proclamation for the encouragement of ſeamen, 94, gives commiſſions for putting the ſtanding forces and the militia in the weſt in a poſture of defence, ibid. publiſhes a proclamation for apprehending the E. of Litchfield, &c. ibid. falls out with her ſiſter the princeſs of Denmark, becauſe ſhe would not diſmiſs the counteſs of Marlborough, 128, prepares to defend England againſt the threatened invaſion of K. James, 131, orders ſeveral diſcontented perſons to be taken up, ibid. commands all papiſts to depart from London and Weſtminſter, ibid. cauſes the militia of Weſtminſter, and the train-bands of London to be drawn up in Hyde-Park, ibid. eſtabliſhes a fund for maintaining preachers and ſchoolmaſters among the Vaudois, 141, iſſues out a proclamation againſt the exporting of corn to France, and orders the laws to be put in execution, 161, governs the nation with great prudence, 168, had a particular eſteem for archbiſhop Tillotſon, 169, ſeized with the ſmall-pox, of which ſhe dies, 170, her character, 171, never guilty of an indiſcretion, ibid. remarks on her unuſual gaiety at her coming to the throne, ibid. and on her quarrel with her ſiſter the princeſs Anne, ibid. addreſſes to the king upon her death, 272, ſhe was a friend to the diſſenters, and for a comprehenſion, ibid. the jacobites exalted at the news of her death, 202, her great care in diſpoſing of church preferments, 333

Maſham, mr. Samuel, preferred by the ducheſs of Marlborough's means, 519, marries Abigail Hill, 520, made a general, 610, created baron Maſham, 641

Maſham, mrs. comes to be in great credit with Q. Anne, 519, the ducheſs of Marlborough's great uneaſineſs at it, ibid. &c. was related to mr. Harley, ibid. her intrigues with the queen, 562, &c. ſhe undermines the D. of Marlborough's intereſt, 610, motion intended in parliament againſt her, ibid. made privy-purſe, 617, had part of the benefit of the Aſſiento trade, 723, reconciles the favourites, 724, the lord-treaſurer demurs about a grant made to her by the queen, 725, ſevere reproaches between her and the treaſurer, when he was diſmiſſed, ibid.

Maximilian prince of Hanover joins prince Eugene, 415

Mazarin, ducheſs of, motion in the houſe of commons againſt her, 32

Mead, dr. Richard, attends Q. Anne in her laſt illneſs, 725

Meath, Henry Jones biſhop of, endeavours to ſtop the execution of ſome cruel acts againſt the proteſtants in Ireland, 56, argues againſt the repealing of the act of ſettlement, 58

Mechlin ſubmits to the allies, 474

Meeting-Houſes; ſome pulled down, 592

Melfort, John Drummond E. of, king James's ſecretary of ſtate, 49, 47, odious to the preſbyterians in Scotland, ibid. letters brought from him to Scotland, 49, excepted out of the indemnity, 87, his letter to the E. of Perth, 283, Tallard's ſaying about him, 284

Melvil, —— lord, made ſecretary of ſtate for Scotland, 51, promiſes to moderate the violence of the preſbyterians in that kingdom, but is not ſo good as his word, 70, his proceedings for ſettling preſbytery, ibid. a great zealot for preſbytery, 118, 119, made privy-ſeal, and moſt of his creatures laid aſide, 127, preſident of the council in Scotland, 353, turned out, 377

Memorial of the Dutch communicated to the houſe of lords and commons, 283, of the French embaſſador to the ſtates, 291, memorial by Daniel de Foe, 305, of the church of England, 452, 453, preſented as a libel, ibid. the publiſher of it ordered to be proſecuted, 461, of the elector of Hanover, 635, &c. of the Dutch againſt the repreſentation of the houſe of commons, 646, of prince Eugene and the deputies of the ſtates to the D. of Ormond, 671

Menin taken by the allies, 474

Mentz, elector of, confers with the D. of Marlborough, 18

Merchants deſign a fraud with regard to the goods imported into Scotland, 497, their petition, ibid. another petition of theirs, complaining of their great loſſes, 29, and of the want of cruiſers, ibid. &c. petition of the Scotch merchants for relief, 31, French, Dutch, and Jewiſh merchants, inſtead of calling in the money they had in the Bank, they carried in more, 43

Meſnager, monſieur, his negotiations at the court of England, 627, 633, delivers the French king's anſwer to the demands laſt ſent over from England, ibid. ſigns the preliminaries of peace, ibid. has a private converſation with the queen, and ſpeaks to her in favour of the pretender, 634, one of the plenipotentiaries at the treaty of Utrecht, 649, his ſervants inſult count de Rechteron, which ſtops for a while the negotiations at Utrecht, 676, 687

Methuen, Paul, envoy to Portugal, 352, concludes a neutrality, 359, and a treaty, 395, preſſes the K. of Portugal to carry on his conqueſts in Spain, 475, envoy extraordinary to the D. of Savoy, 478, made one of the commiſſioners of the admiralty, 584

Middleton, E. of, ſtarts up a difficulty when the pretender was going to be proclaimed, 313, exhorted by K. James to embrace popery, 314

Milaneſe; treaty for evacuating it, 482, 500, 501, evacuated, ibid.

Minas, marquis des, aſſiſts at a council of war, 502, at the battle of Almanza, 503

Minorca, deſcription of that iſland, which is taken by the Engliſh, 555, &c.

Miremont, Armand de Bourbon, marquis de, goes to Utrecht, to take care of the intereſt of the French refugees, 647, intercedes for the proteſtants in the gallies in France, 700

Miſſon, Maximilian, one of the prophets, 526

Mohun, Charles lord, tried for the murder of William Mountfort, 151, and for the murder of captain Richard Coote, 253, is againſt the occaſional conformity bill, 398, carries E. Paulet a challenge from the D. of Marlborough, 657, killed in a duel with D. Hamilton, 681

Moleſworth, William, reflects on the convocation houſes in Ireland, for which he is removed from the privy-council, 702

Molineux, William, his caſe of Ireland's being bound by acts of parliament in England cenſured, 243
Money of braſs, coined by K. James in Ireland, cried down, 96
Monmouth, Charles Mordaunt E. of, goes with K. William to Holland, 108
Mons taken by the French, 109, K. William endeavours to ſurpriſe it, 135, blocked up by the allies, 579, a deſcription of that place, 582, beſieged and taken, ibid.
Montague, Charles, made one of the commiſſioners of the treaſury, 128, 165, his character, ibid. his reaſons for recoining the money, 198, the chief manager of it, 200, inſtrument in reſtoring the public credit, 217, vote of the commons in his favour, 242, had gained a great aſcendant in the houſe of commons, 244, reſigns the chancellorſhip of the exchequer, 255, made auditor of the exchequer, and created L. Hallifax, 281, impeached by the commons, who addreſs the king to remove him from his councils and preſence, 294, 295, articles againſt him, 296, his anſwers, ibid. acquitted, 299, 301
Montague, John D. of, ſworn of the privy-council, 562
Montague, Ralph D. of, travels beyond ſea, 698
Montague, Wortley, moves for a bill for naturalizing all foreign proteſtants, 564
Montgomery, lord, proclamation for apprehending him, 94, in a plot againſt K. William, 130
Montmelian taken by the French, 122
Montroſe, James Graham marquis of, a letter ſent to him by the pretender, but not delivered, 484, created a duke, 498, choſen one of the ſixteen peers, 537
Montroſe, James Graham D. of, ſworn of the privy-council, 562, ſets himſelf up in oppoſition to the D. of Queenſberry's power, 564, removed from the place of lord privy-ſeal in Scotland, 698
Moor, John, made biſhop of Norwich, 114
Moore, colonel, governor of Carolina, attacks Fort St. Auguſtin, 127
Moore, Arthur, made one of the commiſſioners of trade and plantations, 614, directs the lord privy-ſeal in matters of trade at the treaty of Utrecht, 649, commiſſioner of trade, 692, conſulted in the treaty of commerce, ibid. his ſpeech in vindication of it, ibid. account of him, 695, ſpeaks in favour of the treaty of commerce, ibid. and of the Aſſiento trade, 707, gainer by the Spaniſh trade, and by the Aſſiento, 722, 723, intention to cenſure him, ibid. concerned in a clandeſtine trade, ibid.
Mordaunt, Charles lord viſcount, made firſt commiſſioner of the treaſury, 30, created E. of Monmouth, 33, proteſts againſt rejecting the clauſe for taking away the ſacramental teſt, ibid, diſmiſſed from his employments, 84
Mordaunt, colonel Henry, his ſpeech about the union, 493, at Sacheverell's trial, 590
Morel, mr. gives biſhop Burnet an account of the intended aſſaſſination of K. William, 137
Mortmain, ſtatute of, repealed, 406
Mulgrave, John Sheffield E. of, his ſpeech on the bill for excluding placemen from the houſe of commons, 149, oppoſes the court, 150, created marquis of Normanby, and ſworn of the privy-council, 164
Munden, ſir John, ſent againſt Du Caſſe's fleet, and does not behave well, 360, tried for it by a court-martial, and acquitted, but is broke, ibid. and 661
Murray, John lord, made ſecretary of ſtate, 200, created E. of Tullibardine, and appointed the king's commiſſioner, 216
Muſcovite troops; diſpute between the emperor and the K. of Sweden about them, 508
Muſcovites and Saxons undertake to conquer Pomerania, 688
Muſgrave, ſir Chriſtopher, at the head of a party againſt the court, 154, took bribes, ibid. clerk of the ordnance, 212, objects to ſome words ſpoken by the L. Haverſham, 298, &c. made a privy-counſellor, 347, and clerk of the ordnance, 352, his proceedings about the clauſe relating to the ſucceſſion, 370, againſt the place-bill, 372, oppoſes the taking away the firſt-fruits and tenths, 406, ſilenced, 428
Mutiny and deſertion; bill againſt it, 151, 152

N.

Nairne, ſir Daniel, ſecretary to the Scottiſh commiſſioners for the union between England and Scotland, 465
Namur, beſieged and taken by the French, 134, and inveſted by the confederates, 187, bombarded, 419
Nantz, edict of, to be revived, 141
Naples; deſigns of the Auſtrians upon it, 482, expedition there, 500, 511, oppoſed by Great-Britain and Holland, ibid. conquered by the Imperialiſts, 512, inſurrection there, ibid. the inhabitants had an inbred hatred to the French, ibid. eccleſiaſtical revenues there, belonging to perſons reſiding out of the country, ſequeſtered, 557, the viceroy forbids the remitting any money to Rome, 558
Naturalization of the French proteſtants; bill to repeal that act, 619, that act repealed, 646
Navy; condition of it inquired into by the houſe of lords, 406
Negroes, Aſſiento de, 707
Nelſon, Robert, preſents hereditary right to the queen, 704
Netherlands. See Holland.
Neufchatel, principality of, claimed by thirteen different perſons, 516, adjudged to the K. of Pruſſia, ibid.
Newcaſtle, John Holles D. of, made lord privy-ſeal, 434, offers the Bank a ſum of money to preſerve its credit, 535, made lord privy-ſeal, 613, dies, 631, was the richeſt ſubject in England, ibid.
New-England; that colony by whom firſt founded, 326, &c.
Newfoundland; Q. Anne addreſſed to preſerve the fiſhery there, 498, reſtored to the Engliſh, 576, 596, the taking of Canada a great ſecurity to it, 629, to be entirely given up to the Engliſh, 633, 651, 686, the French offer only the freedom of fiſhery there, 649, diſputes between the courts of England and France, about the fiſhery there, 686, &c. given to the Engliſh, 691, 740
Newman, mr. ſpeaks gainſt the Aſſiento trade, 707
News; a bill to prevent the publiſhing any without licence, 227
Nicholſon, governor, takes poſſeſſion of Nova-Scotia, puts a garriſon into Port-Royal, and calls it Annapolis, 629, forms the deſign of the Canada or Quebec expedition, ib.
Nimeguen, peace concluded there, 26
Nonjuring party, riſe of them, 32, make a ſchiſm, 73, 74, a ſevere pamphlet againſt them, 94, &c. nonjuring biſhops and clergy create a ſchiſm, 325
Normanby, John Sheffield marquis of, makes an oppoſition to the bill for the proteſtant ſucceſſion, 274, finds fault with the partition-treaty, 288, made privy-ſeal, 347, Q. Anne's regard for him, ibid. is againſt praying for the princeſs Sophia, 349, created D. of Normanby and Buckinghamſhire, 374
Norris, ſir John, letters of his about the reduction of Sardinia, 555, made admiral, 584, ſent to ſecure Sardinia, 604
North and Grey, William lord, his ſpeeches about the malt-tax, 694, is againſt addreſſing the queen, to apply to the D. of Lorrain to remove the pretender out of his dominions, 696, moves to have all the ſtrangers that were in the houſe of lords put out, 713, ſpeaks againſt a reward being ſet on the pretender's head, ibid. makes a motion for returning the treaſurer thanks, 714, moves to have the treaties of peace and commerce taken into conſideration, ibid. ſpeaks for the ſchiſm-bill, 720
Nottingham, Daniel Finch E. of, made ſecretary of ſtate, 29, his character, ibid. offers to the houſe of lords the bill of toleration and comprehenſion, 34, infuſes jealouſies of the whigs into the king, 38, king William buys Kenſington-palace of him, 62, is at the head of the cabinet council, 92, reflected upon by the E. of Torrington, for ſuppreſſing ſome intelligence, 95, blamed for employing men that were reputed jacobites, 124, a letter of his to ſir Ralph Delaval makes a buſtle in the houſe of commons, 126, complained of for giving improper orders to the fleet, 134, complained of in the houſe of commons, 145, &c. his relation concerning the intended deſcent of the French upon England, 146, 147, &c. Wharton moves for an adreſs to the king to remove him, ibid. aggravates admiral Ruſſel's errors, 149, thought to betray the king his maſter's intereſt, 154, blamed for the ill ſucceſs of our fleet, 159, his intelligence of the fleet, 162, removed, 169, proteſts againſt the vote for acknowledging the reality of the Lancaſhire plot, 174, refuſes to take money from the Eaſt-India company, 178, repreſents the bad ſtate of the coin in the houſe of lords, ibid. oppoſes the aſſociation, and refuſes to ſign it voluntarily, 208, 209, oppoſes the abjuration-act, 319, his motion for the union of England and Scotland, 321, made ſecretary of ſtate, 347, excuſes dr. Davenant and dr. Drake, 351, moves for an enquiry into thoſe books, wherein the murder of K. Charles I. was juſtified, ibid. was againſt aſſiſting the Cevennois, 388, 389, thought it a diſhonour to England to ſtrike even in another king's ports, 395, lays before the houſe of lords the papers relating to the conſpiracy in Scotland, 401, vote of the commons in his favour, 402, his account of the conſpiracy in Scotland, 403, &c. preſſes the queen to diſmiſs the D. of Somerſet and Devonſhire from the cabinet council, 409, reſigns his place of ſecretary of ſtate, ibid. reflects on K. William, with regard to the partition-treaty,

427, thoughts of ſending him to the Tower, ibid. urges the ill conſequences of the act of ſecurity in Scotland, ibid. was for inviting over the princeſs Sophia, 454, ſeconds the E. of Rocheſter in the debates about the affairs of Spain, 525, the court endeavours to gain him on their ſide, 636, offers a clauſe to be inſerted in the addreſs of thanks to the queen, ibid. brings in the occaſional conformity-bill, 639, moves for an addreſs to the queen to deſire her to conſult with the miniſters of the allies in Holland, before the opening of the congreſs, ibid. advertiſement in the Poſt-Boy reflecting on him, 644, ſpeaks againſt the reſumptions of K. William's grants, 648, his ſpeech on occaſion of the D. of Ormond's being ordered not to fight, 658, and about the peace, 663, his ſpeech about the union, 695, ſupports the motion for addreſſing the queen to preſs the D. of Lorrain to remove the pretender out of his dominions, 697, reflected upon in the public ſpirit of the whigs, 707, repreſents the danger that threatened the proteſtant ſucceſſion, 710, his ſpeech upon the lord-treaſurer's motion, for bringing in a bill to make it treaſon to bring any foreign troops into the kingdom, ibid. his ſpeech about the peace with Spain, 715, ſpeaks againſt the ſchiſm-bill, 721, moves for an addreſs of thanks for the queen's proclamation againſt the pretender, 722

O.

Oates, Titus, debates about the judgment againſt him, 63, a conference thereupon, ibid.
Oath; coronation-oath ſettled, 39
Oaths of allegiance ordered to be taken, but refuſed by ſeveral, 31, oaths ſettled, 33, debates about them, 34
Occaſional conformity; bill againſt it, 367, brought in again, 397, &c. 424, endeavours uſed to tac it to the land-tax bill, 425, thrown out by the lords, 426
Orange, account of that illuſtrious family, 23, &c.
Orange William III. prince of, born, 25, comes into the world under great diſadvantages, ibid. was of an infirm conſtitution, ibid. the French king ſeizes his principality of Orange, 26, the prince is choſen chief nobleman in Zealand, and introduced into the council, ibid. comes to viſit K. Charles II. ibid. is declared admiral and captain-general, ibid. and ſtadtholder, ibid. makes a ſtand againſt the French, ibid. retakes Narden and ſeizes Boone, ibid. beats the French at the battle of Seneffe, ibid. offers the K. of France battle when before Bouchain, ibid. marries princeſs Mary, ibid. looked upon as the head of the proteſtant intereſt in Europe, and the greateſt chec to the power of France, ibid. forms the league of Auſtria againſt France, 27, his character, ibid. and 28. See K. William III.
Ordinations of diſſenters, 71, 72
Orford, Edward Ruſſel E. of, concerned in Kidd's affair, 256, impeached by the commons, 294, their addreſs againſt him, 295, articles againſt him, 296, his anſwer, ibid. acquitted, 301, his accounts examined, 407
Orkney, Elizabeth Villiers counteſs of, grants to her in Ireland, 259, K. William regards her, 324, the cauſe of L. Sommers, and E. of Portland's diſgrace, ibid.
Orkney, George Hamilton E. of, made governor, of Edinburgh-Caſtle, 711
Orleans, D. of, is wounded at the battle of Turin, where he behaves bravely, 479, wanted to be made K. of Spain, and offers ſome propoſals to the L. Galway for that purpoſe, 505, ſuſpected of having poiſoned the two dauphins, 648, had formed a project to make himſelf K. of Spain, 649
Ormond, James Butler D. of, ſent to ſecure the quiet of Dublin, 96, wounded at the battle of Landen, 156, attends K. William, in his laſt moments, 322, named commander of a land army, 347, commander in chief of the forces at Cadiz and Vigo, 360, lands at Vigo, 362, rides to St. Paul's on the thankſgiving-day, amidſt loud acclamations, 364, thanked by the lords for his ſervices at Vigo, ibid. they addreſs the queen to order him to lay before them an account of his proceedings, ibid. he complains of ſir George Rooke's conduct at Cadiz, 365, is made lord-lieutenant of Ireland, ibid. and 371, directed by the E. of Rocheſter, 383, his ſpeech to the parliament, of Ireland, ibid. &c. uneaſy at the inſpection of the public accounts, 386, foments the diviſions raiſed by the E. of Rocheſter, 435, deſires the parliament of Ireland to adjourn, ibid. addreſſes preſented to him by the diſſenters, ibid. favours the pretender's friends, 630, his ſpeech in the parliament of England about the neceſſity of a peace, 637, made commander in chief of all the forces at home and abroad, 641, had orders not to engage neither in ſiege nor battle, 655, his inſtructions, 654, aſſures the Dutch of his intention to carry on the war vigorouſly, ibid. receives orders from the queen not to venture a battle, 655, his letters thereupon ibid. 656, &c. refuſes to fight, 656, receives a letter from Villars, 666, correſponds with him, ibid. 669, declares his orders about the ceſſation of arms, 666, deſires prince Eugene to give over the ſiege of Queſnoy, 668, conference between him and one of the Dutch deputies, 680, returns to England, 681, promotes dr. Swift to the deanery of St. Patrick's, 698, made governor of Dover, and warden of the Cinque-ports, ibid. a penſion of 5000l. per annum ſettled upon him, ibid. L. Hallifax's compliment on him, 715
Orphans of the city of London; their affairs examined by parliament, 175
Orrery, Charles Boyle E. of, created baron Boyle of Marton, 631, ſent to the Hague to redreſs ſome diſorders, 685
Oſborne, Thomas, E. of Danby, impeached, 14, inſtrumental in the marriage of the princeſs Mary with the prince of Orange, 26, created marquis of Caermarthen, and made preſident of the council, 28, K. James had offered to put himſelf into his hands before he went away, 29, cool with regard to the ſettlement, ibid. brings a ſtorm on the marquis of Hallifax, ibid. an addreſs propoſed in the houſe of commons, to deſire the king to remove him from his preſence and councils, 65, chief author of the change made in the lieutenancy of London, 84, in great credit with the king, 87, a deſign to impeach him, 107, blamed for the ill ſucceſs of our fleet, 159, created D. of Leeds, 165
Oſborne, Peregrine, marquis of Caermarthen, at the attempt upon Breſt, 166, his diſcovery to the houſe of lords about a letter of the E. of Nottingham, 126
Oſtend and Newport; propoſal to put them into the hands of the Engliſh, 287
Oſtend, taken by the allies, 474, deſcription of it, ibid. yielded by the Dutch, 705, not to be alienated from the Netherlands; ibid. See Eaſt-India company.
Oudenard; deſcription of that town, 541, inveſted by the French, ibid. the French quit the ſiege, 542, battle near Oudenard, ibid.
Overall, Bp. his book publiſhed, 393
Oxford; that univerſity unhappily ſucceſsful, in propagating anti-revolutional principles, 405, its decree burnt, 595
Oxford, Robert Harley E. of, See Harley, lord-treaſurer, his oppoſition to the pretender's being removed out of Lorrain, 696, inſtalled knight of the garter, 700, hated both by the whigs and tories, ibid. upon ill terms with the L. Bollingbroke, ibid. notwithſtanding which he brings his own ſcheme to bear, ibid. raiſes a million in two days time, ibid. L. Bollingbroke, ſecretary Bromley, and ſir William Wyndham, gain the aſcendant over him, upon which he thinks of retiring, 704, endeavours to ſupport the Bank, 705, moves for a bill to make it treaſon to bring any foreign troops into the kingdom, 710, vindicates the peace, 713, and his paying a yearly ſum to the highlanders, 714, his letter to the elector of Brunſwick, 718, was for inviting him over, 719, doubtful whether he was for or againſt the ſchiſm-bill, 720, bred among ſchiſmaticks, ibid. had caſtrated the ſchiſm-bill, ibid. is for examining into the Spaniſh trade, 722, kept to himſelf the principal direction of domeſtic affairs, and the diſpoſal of places, 723, has great quarrels with L. Bolingbroke, 724, endeavours to reconcile himſelf to the whigs, and to remove L. Bolingbroke, ibid. ſends the queen an account of public affairs, ibid. and 736, cauſes of his diſgrace, 724, his attachment to the houſe of Hanover, ibid. removed, ibid.

P

Packington, ſir John, exhibits petitions againſt the Bp. of Worceſter, and his ſon, for endeavouring to prevent his election, 365, his ſpeech in the debate about the danger of the church, 460, ſpeaks againſt the union, 493
Paget, William lord, ſent to Conſtantinople, to mediate a peace between the Turks and the imperialiſts, 140, mediator of the peace of Carlowitz, 249, appointed envoy extraordinary to Hanover, but declines it, 715
Paget, Henry, made one of the commiſſioners of the treaſury, 613, created baron of Burton, 641
Palatine, elector, the Upper-Palitinate reſtored to him, 539, and 559, furniſhes the emperor with troops, 539
Palatines come over to England, 587, a brief for them, ibid. ſent over to Ireland and New-York, ibid. votes of the parliament of Ireland about them, 588, the relief granted them cauſes great uneaſineſs, 590, inquiry of the houſe of commons about them, 619
Paper-credit in Scotland rejected, 437

Papiſts excluded from the crown, 39, gainers in ſome reſpect by the revolution, 60, addreſs for diſarming them, 64, and for ſecuring them, 97, ordered to repair to their places of abode, 65, fly out of Dublin, 91, two proclamations againſt them in England, 92, 131, reſort to London, an addreſs of the commons againſt them, 252, act againſt them, 260, &c. their ſcheme of religion, 325, excluded from being members of the eſtates of Scotland, 381, bill againſt them in Ireland, 386, and in England, 433, pretend that the church was in danger, 452, proclamation for putting the laws in execution againſt them, 621

Parker, ſir Thomas, his behaviour at dr. Sacheverell's trial, 591, made lord chief-juſtice, 592, cauſes a miſtake relating to the regency to be rectified, 700, &c.

Parliament, bill for Triennial parliaments, 502, of K. William, reverſe attainders, 62, bill for the frequent calling and meeting of them, 87, &c. paſſed, 106, members taken off by places and penſions, 124, bill for the frequent meeting of them, 172, act againſt treating at elections of parliament-men, and for regulating thoſe elections, 209, the buſineſs of the Lancaſhire plot laid before them, 174, their proceedings againſt bribery, ibid. and about the orphans and Eaſt-India company's affairs, 175, &c. take into conſideration the re-coining of the money, 198, reſtores the public credit, 217, proſecutes the French ſmugglers, 241, order of the houſe of commons againſt written protections from parliament-men, 197, a party for France in the parliament, 282, both houſes meet upon K. William's death, 343, go to St. Paul's on the thankſgiving-day for the victory at Vigo, 364, both houſes give the D. of Marlborough thanks for his eminent ſervices, 482, firſt ſeſſion of the parliament of Great-Britain, 521, addreſs the queen not to make peace without the reſtitution of all Spain, 526, proceeds with great unanimity in their reſolution for the ſupport of the government againſt the pretender, 533, a faction among the Scots in the ſecond parliament of Great-Britain, 564, both houſes addreſs the queen to order the D. of Marlborough over into Holland, 610, the queen's meſſage to them of her reſolution to ſupport the houſe of Auſtria, 621, &c.

Parliament in Scotland inquires into the Glencoe affair, 183, ſign the aſſociation, and grant K. William a ſupply, 216, the Eaſt-India company lay their grievances before it, 246, &c. their addreſs and petition to the king thereupon, ibid. &c. paſſes an act for keeping a land-force, and another for a land-tax, 274, great diſputes whether the parliament ſhould be continued, or a new one called, 353, &c. the queen's letter to them, 410, debates about the bill of ſucceſſion, 411, &c. and the ſupply, 412, deſire to have all the examinations, relating to the plot, laid before them, ibid. grants a ceſs for the pay of the army, ibid. addreſs the queen that the evidence and papers relating to the plot might be laid before them againſt the next ſeſſion, 413, their proceeding about the treaty with England, 436, &c.

Parliament in Ireland raiſes a maintenance for the army in that kingdom, 253, votes a ſupply, 435, uneaſineſs between them and the convocation, ibid. their votes in favour of the proteſtant ſucceſſion, ibid. and 436

Parties at the revolution, 20, three parties formed in Scotland, 48, a party formed againſt K. William, 124, 154

Partition-treaty; negotiations about it, 248, &c. ſecond partition-treaty, 263, greatly diſliked by the Spaniards and emperor, 265, &c. and by the Engliſh, 274, cenſured in the houſe of lords and commons, 288, &c. papers relating to it laid before the houſe of commons, 293

Paterſon, William, forms the plan of the Weſt-India and African companies in Scotland, and the Darien ſettlement, 183, 200, &c.

Patkul, count, 499

Patrick, Simon, made Bp. of Chicheſter, 69, review the liturgy, 71, &c. tranſlated to the ſee of Ely, 114, dies, 521

Patronage reſtored in Scotland, 635

Pawlet, John earl, made firſt commiſſioner of the treaſury, 613, viſits the D. of Marlborough, 617, made ſteward of the houſehold, 631, his reflecting ſpeech on the D. of Marlborough, for which he is challenged, 658, inſtalled knight of the garter, 700, was for admitting the preſbyterians to be heard againſt the occaſional conformity-bill, 721

Peace, propoſed by France, 212, a ſeparate one between France and D. of Savoy, 213, the preliminaries of a peace, 227, conference at Ryſwick about it, 228, 231, ſigned by England, Spain, and Holland, 233, and by the emperor and the empire, 235, peace of Carlowitz, 242, overtures made by the French for a peace, 481, rejected, ibid. dr. Hare's thoughts upon it, ibid. &c. negotiations for one, 571, &c. the preliminaries of it, 575, rejected by France, 576, but ratified by Great-Britain, ibid. and by Holland, 577, they were contrived only to divide the allies, ibid. new overtures for a peace, 585, negotiations for one begun by Gaultier, 631, new ones made by Torcy, ibid. the preliminaries of peace ſigned, 634, made public, and ſeverely reflected upon, 635, communicated to the ſtates, who are alarmed at them, ibid. conferences for a peace opened at Utrecht, ibid. and 649, coalition of ſeveral peers againſt a peace, 636, the French propoſals for a peace, 649, the demands of the allies, 651, the French plenipotentiaries give a plan for a general peace, 652, not communicated to the ſtates, ibid. negotiations are carried on directly between England and France, 659, the plan of it communicated by the queen to the parliament 661, &c. a new ſcheme propoſed by the Dutch, 680, another propoſed to the ſtates by the E. of Strafford, 683, the French try to elude the preliminaries they had entered into with Great-Britain, 686, the Engliſh miniſtry ſign a ſeparate peace with France, ibid. and 689, they ſcruple to do it a while, 688, peace ſigned, 689, the treaty brought to London, 690, addreſſes about it, ibid. &c. proclaimed 691, thankſgiving for the peace, 697, debates about it, 715, between England and Spain the chief articles of it, 707

Peers, ſixteen, for Scotland to be elected, and the manner of it ſettled, 489, twelve new ones made at once in England, 641

Pelham, Thomas, one of the commiſſioners of the treaſury, 107, reſigns that place, 128

Pelham, ſir Thomas, created a baron, 491

Pembroke, Thomas Herbert, E. of, made privy-ſeal, 126, made one of the lords-juſtices, 181, plenipotentiary at the treaty of Ryſwick, 227, made knight of the garter, 263, lord preſident, and lord high-admiral, 320, diſmiſſed, and refuſes a penſion, 346, is for declaring war againſt France, ibid. maſter of the horſe and preſident of the council, 363, againſt the occaſional conformity-bill, 398, lord-lieutenant of Ireland, his ſpeech to the parliament of that kingdom, 518, made lord high-admiral, 561, reſigns, 584

Penn, William, enters into a plot to reſtore K. James, 109, proclamation for apprehending him, 113

Perth, James Drummond E. of, comes to Scotland with the pretender, 535, 536

Peterborough, Henry Mordaunt E. of, impeached, 75, adviſes ſir John Fenwick to ſet up a counter-plot, 218, encourages Smith, 226, his odd behaviour in that affair, ibid. ſent to the Tower, and turned out of all his places, ibid.

Peterborough, Charles Mordaunt E. of, his ſpeech on the occaſional conformity-bill, 426, ſworn of the privy-council, 435, goes to Catalonia, 446, publiſhes a manifeſto, 447, lays ſiege to Barcelona, ibid. &c. highly commended by K. Charles, 449, jealous of count Cifuentes, 450, marches into Valentia and Arragon, ibid. raiſes the ſiege of St. Mattheo, ibid. makes a ſhew of purſuing the enemy, ibid. his letter from Alcala to K. Charles, 451, poſſeſſes himſelf of Nules, and forms his cavalry, which preſerves Valentia, ibid. recruits the diſmounted Engliſh and Spaniſh dragoons, and forms a new regiment of dragoons, ibid. raiſes jealouſies of brigadier Mahoni in the Spaniſh officers, ibid. makes himſelf maſter of Molviedro, ibid. marches thence without diſturbance to Valentia, ibid. goes to the relief of Barcelona, 475, comes with a ſmall body to aſſiſt K. Charles, 476, uneaſy at not having the chief command, ibid. &c. appointed embaſſador extraordinary, but is unacceptable to K. Charles, ibid. withdraws to Genoa, ibid. aſſiſts at a general council, 481, recalled, ibid. gives his opinion againſt an offenſive war, 501, his anſwers to the queſtion of the committee of the houſe of lords, 502, debates in the houſe of lords about his conduct in Spain, 525, 530, his ſpeech, 525, his conduct in Spain examined into by the parliament, 530, &c. he is made knight of the garter, 700, ſent embaſſador to the K. of Sicily, 704, made governor of Minorca, 711, his proceedings about the Catalans, 732, and 733

Petition, it is voted in the houſe of commons, that it is the undoubted right of the people of England to petition or addreſs the king, 320

Petit, brigadier, aſſiſts at the conqueſt of Minorca, 555, made governor of fort St. Philip, 556

Philip V. K. of Spain, declared ſuch, 274, 275, 276, ſets out for Spain, ib. notifies his acceſſion to all the courts, except that of England, 277, a deſign for an addreſs from the houſe of commons to own him for K. of Spain, 282, gives K. William notice of his acceſſion to the crown, who owns him for K. of Spain, 291, marries the D. of Savoy's ſecond daughter, 310, falls into an ill habit of body, ibid. has diſputes with the ſtates of Catalonia, ibid. acknowledges the pretender for K. of England, 313, goes into Italy, 352, to Naples, and is at the battle of Luzzara, 359, 360, ſeizes the merchants plate at Vigo, 422, proclaims war againſt, and invades Portugal, 360, takes ſeveral towns, ibid. forms a large body near Madrid, 451, goes from Madrid to beſiege Valentia and Gironne, 475, beſieges Barcelona, ibid. comes to Madrid, but ſoon leaves it again, ibid. returns thither, 476, marches up to the E. of Galway, ibid. See Spain. A project made by the miniſtry to yield to him Spain and the Weſt-Indies, 622, uneaſy at the D. of Berry's marrying the D. of Orleans's daughter, 649, negotiations about his renunciation of the crown of Spain, 659, &c. his miniſters not admitted at the congreſs of Utrecht, 674, 676, 686, his renunciation of the crown of France, 680

Phipps, ſir William, made governor of New-England, 128

Phipps, Conſtantine, counſel for dr. Sacheverell, 592, knighted and made lord-chancellor of Ireland, 616, thanked by the clergy, 630, made one of the lords-juſtices, ibid. promotes the jacobite intereſt in Ireland, 701, the commons there reſolve upon an addreſs to the queen for removing him from the chancellorſhip, 702, the biſhops vote a contrary addreſs in his favour, ibid. reflected upon in the Conduct of the Purſe, 703, appointed one of the lords-juſtices of Ireland, ibid.

Picardy, plundered by the confederates, 545

Pickard, captain, deſtroys ſeveral French ſhips in Bertram-Bay, 165

Pierrepoint, Jervaſe, created baron Pierrepiont of Ardglas, in Ireland, 374

Pignerol, beſieged by the D. of Savoy, 157

Piper, count, the D. of Marlborough waits upon him, 507, 508

Pittis, William, proſecuted for the caſe of the church of England's memorial, 499

Placemen; a queſtion in the houſe of commons about their being members of that houſe, 77, bill for excluding them from the houſe of commons, 147, 148, the king refuſes to paſs it, 163, motion for diſabling placemen and penſioners from ſerving in parliament, 456, place-bill loſt, 647

Placentia attacked by the Engliſh, 387

Plague in Poland, 559, at Dantzick, 584, at Copenhagen, 628

Plate; bill for encouraging the bringing of it to the mint, 109, 217

Plays and play-houſes, ſcandalous, an order againſt them, 253

Plot; Lancaſhire-plot, 172, aſſaſſination-plot, 202, plot in Scotland, 398, not duly enquired into, 409, all the examinations relating to it not ſent down to the parliament as deſired, 412, taken again into conſideration, and the examinations ſent down, 438

Pointis, mr. de, takes Carthagena, 229, eſcapes the Engliſh fleet, ibid. and 230, comes with a ſquadron before Gibraltar, 422, ſome of the ſhips deſtroyed by the Engliſh, 446, returns with a ſtronger ſquadron, but is forced to fly, and ſeveral of his ſhips are deſtroyed, ibid.

Poland, Auguſtus K. of, invades Pomerania, 265, defeated by the K. of Sweden, 310. See Auguſtus K. of Poland.

Poland, John Sobieſki K. of, dies, 215, France endeavours to place the prince of Conti on that throne, 230, but the elector of Saxony is choſen, 231. See Auguſtus K. of. A war there, 355, 360, 397, continuation of the troubles there, 559.

Polignac, abbot de, one of the French plenipotentiaries, 597, his ſpeeches there, 649, mr. Vanderduſſen's ſmart ſaying to him about the French proteſtants, 651, made a cardinal, 687

Polhil, David, impriſoned for the Kentiſh petition, 304

Poll-Tax in Scotland, 182, &c. in England, 217, 239

Pooley, John, biſhop of Raphoe, proteſts againſt the meeting of the parliament on a holy-day, for which he is taken into cuſtody, 587

Pope; the French king's letter to him, 482, his mediation for a peace deſired, 483, the French king writes a letter to him, upon the pretender's expedition into Scotland, 532, Clement IX. ſides with the houſe of Bourbon againſt that of Auſtria, 557, countenances the pretender's expedition into Scotland, ibid. difference between the emperor and him, ibid. he raiſes an army, 558, at length he agrees with the emperor, ibid. delays acknowledging K. Charles, 582

Popery; petition from ſeveral in Lancaſhire againſt it, 461, bill to prevent the growth of it, ibid.

Popple, mr. ſecretary of the commiſſioners of trade, 212

Porter, captain, concerned in the aſſaſſination-plot, 202, 207, his character, ibid. and evidence, 211, 218, &c.

Porter, ſir Charles, chancellor of Ireland, motion to impeach him, 186, made one of the lords-juſtices, 216, dies, ibid.

Portland, William Bentick E. of, a great favourite of K. William, made groom of the ſtole, and privy-purſe, 29, created baron of Cirenceſter, viſcount Woodſtock, and E. of Portland, 33, refuſes to take money from the Eaſt-India company, 178, 179, begs of the king the lordſhips of Denbigh, &c. in Wales, 201, it is oppoſed by ſeveral gentlemen, and an addreſs preſented to the king by the commons about it, ibid. and 202, &c. the aſſaſſination-plot is diſcovered to him, 205, entertains Smith as a ſpy, 226, has an interview with marſhal Bouffiers, 233, his ſolemn embaſſy to France, 244, can obtain nothing in favour of the proteſtants in France, 245, ſupplanted by the E. of Albemarle, and at his return, reſigns all his places, ibid. grant of lands to him in Ireland, 259, one of the plenipotentiaries at the ſecond partition-treaty, 264, communicates to the houſe of lords his ſhare in that affair, 290, &c. commits a miſtake in his accounts, 293, impeached by the commons, ibid. but no articles are drawn againſt him, 296, attends K. William in his laſt moments, 322, who was the cauſe of his diſgrace, 324, ſtops by his diligence the reſumption of K. William's grants, 648, ordered to part with his place of colonel of the firſt troop of horſe-guards, 698

Portmore, Daniel Collyer, E. of, made commander in chief of the queen's forces in Portugal, 614, Guiſcard correſponds with France, under cover to him, 620

Portocarrero, cardinal, thought to have forged the K. of Spain's will, 274

Port St. Mary plundered by the Engliſh, 361

Portugal, don Pedro K. of, accedes to the partition-treaty, 266, enters into an alliance with France, 310, afraid of the naval-preparations in England, 352, concludes a neutrality with England, 355, enters into a treaty with Q. Anne and the ſtates-general, 395, &c. inſiſts upon the honours of the flag from the Engliſh admiral, when in his ports, ibid. the auxiliary forces of England and Holland land there, 421, their ill ſucceſs, ibid. not furniſhed with horſe by the king, ibid. the king governed by French counſels, ibid. his kingdom invaded by the Spaniards, ibid. the king comes to the army with a deſign to invade Caſtile, 422, lived privately in a little houſe at Alcantur, 480, has an intrigue with a beautiful Engliſh lady, ibid. dies, ibid.

Portugal, don John K. of, ſigns a treaty of alliance, 480, marries the emperor's ſiſter, 517

Portugal; bill for encouraging the trade there, 524, the trade of that kingdom prejudiced by the treaty of commerce, 692

Powis, William Herbert marquis of, ſails from Ireland into France with K. James, 91, 96

Powis-houſe burnt, 698

Præmunientes clauſe, 335

Preſbyterians; a bill of toleration and comprehenſion in their favour, 33, 35, account of them, 33, their haughty carriage in Scotland, 51, demand to have the king's ſupremacy, and the right of patronage taken away, ibid. uſe the epiſcopal clergy in Scotland with great ſeverity, 71, 83, their violent proceedings, 118, their character, 119, offend K. William, 127, jealous of him, 128, deſirous of recovering his favour, they manage with more temper, 160, &c. join with the jacobites, 185, the origin of the preſbyterians, 326, many embarked for New-England are ſtopped, 327, are againſt a toleration, ibid. would not allow K. Charles to have the common-prayer read in his family, 328, their propoſals at the reſtoration, ibid. were ready for an union, 331, thoſe in Scotland, jealous of the union, 485, act for ſecuring their government, ibid.

Preſton, Richard Graham lord, proclamation for apprehending him, 94, enters into a plot for reſtoring K. James, 109, taken, ibid. tried and condemned, 112, pardoned, 113

Pretender, acknowledged K. of England by the K. of France, 313, and by the K. of Spain, the pope, and the D. of Savoy, ibid. but the kings of Portugal and Denmark refuſe to own him, 313, 314, the Engliſh nation highly angry at his being proclaimed king, 315, act for attainting him, and for abjuring him, 319, a deſign to place him on the throne after the queen's death, 399, his intereſt protected in Scotland, 483, letters of his ſent to ſeveral noblemen in that kingdom, ibid. tells captain Stratton that he longs to be among his Scotch friends, 484, his birth-day kept publicly in Scotland, 519, account of his intended deſcent on Scotland, 532, &c. the French king gives him a ſword, and takes leave of him, ibid. his motto upon his colours and ſtandards, ibid. he and his adherents are proclaimed traitors, 532, ſerves in the French army, 539, his cowardly behaviour at the battle of Oudenard, 543, the pope favoured his expedition into Scotland, 557, the French offer to abandon him, 575, 576, biſhop Burnet warns the queen about her eſpouſing his intereſt, 596, his friends openly ſhew themſelves in Scotland, 630, his medal, ibid. Leſlie was to convert him, 631, tranſactions relating to him, 651, &c. ill of the ſmall-pox, 653, his ſiſter dies of it, ibid. various reports about him, 676, his proteſtation, 691, declaration of the French miniſter, at the Hague, about him, 711, account of him by C. Leſlie, 718, queſtion whether Q. Anne knew any thing of the deſign of bringing him in, 727

Prior, Matthew, his witty repartee to one of the French king's officers, 245, ſecretary to the embaſſy in France, 269, removed from the board of trade and plantations, 499 ſent embaſſador into France, 632, writes the Examiner, 633, comes bac to England, ibid. Matt's peace, 577, named a plenipotentiary at the treaty of Utrecht, but ſet aſide, 649, goes to Paris along with L. Bolingbroke, 675, left there to take care of ſome private affairs, 676, L. Bolingbroke's letter to him, 677, &c. left plenipotentiary at Paris, 678, has a private audience of the K. of France, ibid. comes over to England, and returns to France, ibid. L. Bolingbroke's letters to him, 686, 687, &c. his letters to L. Bolingbroke and the E. of Oxford, ibid. his negotiations about the pretender, 736, &c. the lords Dartmouth and Bolingbroke's letters to him, 738

Privilege places disfranchiſed, 226

Privileges of members of parliament, 306

Privy-council, but one ordered in Great-Britain, 530, ſettled, and who the members of it were, 538

Prizes; proclamation for the diſtribution of them, 539

Proteſtant Succeſſion; meaſures taken to ſecure it, 711, acknowledged at the treaty of Utrecht, 740, debates about the ſecurity of it, 713, voted to be out of danger, ibid. and 716

Proteſtants in Ireland oppreſſed, 52, maſſacre of them deſigned, ibid. many proteſtants againſt the preſent ſettlements, 196, French proteſtants, 15,000l. granted for them by parliament, 198, proteſtants adhering to K. James, 203, the caſe of the French proteſtants not taken into conſideration at the treaty of Ryſwick, 235, nor the Lutherans, ibid. in Sileſia have their churches reſtored to them, 509, act for naturalizing foreign proteſtants, 564, repealed, 619, 646, they preſent a petition about the occaſional conformity-bill, 639, their intereſt but faintly inſiſted upon at the treaty of Utrecht, 651, 686, recommended to Q. Anne by the K. of Pruſſia, 685, in the French gallies releaſed by the mediation of the queen, 700, a clauſe inſerted in favour of the French proteſtants in the ſchiſm-bill, 721

Pruſſia; the D. of Marlborough negotiates with that court for ſending forces into Italy, 419, 429, Sophia Charlotte Q. of Pruſſia dies, ibid.

Pruſſia, Frederick K. of, the principality of Neufchatel adjudged to him, 521, the royal dignity acknowledged in him, 576, demands of arrears due to his troops, and the ſucceſſion of the late K. William, 625, 628, comes to the Hague for that purpoſe, ibid. offers to maintain his own troops, 674, refuſes to come into the peace, 679, his death and character, 685

Pulteney, William, his ſpeech in the houſe of commons about the peace, 659

Puritans; origin of that name, 6, ſtate and church puritans, 7, increaſe, 8, abounded in the parliament of 1640, ibid. doctrinal and diſcipline puritans, ibid. account of the puritans, 326, &c.

Q.

Quakers; account of them, 33, 328, Keith forſakes them, 332, do not join in the addreſs to the queen, 344

Quebeck; expedition there, 629

Queenſberry, James Douglas D. of, 47, commiſſioner to the parliament of Scotland, 262, 274, made knight of the garter, ibid. lord privy-ſeal of Scotland, 353, made high-commiſſioner, ibid. ſecretary of ſtate, 377, and high-commiſſioner again, 378, deſerts the cavaliers, 379, 380, ingroſſes every thing, 383, draws out the ſeſſion of parliament to a great length, ibid. Frazer diſcovers a plot to him, 398, ſome thought it a contrivance of the duke's, 401, he is diſmiſſed from the management of affairs in Scotland, 410, ſome of his friends move, that the queen ſhould be deſired to communicate a letter of that duke's to her, ibid. expoſed thereby to the parliament's reſentment, ibid. ſerves the D. of Argyle, and promotes the act of ſucceſſion in Scotland, 436, arrives at Edinburgh, where he makes a public entry, 438, nominates the Scottiſh commiſſioners for the union between England and Scotland, 466, high-commiſſioner to the parliament of Scotland, 484, the tumults there about the union make him deſpair of ſucceeding, and he apprehends his life to be in danger, 488, goes in great ſtate to the parliament, after the concluſion of the union, 490, his ſpeech at the end of the ſeſſion, ibid. goes to London, and is met by great numbers, ibid. made baron of Rippon, marquis of Beverley, and duke of Dover, 539, ſworn of the privy-council, 562, introduced into the houſe of peers as D. of Dover, ibid. thought he had ſtill a right to vote as a peer of Scotland, 564, but at length not admitted to have a vote in Scotland, after he was created D. of Dover, ibid. had a party in the parliaments, ibid. made third ſecretary of ſtate, ibid. and 570, dies, 631

Queſnoy; reſolution to beſiege it, 657, deſcription of it, ibid. beſieged, ibid. and 668, ſurrenders, ibid. retaken by the French, 674

Quietiſts; 337

Quo-Warranto's, 64, 76, the marquis of Hallifax concerned in them, ibid. againſt the city of London reverſed, 87

R.

Radnor, Charles Roberts E. of, ſworn of the privy-council, 320

Radſtadt taken by the French, 506, conferences there, 795

Ragotſbi, prince, at the head of the diſaffected Hungarians, 394, aims at the principality of Tranſylvania, 423, 453, poſſeſſes himſelf of that principality, 501, encourages the Hungarians to ſtand out, 609

Rain ſurrenders to the allies, 115, a deſcription of it, ibid.

Ramillies; deſcription of that place, 471, battle there, ibid. the ſtandards taken there carried to Guildhall, 491

Ranelagh, —— Jones E. of, made a privy-counſellor, 124, his character, ibid. made receiver and paymaſter-general of the forces, 363, his accounts examined by the commons, 371, 407, quits the place, and is expelled the houſe of commons, 371, the commons addreſs the queen that ſhe would order him to be proſecuted, 407

Ranelagh, Richard Jones, E. of, ſworn of the privy-council, 562

Ranters, 328

Rates, book of, reviewed by the commons, 148, 151

Ratiſbone; a deſcription of it, 390, the elector of Bavaria takes poſſeſſion of it, ibid.

Rawlinſon, ſir William, made one of the commiſſioners of the great-ſeal, 30

Raymond, Robert, made ſollicitor-general, 614

Rechteren, count de, one of the Dutch plenipotentiaries at the treaty of Utrecht, 649, his ſervants inſulted by monſieur Meſnager's, 676, 687

Recognition, act of, 379

Records in the Tower, &c. examined and put in order at the inſtance of the E. of Hallifax, 452

Reformation, 325

Reformers, made St. Auguſtin's notions the ſtandard of religion, 325

Refugees, French, petition the houſe of commons for relief, 119, apply to the king, ibid. their addreſs to Q. Anne in favour of their perſecuted brethren in France, 498, &c. petition for a bill to preclude the ſubjects of the French king from claiming any eſtates here, 596, preſent a petition to Q. Anne for interpoſing at the treaty of Utrecht in favour of their perſecuted brethren in France, 647

Regale; what it is, 27

Regency; act for it, 456, a dangerous miſtake relating to it rectified, 701

Regent of France. See Orleans, D. of.

Reherſal; a paper by Leſlie againſt the lawfulneſs of reſiſtance, 589

Remonſtrance of the ſtate of the kingdom, 9, &c.

Remonſtrants, 325, &c.

Reneu, Hilary, cauſes the French ſmugglers to be proſecuted, 241, naturalized gratis, ibid.

Renunciation of the crown of France by the K. of Spain, 659, memorial about it, ibid. and 680, of the crown of Spain by the princes of France, 683

Repreſentation of the lords to Q. Anne, 401, of the lower-houſe of convocation, 403, of the lords about the Aylesbury affair, 432, &c. of the lower-houſe of convocation,

434, of the commons about the debts of the navy, 622, and about the Dutch, 646, of the convocation to Q. Anne, 624
Republicans, 11, republican whigs, 22
Reresby, sir John, his memoirs quoted, 28, &c.
Retrieved; debate about that word in an address of the commons, 364
Revenue of the crown, 36, the several branches of it, ibid. &c. appropriation of it, 130, &c.
Reynolds, Edward, made bishop of Norwich, 331
Rhinburg taken, 390
Rich, sir Robert, made one of the commissioners of the admiralty, 153
Richardson, ——— one of the accomplices in the assassination-plot, 206
Richmond, Charles Lenox D. of, his estate in France secured, 740
Ridge, Thomas, censured by the house of commons for his management about victualling the navy, 619
Riga besieged by the Poles, 205, relieved by the K. of Sweden, 282
Rights and liberties of the subjects; bill for settling them, 39
Rivers, Richard Savage E. commands the land-forces that were to make a descent in France, 480, strictly examines Guiscard, ibid. has manifesto's ready, ibid. waits on the king of Portugal, who receives him with his hat off, ibid. refuses the command of the forces in Spain, 481, made general of the horse, 538, sworn of the privy-council, 562, sent to the court of Hanover, 616, sent to that court again to assure the elector that care would be taken of the succession in the family, 635, made general of the ordnance, and colonel of the royal regiment of horse-guards, 641
Robinson, John, made bishop of Bristol, 614, and lord privy-seal, 631, designed for plenipotentiary at the treaty of peace, ibid. appointed one of the plenipotentiaries at Utrecht, 633, comes there and appears in a blac velvet gown, 649, his speech at the opening of the congress, ibid. his letters to secretary St. John, 652, fresh orders sent to him, ibid. his answer to the expostulation of the states about the duke of Ormond's refusing to act, 657, threatens them with the English making a separate peace, ibid. proposes to the allies a suspension of arms for two months, in order to treat with the French, 666, &c. he and the E. of Strafford scruple to sign a separate peace, 688, they sign it at last, 689, &c. translated to the see of London, 700, votes against the court, 715, his speech about the peace, 716, says that the schism-bill was necessary, 721
Rochegude, marquis de, speaks to Q. Anne in behalf of the French protestants in the gallies, 700
Rochester, Lawrence Hyde, E. of, made a privy-counsellor, 124, his character, ibid. his great credit with Q. Mary, 146, moves a doubt about the legality of the parliament's continuance, 172, protests against the vote for acknowledging the reality of the Lancashire plot, 174, represents the bad state of the coin to the house of lords, 178, is set at the head of affairs, and engages to bring the tories into the king's service, 281, &c. made lord-lieutenant of Ireland, ibid. animadverts upon some in the house of lords, who had reflected on the K. of France, 290, the king's distrust of him, at which he is offended, 291, the king is uneasy with him, 302, thought to be the promoter of all violent motions, 311, several books published, against him, ibid. delays his going to Ireland, ibid. perceives the king's heart was not with him, ibid. the king complains of his imperious temper, ibid. expostulates with him, ibid. goes to Ireland, ibid. his behaviour there, ibid. asks leave to come to England, 320, brings over complaints against the trustees for forfeited estates, ibid. declared again lord-lieutenant of Ireland, 346, was for an intire change in the administration, 347, a rivalship between him and the D. of Marlborough, ibid. was against declaring war against France, ibid. quits his place of lord-lieutenant of Ireland, 370, &c. set up as the only man that deserved to be prime-minister, 398, seconds the L. Haversham's speech, and complains of the exportation of the coin, 426, urges the ill consequences of the act of security in Scotland, 427, moves the bringing the electress-dowager of Hanover to live in England, 430, 454, moves for a clause in the act of regency, that the regents shall not repeal any part of the act of uniformity, 456, opens the debate about the danger of the church, 458, &c. his speech in the debate about the union, 491, 493, 495, on the state of the nation, 522, was for laying the blame of the miscarriages of the admiralty on the ministry, 523, his speech in relation to the affairs of Spain, 525, speaks in dr. Sacheverell's behalf, 594, 595, made president of the council, 613, complains of the lord-keeper Harcourt, for introducing the Scotch lords to Q. Anne, 616, visits the D. of Marlborough, 617, dies suddenly, 621
Rochester, Thomas Sprat bishop of, taken into custody, 131, Young's plot against him, 142. See Sprat. is against lay-baptism, 592
Rochester, bishop of, see Atterbury.
Rochford, William Henry de Zuylestein E. of, a grant made to him in Ireland, 259
Romney, Henry Sidney, E. of, concerned in Kidd's affair, 256, grants of lands to him in Ireland, 259, made groom of the stole, 264
Rooke, George, rear-admiral, 114, subscribes an address to Q. Mary, 131, knighted and made vice-admiral of the red, 154, his engagement with the French, 158, &c. examined by the commons, 161, made one of the commissioners of the admiralty, 165, with a squadron at Cadiz, 203, 215, resigns the command to lord Berkley, ibid. examined by the house of commons, 226, bombards Copenhagen, 265, commands the English fleet, 310, one of the council to prince George, 347, sent to attac Cadiz, 360, averse to that undertaking, ibid. burns the galleons and French fleet at Vigo, 362, the commons vote him thanks, 365, and address the queen to order him to lay before them an account of his proceedings, 364, his conduct examined and approved, 365, sworn of the privy-council, ibid. sent with a fleet to alarm the coast of France, 387, convoys Charles K. of Spain to Lisbon, 394, comes in sight of the French fleet, but does not engage them, 420, takes Gibraltar, ibid. his victories paralleled by the commons with the D. of Marlborough, 424, he is laid aside, 429
Rosez, taken by the French, 221
Ross, Robert lord, presents an address from Scotland, 263
Ross, William lord, offers a resolve in parliament, 412
Rothes, John Lesley E. of, presents a resolve to the parliament of Scotland, 411, is made privy-seal, 413, removed, 436, was for the union, 485, chosen one of the sixteen peers, 537
Rouille, monsieur de, comes to Holland, under pretence of negotiating a peace, 571, &c. 575, departs from Holland, 639
Rowe, Nicholas, under-secretary of state, 570
Roxburgh, John Ker E. of, desires that the act of security should be read, 412, made secretary of state, ibid. removed, 374, was for the union, 485, chosen one of the sixteen peers, 537, sets himself up in opposition to the D. of Queensberry's power, 564
Ruremond taken, 358
Rushout, sir John, sent embassador to Turkey, 227
Russel, William lord, his attainder reversed, 62, committee appointed to examine who had been his prosecutors, 76, Russel, admiral Edward, convoys the Q. of Spain, 92, appointed commander of the English fleet, 113, convoys the Turkey fleet safe into England, 119, examined in the house of commons about the conduct of the fleet, 126, sends up an address to Q. Mary from the fleet, 131, defeats the French at la Hogue, 131, &c. sails very opportunely out of the Thames, 134, being provoked at some aukward orders, he does not pursue his victory, ibid. thanks voted him by the house of commons, 144, examined by them about the conduct of the fleet, ibid. letters of his, 146, his answer in the house of lords to the E. of Nottingham's papers, wherein his orders and neglects were aggravated, 148, vote of the house of commons in his favour, ibid. dismissed, 154, put again at the head of the fleet, 164, and made one of the commissioners of the admiralty, 165, sails into the Mediterranean, ibid. goes towards the coast of France, upon the discovery of the plot, 206, desires the house of commons to read the papers relating to Fenwick, 219, made E. of Orford, 227, had the management both of the admiralty and the fleet, 217, 244, 252, resigns all his places, 252, very popular 253. See Orford, Edward Russel E. of.
Ruth, monsieur de St. commander of the Irish forces, 101, reduces Savoy, 102
Rutland, John Mannors, E. of, made marquis of Granby and D. of Rutland, 374
Ruvigny, marquis of, his conduct in Ireland, 114, created E. of Galway, and sent to command the English forces in Piedmont, 164. See Galway.
Ryswick, congress of, 227, negotiations there about a peace, 228, &c. peace signed there, 233

S.

Sacheverell (William) refuses the place of one of the commissioners of the admiralty, 30

Sacheverell, Henry; account and character of him, 588, preaches his famous ſermon, ibid. forty thouſand of it ſold, ibid. reflects on biſhop Burnet and Benjamin Hoadley, 589, impeached by the commons, ibid. his trial, 591, &c. it cauſes great uneaſineſs, 590, the managers at his trial, 591, &c. the peers who voted for and againſt him, 594, the cenſure paſſed upon him, 595, his ſermons burnt, ibid. addreſſes on account of his trial, 610, his progreſs, 613, ferment raiſed among the clergy by his trial, 615, rejoicings upon the expiration of his ſuſpenſion, 698, he is made rector of St. Andrew's Holborn, ibid.
Sacramental-teſt; attempts to repeal it, 325, a letter againſt it ordered by the commons to be burnt, 571
St. Germain; the court there encourages the plot in Scotland, 398
St. John, Henry, appointed ſecretary at war, 409, Guiſcard becomes intimate with him, 480, tries to engage the leaders of the tories in Q. Anne's intereſt, 521, reſigns his place of ſecretary at war, 531, made ſecretary of ſtate, 613, delivers a meſſage to the commons about the affairs of Spain, 617, marquis de Guiſcard's intimacy with him, 620, has private meetings with Gaultier, 631, tranſmits the propoſals of France to lord Raby, 632, his letters to the earl of Strafford, 635, &c. 652, 677, his anſwer to the Dutch memorial, 646, his ſpeech when the negotiation of peace was reflected on, 648, his letters about the peace, 650, and to Torcy, 652, to the D. of Ormond about not venturing a battle, 654, his ſpeech in the houſe of commons about a peace, 659, his letter to Torcy about the renunciation, ibid. &c. created viſcount Bolingbroke, 671, goes incognito to France, 675, impowered to conclude a ſeparate peace between England, France, Spain, and Savoy, ibid. goes to Fontainebleau, where he is magnificently entertained by the king of France, who makes him a preſent of a fine diamond ring, 676, returns to England, ibid. his letter to the Britiſh plenipotentiaries, 677, about the ravaging of the Sugar-Iſlands, 678, miſunderſtanding between him and the earl of Oxford, 689, his letters to the duke of Shrewſbury, 686, &c. ſends the Britiſh miniſters orders to ſign the peace, 688, arrives at Whitehall with the treaties of peace and commerce, 690, forms a ſcheme to put himſelf and lord Harcourt at the head of the high-church party, 700, he and ſecretary Bromley, and ſir William Wyndham, gain the aſcendant over the lord-treaſurer, 704, 711, his deſign of new modelling the army, 712, puſhes on his deſign of bringing in the pretender, ibid. his ſpeech about the Catalans, ibid. made a private agreement in France about the dower of king James's queen, 714, lays before the commons an account of the treaties of peace and commerce, 716, cauſes the publiſher of the queen's letter to the elector of Hanover to be apprehended, 719, is againſt inviting that prince over, ibid. promotes the ſchiſm-bill, 720, is againſt allowing the diſſenters ſchools to teach their own children, 721, was bred among ſchiſmaticks, 720, brings in a bill to make it high-treaſon to liſt or be inliſted in the pretender's ſervice, 723, is againſt examining into the Spaniſh trade, ibid. had the conduct of foreign affairs, 724, was bold, a man of pleaſures, and had the public odium, ibid. falls out with the treaſurer and is ſupported by the queen, ibid. cauſes the treaſurer to be removed and is likely to ſucceed him, ibid. reſolves to ſtrike in with the whigs, 725, his proceedings about the pretender, the Catalans, &c. 732, 738, his ſchemes baffled by the duke of Shrewſbury being made treaſurer, 725
Saliſbury, —— Cecil, E. of, ſent to the Tower, 32, admitted to bail, ibid. impeached, 75
——, James Cecil, E. of, Young's plot againſt him, 142
Saluſſes, battle of, 101
Sancroft, William, archbiſhop of Canterbury, tried and acquitted, 18, meets the lords at Guildhall, and invites the prince of Orange, 19, made one of the privy-council, 28, refuſes to conſecrate biſhop Burnet, 30, abſents himſelf from parliament, and refuſes to take the oaths, 32, his character, ibid. ſuſpended ab Officio, 70, was for a comprehenſion, 71, dies, 326, publiſhes biſhop Overall's book, 333
Saragoza; deſcription of that place, 605, battle near it, ibid. king Charles comes thither, 606, the duke of Vendoſme takes poſſeſſion of it, 609
Sardinia reduced, 555, ſecured by ſir John Norris, 604
Savoy, Amadeus II. D. of, accedes to her grand alliance, 100, defeated at the battle of Saluſſes, 101, applies to K. William and the ſtates-general, 102, moſt of his towns taken, 120, K. William and the ſtates of Holland allowed him one hundred thouſand pounds a year, ibid. his af- [illegible] reſtored by the D. of Schomberg's aſſiſtance, ibid. makes a great progreſs in Dauphiné, takes Ambrun, &c. 141, falls ill of the ſmall-pox, ibid. beſieges Pignerol, 157, defeated at the battle of Marſaglia, ibid, &c. makes a ſeparate peace with France, 213, his daughter given in marriage to the D. of Burgundy, 215
Savoy, Victor Amadeus II. D. of, refuſes to have one of his ſons brought to England, and educated in the proteſtant religion, 286, his ducheſs proteſts againſt the bill of ſucceſſion, ibid. that duke commands the French army, 309, grows cold and backward, 310, his ſecond daughter married to the K. of Spain, ibid. owns the pretender, 313, the allies jealous of him, 359, comes into the grand alliance 394, the French diſcover it, ibid. their unreaſonable demands of him, 395, the K. of France's letter to him, ibid. gives notice of his proceedings to Q. Anne and the Dutch, ibid. count Staremberg brings him forces, ibid. the French king declares war againſt him, ibid. loſes his towns and continues firm, though not duly aſſiſted, by the emperor, 422, 444, has but a very ſmall army, and reſolves notwithſtanding to adhere to the grand alliance, ibid. admits none of the clergy into his councils, ibid. fortifies Turin, 478, refuſes the French king's offers, ibid. raiſes the ſiege of Turin, and defeats the French, ibid. undertakes to march an army into France, and Q. Anne makes a treaty with him, 501, 511, forms a project of invading Provence, ibid. enters Provence, and advances towards Toulon, 514, comes before that place, ibid. is obliged to retire, which he does in very good order, ibid. recovers Suza, ibid. the lords addreſs Q. Anne to ſtrengthen his army, he having deſerved ſo well, 526, takes Exilles, Fort la Perouſe, the valley of St. Martin, and Feneſtrella, 554, makes alſo a diverſion in favour of K. Charles, ibid. receives the inveſtiture of the Mantuan and Montferrat, 559, France offers to reſtore Savoy to him, 576, and endeavours to draw him off from the grand alliance, 577, he refuſes to take the field, 582, indifpoſed as well as his ſon and brother, 604, has an interview with the emperor Charles, who grants him the inveſtiture of the fiefs in Montferrat, 628, penetrates as far as the Rhine, ibid. his miniſters angry at the report of their maſter's agreeing to a ſuſpenſion of arms, 667, one of his plenipotentiaries inſulted, 676, account of the differences between him and the court of Vienna, 678, Sicily offered to him, 679
Scarborough, Richard Lumley E. of, attends K. William to Ireland, 88, ſworn of the privy-council, 562, his ſpeech at dr. Sacheverell's trial, 593, is againſt the bill for limiting the number of officers, 596, moves for the thanks of the houſe of lords to be given to the D. of Marlborough, 616
Scarſdale, —— Leake E. of, proclamation for apprehending him, 131, complains of his commitment to the houſe of lords, 144
Schellemberg, battle of, 415
Schiſm formed by nonjuring clergy, 325, &c.
Schiſm-bill; proceedings and debates upon it, 720, extended to Ireland, 721
Schlick, count, enters Bavaria, 390, makes himſelf maſter of ſeveral places, ibid. defeated, ibid. takes Wiltzhoven, ibid.
Schomberg Frederic, duke and marſhal of, relieves Maeſtricht, 26, comes over with K. William, and is maſter of the ordnance, 29, elected knight of the garter, 33, the parliament gives him 100,000l. which is converted into 5000l. a year, 37, 66, has the command of that army in Ireland, ibid. his campaign there, 67, a plot in his army, ibid. his conduct in Ireland, 77, his army re-inforced, 81, takes a farther care of the Engliſh army, 88, takes Charlemont caſtle, ibid. oppoſes the paſſing of the Boyne, and adviſes the ſending part of the army towards Slainbridge, which not being done, he is diſcontented, 89, his bravery at the battle of the Boyne, 90, is ſlain there, ibid. his character, ibid. his ſaying about attacking the French in the Netherlands, 525,
Schomberg, Charles D. of, commands the horſe at the battle of the Boyne, 90, at the ſiege of Limerick, 98, goes to Turin, 121, and retrieves the D. of Savoy's affairs, that were in a deſperate condition, ibid. publiſhes a declaration, 141, is wounded at the battle of Marſaglia, and dies, 153
Schomberg, Maynhard D. of, made privy-counſellor, 182, commands the land-forces ſent to Spain, 397, velt-marſhal general of the Portugueſe forces, 421, ſome diſputes between him and the Portugueſe generals and miniſters, ibid. inſiſts that the auxiliaries may keep in a body, 421, captain-general of the queen of Great-Britain's forces in Portugal, ibid. publiſhes a proclamation about the Iriſh, &c. reſigns his command, 422, made a privy counſellor, 538

Schutz, baron, in the houſe of lords, 709, demands a writ for the elector of Hanover, as D. of Cambridge, 714, forbid the court, ibid.
Scot, dr. John, his account of lord-chancellor Jefferies, 64
Scotland; the Engliſh common-prayer and diſcipline attempted to be introduced there, 8, a convention meets there, 44, the throne declared vacant, 48, K. William and Q. Mary proclaimed there, 49, a faction ſprings up in the parliament, 51, an inſurrection headed by Dundee, ibid. the eſtabliſhing preſbytery there caſts a great load on K. William, 70, the rebels there under colonel Cannon retire to the iſle of Mull, and the highlanders renew their incurſions, 81, many that had been concerned in the plot there take out pardons, 118, and are put into the chief poſts in the government, 127, many in the miniſtry there enemies to the king and government, 160, letters intercepted between Scotland and France, ibid. proceedings of the parliament of that kingdom, ibid. and 182, diſguſted about recalling the act for their Eaſt-India company, 200, 246, great diſcontent there upon the loſs of the ſettlement at Darien, 254, 262, 263, petition drawn up there for a parliament, 262, a ſeſſion of parliament there, ibid. bill for uniting England and Scotland, ibid. K. William's letter concerning that union, 320, 321, bill for the union, 350, Q. Anne's letter to the privy-council there, 352, affairs begin to be imbroiled in that kingdom, ibid. Q. Anne takes the coronation-oath for that kingdom, ibid. at her acceſſion, the government was in the hands of perſons entirely of revolution principles, 353, ſtruggle there about the ſitting of the parliament, ibid. alterations in the miniſtry there, 377, a new parliament choſen, ibid. its proceedings, 378, an indemnity proclaimed, ibid. act for the ſecurity of that kingdom, 380, another for the ſucceſſion, 382, the diſorders in that kingdom riſe to a great height, 383, a plot there diſcovered, 398, 410, ſettlement made there by K. Charles I. ibid. treaty between that kingdom and England demanded, 411, a new commiſſion there made up entirely of Scots revolutioners, 413, the L. Haverſham's ſpeech about the proceedings in that kingdom, 426, &c. debate in the houſe of lords thereupon, ibid. &c. bill for a union, 428, the commons bring in a bill for preventing the dangers that might ariſe from ſome acts paſſed in Scotland, ibid. &c. change in the miniſtry of that kingdom, 436, three parties there, ibid. proceedings for the union with England, ibid. &c. commiſſioners appointed for it, 465, the pretender's intereſt promoted there, 482, the cavaliers reſolve to oppoſe the ratification of the union, 484, debates in the parliament there about it, 485, tumults there to defeat the union, 488, compleated at laſt, 489, land-tax there, 494, frauds deſigned by the merchants with regard to goods imported into Scotland, 497, a commiſſion for a new council ſent into Scotland, 498, two different parties formed in that kingdom, ibid. the affairs relating to it neglected, 518, &c. the act for the ſecurity of that kingdom, and about peace and war, repealed, 524, debates in the committee of the houſe of lords, about the bill for rendering the union of that kingdom with England more entire, 530, &c. juſtices of peace and an exchequer ſettled in that kingdom, 531, account of the pretenders deſcent into Scotland, 532, privy-council of Scotland diſſolved, 538, the peers of Scotland's eldeſt ſons incapacitated to ſit in parliament, 563, debates about the election of the ſixteen peers, 564, bill concerning trials for treaſon there, 567, &c. bill for a toleration of the Engliſh clergy there, 646, the kirk preſents a remonſtrance againſt it, ibid. act for diſcharging the Yule Vacance, and for reſtoring patronages, 647, the intereſt of the pretender promoted there, 700, 3 or 4000l. a year remitted to the highland clans, 710, 713, 714
Scots; reſolutions for declaring them aliens, 428, proceedings againſt that, 439, &c. the act which declared them aliens, repealed, 457, &c, oppoſe the malt-tax, and are very uneaſy, 693, move for an act for diſſolving the union, ibid. motion for inveſting the revenues of the biſhops in the queen, 720
Scottiſh Eaſt-India company, 183, 200, 246, account of its ſettlement at Darien, 253, &c.
Scottiſh lords in London, K. William's ſpeech to them, 43, their proceedings thereupon, 44, deſire his majeſty to take upon him the adminiſtration of affairs in Scotland, ibid. another ſpeech of K. William to them, ibid.
Scottiſh peers ſerviceable to the miniſtry, 636, very uneaſy at D. Hamilton's patent being diſallowed, 638, their repreſentation thereupon, 639, the queen's meſſage to the houſe of lords about it, 643, debates upon that point, ibid. they are promiſed and obtain ſatisfaction, 644
Screw-plot, 615
Seafield, ——— lord, ſecretary of ſtate for Scotland, 247
Seafield, James Ogilvy E. of, made chancellor of Scotland, 377, made ſecretary of ſtate, 413, reinſtated chancellor, 436, was for the union, 485, choſen one of the ſixteen peers, 537
Seafield, James Finlater E. of, ſworn a privy-counſellor, 562
Seal, the great, thrown by K. James II. into the Thames, 19, put in commiſſion, 613
Seamen; regulations about them, 461
Security, act of, in Scotland, 412
Serpa taken by the Spaniards, 505
Settlement, act of, in Ireland repealed, 58
Seymour, ſir Edward, propoſes an aſſociation, 19, is againſt the validity of the convention, 31, preſents an addreſs againſt Ludlow, 80, made a privy-counſellor and commiſſioner of the treaſury, 124, his character, ibid. at the head of the oppoſition to the court, 154, bribed by the Eaſt-India company, 176, 178, diſſuades the king from putting out a proclamation for coin to be received by weight and not by tale, ibid. oppoſes the aſſociation, 208, is againſt the bill for attainting ſir John Fenwick, 223, diſcovers to the parliament the practices of the new Eaſt-India company, 282, reflects ſeverely on the partition-treaty, 290, tampers with Kidd, 294, his opinion of Melfort's letter, 304, his character, 324, made a privy-counſellor, and comptroller of the houſehold, 347, lays Q. Anne's convention for declaring war againſt France before the commons, ibid. treats the Scots with great ſcorn, 350, his account as treaſurer of the navy, 371, moves for leave to bring in a bill to reſume all the grants made in K. William's reign, 372, his youngeſt ſon, Francis Seymour Conway, made baron Conway, 373, ſir Edward is againſt the place-bill, 372, 373, diſmiſſed from his place of comptroller, 409, his death and character, 537, 538
Shadwell, dr. gives the D. of Shrewſbury an account of Q. Anne's ill ſtate of health, 703, 705, 711, attends her in her laſt illneſs, 725, &c.
Shaftesbury, Anthony Aſhley Cooper, E. of, author of the Characteriſticks, his ſpeech for allowing counſel to ſtate priſoners, 197
Shales, John, purveyor of the army in Ireland, 66, his miſconduct, is ordered to be removed, and had been purveyor to K. James's army, 77
Sharp, John, appointed to review the liturgy, 71, made archbp. of York, 114, preaches Q. Anne's coronation-ſermon, and is her chief counſellor, 320, made a privy-counſellor, 374 his ſpeech about the occaſional conformity bill, 426, and about the increaſe of diſſenters, 459, ſpeak to Q. Anne in behalf of the French proteſtants, 700, dies, 706
Sheriffs of London; diſpute at the election of them, 538
Sherlock, dr. William, takes the oaths, 113, made dean of St. Paul's ibid. writes about the Trinity, 332
Ship-money, 8, aboliſhed, 9
Shippen, William, one of the commiſſioners for examining public accounts, 639, moves to examine the debts of the army, 691
Shovel, Cloudeſly, knighted, 62, takes the only frigate K. James had left, 88, ſubſcribes an addreſs to Q. Mary, 131, made one of the commanders of the fleet, 154, bombards Calais, 212, ordered to lay the copies of his papers before the houſe of commons, 226, has a regiment of marines given him, 227, ſent to aſſiſt in deſtroying the fleet at Vigo, 362, &c. his letter about the engagement near Malaga, 421, made rear-admiral of England, and commander in chief of the fleet, 429, ſome letters from the prince of Heſſe to him, 448, &c. commands the fleet that was to invade France, 480, and at the attempt upon Thoulon, 513, chagrined at the miſcarriage of that expedition, upon which he had ſet his heart, 515, caſt away on the Biſhops and Clerks, 516, account of him, and his character, ibid. a letter of his, 514
Shrewſbury, Charles Talbot, E. of, made ſecretary of ſtate, 29, his character, ibid. preſſes the abjuration-bill, 87, retires from court, ibid. deſigns to impeach the marquis of Caermarthen, 107, brings in the bill for the frequent calling and meeting of parliaments, 150, oppoſes the court, ibid. made again ſecretary of ſtate, 164, created a duke, ibid. made one of the lords-juſtices, 181, practices of mr. Smith againſt him, 225, his letter about it, 226, ſecretary Vernon communicates to him the king's letter, 248, hurt by a fall from his horſe, and reſigns the place of ſecretary of ſtate, but is made lord-chamberlain, and goes to Italy, 253, concerned in Kidd's affair, 256, refuſes the place of lord-lieutenant of Ireland, 260, reſigns the place of chamberlain, 264, taken again into the miniſtry, 596, votes in favour of dr. Sacheverell, 611, made lord-chamberlain, ibid. a ſecret management between him and mr. Harley, ibid. ſent embaſſador to France, though lord Bolingbroke was againſt it, 683, part of his inſtructions, 686, lord Bolingbroke's letters to him, ibid. made lord-lieutenant of Ireland, 701, encourages the proteſtant intereſt there, ibid. his ſpeech to the parliament there, ibid. returns to England, 703, is againſt extending the ſchiſm-bill to Ireland, 721, does not join either of the contending parties, 722, 724, made lord-treaſurer, 725

Sicily; the imperialiſts deſign the conqueſt of that iſland, 513, offer of giving it to the D. of Savoy, 679, 684, yielded to him, 644, 742, Sidney, Henry, afterwards earl of Romney, made gentleman of the bedchamber, 29, his character, ibid.

Sidney, Henry, lord-viſcount, made one of the lords-juſtices of Ireland, 99, one of the ſecretaries of ſtate, and lord-lieutenant of Ireland, 126, was thought partial, 161, recalled, and made maſter of the ordnance, ibid. and colonel of the firſt regiment of foot-guards, 164

Sileſia; the proteſtants in that country have their churches reſtored to them, 509, but they receive no benefit from Q. Anne's interpoſition in their favour, 559, the imperial court refuſes to grant the inhabitants the exerciſe of the proteſtant religion, 609, &c. loan to the emperor of the revenues of that province, 642

Silk-Weavers petition againſt the bill for wearing woolen manufactures, 65

Silk trade, very advantageous to England, 692

Smalridge, George, made dean of Chriſt-Church, 698, refuſes the biſhoprick of Briſtol, 704, accepts of it, and is made lord-almoner, 706, votes againſt the court, 715

Smith, John, chancellor of the exchequer, 255, choſen ſpeaker of the houſe of commons, 453, 521, made under-treaſurer, chancellor of the exchequer and a privy-counſellor, 539, his ſpeeches at Sacheverell's trial, 590, is one of the managers, ibid. made a teller of the exchequer, 613, his ſpeech about the peace, 695, in behalf of the whig miniſtry, 696

Smyrna fleets comes in ſafe, 119, another damaged, 157, 162

Snape, dr. debate in the houſe of commons, about his preaching on the 29th of May, 530, publiſhes an anſwer to Bp. Hoadley's ſermon, ibid. and a ſecond letter to him, 718, removed from being the king's chaplain, 719

Sobieſki, John, king of Poland dies, 215, his character, 230

Society for reformation of manners 242, for propogating the goſpel in foreign parts, ibid.

Socinians publiſh books, 155

Soldiers; exactions of their colonels and agents upon them, 174, &c.

Solmes, count, at the ſiege of Limerick, 98, the command of the army in Ireland left with him, 99, his ill conduct at the battle of Steenkirk, 135, taken notice of for the ſame in the houſe of commons, 145, killed at the battle of Landen, 156

Somerſet, Charles Seymour, D. of, refuſes to attend on the pope's nuncio, 17, is for declaring war againſt France, 347, made maſter of the horſe, 363, has a meeting with ſome of the eminent members of the houſe of commons, 521, refuſes to proceed to buſineſs in the privy-council, after the D. of Marlborough was gone, 531, offers the Bank a ſum of money, 538, alienates Q. Anne's mind from her old miniſtry, 614, maſter of the horſe, and refuſes to ſit any more in council, ibid. his ducheſs made groom of the ſtole, and miſtreſs of the robes, 617, conſultation about removing him, 641, removed, ibid. pamphlets againſt him, 641

Sommers, John, made ſollicitor-general, 30, draws up the proclamation of war againſt France, 60, diſtinguiſhes himſelf in the houſe of commons 86, made attorney-general, 126, and lord-keeper, 154, his character, ibid. his propoſal for preventing clipping, 179, made one of the lords-juſtices, 181, made lord-chancellor, and baron of Eveſham, 227, writes for a ſtanding army, 237, his good conduct, 244, &c. K. William communicates to him the partition-treaty, 248, two letters of his, ibid. and 250, concerned in Kidd's affair, 256, attempts to diſplace him, 260, the tories endeavour to remove him, ibid. his argument in the bankers caſe, ibid. &c. the king demands the great-ſeal of him, 261, he delivers it up, 262, his character, ibid. he is blackened about Kidd's affair, 294, debate concerning him in the houſe of commons, ibid. &c. gives that houſe a particular account of the partition-treaty, ibid. impeached by the commons, ibid. their addreſs againſt him, 295, articles againſt him, with his anſwers, 296, acquitted, 300, his advice about the conqueſts in the Weſt-Indies, 310, a tract of his, 311, had a hand in K. William's laſt ſpeech, 317, who was the author of his diſgrace, 324, left out of the privy-council, 347, is againſt the occaſional conformity-bill, 369, draws up the lords addreſſes, 404, his anſwer to the E. of Nottingham about the partition-treaty, 427, his ſpeech in the debate about the danger of the church, 459, moves for a bill to correct ſome of the proceedings in the common-law and chancery, 462, and for diſcouraging the great number of private acts, ibid. had the chief hand in promoting the union between England and Scotland, 468, ſpeaks in behalf of the union, 491, 495, his ſpeech about the ſtate of the nation, 522, made preſident of the council, 561, ſupports the dukes of Hamilton, Montroſs, and Roxburgh, 564, moves for an amendment of the act of treaſons, 568, moves for an addreſs for demoliſhing Dunkirk, 569, removed from the place of preſident of the council, 613

Sophia, princeſs, put into the ſucceſſion of the crown, 29. See ſucceſſion, her name ordered to be put into the public prayers, 359, a motion for bringing her over to live in England, 430, &c. 455, writes a letter to the archbiſhop of Canterbury intimating her readineſs to come over, 456, acts for naturalizing her, 458, called an unbaptized Lutheran, ibid. Q. Anne's letter to her, 718, her death and character, 719

South-Sea trade and company, 622, ſtoc, 700, company, 707, 723

Sout-Leuwe, attacked and taken by the allies, 444, a deſcription of that place, ibid.

Spain accepts the neutrality of Italy, 215, K. of Spain dangerouſly ill, 247, 249, intrigues of the court of France, to ſecure the crown of Spain, ibid. ſends a memorial againſt the ſettlement at Darien, 254, the ſucceſſion to that kingdom ſecured by the French, 263, 264, that court offended at the partition-treaty, 267, 270, great want of money there, 309, K. Charles II. of Spain makes a will in favour of the emperor's ſecond ſon, 270, and another in favour of the D. of Anjou, 272, dies, 274, his will is accepted by the court of France, 275, war declared againſt Spain, 348, their ſettlements in America plundered by the Engliſh, 377, Spain invaded by the Portugueſe and their allies, 446, the Spaniards invade Portugal, and take ſeveral towns, 422, beſiege Gibraltar in vain, ibid. &c. 446, debate in the houſe of lords about the affairs of Spain, 525, they addreſs the queen for the reſtitution of it to the houſe of Auſtria, 526, an inquiry begun in both houſes about the affairs of Spain, 530, the ſervice of the Engliſh there is decried, ibid. campaigns there, 554 and 583, the French offer to give Spain to K. Charles, 571, 596, &c. K. Philip gets his ſon, the prince of Aſturias, acknowledged heir of that monarchy, 576, publiſhes a manifeſto againſt all that ſhould be done at the Hague to his prejudice, 586, heads his army, 604, the Spaniards defeated at the battle of Almanara, ibid. &c. and at Saragoza, 605, and at Villavicioſa, 607, the proſecution of the war there a favourite project, 616, conduct of affairs there taken into conſideration by the parliament, 617, campaign there, 627, the emperor demands Spain, 651, Engliſh forces there called home, 680, peace between that kingdom and England ſigned, 705, proclaimed, 707, debates about it, 715, the Spaniſh trade examined by the lords, 722

Spanheim, baron, embaſſador from the K. of Pruſſia, 429, demands a reparation for the arreſt of the Ruſſian embaſſador, 560. See alſo 569

Spirebach, battle of, 394

Spires burnt by the French, 69

Sprat, Thomas, biſhop of Rocheſter, refuſes to ſign the aſſociation 209, did not think a biſhop could be deprived by the archbiſhop, 334, his character, 337, his death and character, 698

Squadrone, or flying ſquadrons in Scotland, 436, promoted the union, 485, few of them are choſen repreſentatives in parliament, 490, were againſt allowing ſome unreaſonable debts, ibid.

Stage; liberty of it ſcandalous, 253

Stair, lord, ſecretary for Scotland, his letter about the Glencoe affair, 184, diſmiſſed from his office, ibid.

Stair, John Dalrymple viſcount, created an earl, 383, heartily concurs in the union, 466, was for the union, 485, dies, 489

Stair, John Dalrymple E. of, detached to provide corn for the army, 550, ordered to ſell his regiment, 711

Stamford, Thomas Grey E. of, made commiſſioner of trade, 499, his ſpeech about the ſtate of the nation, 522
Standards taken at Ramillies carried to Guildhall, 491
Standing army; papers for and againſt it, 237
Stanhope, Alexander, his proceedings at the court of Madrid, 265, 267, and at the Hague, 274, 275, 278, his propoſals to the court of France for ſecuring the Netherlands, 287, embaſſador to Holland, 344, his memorial to the ſtates, 367
Stanhope, brigadier and afterwards general, taken priſoner with his regiment, 422, at the ſiege of Barcelona, 447, and at the taking of Montjuic fort, 448, &c. offers to furniſh K. Charles with what he wanted, 475, envoy extraordinary to the K. of Spain, 481, had orders to go and ſeek the enemy, 501, concludes a treaty of commerce with K. Charles XII. frames a bill about the vaſſalage of the clans in Scotland, 533, commander in chief of the queen's forces in Spain, 555, forms the deſign of conquering Minorca, which he accompliſhes, 556, &c. is for the bill for limiting the number of officers, 596, is ſurpriſed at Brihuega, 607, endeavours an exchange of priſoners, but continues confined to the end of the war, 627, writes againſt the treaty of commerce, 692, had a hand in the Britiſh Merchant, 693, moves for an addreſs to the queen, to preſs the D. of Lorrain to remove the pretender out of his dominions, 697, ſpeaks in R. Steele's behalf, 709, endeavours to ſecure the proteſtant ſucceſſion, 712, maintains that it was in danger, 716, ſpeaks againſt the ſchiſm-bill, 720, 721, dines with L. Bolingbroke, 725
Stanian, Abraham, envoy extraordinary to the proteſtant cantons, promotes the K. of Pruſſia's intereſt to the principality of Neufchatel, 517
Staniſlaus Leezinkſki choſen K. of Poland, 423, crowned, 452, acknowledged K. of Poland, 481, forced to fly into Saxony, 507, introduced to the D. of Marlborough, 508
Staremberg, Guido de, commands the infantry at the battle of Luzzara, 360, his remarkable march, 395
Staremberg, count, ſent to Spain, 526, appointed commander in chief there, 554, the beſt general of the age for the defenſive, 556, commands in Spain, 628, Torcy deſires that Q. Anne ſhould put a ſtop to his projects, 674
States of Holland, their charges for K. William's expedition into England repaid, 38, 600,000l. granted them, 65, treaties with them, 61, 68, their memorial upon Lewis the XIV's accepting of the K. of Spain's will, 276, preſſed hard by him to declare themſelves, 277, their memorial laid before the parliament, 283, the French king's anſwer to them, 291, they refuſe to treat but in conjunction with England, ibid. their anſwer to K. William's ſpeech, 369, and to the French king's memorial, ibid. augment their army, and regard their fortifications, 371, alliance between them, Great-Britain, and Denmark, ibid. and between them, Great-Britain, and the emperor, 372, in great conſternation upon K. William's death, 344, Q. Anne's letter to them, ibid. publiſh an anſwer to de Barre's memorial, 345, declare war againſt France, 348, conclude a treaty with Portugal, 395, ſome of the ſtates were againſt ſending an army to the Moſelle, 414, their deputies do not conſent, that the D. of Marlborough ſhould attac the enemy in their poſts, 444, the D. of Bavaria makes propoſals to them for holding conferences for a peace, 481, their deputies have a conference thereupon with the miniſters of the allies, ibid. treaty between England and K. Charles how communicated to them, 506, their memorial againſt the conqueſt of Naples, 511, &c. give Q. Anne intelligence of the preparations made at Dunkirk for the pretender, and concert meaſures for aſſiſting her, 532, the court of France makes propoſals of peace to them, but the D. of Marlborough convinces them of the treacherous deſigns of that court, 573, reſolve to enter into no ſeparate treaty, ibid. &c. their reſolution about Petkum's journey to France, and the paper he brought from thence, 586, do not approve of the offers of peace made by France, 597, deſire to have the D. of Marlborough ſent over, ibid. interpoſe in favour of that duke, 613, their deputies propoſe to hazard a battle with the French, 626, were againſt the ſiege of Bouchain, ibid. will not agree that Queſnoy ſhould be beſieged, 627, alarmed at the preliminaries of peace ſigned by the Engliſh, 635, the emperor's letter to them, ibid. the Imperial plenipotentiaries preſent a memorial to them, ibid. were againſt opening a congreſs, 636, barrier-treaty concluded with them, 645, the commons paſs ſeveral votes injurious to them, ibid. write a letter to the queen about the barrier-treaty, 646, publiſh a memorial againſt the commons repreſentation, ibid, &c. their plenipotentiaries at the treaty of Utrecht, 649, Q. Anne conſents that they ſhould have Dendermond and Ghent, 652, give prince Eugene the ſupreme command of their army, 653, jealous of the Engliſh, 654, memorial of their deputies upon the D. of Ormond's refuſing to fight, 656, expoſtulate with biſhop Robinſon upon it, 657, write a letter to the queen upon that ſubject, ibid. and 663, the reſolutions of the commons about that letter, 665, reſolve to entertain the auxiliaries in Britiſh pay, 666, aſſemble on the D. of Ormond's declaration about a ceſſation, 667, have a conference with the E. of Strafford and biſhop Robinſon, but will not agree with a ceſſation, 668, 674, 676, take upon themſelves the payment of moſt of the auxiliaries in Britiſh pay, 674, propoſe a new ſcheme of a peace, 680, the E. of Strafford propoſes to them a new plan, which they except of, 684, &c. they write a letter to Q. Anne, 685, her anſwer to it, 686, 687, their plenipotentiaries ſign the treaty of Utrecht, 690, the anſwer of the ſtates to the E. of Strafford, concerning the conferences at Radſtadt, 705, conclude a treaty with the elector of Hanover, 712, called upon to be ready to perform the guarantee of the proteſtant ſucceſſion, 726, the letter to Q. Anne, June 5, 1712, 738
Steele, Richard, his reflections about Dunkirk, 699, is choſen a burgeſs for Stockbridge, and reſigns his place as one of the commiſſioners of the ſtamp-duty, 704, publiſhes the Criſis, ibid. reflected upon in the public ſpirit of the whigs, 708, &c. obnoxious to the miniſtry, and complained of in the houſe of commons, 709, his motion about Dunkirk, ibid. his trial in the houſe of commons, 710, expelled, ibid.
Steenkirk, battle of, 135
Stevens, William, proſecuted for a pamphlet, 500
Stillingfleet, Edward, made biſhop of Worceſter, 70, talked of for the ſee of Canterbury, 169
Stirum, count, defeats the Bavarians, and takes Newmark and Amberg, 390, attacs and defeats the marquis d'Oſſon, 393, mortally wounded at the battle of Schellemberg, 415
Storm; the dreadful one in 1703, 396
Stormount, lord viſcount, letters ſent to him by the pretender, 484, brought priſoner to London, 537
Strafford, Thomas Wentworth lord Raby, created viſcount and E. of Strafford, and ſent embaſſador to Holland, 631, mr. St. John communicates to him France's propoſals of peace, ibid. his inſtructions communicated to the French miniſter by mr. St. John, 634, communicates the preliminaries of peace to the ſtates, 635, is appointed plenipotentiary for the peace of Utrecht, ibid. his letter to captain Deſborough relating to prince Eugene, 642, comes to Utrecht, 649, his ſpeeches at the congreſs there, ibid. is ſent for to England, 653, goes to the Hague, and preſſes the ſtates to come into the queen's meaſures, ibid. declares her intentions, and has a conference with prince Eugene, ibid. his ſpeech in parliament about the negotiations at Gertrudenberg, 658, and on the plan of peace, 663, ſent to the Hague to induce the ſtates to accept the offers of France, 668, inſiſts that the ſtates ſhould withdraw their forces from Spain and Portugal, ibid. goes to the D. of Ormond's army, ibid. goes incognito to the French camp, to concert meaſures with marſhal Villars, 671, makes himſelf obnoxious to the Dutch by his haughty carriage, 676, the mob break his windows, and ſet up a wheel before his houſe, ibid. his letter to mr. Prior, 677, refuſes to ſign the treaty of Utrecht, without the ceſſion of Tournay to the ſtates, 678, comes to England, 680, various conjectures about his coming, ibid. returns to Holland, 683, propoſes a new plan of peace to the ſtates, ibid. &c. goes incognito to Amſterdam, and has ſeveral conferences with the leading magiſtrates, 684, ſcruples to ſign a ſeparate peace, 688, ſigns it at laſt, 689, inſtalled knight of the garter, 700, ſpeaks to the deputies of the ſtates about the conferences of Radſtadt, 705, and about the barrier in the Netherlands, 706
Straſburg; the French offer to reſtore that place, 575, 576, 596, was to be reſtored to the emperor, 685, 689
Stuart family, deſcended from king Robert II. by his concubine Elizabeth Mure, 6 Succeſſion in the houſe of Hanover; K. William's ſpeech about it, 282, addreſs of the lords thereupon, 284, the firſt vote about it, ibid. heads of the bill of ſucceſſion, 285, that bill paſſed, 286, proteſted againſt by the duchеſs of Savoy, ibid. a clauſe in a bill making it high-treaſon to endeavour to defeat the ſucceſſion, 370, the ſame enacted in Ireland, 386, declared in Scotland, 410, debates about it, 411, 436, &c. addreſs of thanks from the commons about the ſucceſſion, 454

Sugar iſlands belonging to the Engliſh ravaged by the French, 678
Sunderland, Robert Spencer E. of, embraces popery, 17, perſuades K. James to uſe gentle methods, ibid. adviſes him not to accept an army offered him by the French king, 18, excepted out of the indemnity, 87, gains credit with K. William, 154, is the cauſe of L. Sommers and ſir John Trenchard's promotion, ibid. is a great confident of the king, and perſuades him to change his miniſtry, 164, brings about a reconciliation between the king and princeſs Anne, 171, was for the land-bank, 209, made lord-chamberlain, and privy counſellor, 227, reſigns his places and retires from buſineſs, 238, his wiſe adminiſtration, ibid. his order againſt play-houſes, 253, ſent envoy extraordinary to the emperor Joſeph, 445, 446, made ſecretary of ſtate, but againſt queen Anne's will, 499, 500, ſome of his letters to the E. of Mancheſter, about the expedition to Naples, 511, 513, his letter to general Stanhope, 556, ſupports the dukes of Hamilton, Montroſs, and Roxburgh, 564, ſpeaks at dr. Sacheverell's trial, 595, diſmiſſed from his place of ſecretary, 613, his removal inſerted in the French Gazette, ibid. his letters to general Stanhope about the war in Spain, 617, 618, 619, his ſpeech in parliament about the preliminaries of peace, 637, his counteſs reſigns her place of lady of the bed-chamber, 641, his ſpeech about the union, 695, moves for a ſecond addreſs about removing the pretender out of Lorrain, 697, 713, his ſpeech about the Catalans, 712, and on the ſchiſm-bill, 721
Supplies granted for the war, 62, a ſupply of two millions voted, 75, of four millions, 106, of above three millions for the fleet and army, 125, of above five millions, 147, &c. 150, &c. of five millions and a half, 162, of almoſt five millions, 169, of above ſeven millions for the year 1709, 563
Suſpenſion of arms between England and France, 660, articles for it ſigned, 661
Suza taken, 102
Sweden, Charles XI. and XII. king of, 228, alliance between Sweden and France, 249, a league formed againſt K. Charles XII. 265, peace between him and Denmark, ibid. makes a deſcent in Zealand. ibid. defeats the Muſcovites at Narva, 282, routs the Poles and becomes maſter of their camp, 310. See Charles XII. attacked by the Czar, 609, a manifeſto publiſhed there againſt Denmark, ibid. the Swedes land in Rugen, 628, defeat the Danes, 688, &c. enter Mecklenburg, ibid. are defeated, ibid.
Swift, Jonathan, account of him, 633, goes over to the tories, ibid. his fable of the Widow and her Cat, 644, writes againſt the barrier-treaty, 645, his band-box plot, 681, made dean of St. Patrick's, 698, writes The public Spirit of Whigs, 708, careſſed by the lord-treaſurer, ibid. reflected upon, 721

T.

Taffe, alias Thomas O'Mullen, diſcovers the Lancaſhire plotters, 173, his character, ibid. diſguſted and turns againſt the court. ibid.
Taſnieres, battle of, Blaregnies, or Malplaquet, 580, &c.
Talbot, William, made dean of Worceſter, 114, biſhop of Oxford; his ſpeech at dr. Sacheverell's trial, 593
Tallard, count, comes embaſſador from France to England, 246, waits upon K. William in Holland, 248, formed a party in England againſt the partition-treaty, 302
Tallard, marſhal de, his preſumption at the battle of Hochſtet, 416, taken priſoner, 417, brought to England, and ſent to Nottingham, 428, correſponds with France, 526 obtains leave to go to France, 634
Talmaſh, Thomas, general, at the ſiege of Athlone, 115, and battle of Aughrim, 117, his reſolute behaviour, ibid. at the ſiege of Limerick, 118, made lieutenant-general of the foot, 128, commands the regiments of foot, that were ſent over from Holland, 131, of the court-martial to try Grandval, 137, named by the houſe of commons as a perſon fit to command the foot, 145, his bravery at the battle of Landen, 156, wounded at the attempt upon Breſt, and dies, 166
Tankerkerville, Ford Grey, lord, made lord privy-ſeal, 281
Tarbat, George Mackenzie, lord viſcount, made ſecretary of ſtate, 377, created earl of Cromarty, 383
Tariff, 680, 685, 686, 687, 691, 695
Tax on marriages, births, and burials, 169
Temple, ſir Richard, moves to pay the forces abroad by ſending over Engliſh manufactures, 147, defeats the French guards, and takes their baggage, 541, his regiment attacs a party of French, 547, removed from his command of a regiment of dragoons, 690
Tenniſon, Thomas made biſhop of Lincoln, 127, tranſlated to Canterbury, 169, preaches Q. Mary's funeral ſermon, 172, made one of the lords-juſtices, 181, attends K. William in his laſt moments, 322, diſpute between him and the lower-houſe of convocation, about the power of adjourning, 335, &c. his ſpeech in the convocation, 409, refuſes to receive the form of addreſſes, ſent up by the lower-houſe of convocation, 463, prorogues the convocation 464, brings in a bill for the ſecurity of the church of England, 492, receives two letters from the queen, ordering him to prorogue the convocation, 500, a proteſtation prepared againſt him by the convocation, ibid.
Teſſé, marſhal de, the French king's embaſſador-extraordinary to the pope, 558
Teſt, ſacramental, K. William endeavours to have it taken away, 33, 325, paſſed in 1673, 331, a letter againſt it ordered to be burnt, by the commons, 571
Thanet, Thomas Tufton, earl of, made a privy-counſellor, 374, his ſpeech in the debates about the union, 495
Thaun, count, conquers Naples, 512, &c. prepares to march over Mount Cenis, and takes Anneci, 582, takes upon him the command of the confederates, 604
Theſſé, marſhal de, at the ſiege of Barcelona, 475, ſent to cover France on the ſide of Thoulon, 501
Thiſtle, order of the, revived, 383
Thompſon, ſir John, created baron of Haverſham, 212
Tillotſon, John, employed in the review of the liturgy, 71, deſigned for prolocutor of the convocation, but not choſen, 73, made archbiſhop of Canterbury, 113, his character, ibid. and 160, dies, ibid. penſion granted to his widow, ib.
Tilly, count, plunders Picardy, 546, becomes commander in chief of the Dutch troops, 550, paſſes the Scheld to relieve Bruſſels, 552, all the confederate troops are left under his command, 554, at the battle of Malplaquet, 580, at the taking of Doway, 602, &c.
Tindal, dr. Matthew, his Rights of the Chriſtian Church burnt, 595
Tirconnel, Richard Talbot, earl of, lord-lieutenent of Ireland, promotes popery in that kingdom, 52, turns all the proteſtant officers out of the army, and puts papiſts in their room, ibid. gives out commiſſions for levying thirty thouſand men, ibid. uſes the proteſtants with great ſeverity, 54, made a duke, ibid. ſails from Ireland into France with K. James, 91, 96, his papers taken, and treaſonable practices found therein, ibid. returns to Ireland and goes bac to France, 100, returns to Ireland with ſome proviſions, 114, dies in Limerick, 117
Tythes; act for the more eaſy recovery of ſmall tythes, 209
Toland, John, his Chriſtianity not myſterious cenſured, 336, his Dunkirk or Dover, 699, his Art of Reſtoring, 705, formerly employed by the lord-treaſurer, ibid. his Reaſons and Neceſſities of the duke of Cambridge's coming over, 718
Toleration; the preſbyterians irreconcileable enemies to it, 12, bill of toleration preſented to the parliament, 34, paſſed, 35, one paſſed by K. James in Ireland, 59, the independents for it, and the preſbyterians againſt it, 327, hated by many of the clergy, 334
Torcey, marquis de, comes to Holland to negotiate a peace 571, 572, deſires paſſes for ſome miniſters from France to Holland, but is refuſed, 585, 586, writes ſome letters to the D. of Marlborough, ibid. his papers ſent by Petkum, ibid. ſends another project to Petkum for a peace, 596, tranſmits to England new propoſals of peace, 631, 633, his memorial, 652, his anſwer to Gultier's memorial, 659, letters between mr. St. John about the king of Spain's renunciation, 659, &c. his anſwer to lord Bolingbroke's memorial, 686
Tongeren deſcribed, 391, taken by the French, ibid. they abandon it, ibid.
Tories; beginning of that name and party, 14, were for paſſive obedience, &c. 15, did not favour popery nor arbitrary power, ibid. depart from the doctrine of paſſive obedience, 17, in ſome reſpects become whigs ibid. join with the whigs in inviting over the prince of Orange, 18, adhere to the divine unalienable hereditary right of kings, 20, moderate and rigid tories, 21, beget in K. William jealouſies of the whigs, 37, diſplaced, and were againſt carrying on the war, 164, preſs hard upon the E. of Sunderland, 239, the old Eaſt-India company falls into their hands, 240, in the adminiſtration, 258, endeavour the removal of lord Sommers and others of the miniſtry, 260, ſend a propoſal to king James to have the pretender put into the ſucceſſion, 274, ſeem zealous for the bill of ſucceſſion, 284, &c. find fault with the partition-treaty, 288, are againſt the adjuration-act, 319, pretend great zeal for the princeſs of Denmark, ibid. were greatly in Q. Anne's favour, 342, oppoſe the taking away the firſt-fruits, and tenths, 406, were for inviting over the princeſs Sophia, 454, oppoſe the act of regency, 456, are againſt penſioners and place-men ſitting in the houſe of commons, ibid. gain great advantage by dr. Sacheverel's trial, 610, reflect upon the emperor and the Dutch for interpoſing in the duke of Marlborough's favour, 613, a new combination among them, 620, many of them diſlike the peace, 665

Torrington, Arthur Herbert, E. of accuſed of treachery and cowardice, at the battle of Beachy-Head, 93, is ſent to the Tower, 94, tried and acquitted, 95, the king is offended at his acquittal, and takes away his commiſſion, ib.

Torrington, Edward Herbert, earl of, his reflections on the E. of Nottingham's account of the conſpiracy, 404

Toulon beſieged by the allies, 511, 513, the ſiege raiſed, 514, remarks upon that expedition, 515

Toulouſe, count of, blocks up Barcelona by ſea, 475, leaves it. ibid.

Tournay; a deſcription of that place, 578, beſieged, ibid. taken 579, &c. the French king refuſes to ratify the articles for the ſurrender of the citadel, ibid. it ſurrenders at laſt, ibid. the French demand the reſtitution of it, 677, &c.

Tourville, monſieur de, ordered by king Lewis to ſeek out and engage the Engliſh fleet, 131, defeated at la Hogue, ibid. commands the French fleet, 158

Tonſhend, Charles, lord viſcount, attends the D. of Marlborough to Holland, 571, as embaſſador-extraordinary, 575, his character, ibid. has a conference with the Dutch embaſſador, 597, 599 delivers a memorial to the ſtates, 600, makes the barrier-treaty with the ſtates, 644, 646, his ſpeeches about the union, 695, and againſt the ſchiſm-bill, 721

Trade, council of, voted, 201, endeavours to reſettle the trade between England and France, 246

Traerbach; the French imagine the D. of Marlborough intended to beſiege that place, 414, beſieged and taken by the allies, 419,

Trant, ſir Patrick, commiſſioner of the Iriſh revenues, 579

Treaty; a private one between K. James and the K. of France, 13, another ſecret treaty between them, 54, between England and Holland for a joint-fleet, 61, another treaty between them, 68, between England and Denmark, ibid. of peace at Ryſwick, 227, &c. between France and the emperor, 235, of partition, 249, the ſecond treaty of partition, 263. See Partition. Treaties of the grand alliance laid before the commons, 319, treaty between England, Portugal and Holland, 395, &c. between England and Pruſſia, 429, draught of an act for a treaty between England and Scotland, 438, 439, peace between England and Spain ſigned, 707, taken into conſideration by the houſe of lords, 715, 722, extracts of it, 740

Treaty of commerce between K. Charles and England, 506, how diſcovered to the Dutch, ibid. treaties of peace and commerce brought to England, and ratified by Q. Anne, 690, motion in the houſe of commons to addreſs her to communicate them to that houſe, 691, laid before the parliament, ibid. the ſubſtance of them, ibid. and 740, taken into conſideration by the houſe of lords, 710, 715, debates thereupon, ibid. account of theſe treaties laid before the commons, 716

Treby, ſir George, made chief-juſtice of the common-pleas, 126

Trelawney, ſir Jonathan, biſhop of Exeter, oppoſes the the reſt of the biſhops in convocation, 337, tranſlated to to Wincheſter, 521

Trenchard, ſir John, made ſecretary of ſtate, 154, his character, ibid. dies, 181, author of an argument againſt ſtanding armies, 521

Trenchard, John, one of the truſtees for the forfeited eſtates, in Ireland, 385

Treves taken by the French, 359

Trevor, ſir John, choſen ſpeaker of the houſe of commons, 84, his character ibid. made firſt commiſſioner of the great-ſeal, 87, made a privy-counſellor, 107, and maſter of the rolls, 154, concerned in corrupting the members of the houſe of commons, 174, expelled the houſe of commons for corruption, 175, &c. 178, the commons deſign to impeach him, 181

Trevor, ſir Thomas, made ſollicitor-general, 153, made a baron 653, his ſpeech about the union, 695, ſpeaks againſt ſetting a price on the pretender's head, 714

Triers; the fortifications of it blown up by the imperialiſts, 442, ſeized by the French, ibid.

Trimnel, Charles, made biſhop of Norwich, 521, his ſpeech at dr. Sacheverel's trial, 594

Trinidado taken and burnt by the Engliſh, 377

Trinity; complaint of books againſt it, 242

Trinity College, Dublin; five thouſand pounds given for building a library there, 630

Tripoli and Tunis, the peace between thoſe places and England renewed, 388

Trumball, ſir William, adviſes K. William to ſend a fleet into the Mediterranean, to ruin the French trade with Turkey, 140, made one one of the commiſſioners of the treaſury, 165, made ſecretary of ſtate, 182, his character, ibid. choſen one of the repreſentatives for the univerſity of Oxford, 196, one of the lords of the treaſury, 201

Tumult in Edinburgh and other places on account of the union, 488

Turenne, prince of, killed at the battle of Steenkirk, 136

Turin threatened with a ſiege by the French, 446, beſieged by the French, 477, &c. deſcription of that place, ibid. the ſiege raiſed, 479

Turks defeated by the imperialiſts, 122, 123, &c. and at Zenta, 235, peace between them and the emperor, 249, revolution among them, and a new ſultan ſet up, 423, promiſe the emperor not to aſſiſt the Hungarians, ibid. declare war againſt Muſcovy, 609, peace between them, 628, Charles XII. endeavours to kindle a new war between them and the czar, 688

Turner, Francis, biſhop of Ely, enters into a plot to reſtore K. James, 109, proclamation for apprehending him, 113

Tweedale, John Hay marquis of, made lord-chancellor of Scotland, 127, 160, the king's commiſſioner there, 182, his character, ibid. his ſpeech to the parliament, ibid. diſmiſſed, 200, one of the leaders of the country party in Scotland, 378, made high-commiſſioner, 410, his ſpeech in parliament about the ſucceſſion, ibid. &c. on paſſing the act of ſupply, 412, &c. is made lord-chancellor, ibid. excuſes himſelf from ſerving as high-commiſſioner, 428, removed from being lord-chancellor, 436, preſents to parliament the draught of an anſwer to the queen's letter, 438, was for the union, 485

Two and a half per cent. allowed to the D. of Marlborough, by the princes who had troops in Q. Anne's ſervice, cenſured by the commons, 644,

V.

Valencia, campaign there, 450, &c. moſt of the towns there declare for K. Charles, ibid. in a council of war held there, it is reſolved to act offenſively, 501

Vanbrugh, ſir John, draws the plan of Blenheim-houſe, 429

Vanderduſſen, monſieur, penſioner of Gouda, has conferences with the French commiſſioners about a peace, 572, &c. 597, one of the Dutch plenipotentiaries at the treaty of Utrecht, 649, his ſmart ſaying to Polignac, about the French proteſtants in the gallies, 651

Vaudemont, prince of, commander in chief of the confederate's infantry, 186, his famous retreat, 188, he is thanked by K. William for it, 189, burns the French magazines at Givet, 212

Vaudois; their tranſactions in Savoy, 100, 121, 122, reſtored, 141, Q. Mary eſtabliſhes a fund for maintaining preachers and ſchoolmaſters among them, ibid.

Venant, St. taken, 604

Vendoſme, D. of, relieves Mantua, 359, ſent to join the elector of Bavaria in Tyrol, is forced to return bac, 393, takes ſeveral places in Savoy, 422, has an engagement with prince Eugene, 446, ſent to command in Flanders, 474, fixes himſelf in a ſtrong camp, ibid. the D. of Marlborough follows him, but cannot bring him to an engagement, 510, appointed to ſerve under the D. of Burgundy, 539, at variance with him, 543, 545, defeated at the battle of Oudenard, but makes a good retreat, 543, 544, takes Leſſingham, 550, ſurpriſes a body of the Engliſh at Brihuega, 607, defeated at Villaviciosa, ibid. takes poſſeſſion of Sarragoza, 608, attacs ſeveral places in Spain, but to no purpoſe, 628

Venice; embaſſadors from thence have an audience, 499, forbid the court, 537

Venlo taken, 358

Vernon, James, made ſecretary of ſtate, 244, the E. of Portland's letter to him about the partition-treaty, 248, he ſends to the lord Sommers, ibid. lays before the houſe of commons all the papers relating to the partition-treaty, 293, made one of the tellers of the exchequer, 347

Vienna, court of, proceeds with its uſual flowneſs, 395, 526, influenced by the jeſuitical councils, and French money, 727
Vigo; Spaniſh galleons and French fleet deſtroyed there, 362
Villars, marſhal, ſent to reduce the Cevenois, 422, made a duke, and the chief dependance of Lewis XIV. 441, retires at the D. of Marlborough's approach, ibid. takes part of the garriſon of Croon Weiſſenburg priſoners, 444, demoliſhes the walls of that town, ibid. paſſes the Rhine, and makes a great progreſs in Germany, 507, deſigns to reſtore the elector of Bavaria to his dominions, ibid. repaſſes the Rhine, ibid. called the fortunate general, and commands in Dauphiné, 615, ſent to command in Flanders, 578, wounded at the battle of Malplaquet, 581, unadviſedly weakens the garriſon of Tournay 578, endeavours to raiſe the ſiege of Doway, 602, attacs the foragers of the allies, 603, 604, boaſted that his lines were impenetrable, 626, and yet they are ſurpriſed by the D. of Marlborough, ibid. Villars reflected upon for it, ibid. a favourite of madam de Maintenon, 627, declares a ſuſpenſion of arms, 671, forms the deſign of poſſeſſing himſelf of the camp of the Danien, 672, his letter to the D. of Ormond about the action there, 674
Villa-Franca taken by the French, 120
Villavicioſa, battle of, 607
Villeroy marſhal de, general of the French, bombards Bruſſels, 191, taken priſoner by prince Eugene at Cremona, 310, ordered to march into Wirtemberg, and deſtroy that country, 416, approaches near Landau, but does nothing, 419, hinders the elector of Bavaria from ſurpriſing general Auverquerque, ibid. beſieges Liege, 441, receives poſitive orders from the French king to fight the allies, 470, flies to Louvain after the defeat at Ramillies, 473, ſent to command in Dauphiné, 539
Villers, Charlotte, afterwards lady Orkney, an enemy to the counteſs of Marlborough, 129
Villers, Edward, viſcount, one of the plenipotentiaries at the treaty of Ryſwick, 227, made one of the lords-juſtices of Ireland, ibid. and E. of Jerſey, and ſent embaſſador to France, 245. See Jerſey.
Vivans, marquis of, paſſes the Rhine, and defeats the Germans, 507, defeated by them, ibid.
Underdown, captain, his expedition to the Weſt-Indies, 516
Union of England and Scotland, bill for it, 349, commiſſioners to treat about it, 354, &c. their proceedings, ibid. the commiſſion made void by parliament, 382, the beginning of that union, 436, &c. treaty for that union, 438, 440, a clauſe offered by the D. of Hamilton about it, ibid. he moves that the nomination of officers ſhould not be left wholly to the queen, ibid. the union recommended by the queen in her ſpeech, 444, &c. addreſs of the commons thereupon, 454, proceedings about the union, 464, commiſſioners appointed for it, 465, &c. articles of the union, 468, &c. preſented to the queen, 467, the cavaliers in Scotland reſolve to oppoſe the ratification of it, 484, the nobility there ſuffered a great diminution by it, ibid. a powerful party in Scotland againſt it, 485, promoted by the nobility, ibid. and by the ſquadrone, ibid. and 486, debates about it, ibid. proteſts againſt it ibid. and 487, &c. addreſſes againſt it, 488, tumults in Edinburgh and other places, on account of the ſame, ibid. it is completed, 489, commiſſioners for it rewarded, ibid. debates in the houſe of lords concerning it, 491, the queen's ſpeech concerning the union, 492, &c. the articles of it preſented to the houſe of commons, ibid. debates there about the union, ibid. and again in the houſe of lords, 493, bill for enacting it, 496, paſſed, ibid. proteſts againſt it, ibid. ill uſe deſigned to be made of the 4th and 6th articles of the union, ibid. &c. congratulatory addreſſes upon the union, 498, 518, reſolution of the commons for making the union more complete, 524, which articles of the union are alterable, 643, the Scots move for an act to diſſolve it, 693, &c. petition ſigned at Edinburgh for that purpoſe, 701, attacked in the Public Spirit of the Whigs, 708
United Provinces; account of their government, 24, &c. barrier for them, 482
Univerſities for the prerogative, and paſſive obedience, 6, 15, act for veſting in them the preſentations to papiſts livings, 65, the leading men there jealous of K. William, 70, the univerſities propagate the notion of the church's being in danger, 452
Univerſity of Dublin, the fellows and ſcholars of it ejected by K. James, 59
Voltaire, monſieur de, his account of the D. of Marlborough's negotiations with baron Gortz, 507, his account of the D. of Marlborough's and the K. of Sweden's interview, 528
Urſini princeſs, her intereſt eſpouſed by the Britiſh plenipotentiaries at Utrecht, 689, the ſtates regard for her, 705, Q. Anne obliges herſelf to procure Limberg for her, 741, to be put in poſſeſſion of that duchy, ibid. account of her, ibid.
Utrecht; conferences for a peace there, 635, the treaty there opened, 649. See Treaty, Peace, and France. Summary of the proceedings there, 652, &c. 685, &c. the treaty ſigned, 689, &c. See Treaties and Peace.

W.

Wade, captain Cooper, his cowardice, 376, tried and ſhot for it, ibid. and 377
Wade, brigadier, aſſiſts at the conqueſt of Minorca, 556, acts in Spain, 605
Wager, Charles, deſtroys ſome Spaniſh galleons, 559, made rear-admiral of the red, 584
Wagers; bill to prevent them, 570
Wake, dr. William, his ſtate of the church and clergy of England, 409, made biſhop of Lincoln, 434
Walcourt, battle of, 69
Waldeck, prince, defeated at the battle of Flerus, 102, &c. commands the confederate army in Flanders. 119, &c.
Walden, Henry Howard lord, made commiſſary-general of the muſters, 363, created baron of Cheſterford and E. of Bindon, 491
Wales, court of marches there aboliſhed, 65
Walker, ſir Hovenden, commands the ſquadron in the Canada expedition, 629
Walmſley, mr. his houſe the head quarters for the plotters againſt K. William, 139
Walpole, Robert, moves for a reſumption of the grants made in K. James's reign, 372, made ſecretary at war, 538, cenſured, on account of the forage, 644, writes and ſpeaks againſt the treaty of peace, 692, in behalf of R. Steele, 709, 710, his ſpeech to prove the ſucceſſion in danger, 716, ſpeaks againſt the ſchiſm-bill, 720, propoſes to have the toleration act extended to Ireland, 721
Walpole, Horace, ſpeaks in favour of R. Steele, 710
Walſh, mr. ſome lines of his Golden Age, 364
War declared againſt France by the diet of Ratiſbon, the United-Provinces, Spain, England, &c. 59, 60, declared againſt France and Spain, by England, the emperor, and the ſtates-general, 344, &c. the expences of it for the twelve laſt years before the peace of Utrecht amounted to above ſixty-eight millions and a half, 716
Warneton ſeized by the French and abandoned again, 578
Warwick, Edward Rich E. of, tried for murder, 253
Waterford ſurrenders to K. William, 97
Watſon, Thomas, biſhop of St. David's, againſt the court, 146, unwilling to ſign the aſſociation, 209, deprived for ſimony, 434
Webb, major-general, his bravery at the battle of Oudenard, 542, he and others put Picardy under contribution, 546, preſerves a convoy from Oſtend to Liſle, 449, beats the French at Wynendale, ibid. &c. thanked for it by the houſe of commons, and honoured with the order of generoſity by the king of Pruſſia, 550, and 568, made governor of the iſle of Wight, 614
Welwood, dr. James, taken into cuſtody for his Mercurius Reformatus, 126, made one of the phyſicians in ordinary to K. William, ibid.
Weems, David Weems E. of, choſen one of the ſixteen Peers, 537
Weymouth, Henry Frederick Thynne lord viſcount, made a privy-counſellor, 347, reſigns his place of commiſſioner of trade, 490
Wharton, Mary, carried away by colonel Campbell, 106
Wharton, Thomas, one of the commiſſioners to inſpect the books of the chamberlain of London, and of the Eaſt-India company, 175, comptroller of the king's houſehold, 178, his report about the Eaſt-India affairs, ibid. and 179, carries the duke of Leed's impeachment up to the houſe of lords, ibid.
Wharton, Thomas lord, moves for an addition to the lord's addreſs, 290, is againſt the occaſional conformity-bill, 398, his petition about the honour of Richmond, and the proceedings of the lords thereupon, 405, ſupplies and manages the Ayleſbury men, 431, opens the debate for the act of regency, 455, his ſpeech about the danger of the church, 459, was born a diſſenter, ibid. created viſcount Winchendon and E. of Wharton, 494, ſpeaks in behalf of the union, ibid. another ſpeech of his in the debate about it, 495, his ſpeech about the decay of trade, 522, the D. of Marlborough expoſtulates with him, ibid. made lord-lieutenant of Ireland, 561, holds a parliament there, 587, returns to England, 588, his ſpeech at dr. Sacheverell's trial, 593, reſigns the office of lord-lieutenant of Ireland, 613, held a parliament in that kingdom, ibid. &c. turned out of his place of chief-juſtice in eyre, 616, moves for the lords entering their proteſts, 618, ſpeaks againſt the peace, 636, 637, and againſt the reſumption of K. William's grants, 647, his ſpeech on occaſion of the D. of Ormond's refuſing to fight, 658, upon the queen's communicating the plan of peace to the parliament, 663, &c. attempt in the houſe of commons to faſten a miſdemeanor on him, 691, moves for an addreſs that the pretender ſhould be removed out of Lorrain, 634, 713, makes a complaint againſt the public ſpirit of the Whigs, 707, repreſents the danger that threatened the proteſtant ſucceſſion, 710, 713, his ſpeech about the Catalans, 712, &c. and about the peace, 716, ſpeaks againſt the ſchiſm-bill, 720, complains of ſome being liſted in the pretender's ſervice, 722, his ſpeech on account of the pretender's not being removed out of Lorrain, ibid. about the Spaniſh trade, 723

Wheeler, admiral, caſt away, 164

Whigs; beginning of that name and party, 14, their character and principles, 15, K. William jealous of them, 29, loſes his good opinion of them, 77, they grant him his revenues only from year to year, ibid. and 36, 37, promote the bill for taking the militia from the king and the lords-lieutenants, 38, make the king great promiſes, if he would paſs the corporation-act. 79, republican and moderate whigs, 22, diſcontented at the preferring of ſome men, 128, join againſt the court, 158, are again brought into the adminiſtration, 164, diſliked biſhop Stillingfleet's being made archbiſhop, 169, jealous of the E. of Sunderland, 239, loſe their credit in the nation, being charged with robbing the public, 240, grow unpopular, and were for continuing the taxes and army, 281, Q. Anne prejudiced againſt them, 342, had charged the nation with taxes, of which a large ſhare had been devoured by themſelves, 363, have the majority in the houſe of commons, 453, join in oppoſing the inviting over the princeſs Sophia, 454, &c. in a ſtate of war with the tories, 563, alarmed at the E. of Sunderland's removal, 613, removed from the lieutenancy of London, 614, uneaſy at the doctrine of paſſive obedience, 616, diſlike the peace, 665, hated the lord-treaſurer for having done too much, 700, the public ſpirit of the whigs, a pamphlet, 708, take all imaginable care to ſecure the proteſtant ſucceſſion, 712, &c. ſign an aſſociation, ibid. whig lords hold a conſultation at the E. of Halliſax's, 714, try to inflame the animoſity between the E. of Oxford and the L. Bolingbroke, 725

Whiſton, William, his character and odd notions, 624, the cenſure paſſed on him not confirmed by Q. Anne, 653

Whitaker, ſir Edward, admiral, aſſiſts in the conqueſt of Minorca, 556, reduces Port-Fornelli, ibid. brings forces from Naples to Spain, 583, made vice-admiral of the white, 584

White-Friers ceaſed to be a priviledged-place, 226

Whitehall; part of it burnt down, 113, burnt almoſt entirely, 244

Whitelock, ſir William, his ſaying upon the motion for addreſſing Q. Anne to have the pretender removed out of Lorrain, 697

William III. K. and Q. Mary are declared king and queen, 20, uneaſy at the proviſion required for the princeſs of Denmark, 37, proclaimed king and queen of Scotland, 50, 51, acknowledged by an act rightful and lawful ſovereigns, 86

William, K. ſettles a privy-council and appoints a miniſtry, 28, grows jealous of the whigs, 29, his ſpeech to his firſt parliament, 30, attempts to have the ſacramental-teſt taken away, 33, uneaſy at the revenue being granted him only from year to year, 37, his letter to the Dutch, 38, his ſpeech to the Scotch lords, 43, his letter to the convention in Scotland, 46, declares war againſt France, 60, goes to Portſmouth, and diſtributes rewards to the officers and ſailors who were at the fight of Bantry-Bay, 61, buys Kenſington palace, 62, dines with the lord-mayor, 70, promotes a comprehenſion, and gives a commiſſion to ſome divines for that purpoſe, 71, 73, his ſpeech of his own compoſing, to the parliament, 74, diſpleaſed with the whigs, by reaſon of their coldneſs in his intereſt, and their granting him the civil liſt but for one year, 77, a conſpiracy againſt him, 79, the king, not knowing how to truſt the tories, and being determined not to truſt the whigs any more, reſolves to go to Holland, and leave the government in the queen's hands, but alters his deſign, and goes to Ireland, ibid. the cuſtoms ſettled upon him for four years, and the hereditary exciſe for life, 85, 86, rejects a propoſal made to him for ſeizing K. James, 88, lands in Ireland, ibid. forbids any violence on the country people, ibid. orders his whole army to move towards the Boyne, 89, receives a ſlight wound, from whence a rumour of his being killed ſpreads as far as Paris, ibid. defeats K. James at the battle of the Boyne, and behaves with great bravery during the whole action, 90, &c. ſome thought he would not have hazarded a battle, 95, publiſhes a declaration promiſing pardon and protection to the Iriſh, 96, a deſign formed to aſſaſſinate him, ibid. iſſues out a proclamation for crying down K. James's braſs money, ibid. canes a ſoldier who was robbing a poor woman, and cauſes him and ſome others to be hanged, ibid. publiſhes a ſecond pardon, 97, ſets out for Holland, and is in great danger on the coaſt there, 108, his ſpeech at the congreſs at the Hague, ibid. &c. plot againſt him by lord Preſton, 109, returns to England, ibid. goes to Holland again to command the confederate army, 114, eſcapes narrowly being killed, 120, the Spaniards offer to deliver the government of Flanders to him, 123, comes bac to England, ibid. party formed againſt him, 124, was thought to love the Dutch more than the Engliſh, and was naturally ſilent and moroſe, ibid. and 155, fond of his prerogative, 124, not pleaſed with the preſbyterians in Scotland, ibid. goes to Holland, 129, a plot for aſſaſſinating him formed by colonel Parker, &c. ibid. marches towards Namur intending to relieve that place, 134, blamed for not hazarding a battle to relieve ſo important a place, 135, his uneaſineſs at ſeeing the Engliſh not duly relieved at the battle of Steenkirk, 136, Grandval's and Dumont's plot to aſſaſſinate him, ibid. &c. puts out a proclamation againſt vice and immorality, 142, returns to England, 143, dines with the lord-mayor, &c. at Guildhall, ibid. is adviſed to ſend away all the foreign forces he had in England, 148, and to demand of the Dutch and Spaniards cautionary towns, 150, books, pretending to prove that he and Q. Mary came by way of conqueſt, burnt, ibid. refuſes to paſs the bill for the frequent calling and meeting of parliaments, 151, jealous of his miniſters, who are thought to betray him, 154, party formed againſt him, 155, &c. was not eaſy of acceſs, ibid. took no notice of the clergy, and ſhewed no great regard for religion or the church, ibid. goes to Flanders, ibid. his bravery at the battle of Landen, 156, eſcapes narrowly being killed, 157, finds he had been too haſty in truſting ſome in Scotland, 160, does not take due notice of that kingdom, ibid. returns to England, 161, refuſes to paſs the place-bill, 163, makes an alteration in his miniſtry, 164, goes to Holland, 165, commands the army, 166, returns to England, 169, inconſolable for the loſs of his queen, 171, &c. reconciled with the princeſs Anne, 172, his declaration for the ſtrict diſcipline of the army, 175, was apt to ſign papers in a hurry, 184, goes to Holland, 182, his letter to the parliament of Scotland, ibid. vindicated from being the author of the murder at Glencoe, 184, beſieges Namur, 187, his letter of thanks to prince Vaudemont upon his famous retreat, 189, his reputation raiſed by the taking of Namur, 194, comes bac to England, 195, takes a progreſs to Stamford, &c. ibid. iſſues out a proclamation for calling in the clipped money, 199, addreſſes preſented to him about the Scotch Eaſt-India company, 200, diſowns the act made for it, ibid. his anſwer to the commons addreſs againſt the grant to the earl of Portland, 202, not inclined to believe the reports about the aſſaſſination-plot, 203, the ſeveral ways contrived to aſſaſſinate him, 205, Pendergraſs and de la Rue give him an account of that plot, ibid. his ſpeech to the parliament on the diſcovery of the plot, 207, refuſes the royal aſſent to a bill for regulating the elections of members of parliament, 209, gives the royal aſſent to Fenwick's attainder, 224, appoints regents, and goes to Holland, 227, gains great reputation by the peace of Ryſwick, 230, returns to England, ibid. deſpiſed pageantry, ibid. his letters to the E. of Galway about diſbanding the army, ibid. and 243, 252, was againſt diſbanding the army, 236, extremely uneaſy at the reſolution taken to do it, 238, 239, a revenue for life granted him, ibid. goes to Holland, and leaves ſealed orders behind him, 247, his letter to the lord Sommers, 248, returns to England, 250, is ſo uneaſy at diſbanding his Dutch guards, that he reſolves to leave the government, ibid. his meſſage to the commons about the Dutch guards, 251, goes to Holland, 253, chagrined at the proceedings of the commons, 154, his letters to the E.

of Galway, ibid. and 260, 281, endeavours to prevent a breach between Sweden and Denmark, 255, returns to England, ibid. his anſwer to the commons remonſtrance, 256, the grants of lands he had made in Ireland reſumed by the commons, 257, &c. his anſwer to the commons addreſs about them, 259, very much againſt it, and very uneaſy, ibid. his letter to the D. of Queenſberry and privy-council of Scotland, 263, goes to Holland, 264, is weary of the nation, which is highly diſcontented, 265, through his mediation a peace is concluded between Denmark and Sweden, ibid. highly reflected on by the Imperial and Spaniſh courts, about the partition-treaty, 268, returns to England, 274, his letter to the parliament of Scotland, ibid. &c. full of indignation at the French not obſerving the treaty of partition, 278, falls into an ill ſtate of health, and his legs ſwell, 279, the whigs complain of his conduct, 281, ſees the neceſſity of a new war, 282, alarmed at the preliminaries of the bill of ſucceſſion, 285, orders his envoy at the Hague to enter into negotiations with the miniſters of France and Spain, for ſecuring the tranquillity of Europe, 287, acquaints the parliament with his negotiations for the mutual ſecurity of England and Holland, ibid. his anſwer to the commons addreſs about the partition-treaty, 288, and to the houſe of lords about the ſame, 291, his meſſage to the houſe of commons about the French king's anſwer to the ſtates-general, ibid. his anſwer to the commons advice upon that meſſage, ibid. owns the K. of Spain, ibid. his letter to him, 292, ſends ſuccours to the ſtates, 293, his anſwer to the commons addreſs for removing the lords Portland, Sommers, Orford, and Hallifax, 295, not pleaſed with the tories, 302, &c. in a bad ſtate of health, 306, goes to Holland, his ſpeech to the ſtates there, ibid. goes to view the frontier garriſons, 307, uneaſy at the E. of Rocheſter's temper, 311, orders the E. of Manchester to quit France upon the pretender's being proclaimed there, 314, pleaſed with the addreſſes ſent to him upon the proclaiming of that perſon, 315, falls ill at the Hague, and declares to the E. of Portland, that he found himſelf ſo weak he did not expect to live long, 316, returns to England, ibid. his ſcheme to reduce the power of France, 320, his letter for an union with Scotland, 321, has a fall from his horſe, and breaks his collar-bone, ibid. dies, 322, his character, ibid. &c. his reſerved behaviour to the princeſs Anne, 341, his ſaying of the D. of Marlborough, ibid. the funds fell upon his death, 342, the conſternation in Holland upon the news of his death, 345, great rejoicings in France upon that account, ibid. the diſaffected greatly rejoice at the ſame, and vilify the deceaſed king with libels, verſes, &c. 350, a report of ſome papers found in his ſtrong box, for getting the elector of Hanover declared his immediate ſucceſſor, ibid. &c. his papers viſited upon that account, the report found to be falſe and malicious, and the ſpreaders of it ordered to be proſecuted, ibid. clamours againſt his adminiſtration, and the management of the revenue in his reign, 371, a motion for reſuming all the grants made in his reign, 372, one expelled for aſperſing his memory, 588, about drinking to his memory, ibid. his ſtatue defaced, 614, deſign in the houſe of commons to reſume his grants, 621, the K. of Pruſſia preſſes the ſettling of his ſucceſſion, 628, had 50,000l. per annum for contingencies, 644, bill to examine into the grants made by him, 647, &c. his birth-day ſolemnized by the whigs, 681

William's or Coehorn fort, at Namur, 188

Williams, ſir William, his odd behaviour at the trial of the Lancaſhire plotters, 173, 174, his ſpeech againſt the grant made to the E. of Portland, 202, was againſt ſigning the aſſociation, 209

Wilks, lieutenant-general, at the ſiege of Liſle, 546, detached to ſecure Warneton, 578

Willoughby, ſir Thomas, created baron Middleton, 641

Willes, general, commands the garriſon of Lerida, 505, marches to Terragona, ibid. ſerves in Spain, 605, taken priſoner at Briheuga, 607

Willes, John, now lord chief-juſtice of the common-pleas, writes an anſwer againſt Hereditary Right, 704

Wilmore, ——, his paper againſt the lieutenancy of London, 151, taken up for it, 152

Winchester, Charles Paulet marquis of, made one of the lords-juſtices of Ireland, 227

Winchelſey, William Finch E. of, made firſt commiſſioner of trade, 631

Windſor, capt. Edward, diſmiſſed for neglect of duty, 560

Windſor, Thomas lord, made lieutenant-general, 614, created baron Montjoy, 641

Wines, French, a new impoſt of 8l. a tun upon them, 151, act for the importation of them into Scotland, 382

Winnington, ſir Francis, chairman of a committee, 147

Winter; a ſevere one, 554, 570

Wirtemberg, prince of, led the vanguard at the battle of Steenkirk, 135, his pay ſettled according to the Engliſh eſtabliſhment, 147

Wirtemberg, duchy of, laid under contributions by the French, 506

Wirtemberg, D. of, taken priſoner by the French, 145, ſends K. William notice of K. James's being come to Calais, 206, commands the Daniſh troops, and was well-affected to the allies, 471

Wolfenbuttle, D. of, enters into the French intereſt, 310, levies troops for France, but is diſarmed, 320, forced to quit the K. of France's party, 355

Wolfenbuttle, princeſs of, embraces popery, and is married to K. Charles, afterwards emperor, 517

Wood, lieutenant-general, at the ſiege of Liſle, 546, charges a party of French with two battalions only, 547

Woodſtock granted to the D. of Marlborough, 429

Woodward, dr. made dean of Sarum, 114, choſen prolocutor, 337, dies, 338

Wool, act againſt the exportation of it, 241, reſolutions againſt the exporting it into Scotland, 427, 428

Woollen manufacture; a bill for wearing it, 65, addreſſes againſt the woollen manufacture in Ireland, 243, woollen manufactures, hurt by the treaty of commerce, 692

Wratiſlaw, count, preſents a memorial to Q. Anne, 413, waits upon the D. of Marlborough, and ſettles all things for his march, 414, adjuſts all differences between the emperor and the K. of Sweden, 510, comes to Francfort, and to the Hague, 511

Wright, ſir Nathan, made lord-keeper, 262, and one of the lords-juſtices, 264, had put juſtices of peace in and out, 407, his character, ibid. compliments the D. of Marlborough, 428, diſmiſſed from his office, and is deſpiſed even by the tories, his character, 453

Worms burnt by the French, 69

Wyndham, ſir William, ſpeaks in favour of the treaty of commerce, 692, made chancellor of the exchequer, 700, and a privy-counſellor, 704, his ſpeech about the peace, 710, moves for the ſchiſm-bill, 719, ſpeaks for it, 720, 721, is againſt an addition to an addreſs againſt the pretender, 722, deſigned for one of the commiſſioners of the treaſury, 725

Wynendale, battle of, 449

Wynne, William, biſhop of St. Aſaph, ſupports the motion for an addreſs from Oxford, 79

X.

Xativa, the Engliſh retire thither, 504

Y.

York, John Sharpe archbp. of, ſworn a privy-counſellor, 562, ſpeaks in dr. Sacheverell's behalf, 594, againſt lay-baptiſm, 654

Young, Robert, forms a plot againſt ſeveral perſons, 142

Yule Vacance, 647

Z.

Zealand, plundered by a body of French, 667, &c.

Zell or Cell, George William D. of, made knight of the garter, 107, forces the D. of Wolfenbuttle to quit the intereſt of France, 355

Zeuta; the Turks defeated there, 235

Zeiher; account of him, 442

Zinzendorf, count, 509, 512, 571, the emperor's plenipotentiary at the Hague, 575, has conferences with the miniſters, ibid. and 576, 597, 599, is one of the emperor's plenipotentiaries at the treaty of Utrecht, 649, demands the reſtitution of the whole Spaniſh monarchy, 651, ſends expreſſes to the emperor, upon the D. of Ormond's refuſing to fight, 657, his memorial to the ſtates upon the peace, 667, propoſes a plan for the empire, furniſhing four millions of crowns, 680, ſends Q. Anne's plan of peace to Vienna, 686, draws up ſome new propoſals for a negotiation between the imperial and French miniſters, ibid. &c. communicates a ſecond plan of peace, 687, endeavours to have the ſigning of the treaty of Utrecht put off, 689, diſguſted at the offers of France, 690, inſiſts upon preſerving the privileges of the Catalans, 733

Zobor, count, quarrels with count Strahlenheim, 508, delivered up to the K. of Sweden, 509, releaſed, 510

Zuyleſtein, William-Henry de Naſſau L. of, ſent by the prince of Orange to K. James, 19, made maſter of the robes, 30, goes along with K. William to Holland, 108